In 1866 the superior proprietary rights of the village of Saheki were conferred upon Manohar Singh, the eldest of four brothers. It has been found by the Courts below, and this finding is not questioned before me, that Manohar Singh held the superior proprietary rights as the head and representative of the family. Upon his death in 1894 Sahodra, widow of Manohar Singh, claimed that mutation should take place in her name. She, however, admitted that the malikana after the payment of debts is equally divided between the four brothers. She stated that her son, Pemsingh, is deaf and dumb, and hence her name should be entered during her lifetime and after her death the name of Pemsingh should be entered in the Government records. The three brothers of Manohar Singh desired that the name of all four should be shown in the mutation register. The Tahsildar recommended mutation in accordance with the wishes of the brothers, but the Deputy Commissioner ordered that mutation should take place in the name of Sahodra. In this order (Exhibit D-6) the Deputy Commissioner says that Manohar Singh alone was the proprietor of the three villages. This appears to be a slip on the part of the Deputy Commissioner. What he meant was that Manohar Singh was the sole recorded proprietor of the three villages, for the title of the others was never denied either by Manohar Singh or his widow. In 1896-97 the Settlement Paroha showed the name of Sahodra as the superior proprietor of the villages. This was apparently in accordance with the mutation register. A Settlement Officer records facts upon the basis of possession. In the case of superior proprietary rights where only a malikana is realised, there can be no evidence of possession such as would be forthcoming in the case of a village held in inferior proprietary right. Presumably, the person who collected the malikana in the first instance was Sahodra, and as she admitted having divided the net income after payment of debts amongst the co-sharers, no adverse inference could be drawn against the brothers of Manohar Singh and their representatives. The point urged before me is that the possession of Musammat Sahodra was adverse to the plaintiffs, that is, the representatives of her husband's brothers. This argument is untenable in view of the facts I have just recited, and in view of the finding of fact arrived at by the District Judge that she had been dividing the profits till very recently. The appeal, therefore, stands dismissed with costs.

It is urged that the plaintiffs are barred by section 87 of the Land Revenue Act, 1881. This argument is meaningless. There was no award of proprietary rights in 1896-97 by the Settlement Officer. There was an award in 1866, but that award was made, as found by the Courts below, in favour of all the brothers, though only in the name of Manohar Singh. The appeal fails and is dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Transfer of Property Act (IV of 1882), s. 99, applicability of, to mortgage which never came into operation.

The provisions of section 99 of the Transfer of Property Act cannot be applied to the case of a mortgage which was never brought into operation, or which, according to its terms, could not come into operation until a condition was fulfilled, and that condition was not fulfilled. [p. 418, cols. 1 & 2.]

Appeal against the decree of the Court of the Additional Temporary Subordinate Judge, Tanjore (Original Suit No. 46 of 1917 (Original Suit No. 42 of 1916, on the file of the Court of the Subordinate Judge, Tanjore).

FACTS appear from the judgment.

Messrs. T. R. Ramachandra Aiyar, P. R. Srinivasa Aiyangar and K. S. Jayarama Aiyar, for the Appellant.—The sale to the appellant in 1916 must prevail over the respondent's sale. The respondent could not bring to sale the property in execution of his money decree, as his father was already a usufructuary mortgagee. Section 99 of the Transfer of Property Act barred that course. The purchase by the respondent's father was not valid. See Abdul Hashim v. Kader Batcha (1) and Srinivasa Swami Aiyangar v. Athmarama Iyer (2).

Mr. T. R. Venkatrama Sastri, for the Respondents.—Though there was a usufructuary mortgage in favour of the respondent's father, it never came into operation. The chief consideration for that mortgage was the discharge of Veerappa Chetty's Othi deeds. Only Rs. 7,000 was reserved for that purpose, but Veerappa Chetty having demanded Rs. 10,000, the Othi was not discharged; another item of consideration, Rs. 8,000, which was to be applied to respondent's decree debt was never so applied, nor were the tanks repaired as required by the mortgage deed, Exhibit B. Under the circumstances the respondent's father never acquired the status of a usufructuary mortgagee. Section 99 of the Transfer of Property Act will not apply where the mortgage was not acted upon. The document itself was, according to the evidence, returned to the Zamindar. The cases relied on by the appellant are distinguishable.

JUDGMENT.—The father of the defendants in this suit had a money decree against a Zamindar, the owner of the properties in dispute, and in execution of that decree brought them to sale in June 1893. The plaintiff, the appellant before us, bought the property by private sale from the Zamindar in 1916, under Exhibit A, and the appellant's case is that the purchase by the respondents' father was invalid inasmuch as the respondents' father was a usufructuary mortgagee of these properties and, therefore, under section 99 of the Transfer of Property Act of 1882 he could not bring the property to sale in execution of the money decree. The first question for determination is whether the defendants' father was in fact a usufructuary mortgagee.

What happened was, one Veerappa Chetty under Exhibits III and IV, Othi deeds of 1875, had a usufructuary mortgage for Rs. 10,750. He was to enjoy the property in lieu of interest. The defendants' father had a money decree for nearly Rs. 7,000. That was in Suit No. 64 of 1880. Then it appears that the Zamindar, the predecessor of the present Zamindar, executed Exhibit B, purporting to be a usufructuary mortgage, in 1882 for Rs. 16,000 in favour of the father of the defendants. The terms of that mortgage were that out of Rs. 16,000 the defendants' father was to pay off the Othis in favour of Veerappa Chetty (Rs. 7,000 odd) and he was to satisfy his own decree with a sum of nearly Rs. 8,000 and the balance of Rs. 1,000 he was to spend for repairing certain tanks in the Zamindari. Though the document was executed and registered about 3 months afterwards at the instance of the defendants' father, it is indisputable that on the one hand Veerappa Chetty's debt was never paid nor the decree debt due to the defendants' father, nor was any money spent for repairing the tanks as contemplated in Exhibit B, and on the other hand the defendants' father never got possession of the property. The decree which the defendants' father had was executed apparently without any objection on the ground that it was merged in or satisfied by Exhibit B and the property sold, as already stated, and bought by the defendants' father.

One of the issues in the case was whether Exhibit B ever came into operation at all so as to clothe the defendants' father with the status of a mortgagee to bring into operation section 99 of the Transfer of Property Act. It seems to us clear, once the nature of the transaction is properly grasped, that the parties could never have intended Exhibit B to come into operation until at least Veerappa Chetti's debt, in consideration for which he was in possession of the property in dispute as a usufructuary mortgagee, was satisfied. It appears from the evidence that Veerappa Chetty was unwilling to accept Rs. 7,000 in satisfaction of the Othis. He claimed that Rs. 10,000 was due to him and the Zamindar was unable to pay that amount. The defendants' father under Exhibit B on the other hand was not bound to pay more than Rs. 7,000 and odd mentioned in that document. The result was that Exhibit B could not be acted upon and the evidence is that the document was returned some time after to the Zamindar. Upon these facts it is impossible to hold that the defendants' father ever was a usufructuary mortgagee so as to be under any disability by virtue of section 99 of the Transfer of Property Act. It is obvious that Exhibit B as a usufructuary mortgage could not come into operation until the previous usufructuary mortgage had been satisfied, and that is why the document stipulated that Veerappa Chetty's mortgage should be paid off. That clearly implies that the parties intended that Exhibit B should not come into operation until Veerappa Chetty's Othis had been paid off. That is not a case like that in Abdul Hashim v Kader Batcha (1), where the mortgage had been acted upon, possession being obtained of at least a portion of the properties, and the mortgagee leased it to some other person. Similarly Srinivasa Swami Aiyangar v. Athmarama Iyer (2) has no application, because here not only was Exhibit B never acted upon by the parties, but according to the terms it could not come into operation unless a certain condition was fulfilled, and that condition was never fulfilled. For these reasons we are of opinion that the conclusion of the learned Subordinate Judge on this point must be confirmed.

The result is that the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Will—Widow succeeding under Will—Adoption by widow—Bequest by widow in favour of third person—Debt due to estate, adjustment of, with adopted son—Adopted son, whether competent to give discharge—Liability of debtor to successor under Will of widow.

Under the Will of her late husband, C. inherited his entire estate. She adopted a son B., and executed a Will in favour of the plaintiff, who on her death took possession of the estate and applied for Probate of the Will. B. opposed the grant of Probate and instituted a suit against the plaintiff for possession of C.'s estate A compromise was eventually effected between the parties, whereby B. executed a sale in favour of the plaintiff of whatever rights he may have had as the adopted son of C. The plaintiff then brought the present suit to recover from the defendant upon three bonds executed by him in favour of C. The defendant pleaded that he had adjusted the claim by payment to B. The Appellate Court dismissed the claim, on the ground that the effect of the compromise between B. and the plaintiff was to transfer B.'s rights subject to all his liabilities and subject to all that he had done as regards the property up to the date of the compromise. On second appeal:

Held, that the decision was erroneous; that as the sale in favour of the plaintiff contained no reservation that the giving of a discharge to debtors by B. would be recognised, and as there was no admission by the plaintiff that B. had any right to C.'s estate as adopted son, B. had no right to give a discharge to the defendant, and that consequently the adjustment with him could not be set up against the plaintiff. JUDGMENT —The plaintiff sued on three bonds executed by the defendant in favour of Chandubai deceased, proprietress of the firm of Girdharilal Chunni Lal. Chandubai had executed a Will in favour of the plaintiff, of which he has obtained Probate. The defendant admitted the bonds, but pleaded that he had adjusted the claim on them by a payment to Beharilal, who had been adopted by Chandubai and had in consequence become the owner of the firm. The plaintiff replied that Chandubai was the absolute owner of the firm under a Will by her husband Girdharilal and that the adoption of Beharilal did not divest her of the absolute interest she took under the Will.

Both parties admit that Beharilal had opposed the grant of the Probate and had himself sued the plaintiff for possession of Chandubai's estate and that both these proceedings were compromised by Beharilal executing a sale in favour of the plaintiff of whatever rights he may have had as an adopted son for a consideration of Rs. 10,000.

The lower Appellate Court has found that under Girdharilal's Will Chandubai became the absolute owner of his estate, that the adoption of Beharilal did not divest her of it, and that under Chandubai's Will the plaintiff became the owner of her estate. These findings are not challenged on behalf of the defendant. The first Court did not consider the effect of the adjustment with Beharilal apparently as it found that the adjustment was not proved. The lower Appellate Court found that the adjustment was made. It dismissed the plaintiff's claim, on the ground that the effect of the compromise between Beharilal and the plaintiff was to transfer Beharilal's rights in the property subject to all his liabilities as existing on the date of the compromise and "subject to all that he had done as regards the property till then." I am unable to agree with this finding as to the effect of the compromise. There is no reservation or condition in the sale-deed evidencing the compromise that the acts of Beharilal in giving a discharge to creditors are to be recognised. Nor is there any admission therein by the plaintiff that Beharilal had any right to the estate as the adopted son. All that can be said to be admitted by the plaintiff in the sale-deed is that there was a claim made by Beharilal that as an adopted son he was entitled to Chandubai's estate.

The plaintiff has obtained Probate of Chandubai's Will and he is prima facie the only person entitled to claim performance of the contracts made with the deceased and entitled to give a discharge. If the defendant pleads a discharge by Beharilal, the onus is on him to prove that Beharilal had the right to give it. According to the lower Appellate Court's finding of law given in paragraph 6 of its judgment which is not challenged by the defendant in this Court, he certainly had no such right. The mere fact that Beharilal was making a claim, not only not admitted but opposed by the plaintiff, does not give him a right to give a discharge or justify the defendant in making the payment to him in performance of his contract. The only argument advanced by the defendant's Counsel in this Court to justify the payment made by him to Beharilal is that he was led to believe by a notice, Exhibit D-1, given by Beharilal to him that Beharilal was the owner and entitled to receive the payment and that the adjustment of the claim with Beharilal was in good faith. I do not consider that the mere fact of the notice having been given in any way justified the defendant in adjusting the claim with Beharilal. The notice distinctly refers to a dispute with the plaintiff as regards the estate and says that Beharilal was about to bring a suit against the plaintiff for the same. It warns the defendant not to pay to the plaintiff. It does not demand that payment should be made to Beharilal. It only says: "if you do want to pay, pay it (i. e., debt) to me".

The evidence shows that at the time of the payment the defendant was told by Beharilal that the bonds in respect of which the payment was made were with the plaintiff. The adjustment was thus made with a person who was not in possession and whose title was to the knowledge of the defendant disputed. Under the circumstances of the case the payment could not have been made in good faith, which also seems to be negatived by the fact that the adjustment was made for a sum less than 1/3rd of what was really due. Clauses (a), (b), (e) and (f) of section 23 of the Specific Relief Act refer to the persons who in a case like the present would be entitled to claim performance of the contract. Beharilal was not at the date of the payment one of such persons. The lower Appellate Court's judgment proceeds upon the assumption that Beharilal had at the time of the adjustment a right to the estate either in law or admitted by the defendant. This assumption is not correct.

I hold that Beharilal had no right to give a discharge and the adjustment with him cannot be set up against the plaintiff. The appeal succeeds. The lower Appellate Court's decree is set aside and the first Court's decree is restored. The respondent will pay costs throughout.

Appeal allowed.

The sons of one M, a convert to Islam, sold six villages to their first cousin once removed. Plaintiffs, occupancy tenants in one of the villages, sued for possession by pre-emption of that village:

Held, (1) that the fact of the vendees being Christians did not deprive them of their right of succession to the vendors; [p. 422, col. 1.]

(2) that, therefore, the plaintiffs' right of pre-emption was inferior to that of the vendees and their suit was liable to be dismissed. [p. 422, col. 1.]

First appeal from the decree of the Subordinate Judge, 1st Class, Hissar, dated the 31st May 1916.

Maulvi Ghulam Mohy-ud Din for Mr. Habib Ullah Khan for the Appellants.

Messrs. Gokal Chand Narang and Vaughan, for Mr. R. H. Skinner, Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—Defendants Nos. 1 to 3 are the sons of Mr. Stuart Skinner, alias Nawab Mirza, who was a convert to Islam. In 1914 they sold six villages to Mr. R. H. Skinner, defendant No. 4. Plaintiffs, who are occupancy tenants in one of the villages, namely, Dhangar, sue for pre-emption in respect of that village. Their suit has been dismissed on the ground that their right of pre-emption is inferior to that of the vendee, as he would, but for the sale, be entitled to inherit the property on the death of the vendors, being their first cousin once removed. The plaintiffs have appealed to this Court, and the only argument advanced by Mr. Ghulam Mohy-ud-Din on their behalf is that as the vendors are Muhammadans, the vendee, being a Christian, is under the Muhammadan Law debarred from succeeding to their estate and has consequently no right of pre-emption. The lower Court has held that the disability created by the Muhammadan Law is removed by Act XXI of 1850, and the question before us is whether this view is correct.

Act XXI of 1850, which is described as an Act for extending the principle of section 9, Regulation VII of 1832 of the Bengal Code, throughout the territories subject to the Government of the East India Company, runs as follows:—

"Whereas it is enacted by section 9, Regulation VII, 1832, of the Bengal Code that whenever in any Civil suit the parties to such suit may be of different persuasions, when one party shall be of the Hindu and the other of the Muhammadan persuasion; or where one or more of the parties to the suit shall not be either of the Muhammadan or Hindu persuasions, the laws of those religions shall not be permitted to operate to deprive such party or parties of any property to which, but for the operation of such laws, they would have been entitled; and whereas it will be beneficial to extend the principle of that enactment throughout the territories subject to the Government of the East India Company, it is enacted as follows:—So much of any law or usage now in force within the territories subject to the Government of the East India Company as inflicts on any person forfeiture of rights or property, or may be held in any way to impair or affect any right of inheritance, by reason of his or her renouncing, or having been excluded from the communion, of any religion, or being deprived of caste, shall cease to be enforced as law in the Courts of the East India Company, and in the Courts established by Royal Charter within the said territories."

It is argued for the appellants that the Act only protects the convert from the loss of his right of inheritance in consequence of his renouncing his religion, and that it does not affect the provisions of the Muhammadan Law regarding the right of another person to inherit the property of the convert or convert's successors. It appears, however, that section 9 of Regulation VII of 1832 of the Bengal Code rendered the rule of Muhammadan Law by which a non-Muslim is debarred from inheriting the property of a Muslim inoperative in the Bengal Presidency. What we have to consider is whether the enactment of Act XXI of 1850 had the same effect throughout the territories subject to the Government of the East India Company.

We have not been referred to any case in which the point now in dispute arose, but a decision given in regard to the construction of Act XXI of 1850 in Bhagwant Singh v. Kallu (1) is against the appellants' contention. The case was one in which a Muhammadan whose father had renounced the Hindu religion claimed certain property as heir of his father's brother, and the question was whether Act XXI of 1850 applied, the plaintiff not being himself a convert, but being the son of a convert. It was held that the Act applied. Edge, C. J., remarked that as the Legislature in the preamble expressed the intention of the Act to be to extend the principle of section 9 of Regulation VII of 1832 throughout the territories of the East India Company, one would expect that in the operative part of the Act the principle of section 9 of the Regulation would not be cut down or curtailed. He then considered whether the Act did in fact cut down or curtail that principle and came to the conclusion that it did not. He held that the operative portion of the Act related to different classes of persons, the earlier portion protecting any person from forfeiture of right of property by reason of his or her renouncing their religion, or being excluded from caste, while the latter portion protected any person from having any right of inheritance affected by reason of any person having renounced his religion or having been excluded from caste, and he gave as his reason for this view that if the latter part of the section was restricted to the protection of the right of inheritance of the persons renouncing their religion or being excluded from caste, their case was covered by the words of the early part of the section.

From the interpretation placed on Act XXI of 1850 in that judgment it would necessarily follow that the Act abrogated the rule of Muhammaden Law by which a non-Muslim is excluded from succession to a Muslim.

In Kanshi Ram v. Jiwan (2) a doubt was expressed regarding the correctness of the decision of the Allahabad High Court, but the point was not decided or discussed, and in Gulab v. Ishar Kour (3), Stogdon, J., observed that he was inclined to think that the construction put upon the meaning of the Act by the Allahabad High Court was correct, although the matter was not one with which the Court was in that case particularly concerned. The Allahabad decision was, however, followed in Mahna v. Chand (4), it being held that Act XXI

(1) 11 A. 100; A. W. N. (1888) 288.

(2) 82 P. R. 1890.
(3) 63 P. R. 1895.

of 1850 applied not only to the convert himself, but to his heirs. In Jiwan v. Harnam Das (5) also the interpretation placed on the Act by the Allahabad High Court was accepted as correct. Counsel for the appellants has also cited Desu v. Jowala (6) and Badar Bakhsh v. Sahib Jan (7) and on the other side we have been referred to Khunni Lal v. Kunwar Gobind Krishna Narain (8) and Mukerji v. Alfred (9), but none of these rulings appear to afford any assistanse in determining the question before us.

We are of opinion that the construction placed on Act XXI of 1850 in Bhagwant Singh v. Kallu (1) was a right construction. Follow, ing that decision, we hold that the vendee has a right of succession to the vendors and that the suit for pre-emption has been rightly dismissed. We accordidgly dismiss the appeal with costs.

Where such an agreement is the result of a mistake, the mistake can be relieved against and the period of limitation within which relief may be sought is contained in Article 141 of Schedule I to the Limitation Act, commencing from the date of the death of the last holder of the estate. Mr. D. T. Mangalmurti, for the Appellant.

Mr. M. R. Bobde, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The following genealogical tree explains the relationship of the of parties:—

WASUDEO v. VITHAL.

Prior to the death of Gopikabai widow of Govindrao, who possessed an 8-annas share in the village of Babral, Tahsil Chanda, the owners of the village and malik makbuza field No. 342 in Mouza Chandli Buzrukh, Tahsil Chanda, were Gopikabai wife of Govindrao, 8 annas; father of defendant No. 1, 4 annas; Sadasheo defendant No. 2, 1 anna; Gopalrao father of plaintiffs Nos. 1, 2 and 3, 1 anna; plaintiff No. 4, 1 anna; father of plaintiff No. 5, 1 anna. Gopikabai died on 29th January 1905, and Krishna Bhat father of defendant No. 2 before her on 7th December 1902. So at Gopikabai's death her 8 annas share should have been divided among Gopalrao, plaintiff No. 3, Dinkarrao and Harbhat, father of defendant No. 1, each getting a 2-annas share. The 2nd defendant Sadasheo could not succeed. The family had divided, but partition by metes and bounds had not been effected. But owing to want of knowledge of law by the plaintiffs' forefathers and the cunningness of Harbhat, after Gopikabai's death her share was recorded 4 annas in the name of Harbhat, father of defendant No. 1, and 1 anna in the names of each of defendant No. 2, Gopalrao, Balaji and Dinkarrao; and parties have been holding possession and enjoying the shares. But the plaintiffs' real rights are still in force and plaintiffs now sue for a declaration that plaintiffs Nos. 1, 2 and 3 own a 3-annas share; plaintiff No. 4, a 3-annas share; plaintiff No. 5 a 3-annas share; defendant No. 1 a 6-annas share and defendant No. 2 a 1 anna share in the village and the Muafi field No. 342 and for getting joint possession of the shares. They ask for a separate partition of the 9 annas share, the property of the plaintiffs.

Defendants contested the suit, stating that Govindrao husband of Gopikabai died on 11th May 1901, and some four or five days before his death willed away his property in favour of Harbhat subject to the condition that his wife should enjoy it during her lifetime. Accordingly the widow entrusted her property to Harbhat at the time of her death and immediately afterwards the father of plaintiffs Nos. 3 and 5 came to the father of defendant No. 1 and began to claim a share in the said property. Harbhat refused to give any, but eventually agreed to give and mutate the shares in the names of the brothers and their nephews though they had no right to them. He gave an anna to Gopalrao father of plaintiffs Nos. 1 to 3; 1-anna to Balaji plaintiff No. 4; 1 anna to Dinkar father of plaintiff No. 5 and 1-anna to Sadasheo defendant No. 2. The settlement was agreed to by all the parties and accepted by them. The settlement was effected by Gopalrao as manager of the joint family and, therefore, binding on its members and as plaintiffs have acted according to the terms of the settlement for a long period, they are now estopped from claiming any further interest in the property. Other defences were raised which it is unnecessary for the moment to enter into. The result of the case in the first Court was, the Judge holds, that the oral Will set up by the defendants had not been proved and that the oral settlement had not been clearly established. He holds that Gopalpant, Dinkar and father of defendant No. 1 did not compromise the matter about the property of Govindrao in May 1905, and that the mutation proceedings in no way barred the present claim and that the plaintiffs' holding the shares they now do was due to a mistake of law on their part and that the mistake was not discovered until 1913. Article 141 of the Limitation Act was held to apply, limitation commencing from the death of Gopikabai. The claim was decreed.

On appeal, the Additional District Judge, in a careful judgment dealing with the question whether even as heirs of the deceased Govindrao the plaintiffs could not under the Hindu Law of inheritance get more than the shares they already get, come to the conclusion that the heirs took per capita and not per stirpes. They took in equal shares and consequently the appellant in the case is entitled only to 2-annas share. The Judge holds that with the plea of the Will stands or falls that of the alleged compromise at the time of mutation, for if there was no Will there was no occasion for any compromise. After scrutinizing the evidence adduced to prove the oral Will and the probabilities of the case the Judge finds the pleas of the Will and compromise were pure inventions. The question of estoppel was found against the defendant and as regards limitation the suit was found to be governed by Article 141 of the Limitation Act. A cross-objection filed by the 4th respondent as regards the partition of the field was decreed.

Against that decision the present appeal has been filed.

It is contended that the plaintiffs, having admitted that the unequal division of the property of the deceased Govindrao was made with the consent of all the claimants to the estate and having agreed to the unequal division under a mistake of law, are not entitled to avoid or re-open the division at all. It is further contended that there was no deception by Harbhat, nor was it due to him that the partition took place in the way it did; and that whether Govindrao made a Will or not was immaterial. It is contended that the parties, being under a bona fide belief that the division was to take place per stirpes and not per capita and having determined their shares on that basis and got them mutated accordingly, cannot how avoid that division. Appellant Wasudeo Harbaji further contends that the suit did not come under Article 141; it being clearly for relief on the ground that the determination of shares was due to a mistake, Article 96 of the Limitation Act governs it and as the mistake was discovered in 1913 and the suit was not filed till 26th January 1917, it is time-barred. In any case the partition was the result of a family arrangement and compromise. It is further contended that the arrangement effected at the death of Gopikabai led the defendant to give up his rights under the Will, whatever they may be, and the plaintiffs could not, therefore, now turn round and plead the rights claimed, after the appellant would be unable to enforce the oral Will.

It seems to me that there is no force in this appeal. There is not the slightest doubt that as regards the plaintiffs the division at Gopikabai's death was due to a mistake of law; they thought they took per stirpes and not per capita. It is contended that as all were under a mistaken view of the law, a compromise of their disputed rights amounts to a family settlement; but an agreement in a compromise of this nature has to be entered into upon a supposition of a right or of a doubtful right: see Stapilton v. Stapilton (1), and these agreements are not upheld unless deliberately entered into with full knowledge. In the well known case of Pusey v. Desbouvrie (2) it was held that if an eldest son, (and heir-at-law), knowing that he was the eldest son, but too ignorant to know that he was, therefore, also heir-at-law, should agree to divide the estate with his younger brother, a Court of Equity would relieve, upon the presumption of some imposition practised. All material circumstances must be within the knowledge of the parties because, without full disclosure, honest intention is not sufficient [DeOordova v. DeOordova (3)]. Helan Dasi v. Durga Das Mundal (4) is quoted by appellant's Counsel, and it is true that the doctrine of family arrangements may extend further than the arrangement or a settlement of doubtful or disputed rights and the principle is applicable not merely to cases in which arrangements are made between members of the family for the preservation of its peace, but also to cases in which arrangements are made between them for the preservation of its property. The present case, however, does not come within this category.

It is further contended that the agreement not being vitiated by fraud, it cannot be interfered with. The mistake here was really one of fact, though there was a misapprehension as to the law. It seems to me that the mistake in the present case can be relieved against. It is contended that an error of law does not vitiate a contract: Vishnu Sakharam Phatak v. Kashinath Bapu Shankar (5); but there was no contract in the real sense of the term here but a mere arrangement.

It is next argued that the case is barred by limitation and as the relief sought is on the ground of mistake, Article 96 of the Limitation Act applies. Plaintiffs knew of the mistake in 1913. I think that Article 141 has been correctly applied. Plaintiffs had 12 years from the death of Gopikabai to claim their full share of Govindrao's property. The fact that by an agreement entered into among themselves due to an error they accepted at the time less than their full share would not bring the case within Article 96 of the Limitation Act. The fact of the shares having been mutated does not effect the plaintiffs' claim: Jagrani Misrain v. Bisheshar Dube (6).

The case seems to me to have been rightly decided and I, therefore, dismiss this appeal with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. XVI, rr. 10, 11, 12—Non-appearance in obedience to summons—Order imposing fine—Jurisdiction.

An order imposing a fine on a person under Order XVI, rule 12, of the Code of Civil Procedure for failing to appear in obedience to a summons is without jurisdiction, unless it is made after attachment of the property of that person under rule 10 of the Order. [p. 426, col. 1.]

Rule against the order of the Court of the Settlement Officer of Nadia.

FACTS appear from the judgment.

Babu Amulya Kumar Bhattacharjee, for the Petitioner.—The Settlement Officer has purported to act under Order XVI, rule 12, Civil Procedure Code. Before he could have acted under Order XVI, rule 12, he should have followed the procedure laid down in Order XVI, rules 10 and 11. Refers to Nabadip Chandra Nandi v. Secretary of State (1), which was decided by Holmwood and Imam, JJ.

Babu Ramcharan Mitra, Government Pleader, for the Opposite Party.—Service of summons was effected on 28th May. The date for hearing was fixed on 30th May. Even on 29th May there was no pretence that service was not effected. Then she failed to come on 30th May. I submit that rule 12 should be read and applied independently of the previous rules 10 and 11. It is not necessary to issue attachment when the admission is that summons was duly served and in time to make appearance on 30th May. Attachment and proclamation are necessary to compel production of evidence. When a summons is duly served and not obeyed, rule 12 will directly apply. Rule 12 should be read independently when Court wants to levy fine for disobedience.

Babu Amulya Kumar Bhattacharjee replied in brief.

JUDGMENT.—This Rule is directed against an order by which the Assistant Settlement Officer imposed a fine of Rs. 50 on the petitioner and an order on appeal by the Settlement Officer affirming that order. The Assistant Settlement Officer purported to act under Order XVI, rule 12, Civil Procedure Code.

It appears that a summons was served on the petitioner asking for certain information regarding a Touzi in which she owns an eight-annas share. The summons was served on the 28th May on an employee of the petitioner. The petitioner states that on the 29th May she sent an officer to the Assistant Settlement Officer, but he was told to go away on the ground that this was not the day for hearing the matter. In fact the 30th was the date fixed. Then a notice was issued on the petitioner to show cause why she should not be fined for not carrying out the order. The petitioner's officer showed cause, but he did so on paper which did not bear a Court fee. On the 10th June the order complained of was made by the Assistant Settlement Officer.

The objection taken against the order is that the procedure laid down in rules 10, 11 and 12 of Order XVI, Civil Procedure Code, had not been carried out. Rule 10 provides in the fourth clause for issue of summons to give evidence or produce documents. The second clause of that rule provides that where a person summoned has failed to attend, the Court may issue a proclamation requiring him to attend. The third clause of rule 10 provides that instead of issuing a proclamation or at the time of issuing a proclamation or at any time afterwards the Court may issue a warrant for arrest of the person and make an order for attachment of his property. Then rule 11 provides that after the attachment of the property, if the person appears and satisfies the Court that he did not without lawful excuse fail to comply with the summons or intentionally avoid the service, and when he has failed to attend at the time and place named in the proclamation that he had no notice of the proclamation, the Court shall direct that the property be released. Rule 12 provides that the Court may where such person does not appear, or appears but fails to satisfy the Court, impose upon him a fine.

In support of the Assistant Settlement Officer's order it is now argued by the learned Government Pleader that rule 12 must be read independently of rule 11 and that in fact it must be read immediately after the first clause of rule 10, that is, that where a person has been summoned, if he fails to appear in answer to the summons, then the Court may proceed under rule 12. It seems to me that that contention cannot be upheld. Rule 12 provides two alternatives, that is, non appearance of the person or his appearing and failing to satisfy the Court. That seems to me to be the alternative, of the facts which are contemplated in rule 11, namely the person appearing and satisfying the Court. To put it in other words, rule 11 provides for a case where the person satisfies the Court that he has not intentionally failed to carry out the order; rule 12 applies to the alternative case of a person failing to satisfy the Court, whether he appears in order to offer an explanation or no. But in either case whether the facts are those contemplated in rules 11 or rule 12, the Court can only proceed after attachment of the property. In the present instance there has been no attachment of property and the Assistant Settlement Officer's order was without jurisdiction and must be set aside. The fine, if paid, must be refunded to the petitioner.

I make no order as to costs.

Order set aside.

JAGANNATH—PLAINTIFF—RESPONDENT.

Interpretation of Statutes—Retrospective effect—C. P. Land Revenue Act (XVIII of 1881), suit brought under—Act displaced by C. P. Land Revenue Act (II of 1917)—Decision, whether with reference to Act of 1881 or 1917—Settlement Record, entry in, effect of—Evidence Act (I of 1872), s. 90—Certified copy, admissibility of—Presumption as to such copy.

A Statute which prejudicially affects vested rights in existence and claimed before its enactment cannot be applied retrospectively. [p. 428, col. 2; p. 429, col 1.]

Where, therefore, a suit was brought to recover revenue and cesses when the C. P. Land Revenue Act, 1881, was in force, and was pending for nearly a year before that Act was displaced by the C. P. Land Revenue Act, 1917:

Held, that the suit must be decided with reference to the Act of 1881. [p. 429, col 1.]

The bare entry in a Settlement Record of a person as malik makbuza muafidar malguzar is not sufficient to justify a Civil Court in holding that his heir is entitled to enjoy a like privilege. [p. 429, col. 2]

A certified copy of a receipt purporting to be more than thirty years old, acknowledging the receipt of possession of certain malik makbuza plots, is inadmissible in evidence in the absence of any indication of the record from which it was obtained, or of the connection in which the possession was given. No presumption can be made in favour of a copy of a document under section 90 of the Evidence Act. [p. 430, col. 1.]

Appeal against the decree of the Additional District Judge, Narsingbpur, in Civil Appeal No. 66 of 1917, decided on the 25th March 1918.

Dr. H. S. Gour, for the Appellant.

Mr. S. Ramdas, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The suit out of which this second appeal arises was instituted on the 22nd December 1916. The plaintiff is one Jagannath, who acts as sarbarakar of Mouza Kheria, which is recorded in the name of the god Laxminarain. The defendent Nathuram is the malik makbuza of certain plots in the village, of which the revenue assessed at the settlement made in 1895 is Rs. 40 while Rs. 2-3-0 are payable in addition as cesses. In the khewat (Exhibit D-1) of 1895 Nirpatram, the defendant's father, was entered as malik makbuza muafidar malguzar. The plaint alleges that Nirpatram was not entitled to hold revenue-free and claims from the defendant, who is now in possession, the revenue and cesses for the Sambat years 1970, 1971 and 1972 with interest thereon at 1 per cent. per mensem. Rs. 126-9-0, the principal amount claimed, was paid into the treasury by the plaintiff along with the rest of the revenue and cesses due in respect of the village.

The defendant filed a written statement explaining how the land came to be held revenue-free by his father and then by himself. He raised certain pleas with reference to the frame of the suit which led to the amendment of the plaint in accordance with my order in Miscellaneous Appeal No. 47 of 1917, decided on the 21st January 1918. He also relied on the deed Exhibit D 5, dated the 19th June and 26th July 1891, by which Beharilal, the former owner of the village, and his two wives dedicated it along with Mouza Kerpani to the god and contended that the malik makbuza plots belonging to Nirpatram and those belonging to one Musammat Kesar, with whom we are not here concerned, were excluded from the dedication. The history of the defendant's plots is thus given :—

"One Motiram was the cousin of Summer, father of the said Beharilal. The village Kheria was the joint ancestral property belonging to the family of Motiram and Summer. Motiram and other members of the family claimed their shares and Motiram got the fields of which revenue is claimed rent and revenue-free in lieu of his share before the 30 years settlement. The defendant's father Nirpatram brought a suit against Peare, Thamman, Jawahir, sons of Motiram, under a mortgage deed and obtained a foreclosure decree, and got possession of the fields on 31st December 1877. Since then Nirpatram, defendant's father, and the defendant have remained in possession. At the present settlement the fields have been recorded as malik makbuza muafi malguzari land. The defendant is not liable to pay the revenue claimed."

The trial Judge delivered judgment on the 7th May 1917. Following the unreported decision of Stanyon, A. J. C., in Dalchand v. Sheoprasad (S. A. No. 66 of 1912, decided on the 20th March 1913), he held that the entry in the khewat of the current settlement should be treated as confering on Nirpatram personally the privilege of holding revenue-free and that if the defendant desired to enjoy the same privilege he should move the Deputy Commissioner under section 132 (f) of the Land Revenue Act, 1881, the Civil Court being debarred from dealing with such a matter by section 152 (b) (9) ibid., as laid down in Chaturbhuj v. Chandirmool (1). The claim was accordingly decreed in full and the defendant appealed to the District Court.

By the time this Court remanded the case to the lower Appellate Court, the present Land Revenue Act had come into force on the 1st September 1917. No application under section 75 (3) of that Act, however, was preferred to the Additional District Judge and on the 25th March 1918 he dismissed the appeal. He held that the Settlement Officer did not declare the muafi to be hereditary and that the defendant should have moved the Deputy Commissioner under section 132 of the Land Revenue Act, 1881. With reference to section 117 of that Act he held that the defendant had not proved Nirpatram to have held under an agreement made before the 4th November 1881 when the Land Revenue Act of that year came into force. The plaintiff's claim was accordingly held to be justified by section 117 of the old Land Revenue Act. The exclusion of the muafi lands from the operation of Exhibit D-5 was regarded as due merely to the fact that Beharilal was not their owner. The defendant has now preferred this second appeal.

At the hearing the appellant applied under section 75 (3) of the present Land Revenue Act for an order staying the proceedings and referring for the orders of the Deputy Commissioner as Settlement Officer the question whether the appellant is entitled to hold revenue-free. It was urged in his behalf that the difference between section 75 of the present Land Revenue Act and section 74 in the Act of 1881 amounts to a mere alteration in the procedure to be followed and that the present Act, which came into force on the 1st September 1917, by virtue of Notification No. 38, dated the 2nd June 1917, should be applied to the circumstances in spite of the fact that the suit was both instituted in, and decided by, the Court of first instance while the Act of 1881 was still in force. The application was opposed by the plaintiff on the strength of the fact that the trial Judge decided the suit before the present Act came into operation.

Under section 5 of the Central Provinces General Clauses Act, 1914, which closely follows section 6 of the General Clauses Act, 1897, the repeal of an enactment does not, unless a different intention appears, affect any legal proceeding or remedy in respect of any right, privilege, obligation, or liability, acquired, accrued or incurred under the repealed enactment. It is now settled law that under the Act of 1881, the jurisdiction of the Civil Court was restricted, in a suit to recover arrears of revenue on account of land which has been held rent-free as against the malguzars, to giving effect to any decision recorded by a Settlement Officer or by a Deputy Commissioner under section 74 of that Act: see Ramlal v. Seth Fatehchand (2), Ambika Prasad v. Vishvanath (3) and Chaturbhuj v. Chandirmool (1). The section just cited ran as follows:—

"When any land being not land which any person is entitled to hold free from revenue as against the Government is held by a proprietor, whether himself a malguzar or not, who claims to hold it wholly or partially free from revenue as against the other malguzars of the Mahal, the Settlement Officer shall decide whether the claimant is entitled to be exempted from paying the whole or any part of the revenue which would otherwise be payable in respect of such land, and, if he decides that the claimant is so entitled, shall also determine the conditions under which and the term for which the claimant is entitled to such exemption:

"Provided that no decision under this section shall exempt any land from the payment of revenue, when the Mahal in which such land is comprised is sold for arrears of revenue.

"The Chief Commissioner may make rules for the guidance of Settlement Officers in dealing with cases under this section."

(3) 1 N. L. R. 140.

More than one change has been introduced by section 75 of the present Act which is worded thus:—

"(1) If the proprietor of any estate, Mahal or land claims to hold it on conditions which require that the whole or any part of the land revenue thereof shall be paid by any other person, whether under an agreement entered into before the fourth day of November, 1881, or under any order recorded at settlement or under a decree of a Civil Court, the Settlement Officer shall enquire into such claim and, notwithstanding any such agreement, order or decree, may either disallow the claim or may determine the period for, and the conditions on which such estate, Mahal or land shall be so held.

"(2) No decision under sub-section (1) shall exempt any such estate, Mahal or land from liability to the payment of land revenue, if such estate or Mahal or the Mahal in which such land is included is sold for arrears of land revenue.

"(3) If any question arises in a Civil Court as to the amount of land revenue payable or the conditions on, or the period for which such estate, Mahal or land may be held free of land revenue, the Court shall, on application made in this behalf, stay the proceedings and refer the question for the orders of the Settlement Officer, and shall make a decision in accordance with such orders."

The reference in sub-section 1 to an agreement entered into before the 4th day of November 1881 can only be understood by being read in the light of section 117 in the Act of 1881, by virtue of which no agreement made after the Act came into force, i. e., after the 3rd November 1881, could be effectual to bar the right of the malguzar to demand revenue in respect of land assessed to revenue but held free without the sanction of the Chief Commissioner. It is now possible for the Settlement Officer to disallow a claim to hold revenue-free even if based on an agreement entered into before the 4th November 1881. The section, therefore, prejudicially affects a vested right which has been claimed by the defendant, namely, that he holds by virtue of an agreement made in 1877, and it is chiefly in such cases that the general rule against giving a Statute retrospective effect operates: see Kala v. Narayan (4). In that case the landlords sued the vendee for possession of an occupancy holding which the latter had bought from the original tenant on the 11th February 1898, i.e., nearly 8½ months before the Tenancy Act of 1898 came into force. The sale had not received the landlords' consent and it was held that the new Act had no retrospective operation so as to bar the landlords' right to sue in a Civil Court for possession under section 43 (2) of the 1883 Act. The change effected by the Act of 1895 was not one of procedure only but materially curtailed the privileges of the landlord. The same principle was applied in Harikrishna v. Jaideb (5). There is, no doubt, another general principle that the presumption against a retrospective construction of a Statute has no application to enactments which affect only the procedure and practice of the Courts, even where the alteration which the Statute makes has been disadvantageous to one of the parties: see Shankargir v. Ramchandra (6). But I do not think that the present case can reasonably be brought within the operation of that principle. In this connection it is not impertinent to observe that in section 203 (6) of the present Land Revenue Act provision is expressly made for applying a declaration by the Financial Commissioner in respect of certain rights in house property to suits pending at the date of its issue and to appeals from decrees either so pending or instituted within three months from its date.

The revenue for which the present suit was brought relates to years the last of which had completely expired before the 1st September 1917, and the suit was, as already stated, instituted nearly a year before that date. For the reasons above stated I think that the case must be decided with reference to the Act of 1881, and I, therefore, dismiss the application under section 75 (3) of the present Act with costs.

Defendant's appeal is supported, firstly, on the ground that according to the unreported decision of Hallifax, A. J. C., in Motilal v. Bhawani Prasad (S. A. No. 662 of 1912, decided on the 30th July 1913) the settlement entry of 1895 should be interpreted to mean that Nirpatram's heirs and assignees would, like him, be entitled to hold revenue-free. The balance of authority in this Court appears to me to favour the opposite view and I prefer the opinion expressed by Ismay, J. C., in Hiralal v. Seth Nathuram (S. A. No. 409 of 1897) and Parvat Singh v. Raghunath Ram (S. A. No. 492 of 1904), by Batten, A J. C., in Bansidhar v. Bhargo Commercial Bank (S. A. No. 429 of 1906) by Stanyon, A. J. C., in Dalchand v. Sheoprasad (S. A. No. 66 of 1912) and by Mittra, A. J. C., in Chhogmal v. Karansingh (S. A. No. 196 of 1912). The object of section 117 in the Act of 1881 and of the corresponding provision (section 159) in the Act of 1917 appears to be that the responsibility for land revenue shall rest with the person who enjoys the land, and section 75 of the present Act requires a Settlement Officer, if he does not disallow a claim to hold revenue-free, to determine the period for and the conditions on which the land is to be held. Clause (e) of section 156 requires the Deputy Commissioner, when a settlement is not in progress, to perform what would otherwise be the Settlement Officer's duty and in my opinion it is now for the defendant to seek from the Deputy Commissioner the decision which he might have applied for on Nirpatram's death.

Agreeing with the Courts below I hold that the bare entry in the Settlement Record of Nirpatram as malik makbuza muafidar malguzar does not justify the Civil Court in holding that his heir was entitled to enjoy a like privilege.

With regard to the contentions embodied in the 5th ground of appeal, to the effect that the malik makbuza plots were excluded from the dedication of the village to the god and that the plaintiff must be deemed to have taken the village on the understanding that he would pay land revenue for the excluded area, I agree with the lower Appellate Court that the exclusion is adequately explained by the fact that Beharilal was himself not the owner of the plots.

AZIZ KHAN v. SARAJUBALA DEBI.

It remains to consider whether the trial Judge was justified in rejecting the certified copy of a receipt which has been tendered in this Court with a prayer for its admission to the record. The original receipt appears to have been signed by Nirpatram and another on the 31st December 1877, with the object of acknowledging receipt of possession of the malik makbuza plots to which this litigation relates. This copy was filed in the Court of first instance at the first hearing (19th February 1917) but was rejected as unproved on the day (7th May 1917) when judgment was delivered. No attempt has been made to explain why the original could not be produced or why the genuineness of the original should be presumed. In Shripuja v. Kanhaya Lal (7) it was held that no presumption can be made under section 90, Indian Evidence Act, 1872, in favour of any document, unless such document itself is produced before the Court invited to make the presumption. The production of a copy is insufficient. I may add that the copy itself contains no indication of the record from which it was obtained or of the connection in which the possession was given: still less does it indicate that the land had been or was to be held revenue free. Under these circumstances I think rejection of the document is justified and it will now be returned to the appellant.

The appeal fails and is dismissed with costs. In the Courts below costs will be paid as already ordered.

Appeal dismissed.

Present:—Mr. Justice Beachcroft.

AZIZ KHAN AND OTHERS—DEFENDANTS—APPELLANTS

Srijukta SARAJUBALA DEBI AND OTHERS—PLAINTIFFS—RESPONDENTS.

Bengal Tenancy Act (VIII B. C. of 1885), s. 52—Enhancement of rent on increase in area—Area at inception of tenancy, proof of, by landlord—"Area for which rent has been previously paid," meaning of.

To enable a Court to grant an enhancement of rent under section 52 of the Bengal Tenancy Act, it must be in a position to find what the area was at the inception of the tenancy; it is necessary, therefore, for the landlord to prove that there has been some increase in the area as compared with the area of the tenancy at its inception. [p. 431, cols. 1 & 2]

The expression "the area for which rent has been previously paid" in section 52 of the Bengal Tenancy Act means the area with reference to which the rent previously paid has been assessed or adjusted. [p. 431, col. 1.]

Appeal against the decree of the Special Judge, Dacca, dated the 19th of November 1918, affirming the decree of the Assistant Settlement Officer of that District, dated the 20th of August 1917.

FACTS appear from the judgment.

Babu Gunada Charan Sen (with him Babu Prasanta Bhusan Sen Gupta), for the Appellants.—The tenant defendants are the appellants. The appeal arises out of proceedings under section 105 of the Bengal Tenancy Act. The rent was sought to be enhanced on three grounds, viz., increase in area, rise in prices of food crops and increase in the productive power of the soil by reason of fluvial action. The Courts below decreed enhancement on the first and the third grounds. As regards the first ground, the Courts below have not complied with the provisions of section 52 of the Bengal Tenancy Act. The landlord must show that the tenant has encroached upon his other lands and has thereby added to the area originally let out to the tenant. Refers to Gouri Pattra v. H. R. Reily (1), Rajendra Lal Goswami v. Chunder Bhusan Goswami (2). The finding on the question of fluvial action is in my favour. Refers to Akbar Ali Mian v. Hira Bibi (3), Dhrupad Chandra

(1) 20 C. 579.
(2) 6 C. W. N. 318.
(3) 15 Ind. Cas. 332. 16 C. L. J. 182.

v. Harinath Singha Roy (4). My submission is that under section 52 of the Bengal Tenancy Act, the area at the inception of the tenancy ought to be looked into by the Court when enhancement on that ground is allowed. The entire land is not of the same quality. As such the Settlement Officer was not entitled to enhance the rent in the way he has done. I would, therefore, ask your Lordship to decree the appeal.

No one appeared for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—This appeal is by the tenant defendants and it arises out of a proceeding under section 105 of the Bengal Tenancy Act. The landlord sought to enhance rent on three grounds, increase of area, rise in prices of food crops and increase in the productive power of the soil by reason of fluvial action. The Courts have given enhancement of rent on the first two grounds. The learned Special Judge was not in a position to find what was the area of the holding at the inception of the tenancy. But he has found that in the year 1309 it was less than what it has been found to be in the recent survey and settlement proceedings but the rent was the same then as it is now. On that finding he has upheld the decision of the Settlement Officer.

The ground taken in appeal here is that unless the Court is in a position to find what the area was at the inception of the tenancy, it cannot under section 52 of the Bengal Tenancy Act give any enhancement on the ground of increase in area of the holding. That contention appears on the authorities to be in a sense sound It is not necessary to refer to all the cases on the point. It was decided in the case of Rajendra Lal Goswami v. Chunder Bhusan Goswami (2) that the words in section 52, "the area for which rent has been previously paid," must be understood to mean area with reference to which the rent previously paid had been assessed or adjusted. That view has been subsequently accepted as correct in various decisions of this Court and I am not aware of any case in which that view has been dissented from. It was, therefore, necessary for the landlord in the case to prove that there had been some increase in the area as compared with the area of the tenancy at its inception. The learned Judge has remarked that it was not possible to do so by direct evidence. All that he has found is that in one year sometime between the inception of the tenancy and the present date the tenant was in occupation of land less than that now in his possession. It does not follow from that that previous to that year he was not in possession of more land than he held in that year. It cannot be inferred from the single instance of one year—nor did the learned Judge attempt to do so—that the area then in the tenant's occupation was the same as the area on which rent had originally been assessed.

That being so, the decree must be modified to this extent that the amount given as enhancement on account of increase in area must be deducted from the amount to which the landlord has been held entitled.

The respondents do not appear. So the appellants will get no costs of this hearing. As regards the costs of the two lower Courts the parties will get costs in proportion to their success.

Decree modified.

Second appeal from the decree of the District Judge, Gurdaspur, dated the 14th day of August 1919, reversing that of the Munsif, 1st Class, Batala, District Gurdaspur, dated the 23rd May 1919.

Lala Fakir Chand, for the Appellants.

Mr. Abdul Qadir, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—These are three connected appeals from three separate orders passed by the District Judge of Gurdaspur. The appellants are Rura, Kalu and Nanak, respectively, in the three cases. The respondent in all is Abdul Majid. Abdul Majid instituted three suits for possession of land on three separate mortgages, one executed by Kalu on the 14th of January 1907, another executed by Nanak on the 2nd of July 1907, and the third executed by Rura on the 16th of March 1911. Of these the two latter were registered. The plea in all the cases was that the mortgagors had really been dealing with one Sheikh Ilahi Bakhsh who was the real mortgagee, although the documents had been executed in favour of Abdul Majid. Certain payments made to Ilahi Bakhsh were also pleaded. With regard to these payments the learned District Judge has held that they have not been proved and as their payment is a question of fact, I cannot go into it in second appeal.

Lala Fakir Chand on behalf of the three appellants contended that Abdul Majid as a benamidar was not competent to sue for possession, and in support of his contention he referred me to Atrabannessa Bibi v. Safatullah Mia (1), Ram Ratan Purohit v. Sikdar Ali (2) and Guyan Dhanger v. Gonder (3). No doubt these cases support the learned Vakil's contention, but Sheikh Abdul Qadir points out that Guyan Dhanger v. Gonder (3) has been set aside by Goiyan Dhangar v. Sheikh Gondar (4), which itself proceeded on Gur Narayan v. Sheo Lal Singh (5) in which their Lordships of the Privy Council have held that a benamidar represents the real owner and an action can be maintained in his name in respect of the property that stands in his name, although the beneficial owner is no party to it. In these circumstances it would appear that the decision of the learned District Judge in these three cases is correct and that the mere fact that Abdul Majid is a benamidar does not prevent him from bringing the suits he has.

Lala Fakir Chand then contended that Jahan Khan v. Dalla Ram (6) relied on by the District Judge has no bearing on this case. In this I am unable to agree. The suits are between the mortgagors and the mortgagee as entered in the mortgage deeds, and it is only if Ilahi Bakhsh were to attempt to obtain possession that the applicability of the Alienation of Land Act would arise.

I accordingly dismiss these appeals with costs.

Landlord and tenant—Occupancy holding, non-transferable—Sale of holding—Tenant continuing in possession and paying rent, whether can be ejected.

A tenant of a non-transferable holding sold his interest therein, but continued in possession and paid rent to the landlord, which the latter accepted even after the transfer of which he had notice. In a suit for ejectment brought by the landlord:

Held, that the landlord, having continued to receive rent from the tenant, could not eject him on the ground that he had sold his holding. [p. 433, col. 2.]

TEJSINGH v. PATIRAM.

Appeal against the decree of the Subordinate Judge, 1st Court, 24-Pargannas, dated the 14th February 1919, modifying that of the Munsif, 2nd Court at Baruipur, dated the 15th April 1918.

FACTS appear from the judgment.

Babu Jogendranarayan Mazumdar (with him Babu Amulya Kumar Bhattacharjee), for the Plaintiff-Appellant.—The Full Bench in Dayamoyi v. Ananda Mohan Roy (1) drew a distinction between transfer of a portion of a holding and the whole of it—in the former case the question of abandonment or relinquishment arises. The lower Court holds erroneously that the question of abandonment arises in the present case. The lower Appellate Court finds that defendant No. 2 is in possession. It is not necessary for the landlord to prove abandonment. If the landlord was receiving rent from the tenant, that could not operate as consent to transfer. I am entitled to khas possession of the land.

Babu Ramgati Sarkar, for the Defendants-Respondents.—The primary Court disbelieved the story of abandonment. The lower Appellate Court passed a decree against the vendee only because it found the original tenant still on the holding. Dayamoyi's case (1) contemplates abandonment. Reads section 87, Bengal Tenancy Act. For khas possession two things are necessary, viz., (1) there must be an abandonment on the part of the tenant, and (2) failure on the part of the tenant to make arrangements for payment of rent. In this case these two points have been found in my favour. The landlord cannot get any relief against the tenant.

Babu Jogendranarayan Mazumdar, in reply.—It is clear when there has been a sale of the whole holding, the landlord is ordinarily entitled to recover. Any extraordinary circumstance is to be proved by the defendant. The transfer of the whole holding amounted to abandonment here and so the landlord can claim re-entry. Sailabala Debi v. Sriram Bhattacharji (2) is on fours with the present case.

JUDGMENT.—This appeal arises out of a suit for ejectment. The defendant No. 2 was a tenant of a non transferable occupancy holding and sold her interest to defendant No. 1. It is found that the vendor is still in possession and that rents have been accepted from the vendor even after the transfer of which the landlord had notice.

It appears to me that on these findings the landlord cannot succeed in ejecting defendant No. 2, the vendor. He has obtained a decree in ejectment against the purchaser, defendant No. 1.

It is contended on the authority of the case of Dayamoyi v. Ananda Mohan Roy (1) that where the transfer is a sale of the whole holding, the landlord is entitled to recover khas possession even if there has been no abandonment. It was held in that case that under such circumstances, the landlord is ordinarily entitled to possession of the holding, but in an ordinary case one would expect a sale of the whole interest of the raiyat to be followed by an abandonment of the holding or a cessation to pay rent. So far as I know, it has never been held that the landlord who is continuing to receive rents from a tenant, can eject that tenant on the ground that he had sold his holding.

The appeal fails and is dismissed with costs.

TEJSINGH v. PATIRAM.

The holder of mortgaged property transferred in breach of a condition against alienation may be made a party to a foreclosure suit [p. 435, col 1.]

Appeal against the decree of the Additional District Judge, Narsinghpur, in Civil Suit No. 39 of 1916, decided on the 30th November 1917.

Dr. H. S. Gour, for the Appellants.

Mr. M. Gupta, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This appeal arises out of a suit brought on foot of a mortgage executed by the first three defendants on the 18th May 1912. The document (Exhibit P-1) includes a covenant that the khudkasht land should not be let and the mortgage plainly covers both the proprietary and cultivating rights in such land.

The 4th, 5th and 6th defendants, who are the appellants in this Court, hold the greater part of the khudkasht under an oral letting by the first three defendants effected in May or June 1914, and the plaint alleged this letting to have been merely a nominal transaction besides being in contravention of the aforesaid covenant. Foreclosure and possession of the mortgaged property were prayed for. The 5th and 6th defendants filed each a separate written statement denying that the letting was merely a nominal transaction and that cultivating rights in the khudkasht were mortgaged; both claimed to be discharged on the ground that they had no right of redemption and did not wish to redeem. The trial Judge found that the appellants, each of whom is the son-in-law of one of the first three defendants, are merely nominal lessees under an arrangement designed to defeat the rights of the mortgagees; that letting is prohibited by the mortgage; and that the appellants were proper parties to the suit and were liable to deliver possession of the khudkasht. The decree passed does not contemplate any payment by the appellants, but directs that in the event of foreclosure they along with the other defendants shall put the plaintiffs in possession of the property mortgaged. In this Court the only point pressed is that the appellants are not necessary parties to the suit under rule 1, Order XXXIV, 1st Schedule to the Civil Procedure Code, and that the question of their right to hold the land could not be gone into in this suit.

The appellants' contention is rested mainly on the decision of the Privy Council in Radha Kunwar v. Reoti Singh (1), but the judgment contains nothing but an obiter dictum on the matter of joinder of parties and the person held to have been improperly joined as a defendant to the mortgagee's suit set up a title to part of the mortgaged property wholly inconsistent with that of the mortgagor. The point actually decided in the case was that no appeal lay to His Majesty in Council because the subject-matter of the appeal was not of the amount prescribed by section 110, Civil Procedure Code. In the present case the appellants claim under the mortgagor a title said to have been created subsequent to the mortgage and, therefore, they cannot come within the ordinary rule laid down in Jaggeswar Dutt v. Bhuban Mohan Mitra (2) that a plaintiff mortgagee cannot be allowed so to frame his suit as to draw into controversy the title of a third party who is in no way connected with the mortgage and who has set up a title paramount to that of the mortgagor and mortgagee.

Rule 1, Order XXXIV, does not prohibit the joinder of any person, but merely lays down that subject to the provisions of the Code all persons having an interest either in the mortgage-security or in the right of redemption shall be joined as parties to any suit relating to the mortgage. It is urged for the appellants on the strength of Girish Chunder Dey v. Juramoni De (3) that the holder of a raiyati interest is not entitled to redeem under clause (a), section 91, Transfer of Property Act, as a person having any interest in the property. In that case, however, there appears to have been no conflict between the interest of the raiyat and the interest of the mortgagee. In Shankersingh v. Hukumchand (4), where a malik-makbuza who had mortgaged certain land to the defendant subsequently made the plaintiff a permanent rent-free subtenant of the same land, it was held that the plaintiff had an interest in the property entitling him to redeem, inasmuch as he would be prejudiced by a foreclosure in pursuance of the mortgage. The position in the present case seems to me to be very similar, for the case of the mortgagees is that they are entitled in the event of default in payment of the mortgage money to actual possession of all the khudkasht.

Another authority referred to on behalf of the appellants is Ganpat v. Bhangi (5), where it was held that a landlord had no such interest as would entitle him to redeem a mortgage of an absolute occupancy holding effected by a tenant. The position in that case is the converse of that in Girish Chunder Dey v. Juramoni De (3) and the view that a claim by the landlord to redeem cannot stand is in accordance with the rule laid down in Ghose's Law of Mortgage in India (page 238, 4th Edition), which was cited with approval in Shanker Singh v. Hukumchand (4), namely, that the interest which entitles a person to redeem must be derived directly or indirectly from the mortgagor since the making of the mortgage.

The plaintiffs by the frame of their suit gave the appellants the opportunity for redeeming, to which according to the decision in Radha Pershad Misser v. Monohur Das (6), a case relied upon for the appellants, they were as lessees entitled. Ali Hasan v. Dhirja (7), another authority cited for the appellants, is against them in so far as it lays down that a covenant against alienation is valid only to the extent to which it does not encroach upon the rights of the prior mortgagee. In neither of these cases do I find any authority for the proposition that the holder of a mortgaged property transferred in breach of a condition against alienation cannot properly be made party to a foreclosure suit. In England the rule appears to be that not only the parties to the mortgage-deed but also those claiming under them can be parties to a suit for foreclosure: see Audsley v. Horn (8).

The proviso to rule 4, Order II, 1st Schedule to the Civil Procedure Code, contemplates joinder of a claim for possession of the mortgaged property with a claim for foreclosure, and it is not suggested that the appellants have been prejudiced in any way by their joinder, nor is the lower Court's decision as to the character of the letting to them impeached on the merits. In these circumstances section 99, Civil Procedure Code, precludes this Court from interfering, even if it could be held that the appellants should not have been joined as defendants.

In my opinion the appellants were rightly joined as parties to the suit and I dismiss this appeal with costs. The lower Court's costs will be paid as already ordered.

Appeal dismissed.

Right of way—Claim based on immemorial user, failure of—Appeal, second—Remand for re-trial, whether should be granted on issues not raised.

Where a plaintiff claims a right of way based on immemorial user and fails to establish such right, he cannot in second appeal obtain a remand for a re-trial on issues of an implied grant or an easement of necessity, especially where these issues were not raised in the Courts below. [p 436, col. 2]

Appeals against the decrees of the Subordidate Judge, 1st Court, Sylhet, dated the 5th April 1919, reversing that of the Munsif, 1st Court at that place, dated the 25th of February 1918

FACTS appear from the judgment.

The Hon'ble Mr. A. K. Fazlul Huq (with him Babu Bijan Kumar Mukerjee), for the Plaintiff-Appellant.—This was a suit for a declaration of a right of way over two pieces of land. The appellant based her claim on (1) a right by user from time immemorial, (2) implied grant, (3) and easement of necessity. There is absolutely no finding on the third ground. Evidence had been recorded on three aspects of the case. I admit that the prayer portion is quite general. I submit that grant and easement of necessity are not always inconsistent. My allegation has got to be determined. The issue is of a general character and advisedly so. There ought to be a remand.

Dr. Sarat Chandra Basak (with him Babu Paresh Lal Shome, for the Respondent.—There is no suggestion in the lower Appellate Court's judgment as to any claim re easement of necessity. There was a claim on grounds (1) and (2) and not the faintest suggestion on (3).

In the plaint there was no allegation that the claim was based on easement of necessity.

Mr, Fazlul Huq, in reply.—We distinctly said that one path was the only means of communication between our house and the public road, and that the other path was the only path for communication with the old tank. This definite statement, I beg to submit, amounts to a distinct claim of a right of way by easement of necessity. What else can it be and what can be more pointed?

JUDGMENT.—These two appeals arise out of two connected suits brought by the plaintiff to establish her right of way over two pieces of land. The suits were decreed by the first Court but were dismissed by the lower Appellate Court on appeal.

It is conceded by the learned Vakil for the appellant that in second appeal, he cannot attack the findings of the lower Appellate Court that the plaintiff has failed to establish her right of way based on user from time immemorial.

It is contended, however, that the plaintiff also based her claim upon an implied grant and an easement of necessity and that the lower Appellate Court has come to no findings on these aspects of the case, and that the case should be remanded for a fresh decision. The pleadings have not been translated. But from a summary given in the Munsif's judgment and also in the judgment of the lower Appellate Court, it would appear that no claim of a right of way was based either on an implied grant or on an easement of necessity.

My attention has been drawn to a statement in the judgment of the Munsif that "The former path was said to be the only means of communication between the plaintiff's house and the public road and the latter path as the only path for communication with the old tank." This statement does not amount to a claim of a right of way by easement of necessity. It is clear from the judgment of the lower Court that the right of way was never claimed on any other ground than that of an immemorial user. I am not willing to remand the case for re-trial on issues which were not raised in the lower Courts.

I accordingly dismiss these appeals, No. 1308 with costs and No. 1182 in which respondents did not appear without costs.

Appeals dismissed.

In such cases the action against the guardian must succeed on the indemnity clause in the sale-deed: the fact that there is no proof of any deceit will not affect the liability of the guardian under that clause [p. 437, col 2.]

SRINIVASA THATHACHARLU v. NOOLAMMA.

Second appeal against the decree of the District Court, Bellary, in Appeal Suit No. 126 of 1917, preferred against that of the District Munsif, Bellary, in Original Suit No. 253 of 1916.

FACTS appear from the judgment.

Mr. B. Sitarama Row, for the Appellant.—I admit the 1st defendant is not liable for breach of the condition by his guardian, the 2nd defendant. The 2nd defendant is, however, personally liable. The lower Court is wrong in thinking that proof of deceits by 2nd defendant is necessary to sustain the claim against her. The stipulation for indemnity for breach of title was made by her and she must be personally answerable for it. She cannot bind the minor. It is a personal covenant. See Firm of Sadasuk Janki Das v. Kishan Pershad (1).

Mr. K. Rajah Aiyar, for the Respondents.—The guardian made the stipulation as to indemnity for the minor and only in her capacity as guardian. She cannot be personally liable. She acted bona fide in the matter.

JUDGMENT.—The 2nd defendant is the grandmother of the 1st defendant and during the minority of the latter she sold certain property to the plaintiff in the year 1901. The plaintiff got possession and while in possession was ousted by a person who claimed a superior title and who obtained a decree in respect of the property. Thereupon this suit was brought on the indemnity clause in the sale-deed. The suit was both against the minor, who has since attained majority, and the grandmother. They are defendants Nos. 1 and 2 respectively.

Mr. Sitarama Row conceded that, as regards the 1st defendant, he could not sustain his claim. The indemnity clause cannot bind the 1st defendant. That was decided by the Privy Council in Indur Chunder Singh v. Radhakishore Ghose (2) and consequently the claim, so far as the 1st defendant is concerned, must be dismissed. The second appeal, to that extent, is dismissed with costs.

(2) 19 C. 507 (P. C.); 19 I. A. 90; 6 Sar. P. C. J. 185.

The case against the 2nd defendant is different. We cannot help saying that the Courts below have confused the issue by introducing the question of deceit. So far as the plaint is concerned, there is nothing in it which suggests fraud either against the 1st defendant or against the 2nd. The simple case put forward by the plaintiff is that, relying on the representation of the 2nd defendant, he purchased the property, that he was deprived of the property, and that he is entitled to damages for the breach. That is stated very clearly in paragraph 3 of the plaint.

Mr. Rajah Aiyar contends that the 2nd defendant is not liable because the indemnity must be deemed to have been given by her as guardian of the 1st defendant. We are unable to agree with him. It must be presumed that these parties knew the law, and the law is that a guardian cannot bind the minor by a clause of indemnity like this. Therefore, when the 2nd defendant inserted this clause, she must be deemed to have agreed to indemnify the plaintiff against any loss in consequence of defect of title in the property she conveyed. It must be taken to be a personal covenant on her part and she is certainly liable to be proceeded against under that covenant. The passage in Story on Agency Mr. Sitarama Row quoted and the recent decision of the Privy Council in Firm of Sadasuk Janki Das v. Kishen Pershad (1) also support this view. Although the latter was a case under the Negotiable Instruments Act, the principle enunciated therein would apply with equal force. We are, therefore, of opinion that the Courts below are wrong in rejecting the claim on the ground that no question of deceit has been proved against her. The decree must be reversed and the case sent back to the lower Appellate Court for disposal according to law.

Mr. Rajah Aiyar suggests that there has been default on the part of the plaintiff in not having asked the 2nd defendant to assist him in the litigation about the property sold. That is covered by the 3rd issue. That issue and the question as to the amount for which the 2nd defendant is liable, if she is liable at all, will have to be determined on remand.

Costs, so far as the 2nd defendant is concerned, will abide the result. The Court-fee, so far as the 2nd defendant is concerned, will be refunded.

Partition—Ancestral property—Burden of proof—Refusal to grant partition, when can be justified—High Court, power of, to grant relief—C. P. Land Revenue Act (XVIII of 1881), s. 136.

Where in an application for partition the applicant claims all the lands recorded in the names of the different members of the family as being ancestral lands, it is for him to prove this and that, in spite of the separate entries, the co-sharers are in joint possession thereof [p. 439, col. 2.]

Where the right of an applicant for partition is not questioned, and no question of title is involved, a Court is not competent to refuse partition: a refusal can only be justified under section 136-F of the Central Provinces Land Revenue Act upon a good and sufficient objection to the partition. [p. 440, col. 1.]

Where in a partition suit the whole case comes before the High Court and that Court finds that the order of the lower Court declining partition is without jurisdiction, it is competent to set aside that order and to afford relief to the parties. [p. 440, col. 2; p. 441, col. 1.]

Appeal from the decision of the Extra Assistant Commissioner, Sambalpur, dated the 22nd July 1918, in a suit for partition.

Mr. Brajraj Chowdhuri, for the Appellants.

Mr. Biswanath Sinha, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This is an appeal against the order of the Extra Assistant Commissioner of Sambalpur dated the 22nd of July 1918, rejecting the petition of the appellant, under section 136 of the Central Provinces Land Revenue Act XVIII of 1881, for partition of the Bhogra lands specified therein. The applicant before the Extra Assistant Commissioner was Karunakar Pati, son of one Lambodhar Pati. Dharnidhar, father of Sadananda, and Bimbadhar Pati were the other sons of Lambodhar Pati. Kashi, the applicant, therefore, was entitled to a third share in the property of the common ancestor, Lambodhar. He alleged that Lambodhar had 20·25 acres of land which were inherited by his descendants including the applicant and the applicant was given only 1·58 acres for maintenance, but that the remaining lands continued to be joint and were held by him along with the other descendants of Lambodhar Pati. The applicant, therefore, prayed for partition of all the lands including those that were said to have been given to him for maintenance. There was also a prayer for partition of 3·94 acres of Bhogra lands said to have been owned and possessed jointly by the descendants of Lambodhar and other co-sharers in the Mahal, namely, one Banamali Pati, Kanu, Madhu Pati and Bhagirathy Pati. In this land the applicant claimed a 1/24th share.

Sadananda and Bimbadhar filed separate written statements but in the main their objections were similar. The principal contention raised by the objectors, non-applicants, was that after the death of Lambodhar about the year 1892, there was a complete partition of all the ancestral property which consisted of 10·34 acres only, and that the applicant and the other descendants of Lambodhar were respectively in exclusive possession of the properties allotted to them.

With respect to a small quantity of land measuring 1·27 acres, it was stated that it was given to the widow of Lambodhar for maintenance. Besides the ancestral property held by Lambodhar, there were certain lands measuring 3·30 acres which were acquired by the proprietors of the Mahal by suits in ejectment from the tenants thereof and these are included in 20·25 acres, the subject-matter of the application for partition. The non-applicants Sadananda and Bimbadhar admitted the title of the applicant with respect to the aforesaid lands, viz., 1·27 and 3·30 acres of lands. They, however, claimed contribution with regard to the expenses incurred in the Sradh ceremony of the widow of Lambodhar and those incurred in the suits brought by the proprietors to eject the tenants from the said lands measuring 3·30 acres.

With regard to the claim of the applicant in respect of 3·94 acres, neither the descendants of Lambodhar nor the other co-proprietors disputed the title or possession of the applicant.

The Extra Assistant Commissioner after trial of the issue framed by him refused to grant partition with respect to any of the lands claimed by the applicant, on the ground that there was a complete partition of the family properties about the year 1892.

The appellant before us disputed the correctness of the finding of the Court below and contends that the evidence in this case is not sufficient to justify a conclusion that all the properties were completely partitioned. We have been invited to the oral and the documentary evidence on the record and on giving our best consideration to it and to the contentions of the learned Vakil on behalf of the appellants we do not feel at all inclined to disturb the finding of the Court below.

The earliest document on the record is the Jamabandi of Bhogra lands (Exhibit E) of Mr. Nethersole's Settlement of 1889. In that Lambodhar's name stands recorded in respect of 9·22 acres only. The applicant has failed to show that Lambodhar had at any time in his possession any land beyond that recorded in the aforesaid Jamabandi, or admitted by the non-applicants. The claim, therefore, of the applicant that the entire ancestral lands consisted of 20·85 acres is without any foundation at all. It has been conclusively established from the oral evidence in this case, which has not been at all rebutted by the applicant, that Lambodhar died some time before 1892; equally has it been established that not long after the death of Lambodhar his descendants separated amongst themselves in the presence and through the assistance of the Gountia of the village, the landlords and other persons of the village. This does not only rest upon the oral testimony but is also corroborated by a subsequent document Exhibit F, called Dewar's Khewat in 1902 03. In that document the descendants of Lambodhar have been separately recorded with respect to the lands in their possession. A reference to that table would show that Dharanidhar, now represented by his son Sadananda, was recorded with respect to 13·74 acres, Karunakar the applicant with respect to 1·58 acres and Bimbadhar with respect to ·96 acre. All the three brothers were recorded jointly in respect of 1·27 acres and Dharanidhar and Karunakar with respect to 3·30 acres. The aforesaid lands come to 28·85 acres, exactly the land claimed by the applicant to be the property which was originally held by Lambodhar. This was the entry in the Dewar's Khewat. It may have been a great temptation for the applicant to claim all the lands, recorded in the names of different members of the family as being the ancestral lands, but it was for the applicant to prove that all those lands were the ancestral lands, and that in spite of the separate entries the descendants of Lambodhar were jointly in possession thereof. The applicant has failed to do so. Sadananda, son of Dharanidhar non-applicant, has explained how he happens to hold more lands than the other descendants of Lambodhar as shown in the Khewat. He has subsequently acquired by purchase and otherwise lands in the village from Bimbadhar and other persons. The applicant Karunakar was allotted 3·53 acres out of the family properties at the time of partition, out of which 1·58 stand in his name and 1·95 stand in the name of Dharanidhar (Khasras Nos. 989 and 3654) but which actually belongs to and is in possession of the applicant. The applicant is entitled to this much only as admitted by the non-applicants and to no more. The Court below was, therefore, right in coming to the conclusion that there was a complete partition of the family property in 1892. The order of the Court below so far must, therefore, be affirmed.

The appellant further contends that the land measuring 1·49 acres, said to have been purchased from one Lakhan Pati in the name of Dharanidhar, was acquired jointly for the benefit of all the descendants of Lambodhar. The said land was no doubt originally held in mortgage by Lambodhar for Rs. 186 (vide the statement of Karunakar, page 11, and of Bimbadhar, page 15 of the paper-book). It was subsequently purchased by Dharanidhar in his own name on payment of a further sum of Rs. 14 to the owner of the land. We are not called upon to decide the rights of the parties with respect to this land, inasmuch as we accept the statement of Bimbadhar that the mortgage deeds also were partitioned amongst the descendants of Lambodhar. He definitely stated that the land which originally belonged to Lakhan Pati was allotted to Dharanidhar and the land which was acquired from Labni fell to his own share. This is consistent with the partition itself, whereby all the properties moveable and immoveable, whether in the shape of bonds or otherwise, must have been partitioned. The claim of the applicant with respect to this land must also be rejected. The applicant further claimed a share of partition in the lands allotted to the widow of Lambodhar in 1·27 acres, and those which were acquired by ejecting the tenants, 3·30 acres. The Court below has declined to partition these lands also, leaving it "open to the applicant to settle with the opposite party Sadananda either by a Civil suit or amicably on what terms the division of those lands should be made." No question of title was at all involved in respect of these lands and the right of the applicant to have partition of the lands is not at all questioned. It was not, therefore, competent to the Court below to refuse partition, for it could only do so under section 136-F upon an objection made to the partition by any co-sharer and upon the Court coming to the conclusion that the objection so made was good and sufficient. No objection appears to have been made with respect to these lands, as is admitted by the Court below when it says "that Sadananda was willing to divide it." The order of the Court below refusing partition with respect to these lands must, therefore, be set aside. For similar reasons the applicant is entitled to partition of land measuring 3·94 acres held by the descendants of Lambodhar jointly with the other co-sharers in the village. The Court below has not addressed itself to this and has absolutely given no reason why partition should not have been allowed. The result is that the appeal is decreed in a modified form, with proportionate costs. The case must be sent back to the Court below to carry out partition of the aforesaid lands in accordance with law.

It may be noted that the learned Vakil on behalf of the respondents has raised the question regarding the right of this Court to entertain any appeal with regard to the aforesaid lands, viz., 1·27, 3·30 and 3·94 acres, which we have ordered to be partitioned by the Court below. The contention is that no rights of parties have been decided with respect to these lands by the Extra Assistant Commissioner and hence section 136-H has no application, and, therefore, there was no appeal to this Court, but only to the Commissioner of the Division as provided for in section 22 of the Act. In support of his contention the learned Vakil has quoted the authority of Padman Lochan Misra v. Krishna Chandra Misra (1). That case simply lays down that from an order passed by a Deputy Commissioner under section 136-G, under the Central Provinces Land Revenue Act of 1881, read with Act II of 1904, an appeal would lie to the High Court and not to the District Court. The decision in that case is, therefore, no authority for the present question, namely, whether the refusal of the Court to allow the prayer of the applicant for partition of the specific lands is appealable to this Court or not. As already shown above, the order of the Court was without any jurisdiction and it was, therefore, incumbent upon the Court below to carry out the partition of the lands in question. The order of the Court virtually decides the rights of the parties as to whether this land should be held jointly or separately and as such it may well come under section 136-H. It is not at all disputed that the refusal of the Court below to effect partition, on the ground that there was a private partition, is appealable to this Court. I am inclined to hold that when the whole case has come before us with respect to certain lands and we are of opinion that the lower Court should have effected the partition and that its order declining partition was without jurisdiction, it is competent to this Court to set aside that order and to afford relief to the parties without causing them the trouble and expense of going to a Civil Court.

Appeal, second—Point raised in memorandum of appeal but not pressed before lower Appellate Court, whether can be raised in second appeal—Oudh Laws Act (XVIII of 1876), s. 5—Dower, proper—Means of parents of husband, whether can be taken into consideration.

Where a point was raised in the memorandum of appeal to the lower Appellate Court but was not pressed before that Court, it cannot be raised in second appeal. [p. 441, col. 2.]

In fixing the amount of proper dower under section 5 of the Oudh Laws Act the Court can, in a case in which it appears that the husband's means of subsistence is an allowance made to him by his parents, take into consideration the means of the parents, especially where the marriage had taken place while the bridegroom was still below the age of majority. [p. 441, col. 2; p. 442, col. 1.]

The Hon'ble Syed Wazir Hasan, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This appeal has arisen out of a suit for restitution of conjugal rights. The plaintiff appellant is the husband and the 1st defendant in the case, Musammat Amir Jahan, is the wife. The other two defendants in the case are the wife's parents. It appears from the judgment of the lower Appellate Court that the lady is of distinguished parentage, being a descendant of Mohammad Ali Shah, the late King of Oudh. A decree for restitution was made in the Court of first instance conditional on the payment by the plaintiff of the dower debt of the 1st defendant, the amount of the debt being fixed by the first Court at Rs. 3,000. In appeal the learned Judge has affirmed the order of the Court of first instance, but, having regard to the circumstances of the case, the amount of the dower-debt has been reduced to Rs. 1,500 and so the decree for restitution is now conditional upon the payment of this sum by the husband.

In second appeal it has been argued here in the first place, that under the Shia Law it was not competent to the Courts below to make a conditional decree by directing the husband to pay the dower-debt before an order should be made directing the wife to return to him. This point, I observe, was distinctly raised in the memorandum of appeal filed in the lower Appellate Court, and from the lower Court's judgment it is clear that it was not pressed before the learned Judge. He was only asked to deal with the question of the proper amount of dower in the case. In these circumstances the appellant is not entitled to raise this question here, and it cannot be allowed to be discussed.

There remains the only other question, that is to say, the proper amount of the dower. On this the argument is that the lower Court did not act in accordance with law in assessing the amount of the dower, inasmuch as the learned Judge took into consideration the means of the husband's parents and had no regard to the husband's own means. From what is stated in the lower Appellate Court's judgment it appears that the plaintiff has no means at all, that is to say, no means independent of his father and mother. It is further apparent that while the lady was living with the plaintiff as his wife, the parents of the husband made an allowance of Rs. 60 a month for the support of the young people. In these circumstances I think the Judge cannot be said to have acted in contravention of the provisions of section 5 of the Oudh Laws Act. There certainly are means of the husband regarding which evidence has been given, namely, this allowance which his father and mother allowed for himself and his wife. Taking all the circumstances into consideration, and also having regard to the obvious fact that the dower in a case like this is arranged by the parents while the bridegroom is still below the age of majority, I am not prepared to say that the Judge was not entitled to have some regard to the means of the parents from whom the plaintiff enjoys the annual income upon which he can support his wife. Rs. 1,500 is not an excessive sum and I see no reason, therefore, to interfere with the lower Court's judgment.

The appeal fails and is dismissed with costs.

Revision of the order of the Additional District Judge, Wardha, dated the 25th June 1919, in Civil Suit No. 32 of 1919.

Mr. G. R. Deo, for the Applicant.

ORDER.—The only point here raised is one not to be found in the memorandum of revision. It is that the suit being of a Small Cause Court nature it could not be tried in an ordinary Court. The proceedings it is contended, are, therefore, vitiated. The plaintiff chose his own venue and the case has proceeded without hindrance on the ground here alleged through two Courts. A pure technicality is now urged to set aside the proceedings of the Courts below. The question is not free from difficulty but there are cases against the contention now raised. I need only mention Ram Lal v. Kabul Singh (1). There has been no prejudice in the case and looking to the fact that plaintiff after choosing his own Court allowed the case to proceed in both lower Courts to judgment, I decline to now entertain the contention raised. This application fails and is dismissed without notice to the other side.

Application dismissed.

JUDGMENT.

DAS, J.—This appeal arises out of an application for the appointment of a Receiver to a very important endowment known as Soghra Waqf Estate.

It appears that the defendant No. 1, who is the appellant before us, was confirmed as the Mutwalli of the estate on the 12th of June 1918. Various charges are now made against the Mutwalli. They have all been answered by the Mutwalli, and, in my view, it is impossible on the materials before us to say whether the charges against the Mutwali have been established or not. But it is abundantly clear that until a scheme is framed by the Court, it is impossible for the defendant to administer the trust with any satisfaction to the parties. The position taken up by the Mutwalli himself is sufficient for this purpose. He says that various differences have arisen between himself on one hand and the president of the committee on the other hand, due to the difficulty of interpreting the compromise decree and the waqfnama, but it is clear from the waqfnama itself that the committee has very important functions to perform. It is not necessary at the present moment to say who is in a superior position and who is in a subordinate position, but the settlor has undoubtedly brought into existence three different bodies, the first, consisting of the Mutwalli himself, the second, consisting of the two Naibs, and the third, consisting of the committee. Each body has important functions to perform and to that extent each must be considered as a trustee. The settlor undoubtedly contemplated a concurrence of all these different bodies in the administration of the trust. She contemplated that all business connected with the Waqf should always be brought up before the committee and that the works in connection with the Waqf should be done by the decision of the majority of the committee. She further contemplated that the Mutwalli should always act in consultation with the Naibs. In my view there is no doubt at all that the settlor contemplated that the three different bodies which she brought into existence should concur in their decision relating to the administration of the trust.

Now what are the facts? The facts are that the last meeting of the committee was held so far back as the 1st of December 1918. A meeting of the committee was called for the 5th of January 1919, but it appears that no meeting of the committee has actually been held. The Mutwalli says that he could not call any meeting because the committee was bent on obstructing him. His explanation is that he was not unwilling to call a meeting for the 5th of January 1919, but that the president of the committee asked him to postpone the meeting till some other day in February and that thereafter differences arose between him and the committee, with the result that no meeting could be called. I am at present not apportioning blame between the different parties, but the undoubted fact is that either through the fault of the Mutwalli or through the fault of the committe no meeting of the committee has been called since the 1st of December last, although the waqfnama provides that all business connected with the Waqf shall be done by the committee. Now how is the work of the Waqf to continue? The Mutwalli says that he cannot call a meeting because there are differences between him and the committee. He may be right, but the differences between him and the committee cannot be settled until a scheme is framed by the Court. In my view the principle is well established that where the settlor has brought into existence different bodies with the definite idea that there should be concurrence between them in the administration of the trust, then, where concurrence is impossible, the Court, in a properly constituted suit, is competent to appoint a Receiver. It is clear to my mind that the trust cannot be administered on the basis of the waqfnama. It is admitted even by the Mutwalli that a scheme will have to be framed by the Court. In my view, therefore, without apportioning blame at the present moment and prejudging nothing at all, all that we can say is that the learned District Judge has exercised a wise discretion in appointing a Receiver in this case. At any rate, we are unable to say that the discretion exercised by the learned District Judge is so unreasonable that we ought to interfere. The appeal is dismissed and the Civil Rule is discharged. We think that costs of all the parties both of the Court below and of this Court should come out of the estate. Hearing fee ten gold mohurs in each Court.

The learned Government Advocate asked us to give directions as to the remuneration of the Mutwalli and also as to the costs which will be incurred by him in defending this action. We think that we are incompetent to deal with those matters in this appeal.

The mere fact that a party does not apply to set aside an ex parte decree under Order IX, rule 13, Civil Procedure Code, is no bar to his making an application under Order XLVII, rule 1, for a review of the decree. [p. 445, col 1.]

A petitioner for review is entitled under section 12 (2) of the Limitation Act to have deducted in his favour the time taken in obtaining a copy of the judgment which he seeks to have reviewed. [p. 445, col. 1.]

Whether or not a party, who seeks to review an ex parte decree, had sufficient reason for his failure to appear, is not one of the grounds which can be urged under Order XLVII, rule 7 of the Code of Civil Procedure, in an appeal from an order granting the review. [p. 445, col 2]

Appeal against the order of the Court of the Temporary Subordinate Judge, Sivaganga, dated the 29th March 1919, in I. A. No. 301 of 1916 (in Original Suit No. 77 of 1915, on the file of the Court of the Temporary Subordinate Judge, Sivaganga).

FACTS appear from the judgment.

Messrs. A. Kishnasawami Aiyar and A. Venkatrayaliah, for the Appellant.—The review should not have been granted. The proper course for the aggrieved party was to have applied under Order IX, rule 13, Civil Procedure Code. On the date of the review application, a petition under Order IX, rule 13, had become barred. A petition for review was, therefore, incompetent.

The petition is also time-barred. It was filed after 90 days from the date of the decree.

Here is no case of service by affixture. The party was served in person and, had he taken proper precautions, he could have appeared in person.

Messrs. T. M. Krishnasawmy Aiyar and V. Ganapathy Iyer, for the Respondent.—The remedies open to the party are cumulative. He is not confined to an application under Order IX, rule 13, and the fact that it has become barred does not prevent his resorting under the review section. The right to have the review is an independent right, if the party could satisfy the conditions laid down in Order XLVII, rule 1. See Lal Chet Narain Sahi v. Rampal Manjhi (1), Raj Narain Purkait v. Ananga Mohan Bhandari (2). The principle of the Full Bench ruling in Sadhu Krishna Ayyar v. Kuppan Ayyangar (3) applies. The omission to apply under Order IX, rule 13, was held not to affect the party's right of appeal.

As to the question of limitation, the application was in time, excluding the time taken in obtaining copy of decree.

Though petitioner was served in person, he had to go all the way from Malay States. That point cannot be urged in an application under Order XLVII, rule 7. See Oravukundiyil Parkum Elavana Tholan v. Palankundy Kunhi Kutty (4), Sreenivasa Aiyar v. Nataraja Aiyar (5) and Meduru Brahmayya v. Vedulu Yellamma (6).

JUDGMENT.—The first point taken is that no review can be granted on grounds falling within Order IX, rule 13, of the Code of Civil Procedure, and a party's remedy in such a case is confined to that rule, and as time had admittedly expired in the present case for an application to set aside the ex parte decree under that rule when the review application was filed, it should have been dismissed. We are unable to uphold this contention. If a party can bring his application within the provisions of Order XLVII, rule 1, of the Code of Civil Procedure, the fact that he could also have applied under Order IX, rule 13, cannot be treated as a bar to it. See Lal Chet Narain Sahi v. Rampal Manjhi (1), following Raj Narain Purkait v. Ananga Mohan Bhandari (2). We follow these rulings in spite of the dissent of Mr. Justice Roe in Deolip Singh v. Gopal Singh (7). In Virupakshi Gowd v. Bandappa (8) the view of that learned Judge was not accepted by this Court. It has been ruled by this Court in Full Bench in Sadhu Krishna Aiyar v. Kuppan Ayyanar (3) that a party's right of appeal is not affected by the fact that he had a right under Order IX, rule 13, also which he did not take advantage of and that it is open to the Appellate Court to set aside the ex parte decree and direct a new trial on grounds falling within Order IX, rule 13 of the Code of Civil Procedure. If an appeal can be allowed in that manner, we see no reason to suppose why a review cannot be allowed on similar grounds.

The next point taken is as to limitation. The review was no doubt filed after the expiry of 90 days from the date of the decree, but it is clear from the express language of section 12 (2) of the Limitation Act that the petitioner was entitled to have deducted in his favour the time taken for obtaining the copy of the judgment on which this review was founded. It was admitted in the lower Court that on making this deduction the application was in time.

We must, therefore, overrule this objection.

It was finally argued that, on the merits, there was no ground for setting aside the ex parte decree, as petitioner was served in person and could have appeared at the hearing with some diligence. He was living in Ipoh in F. M. States when he was served, and the lower Court has found that he had sufficient reason for his failure to appear. We agree with that finding. We also observe that it is not one of the grounds which can be urged under Order XLVII, rule 7, in an appeal from an order granting a review. See Orattukundiyil Parkum Elavana Tholan v. Palankundy Kunhi Kutty (4). Meduru Brahmayya v. Vedulu Yellamma (6) and Sreenivasa Aiyar v. Nataraja Aiyar (5).

The appeal fails and is dismissed with costs.

PATNA HIGH COURT.

CIVIL REVISION No. 283 OF 1919.

February 4, 1920.

Present:—Mr. Justice Das.

Maharaja SIR RAMESHWAR S NGH BAHADUR OF DARBHANGA—PETITIONER

SADANAND JHA AND OTHERS—OPPOSITE PARTY.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), ss. 115, 151, O XVII, r. 3—Plaint, defective—Procedure—Power to reject plaint or dismiss suit—Material irregularity, what is Dismissal of suit on account of defective plaint, whether material irregularity—Revision—High Court, interference by.

A Court has no jurisdiction to either dismiss a suit or reject a plaint merely because the plaint is defective in that it does not comply with a provision of the law. The proper procedure is to call on the plaintiff to cure the defect, and on his failure to do so, the Court may proceed to decide the suit forthwith and to dismiss it under Order XVII, rule 3, of the Civil Procedure Code, or it may reject the plaint under its inherent powers. [p. 446, col. 2; p. 447, col 1.]

An error of procedure resulting in a failure of justice is a material irregularity and is open to correction by the High Court under section 115 of the Code. [p. 447, col. 1.]

RAMESHWAR SINGH v. SADANAND JHA.

The dismissal of a suit on the ground that the plaint is defective without affording the plaintiff an opportunity of curing the defect is a material irregularity. [p. 447, col. 1.]

Appeal from a division of the District Jugde, Darbhanga.

Messrs. Purnendu Narain Sinha and Murari Prasad, for the Petitioner.

Mr. L. K. Jha, for the Opposite Party.

JUDGMENT.—This application is directed against the judgment of the learned District Judge of Darbhanga, who refused to set aside the order of the learned Munsif dismissing the suit on the ground that the plaint was defective.

The suit was brought by the Maharaja of Darbhanga for recovery of rent. Certain area and certain Jama were mentioned in the plaint which appeared to be different from those as entered in the finally published Record of Rights. To this extent the plaint was defective, for it contravened the provision of section 148 (b) (2) of the Bengal Tenancy Act: "Where an alteration has been made in the area of the tenancy, since the Record of Rights was prepared and finally published, the plaint shall further contain a statement of rental of the original tenancy according to the Record of Rights, together with a statement showing how the amount of rent claimed in the suit has been computed."

It is clear that the plaint did not contain a statement of the rental of the original tenancy according to the Record of Rights together with a statement showing how the amount of rent claimed in the suit had been computed and to this extent, as I have said, the plaint was clearly defective. But because the plaint was defective, did it give any jurisdiction to the Court to dismiss the plaint? That is the question which I have to determine.

In my view it gave no jurisdiction whatever to the learned Munsif to dismiss the suit. He ought to have asked the plaintiff to cure the defect and if the plaintiff failed to carry out the order of the learned Munsif, then and in that case the Munsif would have power under Order XVII, rule 3, to reject the plaint. There is no power in the Code and there is none in the Bengal Tenancy Act which gives any power to the Court to reject a plaint simply because the plaint is defective. It is useful to turn to the provisions of Order VII, rule 11, of the Code. That section provides: "The plaint shall be rejected in the following cases:—

(a) Where it does not disclose a cause of action:

(b) Where the relief claimed is undervalued, and the plaintiff, on being required by the Court to correct the valuation within a time to be fixed by the Court, fails to do so:

(c) Where the relief claimed is properly valued, but the plaint is written upon paper insufficiently stamped, and the plaintiff, on being required by the Court to supply the requisite stamp paper within a time to be fixed by the Court, fails to do so:

(d) Where the suit appears from the statement in the plaint to be barred by any law."

Now in this case it is argued by the learned Vakil on behalf of the respondent that the plaint was defective inasmuch as it did not disclose a cause of action. I am unable to take that view. The learned Munsif rejected the plaint not on the ground that it did not disclose a cause of action, but on the ground that it was defective. Then it cannot be argued that the suit appeared from the statement in the plaint to be barred by any law. Therefore, reading Order VII, rule 11, there was no power in the Court to reject the plaint; but it is useful to turn to clauses (b) and (c) of that rule. Those provisions give the Court power to reject a plaint if the claim is undervalued or the plaint is written upon paper insufficiently stamped and the plaintiff, on being required by the Court to correct the valuation within a time to be fixed by the Court, or to supply the requisite stamp paper within a time to be fixed by the Court, fails to do so. There is a clear indication that if there is any defect in the plaint itself, the Court must give the party opportunity to cure that defect, and if the party still fails to carry out the order of the Court, then the Court has ample power under Order XVII, rule 3, to reject the plaint. Order XVII, rule 3, clearly contemplates cases where the party fails to perform any act necessary to the further progress of the suit for which time has been allowed. In my view this is one of the matters contemplated by Order XVII, rule 3. If the plaintiff fails to perform any act necessary to the further progress of the suit for which time has been allowed, the Court may, notwithstanding such default, proceed to decide the suit forthwith, and to dismiss the suit on that ground. It may reject the plaint under its inherent power or proceed to try the suit and dismiss the suit under Order XVII, rule 3. In my view there is nothing either in the Code or in the Tenancy Act which gave the Court any power to either reject the plaint or to dismiss the suit on the ground that it did not comply with the provisions of section 148 (b) (2) of the Bengal Tenancy Act.

That being so, the question arises, have I any power to interfere with the order under section 115 of the Code of Civil Procedure?

The learned Vakil on behalf of the respondent has argued that that Court, namely, the Court of the District Judge, was the only Court that was competent to deal with the matter, that he has dealt with the matter, that, however erroneous his order may be, he had jurisdiction to pass that order, and that, therefore, this Court is powerless. I am unable to take that view. The High Court may make such order in the case as it thinks fit, if the Subordinate Court has acted in the exercise of its jurisdiction illegally or with material irregularity. It has been held in a series of cases, which it is unnecessary to discuss, that an error of procedure resulting a failure of justice is a material irregularity which would be corrected by the Court under section 115 of the Code. It was, in my view, a material irregularity on the part of the learned Munsif to dismiss the suit without giving the plaintiff any opportunity to cure the defect, and it has undoubtedly resulted in a failure or justice, inasmuch as the plaintiff's suit, as a result of that order, stood dismissed. I would, therefore, set aside the orders of the Courts below and direct that the suit be tried after giving an opportunity to the plaintiff to comply with the provisions of section 148 (b) (2) of the Bengal Tenancy Act. Opportunity will also be given to the defendant to file a written statement to the plaintiff's suit.

The learned Vakil on behalf of the petitioner does not ask for any costs on behalf of his client. I, therefore, make no order as to costs.

Petition allowed.

Contract Act (IX of 1872), ss. 14, 16—Undue influence—Dominating will of another, whether sufficient—Unfair advantage, use of position to obtain, whether essential—Burden of proof.

Undue influence is not established by proof of the relations of the parties having been such that the one naturally relied upon the other for advice, and that the other was in a position to dominate the will of the first in giving it. [p. 448, col. 2.]

To render influence 'undue', it must be established that the person in a position of domination has used that position to obtain unfair advantage for himself, and so to cause injury to the person relying upon his authority or aid. [p. 448, col. 2.]

It is only when the bargain is with the influencer and is in itself unconscionable that the burden is thrown upon the influencer to establish affirmatively that the other party was scrupulously kept separately advised in the independence of a free agent. [p. 448, col. 2.]

Appeal from a decree of the Madras High Court, dated July 30th, 1912, reversing a decree of the Subordinate Judge, Madura (East).

FACTS of the case are sufficiently stated in their Lordships' judgment, for which alone it is reported.

Sir Erle Richards, K. C., and Mr. Dube, for the Appellant.

Messrs. De Gruyther, K. C., and Kenworthy Brown, for the Respondents.

The arguments were directed to the facts, the only issue being whether the execution of the sale-deed, which it was sought to set aside, had or had not been procured by undue influence.

JUDGMENT.

LORD SHAW.—This suit has been brought by the present appellant for the cancellation of a deed of sale executed by him on the 17th March 1906. Cancellation was decreed by the Subordinate Judge, and the decision was reversed by a decree of the High Court of Judicature at Madras.

The real and only point at issue between the parties is whether the deed in question should be cancelled on the ground of undue influence. In the Court of the Subordinate Judge this point did not clearly appear from the issues which were framed. But an examination of the proceedings and evidence shows that it is to an issue of this kind that the plaintiff was throughout groping. The High Court properly discerned that; and the learned Counsel for the appellant properly presented the case from that point of view.

It is not necessary to speculate whether the provisions of the Indian Contract Act differ in any particulars from the doctrines of the English Law upon this subject. For no such differences are suggested to have any bearing on the issue between these parties. The issue in the present suit is an issue of fact, and there does not appear to the Board to be any sufficient reason for doubting that the judgment arrived at in the High Court is sound.

The Indian Contract Act by section 14 provides that "consent is said to be free if it is not caused by...undue influence as defined by section 16." By section 16 (1) "the contract is said to be induced by 'undue influence' where the relations (subsisting?) existing between the parties are such that one of the parties is in a position to dominate the will of the other, and uses that position to obtain an unfair advantage over the other." Sub-section 3 of the same section may also be referred to. It provides that:—

"Where a person who is in a position to dominate the will of another enters into a contract with him, and the transaction appears on the face of it, or on the evidence, to be unconscionable, the burden of proving that such contract was not induced by undue influence shall lie upon the person in the position to dominate the will of the other."

It is a mistake (of which there are a good many traces in these proceedings) to treat undue influence as having been established by a proof of the relations of the parties having been such that the one naturally relied upon the other for advice, and the other was in a position to dominate the will of the first in giving it. Up to that point "influence" alone has been made out. Such influence may be used wisely, judiciously and helpfully. But, whether by the law of India or the law of England, more than mere influence must be proved so as to render influence, in the language of the law, "undue." It must be established that the person in a position of domination has used that position to obtain unfair advantage for himself, and so to cause injury to the person relying upon his authority or aid.

And where the relation of influence, as above set forth, has been established, and the second thing is also made clear, viz., that the bargain is with the "influencer" and in itself unconscionable: then the person in a position to use his dominating power has the burden thrown upon him, and it is a heavy burden, of establishing affirmatively that no domination was practised so as to bring about the transaction, but that the granter of the deed was scrupulously kept separately advised in the independence of a free agent.

These general propositions are mentioned, because if laid alongside of the facts of the present case, then it appears that one vital element—perhaps not sufficiently relied on in the Court below, and yet essential to the plaintiff's case, is wanting. It is not proved as a fact in the present case that the bargain of sale come to was unconscionable in itself, or constituted an advantage unfair to the plaintiff; it is, in short, not established as a matter of fact that the sale was for an undervalue.

The subject of the sale, to mention only one particular, was not the two villages mentioned in the plaint, but the property in the villages burdened with usufructuary mortgages which did not expire for eighteen years. These mortgages amounted to Rs. 51,000. The crucial enquiry on the point of sufficiency of consideration accordingly was, what on the date of the sale was the de presenta value of the plaintiff's right of property in these villages? Beyond a loose reference to a lakh of rupees, without any specification as to whether this referred to the present value, or to deferred value, or to value of the property, the evidence is entirely silent.

Nothing has been brought in argument before the Board to satisfy their Lordships' minds that the price of Rs. 6,000, even coupled with the demand for the wiping off of a debt of about Rs. 3,000, incurred for litigation and for the honouring by the plaintiff of a promissory note executed by him for another Rs. 3,000—was not a fair consideration for the transaction.

Their Lordships think it unnecessary to enter into the further grounds stated by the learned Judges of the High Court for their decision, although they express no disagreement with these grounds in themselves.

The true contradictor in the issue was the party to the transaction, the vendee. But the plaintiff endeavoured to strengthen the case for cancellation by convening also as defendants his two uncles, now also his two fathers in law.

Their Lordships do not doubt that in the category of cases of undue influence might be covered cases where the party to a transaction exercised that influence in conspiracy with or through the agency of others. But they think it right to say that no proof has been given of any such conspiracy or agency in the present case.

When it is added that the consideration paid was in part actually defrayed to cover expenses incurred by the plaintiff on the occasion of his marriages to the two daughters of his uncles, the 1st and 2nd defendants, and that these marriages took place, it would require fairly strong evidence to induce any Court to give countenance to the suggestion that his uncles and fathers-in law had conspired with the third defendant to subject the plaintiff to unconscionable loss. To this element weight is properly attached in the Court below.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), s. 50—Judgment-debtor, who is—Decree against dead person, whether enforceable against his legal representatives.

For a person to be a judgment-debtor, he must be a party to a suit or appeal. A person who dies before a decree is passed against him is not a judgment-debtor, and consequently the decree cannot be enforced against his legal representatives under section 50 of the Civil Procedure Code, as that section applies only where a judgment-debtor dies subsequently to the passing of the decree. [p. 450, cols. 1 & 2.]

Appeal against the decree of the Additional District Judge, Raipur, in Civil Appeal No. 240 of 1918, decided on the 17th January 1919.

Mr. A. C. Roy, for the Appellant.

Dr. H. S. Gour, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—Mahadin, the father of the respondents, an insane person under the guardianship of Bhagwati Prasad, respondent No. 1, obtained a decree for possession of a house site against the appellant Bhanjisingh. After the dismissal of a first appeal by Bhanjisingh, Mahadin recovered a part of the costs on the 29th June 1915 and took possession of the site in execution on the 8th April 1916. A second appeal was filed by Bhanjisingh on the 17th August 1915. It was heard on the 9th February 1917. Mahadin was represented at the hearing by Counsel. The appeal was decided in Bhanjisingh's favour on the 12th February 1917.

Bhanjisingh made two applications in execution, one for restitution of the site, the costs recovered by Mahadin and for damages, and the other for costs awarded to him under this Court's decree. The respondents were joined as parties to the execution proceedings on the ground that Mahadin had died and they were his heirs in possession of the land in dispute. The respondents pleaded that the decree of this Court in second appeal was a nullity as it was passed against Mahadin after his death, which took place on Srawan Badi 6th corresponding to 19th August 1916. Bhanjisingh admitted that Mahadin had died before the hearing of the second appeal.

Both these applications have been dismissed by the lower Appellate Court on the ground that the decree in second appeal was a nullity.

It is contended on the appellant's behalf that the executing Court had no power to go behind the decree and investigate the question whether the decree was valid or not.

The trend of rulings seems to be that it is not open to the executing Court to go into such a question: Hari Govind Kulkarni v. Narsingrao (1), Maharaj Kumar Bindeswari Prosad Singh v. Thakur Lakpat Nath Singh (2), Liladhar v. Chaturbhuj (3), Kumaretta Servaigaran v. Sabapathy Chettiar (4) and Kodula Agarwala v Behari Kurmi (5).

The real question in this case is whether the decree is executable against the respondents. It was not passed against them personally. It can only be executed against them as the legal representatives of a judgment-debtor under section 50, Civil Procedure Code (I take it that restitution under section 144, Civil Procedure Code, is also a matter in execution). It is open to the respondents to urge that they are not the legal representatives of any person who is a judgment-debtor under the decree sought to be executed. The defendant can only point to Mahadin as the judgment debtor. This Mahadin could not have been. Before a person can be a judgment-debtor he must be a party to the suit or appeal. There is no provision in the Civil Procedure Code under which a dead person can be a party to a suit or appeal. Section 50 can apply only to living persons who have been parties and become judgment-debtors and have subsequently died. It is clear that Mahadin was not a judgment debtor and the respondents are not the legal representatives of a judgment-debtor and no application for execution can be made against them. Reference in this connection may be made to Girendronath Tagore, In the matter of the petition of (6).

The appeal fails and is dismissed with costs.

Lala Madan Gopal, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—In this case the facts are very simple. One Mahna mortgaged two pieces of land, one measuring 11 kanals 3 marlas and the other 3 kanals 4 marlas, in 1876 and 1880 respectively. In 1890 Mahna's son Jassu redeemed his half share in the first mortgage and the whole of the second mortgage. In the same year he sold the land redeemed to defendant No. 1. He thus sold the half share in the 3 kanals 4 marlas which belonged to his brother Jowala. Jowala's son Basanta has now sued for possession by redemption of his half share of the 3 kanals 4 marlas, and his suit has been contested by the vendee from Jassu. His suit has been dismissed as time-barred by both Courts. The lower Appellate Court considered that Jassu was not a mortgagee but merely a charge-holder and that the case was governed by Article 144 of the Limitation Act. It referred to Jai Kishen Joshi v. Budhanand Joshi (1) as an authority on this point; also Vasudev v. Balaji (2)and Purna Chandra Pal v. Barada Prasunna Bhattacharjee (3). It considered that Khanu Mal v. Khan Muhammad (4) was distinguishable. Against this decision the plaintiff has preferred a second appeal to this Court.

His Counsel urges that Khanu Mal v. Khan Muhammad (4) exactly applies to the present case. He also relies upon Ashfaq Ahmad v. Wazir Ali (5) and Khiali Ram v. Taik Ram (6), which approved of Ashfaq Ahmad v. Wazir Ali (5). As for Khanu Mal v. Khan Muhammad (4) the facts are not analogous to those of the present case, as the plaintiff was contesting a transfer by a mortgagee to a third party. The learned Judges held in that case that the third party stood in the shoes of the original mortgagee and that the period of limitation would be that provided by Article 148. As for Ashfaq Ahmad v. Wazir Ali (5) it is somewhat in favour of the appellant. A Full Bench of the Allahabad High Court held that a co-mortgagor redeeming the whole of the mortgage stood in the shoes of the original mortgagee as regards the portion of the property which represented the interest of the other co-mortgagors. In that case, however, there had been no further transfer of the redeemed property to any third party. The judgment is certainly in favour of the appellant in so far as it holds the redeeming co-mortgagor not to be a mere charge-holder. This view was followed in Khiali Ram v. Taik Ram (6). On the other hand there is a consensus of opinion of the other High Courts that a redeeming co-mortgagor does not become a mortgagee of the portion redeemed belonging to other co-owners, see, for instance, Vasudev v. Balaji (2), Purna Chandra Pal v. Barada Prasunna Bhattacharjee (3) (a Calcutta case), Murajalli Hunia Goundan v. Ramasami Chetti (7), Mulla Vittil Seeti Kutti v. Kunhi Pathumma (8) and Ram Kanai Ghosh v. Raja Sri Sri Hari Narayan Singh Deo Bahadur (9). Finally there is the clear authority relied upon by the lower Appellate Court, Jai Kishen Joshi v. Budhanand Joshi (1), that Article 148 of the Limitation Act, which refers only to a suit against the mortgagee, has no application to a suit against a charge-holder. It is true that the principles on which these judgments proceed are contained in sections 95 and 100 of the Transfer of Property Act, which is not in force in the Punjab, but as pointed out in Vasudev v. Balaji (2) on page 504, the Act merely gives legislative expression to what was the law apart from it.

For the foregoing reasons I agree with the lower Appellate Court that Article 148 does not apply to this case. The suit

A party entitled to rateable distribution under the provisions of section 73, Civil Procedure Code, is not entitled to attack a decree obtained by a rival decree-holder on the ground that the debt on which the decree was founded was not a real debt or was not supported by consideration. Appeal against the decree of the Court of the Subordinate Judge, Nagapatam, in Original Suit No. 22 of 1913.

FACTS appear from the judgment.

Mr. K. Srinivasa Aiyangar (with him Messrs. K. V. Krishnasami Aiyar and K. S. Jayarama Aiyar), for the Appellants.—The suit for declaration and injunction is not sustainable. It was, at any rate, premature. Clause (2) of section 73, Civil Procedure Code, provides a remedy to the party who complains of wrong disbursement of the assets. He could institute a suit for refund where money was wrongly paid to a decree-holder not entitled to receive it. Here the amount was in Court deposit and was not actually paid to the 1st defendant. The plaintiff should have waited till the amount was actually paid. See Parasurama Pattar v. Veeraraghava Pattar (1), C. C. C. Appeal No. 31 of 1909, Hart v. Tara Prasanna Mukherjee (2). The plaintiff should have resorted to the special remedy provided in section 73. No other remedy was open to him.

The judgment in Original Suit No 26 of 1910 establishes the relation of creditor and debtor between the parties for the amount of the decree. The defendant himself could not have avoided the decree on the ground of want of consideration or on the ground that the decree was secured by means of perjured evidence. A fortiori third parties cannot attempt to impeach the decree on similar grounds. The only exception is in cases of fraud or collusion. The finding here is that there was no extrinsic fraud.

Though the judgment in Original Suit No. 26 of 1910 is only a judgment in personam and binds only parties to the suit and their privies as a general rule, there are still exceptions and strangers cannot intervene in the method by which [illegible] a decree has been obtained where there has been no fraud.

The Hon'ble Mr. D. Devadoss and Mr. T. Rangachariar, for the Respondents.—The plaintiff was not a party to Original Suit No. 26 of 1910 and the judgment in that suit does not bind him. The judgment is only in personam; where the decision in that suit injuriously affects a third party, he is entitled to have it vacated. The judgment only evidences a debt between the parties and the respondents are entitled to show that it was wrongly obtained. Plaintiff can come in only within the principles of section 53 of the Transfer of Property Act. There are cases in the English Courts in which the Courts have intervened where judgments in personam have been obtained to the injury of third parties. See Kibble, Ex parte, Onslow, In re (3), Hawkins, In re, Troup, Ex parte (4), Fraser, In re, Central Bank, Ex parte (5), Lennox, Ex parte, Lennox, In re (6). See also Sunder Dass, In re (7).

The general relief under the Rpecific relief Act is not barred by clause (2) of section 73, Civil Procedure Code. A party is not disentitled to sue for declaration and injunction by reason of the special remedy provided by section 73, Civil Procedure Code. If the person to whom money has been paid is a pauper, a suit for refund will avail him nothing.

Mr. K. Srinivasa Aiyangar, in reply.—The English cases relate to special bankruptcy proceedings and are not applicable.

JUDGMENT.

BODAM, J.—Plaintiffs are creditors of Vynagaram Lakshmana Chetty and Nataraja Aiyar. The former was carrying on money-lending business in the Tanjore District with a head office at Kumbakonam and branches at Mudikondan and Nagapatam. The firm also did business in Madras, Calcutta, Singapore and other places. Nataraja Aiyar was associated with the firm, and it is suggested that when its credit was failing, his assistance was sought in order to improve the financial position. At the time the transaction now in question was entered into, he was a young man of considerable means. Lakshmana Chetty is now an insolvent and the whereabouts of Nataraja Aiyar are said to be unknown, Plaintiffs' witness No. 1, the defendant and Narayana Sastri were respectively the agents of the firm at Kumbakonam, Mudikondan and Nagapatam. The plaintiffs have obtained decrees against their debtors and considerable sums realised in execution were held by the Nagapatam Sub-Court. The 1st defendant also obtained a decree in Original Suit No. 26 of 1910 against the same debtors and he applied under section 73 of the Code of Civil Procedure for rateable distribution along with the plaintiffs. In the ordinary course the 1st defendant would admittedly be entitled to a share in the assets realised. At the time the applications were disposed of by the Court, proceedings were pending in the High Court which, if decided against the 1st defendant, would have resulted in his decree, which was passed ex parte, being set aside. The Court, in ordering rateable distribution, directed that the proportionate share to which the 1st defendant would be entitled on the basis of his decree should be retained in Court, while the sums due to the other judgment creditors were disbursed. The proceedings in the High Court terminated in favour of the 1st defendant. But the amount rateably due to him has not actually been paid and is still in Court deposit. The decree in Original Suit No. 26 of 1910 is dated 16th April 1910, but the final order of the High Court was not passed until 7th December 1912. On 9th January 1913, the present suit was instituted. The relief sought was a declaration that the defendant was not entitled to participate in the distribution of assets under section 73 of the Code of Civil Procedure. It was alleged in the plaint that the decree in Original Suit No. 26 of 1910 had been obtained by means of fraud and collusion; and it was further asserted that the promissory note on which the 1st defendant's claim was based was entirely unsupported by consideration. The suit was dismissed on 22nd December 1915, the Subordinate Judge holding that it was not sustainable without a prayer for consequential relief. He also held that the suit for declaration as prayed for in this case would not lie, where actual payment had not been made under the provisions of section 73.

On appeal to the High Court (Appeal No. 21 of 1916) the decision of the Subordinate Judge was set aside after permission had been granted to the plaintiffs to amend the plaint by adding a prayer for consequential relief by way of injunction. This point and a question of stamp duty are the only matters dealt with in the judgment of the High Court.

On the re-hearing in the Sub-Court of Nagapatam, the contest before the Subordinate Judge related firstly to questions of fact, as to whether there had been any fraud or collusion in obtaining the decree in Original Suit No. 26 of 1910 and whether the promissory note in favour of the 1st defendant was supported by consideration or not; and secondly, to questions of law relating to the maintainability of a suit of this nature. The Subordinate Judge found that there was no consideration for the promissory note, and that, except in one particular, there had been no extrinsic fraud or collusion in obtaining the decree.

On the questions of law, he found that the suit was maintatinable and granted the plaintiffs the declaration and injunction prayed for. The 1st defendant appeals.

With regard to the finding as to fraud and collusion, the Subordinate Judge came to the conclusion that as far as Nataraja Aiyar and the proceedings taken by him are concerned, there was no collusion of any kind between him and the 1st defendant. On the evidence no other conclusion was possible. The other defendant in the suit, Lakshmana Chetty, was proceeded against through his agent at Nagapatam, Narayana Sastri. Collusion is not alleged but as to fraud the Subordinate Judge, as I understand him, is of opinion that the impleading of Narayana Sastri as the agent of Lakshmana Chetty was a fraudulent act on the part of the 1st defendant. This is based on the ground that the agency of Narayana Sastri, which had admittedly existed, had been terminated prior to the institution of Original Suit No. 26 of 1910 to the knowledge of 1st defendant. The agency is said to have come to an end owing to the insolvency of Lakshmana Chetty. Adjudication in insolvency would have this effect under section 201 of the Contract Act.

The facts as to the insolvency proceedings are these: a creditor's petition was presented agains- Lakshmana Chetty to declare him insolvent on 7th October 1908. This was in the District Court of Madura. He was declared insolvent on 29th March 1909 by the Sub-Court, Madura (East). That order was subsequently annulled on 18th October 1909, as the Subordinate Judge found that he had acted without jurisdiction. Eventually an order adjudicating Lakshmana Chetty an insolvent was passed in the District Court of Madura on the 29th September 1910. It is clear from these proceedings that neither at the time when Original Suit No. 26 of 1910 was instituted nor at the time when the decree in Original Suit No. 26 of 1910 was passed was Lakshmana Chetty an insolvent. The order of adjudication which had been previously passed, having been made without jurisdiction, was a nullity.

It is also pointed out that in another suit, Original Suit No. 32 of 1908, the defendant himself had pleaded that Narayana Sastri was not Lakshmana Chetty's agent. All that is stated in the written statement in that suit is that Narayana Sastri "had no power to file this plaint." I do not think that the written statement can be taken as asserting that the agency was no longer existing. The evidence of plaintiffs' witness No. 1 shows that Narayana Sastri did continue to conduct the affairs of the firm long after the institution of the insolvency proceedings. The Kumbakonam branch was closed in June 1908 and according to plaintiffs' witness No. 1 the whole of the accounts were handed over to Narayana Sastri. There is no proof that he had ceased to be agent of the Chetty before the decree in Original Suit No. 26 of 1910 was obtained. He did not defend the suit, but it cannot be inferred from this that the agency had terminated or that there was collusion. It is not clear that any part of the assets held by the Court was realised from Lakshmana Chetty's properties.

The next question is whether the promissory note on which the 1st defendant sued was supported by consideration. Exhibit H is the note. It was executed on 2nd February 1908 by plaintiffs' witness No. 1 both in his capacity as agent for Lakshmana Chetty and as agent for Nataraja Aiyar. It is for a sum of Rs. 30,000 and was attested by plaintiffs' witness No. 3. There is no dispute as to the genuineness of the note and the only contest is as to the circumstances in which it came into existence. The 1st defendant was regarded as a person capable of raising money when wanted. This appears from a number of letters on the record (e. g.) Exhibits III (a), III (c) and VIII (e). He was approached at this time with a request to procure Rs. 30,000. Vide Exhibit VI (a) of 30th January 1908. It was in pursuance of prior communications with the 1st defendant that plaintiffs' witness No. 1 went to Mudikondan on the 2nd February when Exhibit H was executed. Even prior to this date, rumours injurious to the firm's credit appear to have been spread about, vide Exhibit D-1. Shortly afterwards the stability of the business seems to have been severely shaken by loss of credit, vide Exhibits D-10 and D-11. The firm was in need of money and it became increasingly difficult to procure] it. The chief reason why the Mudikondan branch was in urgent need of fund was this: that a number of the depositors were desirous of withdrawing their moneys as they wished to purchase lands in Court auction and had to provide themselves with the means of making the necessary payments when the sale took place. This is the transaction referred to in a number of letters as the sale of Kollumangudi lands. Exhibits DD-5 and DD-7 and another letter of the 26th January 1908 make the position clear.

The plaintiffs' case is that the sum of Rs. 30,000 was needed principally for meeting this demand and in fact a loan of Rs. 30,000 was raised from plaintiffs' witness No. 2 under Exhibits B and B 1 of the 13th and 15th Febraury 1908 respectively. It was out of this money that the purchasers in the Court sale were supplied with the funds necessary to pay up the balance of the price when it fell due about the middle of February, vide Exhibit D-8 The suggestion is that plaintiffs' witness No. 2 had to be resorted to because the 1st defendant had failed to obtain the money.

The 1st defendant's case is that the loan advanced by him was required for remittance to Madras and Calcutta and has nothing whatever to do with the re payment to local constituents of their deposits.

The Subordinate Judge has examined the evidence at length and with care and has come to the conclusion that there was no consideration for the note. The reasons given by him have not been successfully attacked and the conclusion appears to me to be right. There is in the first place the oral evidence, Plaintiffs' witness No. 1 and the attestor, plaintiffs' witness No. 3, both assert that no consideration passed. On the other side there is the statement of the 1st defendant and of the 5th defence witness. The latter's evidence is unworthy of credit and has been rightly rejected by the Subordinate Judge. The explanation given by the plaintiffs' witnesses for the execution of the note and for its delivery to the 1st defendant is that it was anticipated that he would be able to raise the money, once he was armed with this document which pledged not only the credit of Lakshmana Chetty but also that of Nataraja Aiyar. Even after the 1st defendant was known to have failed in raising the money, the note was not recovered from him. The evidence as regards this cannot be regarded as altogether satisfactory. It is stated by the witnesses on the plaintiffs' side that the fact that the note was in the possession of the 1st defendant was publicly mentioned. The 1st defendant is said to have admitted that no consideration had passed and to have asserted his intention of keeping the note in order to support a claim against the firm, which was known by him to be in a precarious condition. Plaintiffs' witness No. 2, who is a relative of the 1st defendant, was also a creditor of the firm, and the evidence is that the 1st defendant asserted that he was retaining the note in order that plaintiffs' witness No. 2 might benefit by any sums which might be realised on it. The admissions of the 1st defendant to this effect are spoken to by plaintiffs' witnesses Nos. 1, 2 and 4 The two latter are men of wealth and position and one of them, as already stated, is connected with the 1st defendant. The Subordinate Judge accepts the evidence of these witnesses and points out that plaintiffs' witness No 2 in particular seems to be a very respectable man. According to his own statement, however, his respectability did not render him proof against acquiescing in a fraud which might benefit himself, and it is unlikely that 1st defendant would have proclaimed his intention in the manner suggested. I am not inclined to attach importance to the oral evidence as to the 1st defendant's admission. The plaintiffs have given a reasonable account as to why the money was required, which is supported by the correspondence as has already been pointed out. The 1st defendant's story is that it was required in order to make payments to Marwaris. There is no corroboration of this statement. No writing has been referred to in which any demand of money on this account is mentioned. The 1st defendant himself admits that he has no knowledge of how this large sum was dealt with and that he never made any enquiries on this point. The accounts of the firm appear to have been kept in a perfectly regular manner, both as regards transactions with strangers and as regards adjustments between the various branches of the firm itself. A number of loans are referred to in the evidence, and all of these can be traced through the accounts, e. g., Rs. 30,000 borrowed from plaintiffs' witness No. 2 under Exhibits B and B1. There is, however, not a single entry relating to the loan the defendant is alleged to have made. It is important to remember that the accounts were written long before any dispute had arisen and while the 1st defendant, plaintiffs' witness No. 1 and Narayana Sastri were on perfectly friendly terms. The 1st defendant had access to the account not only of the branch of which he was himself in charge but also of those in Kumbakonam, vide Exhibit S, and he must have been well aware that no entry relating to this very large advance received through himself was to be found in any of the firm's books. Yet in spite of this there is no evidence whatever of a word of protest on his part. It is impossible to believe that this would have been the case if the 1st defendant had really made himself responsible, as he alleges, for Rs. 30,000 for the benefit of the firm. The 1st defendant has given a long explanation as to how he raised the necessary money, and it is not suggested that he could have provided the whole of the amount himself. The story is that he borrowed Rs. 25,000 and advanced Rs. 5,000 of his own. He alleges that Rs. 20,000 was borrowed from Adi Swaminatha Aiyar. The evidence regarding this transaction has been dealt with at length by the Subordinate Judge in paragraphs 25 to 28 of the judgment. I do not think that anything can usefully be added to what he has said in the judgment and I entirely agree with the conclusions arrived at by him. Subject to a remark about Exhibit XV, the facts appear to me to have been accurately stated and the inferences from them to have been correctly drawn. As to Exhibit XV, it no doubt shows that a sum of about Rs. 3,000 was paid by him to Swaminatha Aiyar on 16th October 1911; but there is nothing to connect this with the alleged loan of Rs. 20,000 and it is clear that there were other monetary transactions between the 1st defendant and his relative Adi Swaminatha Aiyar. It may be pointed out that the entry in Exhibit XV gives no support to the story of a small outstanding balance which the 1st defendant has invented for the purpose of explaining his failure to produce the discharged promissory notes. Rs. 5,000 is said to have been borrowed from 1st defendant's witness No. 6, who is the sister's husband of the 1st defendant. This loan is not supported by any document, although it asserted that a promissory note was to be executed, and no accounts are produced containing any reference to this amount. The 1st defendant stated that he had kept no accounts for this period, but this is in conflict with the evidence of plaintiffs' witness No. 6. A perusal of the evidence of this witness leaves no doubt that he was never in a position to advance such a sum. As to the balance of Rs. 5,000, there is no corroboration of the 1st defendant's assertion. The conduct of the 1st defendant is also inconsistent with his ever having made the loan. His account is that he had procured this large sum of Rs. 30,000 on his own personal credit and that the money was utilised solely for the benefit of the firm by which he was employed. He was to get absolutely no advantage, but on the other hand he incurred heavy liabilities and this, at a time, when he was aware that the firm's credit was failing. He represents himself as having discharged the debts incurred by him for the benefit of the firm, out of his own pocket and by the sale of his own property. Although there is a great deal of correspondence subsequent to the making of the loan between the 1st defendant and plaintiff's witness No. 1, yet there is not a single reference to the 1st defendant's own position and to the large debt due to him by the firm. It is almost impossible to believe that in the circumstances, the 1st defendant would not have taken some steps to protect himself against the loss with which he was faced, if there had been any truth in his having made an advance of this amount. One point which has been strongly relied upon for the appellant is the admitted fact that on the 3rd February 1908 a sum of Rs. 10,000 was remitted from Mudikondan to Nagapatam through plaintiffs' witness No. 1. This was on the day subsequent to the execution of Exhibit H and the 1st defendant's case is that the Rs. 10,000 forms part of the Rs. 30,000 which was advanced by him. The plaintiffs on the other hand assert that the money was raised by means of Exhibit VII*a*, a promissory note executed by Nataraja Aiyar in favour of M. Rama Aiyar. There is no dispute about the genuineness of Exhibit VII*a*. The 1st defendant explains that it represents a purely private transaction between Nataraja Aiyar and Rama Aiyar and that the money was received by Nataraja and not by the firm. For this contention the wording of Exhibit VII*a* and a letter, Exhibit VII*b*, are relied upon. Nataraja was at the time at Vedaranyam. Admittedly the promissory note was sent to him there for execution. In terms, it is a transaction between him and M. Rama Aiyar. There is no recital in the promissory note that the money was required for the firm. The note was taken to Vedaranyam by plaintiffs' witness No. 3 who was Gumastah of the firm, and in Exhibit VII*a*, it is recited that Rs. 12,000 has been received through him on the 4th February. Exhibit VII*b* is a letter of even date which contains a similar statement. It is, however, clear, as pointed out by the Subordinate Judge in paragraph 37 of the judgment, by reference to letters written by the 1st defendant himself, that the money raised under Exhibit VII*a* was obtained for the firm and utilised by it. This is also the evidence of 1st defendant's witness No. 1 and plaintiffs' witness No. 3. Their evidence is corroborated by the contemporaneous entries in the accounts—vide paragraph 38 of the lower Court's judgment. I have no doubt that this view of the matter is correct, and that no money was sent to Vedaranyam but that M. Rama Aiyar supplied funds direct to the agents of the firm who were at Mudikondan and that the money was used for the firm's purposes. The sum thus obtained was Rs. 12,000 and it was from out of this that plaintiffs' witness No. 1 was able to take Rs. 10,000 to Nagapatam on the 3rd February. Exhibit VII*a* is dated 4th February, but the evidence establishes that the money had been actually received on the 2nd. The remittance to Nagapatam in no way supports the truth of the loans by the 1st defendant.

Stress has been laid on the fact that the promissory note Exhibit H was allowed to remain in the possession of the 1st defendant. That it should have been left with him for a short time with hopes that he would procure the money is natural enough. But there was considerable delay in taking any effective steps to secure its return. Reference has already been made to this, and to the explanation which is furnished in the oral evidence. It was not until August 1908 that a formal notice, Exhibit XVII, demanding return of the Exhibit H was sent to the 1st defendant; and to this he replied by Exhibit XVII*a* asserting that the note was supported by consideration. Shortly afterwards, a suit, Original Suit No. 32 of 1908, was instituted for a declaration that no consideration had passed. The original plaintiff was Lakshmana Chetty by his agent Narayana Sastri, the Nagapatam agent. The suit was dismissed on a question of stamp duty in the Court of first instance, and this decision was confirmed on appeal on 7th September 1909 [vide Exhibit X (c)]. Nothing further was done. Lakshmana Chetty was in very involved circumstances, and this may account for his inaction. Narayana Sastri is dead and Lakshmana Chetty has not been examined.

Nataraja Aiyar had been added as a plaintiff and why he took no further steps is not made clear. He actively contested proceedings in Original Suit No. 26 of 1910. The conduct of the debtors in Original Suit No. 32 of 1908 does not in my opinion rebut the very strong evidence indicative of the absence of consideration for Exhibit H.

The facts then are that the decree in Original Suit No. 26 of 1910 was not obtained by collusion, that there was no extraneous fraud, but that the promissory note on which the decree is based was unsupported by consideration. As far as the parties to the suit are concerned, the judgment is final and there are no circumstances which would enable them to have it set aside. Logadapatti Chinnayya v. Kotla Ramanna (8), Kadirvelu Nainar v. Kuppuswami Naicker (9). An order in 1st defendant's favour for rateable distribution has been passed, but no payment has been made to him. It remains to be determined whether it is open to third parties in the position of the plaintiffs to impugn the validity of the decree and whether a suit for declaration of this kind is maintainable.

The latter point may be considered first.

The question is whether the suit is premature because the share of the 1st defendant has not been disbursed. Once assets have been disbursed, clause 2 of section 73 of the Civil Procedure Code, 1908, expressly provides for a suit for refund where the payment has been made to a person not entitled to receive it. The contention for the appellant is that the plaintiffs have no cause of action until payment has been made and that suit for declaration will not lie. Two decisions of this Court have been relied upon, Parasurama Pattar v. Veeraraghava Pattar (1), and an unreported case C. C. C. Appeal No. 31 of 1909 (Exhibit I). In the former case a decree holder had been paid the whole sum realised by him in execution of his decree as the application of another decree holder for rateable distribution had been dismissed. The latter succeeded in getting the order of dismissal set aside and the former was directed to pay back into Court the sum he had drawn. He then sued for a declaration that the other claimant was not entitled to rateable distribution, but as no assets had come in the latter's hands it was held that the suit was not maintainable. Hart v. Tara Prasanna Mukherjee (2) is referred to. There the Court had ordered under section 295 (section 73 of the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908) that the whole sum realised by the defendant in execution proceedings should be paid to him in spite of plaintiff's application for the rateable distribution. No disbursement was, however, made. The plaintiff sued for payment out of Court to him of the sum which he claimed as rateably due. The question whether a declaratary suit was maintainable was raised in the arguments. The judgment, however, proceeds on the basis that the suit was brought under the provisions of section 295, and the decision is that it would not lie because assets had not come into the hands of the defendant. There is no suggestion in the judgment that any other remedy was open to the plaintiff.

In Trailakya Nath Adhya v. Pulin Behari Baral (10) it was held that a suit would lie for a declaration that a decree-holder, who was otherwise qualified to get rateable distribution under section 73, was not entitled to receive payment on the ground that his decree had been obtained by collusion and fraud. The decision in Hart v. Tara Prasanna Mukherjee (2) was distinguished on the ground that the prayer was for a refund. The plaintiff had asked in the alternative for recovery from the defendant in the event of payment having been made, but the report indicates that this event had not happened and he also asked for payment out of the assets held by the Court.

Both the Calcutta cases were considered in C. C. C. Appeal No. 31 of 1909. The facts on which the declaration was sought are not stated in the judgment. Apparently it was not a case in which the decree was attacked on the ground of collusion. The decision reported in Parasurama Pattar v. Veeraraghava Pattar (1) was followed, and it also was a case in which the right to distribution was not disputed on the ground that the decree was collusive. The case of Trailakya Nath Adhya v. Pulin Behari Baral (10) is referred to as being in favour of the maintainability of a declaratory suit, and it is remarked that the decision may perhaps be distinguished on the ground that the decree of the rival decree-holder was alleged to be collusive. It was held that a suit for a declaration was not maintainable and it was pointed out that the Legislature had provided a special machinery for a limited purpose and a special remedy for determining questions of right which might arise. To hold that such a suit is not maintainable would result in many instances in depriving the plaintiff of his only effective remedy. The Madras cases do not decide that such a suit is not maintainable when the decree is attacked on the ground of collusion. That is the case which was put forward in the plaint. In the absence of proof of collusion the suit in my opinion will fail on another ground and, therefore, this point need not be dealt with further. The case of the respondents is that as they were not parties in Original Suit No. 26 of 1910 and as the judgment is only in personam, they are entitled to have it vacated even on grounds which would not be open to the defendants in the suit. The judgment is said to be only a piece of evidence as to the existence of a debt which it is open to the respondents to rebut and which they have succeeded in rebutting. The Subordinate Judge has held that the facts that Exhibit H was not supported by consideration and that the defendant must have supported his claim by false evidence are sufficient to entitle the plaintiffs, who held decrees against the same judgment-debtors, to the relief they pray for in this suit. It is contended before us that this view is wrong. It is conceded that cases of collusion or proceedings in bankruptcy stand on a different footing. The argument advanced is that apart from the exceptions just mentioned, the plaintiffs would be entitled to relief in such circumstances only to which the principle illustrated by section 53 of the Transfer of Property Act is applicable. The fact that there has been a fraud by one creditor on the judgment-debtor will not enable other creditors to dispute the validity of the decree, where the fraud was not aimed at them and they had no direct interest in the suit.

A number of English cases have been cited, but it is unnecessary to deal with them at length because all the decisions relate to bankruptcy proceedings and there is really no controversy as to the powers of a Court exercising bankruptcy jurisdiction. Kibble, Ex parte, Onslow, In re (3), Lennox, Ex parte, Lennox, In re (6), Fraser, In re, Central Bank, Ex parte, (5), Hawkins, In re, Troup, Ex parte (4) were referred to.

These cases establish that the mere fact that a debt which is sought to be proved is founded on a judgment does not prevent the trustee in bankruptcy inquiring into the reality of the debt on which the judgment is based. Such an inquiry may be held even before a receiving order has been made and even at the instance of the debtor, although the latter would be estopped by the judgment from disputing the existence of the debt in any other forum. In order to justify the rejection of the debt by the Court, it is not necessary that there should be proof of collusion or of fraud. It is enough that the transaction should have been unfair and unreasonable. [Vide Hawkins, In re, Troup, Ex parte (4).] It is clear from the judgments that the decisions are based on the peculiar powers of the Court of Bankruptcy. The Court is charged with the administration of the estate for the benefit of the whole body of creditors and the interference of the Court has far-reaching and permanent effects on their rights. The proceedings in bankruptcy are the acts of the Court and it is not estopped by any prior conduct on the part of the debtor, by any engagements he may have entered into or by any decrees which may have been passed against him from inquiring into the true nature of the transactions so that the assets may be equitably distributed between the bona fide creditors of the bankrupt. These decisions do not touch the question of the rights of third parties to attack decrees on their own account. If the 1st defendant seeks to prove his debt in the Insolvency Court in order to share in the assets of Lakshmana Chetty held by the Receiver, it may be open to the Court to go behind the judgment in Original Suit No. 26 of 1910 and inquire into the consideration for Exhibit H. There is nothing in the cases cited to support the plaintiffs' contention as to the maintainability of the present suit. In this view, it is hardly necessary to notice the further argument that a Court acting under section 73 of the Code of Civil Procedure is invested with powers similar to those exercisable in insolvency proceedings. I think the correctness of this proposition is doubtful.

In Sunder Dass, In re (7) it has no doubt been held that the Court has a right to inquire whether any decree on which rateable distribution is claimed is a sham decree or not. The reason given is one which furnishes a ground for the interference of a Court of Bankruptcy in such matters, namely, that a debtor should not be allowed to defeat the rights of his bona fide creditors by means of claims brought into existence collusively for this very purpose. In Shankar Sarup v. Mejo Mal (11), the Judicial Committee expressed the following view as to the nature of proceedings under section 295 (73) of the Code of Civil Procedure: "The scheme of section 295 is rather to enable the Judge as matter of administration to distribute the price according to what seem at the time to be the rights of parties, without this distribution importing a conclusive adjudication on those rights, which may be subsequently re adjusted by a suit such as the present. Their Lordships approve of the decision on this point in Vishnu Bhikaji Phadke v. Achut Jagannath Ghate (12), and they concur in the further observation made by the learned Judge in that case that the application of the 13th Article is also precluded by the fact that the order for distribution was a step in an execution proceeding, and was, therefore, made in the suit in which the decree was made which was in process of execution. The order for distribution was thus an order in a suit." A Court cannot in execution go behind the decree which it is executing. If the orders passed under section 73 are made in execution of the several decrees which happen to be before the Court, it is difficult to see how the Court has authority to question the validity of any of them. The action of a Court under section 73 is materially different from that of a Court in insolvency proceedings. The estate is not vested in the Court. The remedies open to the creditors in future are not curtailed. The Court merely gives effect to a rule of procedure enacted for the purposes set out in the judgment of Strachey, C. J., in Bithal Das v. Nand Kishore (13). The decisions cited for the respondents do not help the determination of the point in issue. They, however, rely upon general principles as establishing their title to the relief now sought. They contend that the judgment in Original Suit No. 26 of 1910 is not one binding against all the world, that the existence of the debt sued upon is not res judicata as far as they are concerned and that the position they hold as judgment-creditors of the defendants in the suit entitles them to question the validity of the transaction. The judgment is not one in rem, the facts found are not res judicata and the plaintiffs have now an interest in disputing the 1st defendant's right to receive payment. The answer furnished on behalf of the appellant is that there are exceptions to the rule that judgments in personam bind only parties and privies and that the present case falls within those exceptions. The existence of exceptions is recognised and acted upon in Srinivasa Aiyangar v. Aarayar Srinivasa Aiyangar (14). In that judgment a long passage is quoted with approval from an American case, Oandee v. Lord (15), as giving a clear instance of such an exception. The passage in question contains the whole of the argument for the appellant. The proposition enunciated is this. An owner may dispose of or burden his property as he pleases, provided he does not thereby cause injury to others. He may for instance contract a debt and this is a matter which concerns solely himself and the particular creditor, provided the act is not done in bad faith and to the prejudice of other creditors. When bad faith has been shown, the transaction can be avoided. When the proviso has been complied with, strangers cannot intervene. They are not entitled to question the way in which a man has dealt with his own, merely because he has been improvident in incurring liabilities or careless in defending his rights. As regards judgments the conclusion is thus stated (page 486):* "It follows from the principle suggested that a judgment obtained without fraud or collusion and which concludes the debtor, whether rendered upon default, confession, or after contestation is upon all questions affecting the title to his property conclusive evidence against creditors to establish first the relation of creditor and debtor between the parties to the record; and second the amount of the indebtedness." No Indian or English decisions covering the same ground have been cited before us. Black on Judgments, Volume 1, section 294, Bigelow on Estoppel at page 167 and Bigelow on Fraud at page 91 indicate that the view taken in Candee v. Lord (15) is one generally accepted by American authorities.

An act of a debtor or a judgment passed against him may subsequently become highly detrimental to the interests of other creditors, but this will not entitle them to interfere if all was done in good faith at the time the events took place. (Vide Bigelow on Fraud loc. cit).

An illustration of the application of these principles is to be found in Suppa Bhattar v. Suppu Sokkaya Bhattar (16). X had been the sole owner of certain property. Y claimed it under an alienation by X. Y's claim was upheld in a judgment passed in litigation to which all persons having an existing interest in disputing the claim were parties. Subsequently Z, who had not been a party to the previous suit, acquired such an interest and tried to question Y's rights on grounds similar to those which had failed before. It was held that he was not entitled so to do.

I think the principle of the decision to be that the persons who had the exclusive right to settle the question had done so without any fraud on Z and he could not object to what had taken place.

The passages relied upon in the books referred to above lay stress on the fact that a fraud practised on the debtor is not in itself any ground for interference by third parties. The defendant holds a decree, which finally determines that the relation of creditor and debtor exists between him and his judgment-debtors and which is also conclusive as to the amount of the debt as between the parties. Fraud there has been, but not of a nature to enable the debtors to re-open the matter. The plaintiffs are now seeking to have the debtors' lost cause re-tried because the result is injurious to themselves. They have failed to establish collusion or fraud against themselves. In these circumstances I think the principle of the decision above referred to applies and the plaintiffs are not entitled to attack the decree by showing that it is not based on a real debt.

I am, therefore, of opinion that the appeal must be allowed and the suit dismissed. I agree with the order as to costs proposed by my learned brother.

SADASIVA AIYAR, J.—The 1st defendant is the appellant. The plaintiffs and the defendants Nos. 2 and 3 (who have common interests with the plaintiffs) are the respondents. The material facts and pleadings have been mentioned in detail in the judgment just now pronounced by my learned brother and I shall not repeat them.

I substantially agree with his conclusions throughout and have not much to say in my own words.

The decree attacked in the plaint, namely, the decree in Original Suit No. 26 of 1910, was obtained by the 1st defendant against Nataraja Aiyar ex parte and the assets held by the Court were realised in execution against his properties alone, as the other judgment-debtor's (Lakshmana Chetty's) properties had vested in the Official Receiver on his insolvency.

That decree is dated 16th April 1910. The plaintiffs in the present suit state in paragraph 7 of the plaint: "Nataraja Aiyar neglected to appear and the Pleader engaged by him did not also appear on the date of hearing and by reason of the gross and culpable neglect of the said Nataraja Aiyar and by the defendant getting untrue and false returns" (the 1st defendant in this suit who was impleaded at first as the only defendant being the plaintiff and the decree-holder in the other suit) "and by the said defendant falsely swearing that the debt was due, the decree has been obtained. The same is fraudulent, null and void and collusive and is devoid of legal effect as against the plaintiffs. The subsequent proceedings initiated by Nataraja Aiyar to set aside the ex parte decree were fraudulently and collusively conducted by him. He fraudulently abstained from letting in all the evidence which could have been availed of by him. But in any case the said decree is not binding on the plaintiffs."

Two of the eminent leaders of the Bar of this Court, Messrs. T. R. Ramachandra Aiyar and K. Sreenivasa Aiyangar, appeared for the contesting parties! (namely, Nataraja Aiyar and the present 1st defendant) respectively in the proceedings conducted to set aside the ex parte decree and they have been examined as defence witnesses Nos. 2 and 1 in the case. As the learned Subordinate Judge remarks in paragraph 43 of his judgment, "After reading their evidence it is not possible to find that there can be any collusion between Nataraja Aiyar and the 1st defendant in the conduct of those proceedings" [See also Venkatarama Aiyar v. Nataraja Aiyar (17), which contains the report of those hotly contested proceedings between Nataraja Aiyar and the 1st defendant and in which Nataraja Aiyar was unsuccessful.]

That a judgment, though obtained on perjured evidence, is conclusive between the parties has been now settled by the Full Bench decision in Kadirvelu Nainar v. Kuppuswami Naicker (9).

It is clear from the principle of the decisions in Srinivasa Aiyangar v. Arayar Srinivasaa Aiyangar (14) and in Sayam Ramamoorthi Dhora v. Secretary of State for India (18), which principle was substantially approved in Kuppa Bhattar v. Supvu Sokkaya Bhattar (16), that when the relationship of decree-holder and judgment-debtor was finally established between the present 1st defendant and Nataraja Aiyar by the decree in Original Suit No. 26 of 1910, the extent and reality of Nataraja Aiyar's indebtedness under that decree cannot be questioned by third persons (though they are also creditors of Nataraja Aiyar) so long as that decree remains effective. As regards proceedings in insolvency and bankruptcy and proceedings taken in winding up registered companies, special powers are given to Courts and Receivers (not to set aside judgments and decrees, but as said in some English cases) "to get round judgments," "to go behind judgments," so that the creditors who have got just debts alone may share in the distribution of assets and not the creditors whose debts are unjust though they may be decree-creditors. Those decisions are, in my opinion, not applicable to the question of rateable distribution in execution proceedings under the Civil Procedure Code. Most Insolvency and Bankruptcy Acts, for instance, contain special provisions which direct that domestic servants and clerks, etc., should be paid in full the arrears of wages due to them for particular periods of time in preference to other creditors, and contain similar special provisions based on special considerations, but these considerations cannot be taken into account under the Civil Procedure Code.

I am, therefore, clear that the plaintiffs who are decree-holders (just like the 1st defendant) against Nataraja Aiyar cannot attack the 1st defendant's decree as not creating a valid debt against Nataraja Aiyar and as, therefore, not being a decree capable of execution against Nataraja Aiyar's assets, if Nataraja Aiyar himself is precluded from setting aside that decree and if there was no collusion between the 1st defendant and Nataraja Aiyar in the obtaining of the decree by the 1st defendant. [Of course if there was such collusion, it was open to the plaintiffs to attack it. See Surya Narayana Jagapati Raju v. Gopala Surya Rao (19).]

was to have waited till the money was paid in the course of rateable distribution to the 1st defendant and then to bring their suit or suits for recovery of that money under the provisions of section 73, Civil Procedure Code. I might, however, for the sake of completeness express my considered view that they are not so precluded. It may happen that the remedy under section 73, Civil Procedure Code, may become, in certain cases, quite illusory; for example, where the creditor to whom it was wrongly paid is a pauper or has no tangible property or absconds. The right of a man to recover the debt out of his debtor's assets is a substantial right. Where that right is in danger, I do not see why he should be confined to a particular remedy given by a particular Statute and why he should not resort to another remedy given by another Statute (such as the Specific Relief Act) to protect his rights effectively. If there are observations in certain cases which hold that a suit for declaration and injunction (where the plaintiff is entitled to sue under section 73 after the wrong distribution takes place) is premature, I respectfully dissent from those observations. The actual decision in Parasurama Pattar v. Veeraraghava Pattar (1) can be supported on the ground that the consequential relief of injunction was not asked for. Exhibit I merely follows Parasurama Pattar v. Veeraghava Pattar (1) and the actual decision may be supported on the same ground.

In the result, though with great reluctance, I agree with my learned brother in holding that the lower Court's decision must be reversed and the suit dismissed, but as the 1st defendant obtained a dishonest decree and raised the false defence that the promissory note on which he obtained that decree in Original Suit No. 26 of 1910 was supported by consideration, I would direct the parties to bear their respective costs in both Courts.

Appeal allowed.

APPEAL FROM APPELLATE DECREE No. 547 OF 1919.

December 9, 1919.

Present :—Justice Sir Ernest Fletcher, KT.

SRIRAM CHANDRA (RAM CHANDRA IN vakalutnamah) SUTRADHAR AND ANOTHER—DEFENDANTS NOS. 1 AND 2 —APPELLANTS

DHARAMDHAR GHOSE—PLAINTIFF AND OTHERS—RESPONDENTS.

Estoppel—Dar-mokarariдar, suit by, for possession —Title, proof of—Admission in previous proceedings, effect of.

While A was in possession of certain land as dar-mokarariдar, B obtained a fraudulent lease of the same from the mokarariдar ignoring the dar-mokarari interests of A. Subsequently in a criminal proceeding between the parties a compromise was entered into by which B recognised and admitted the interests of A. They and their successors-in-interest then continued to hold and enjoy the land in accordance with the terms of the compromise. In a suit by the successor-in-interest of A for recovery of possession of the land against B's successors-in-interest:

Held, that although the nature of the plaintiff's interest was not strictly proved, he was entitled to a decree as the defendants could not set up their fraudulent lease against the plaintiff's interest in the land, which was admitted and recognised by the compromise in the criminal proceeding. [p. 464, col. 2.]

Appeal against the decree of the Subordinate Judge, Bankura, dated the 6th of January 1919, affirming that of the Munsif, 1st Court at that place, dated the 15th of August 1917.

FACTS appear from the judgment.

Babu Sitaram Banerjee (with him Babu Haripada Ghose), for the Appellants.—The defendant is the appellant. The appeal arises out of a suit for recovery of possession on declaration of title thereto. The land in dispute is situated in the town of Bankura. The Courts below found that the plaintiff's predecessor-in-interest had no satisfactory title, but they relied on a compromise which was entered into between the plaintiff's predecessor-in interest and my predecessor-in interest in a criminal case. In it the latter is said to have admitted and recognised the title of the former. My submission is that the Courts below, having found in my favour on the question of title, ought not to have given effect to or placed any reliance on the compromise in a criminal case where the dispute between the parties was not of a civil nature. The compromise is of no use at all.

Babu Karunamoy Ghose (with him Babu Monindra Nath Talit), for the Respondents.—I submit the case is wholly concluded by the finding of the lower Courts. The compromise is fully operative, even though it was filed in the course of a criminal case.

JUDGMENT.—This is an appeal brought by the defendants Nos. 1 and 2 against the decision of the learned Subordinate Judge of Bankura, dated the 6th January 1919, affirming the decision of the Munsif of the same place. The suit was brought to recover possession of certain land within the limits of the town of Bankura. It appears from the facts found that one Dwarka Nath Roy admittedly had a mokarari interest in the land in question. It was set up by the plaintiff and denied by the defendants that another interest had been created, namely, a dar-mokarari interest in favour of one Hari Narain and Hari Narain's connection with the land was further evidenced, it was stated, by the fact that he kept a woman who lived on the land in dispute. However, the Court found that it was no satisfactory evidence as to the creation of the dar mokarari interest in favour of Hari Narain. We have got to take that finding with the other findings made in the judgment. I take it that what the learned Judge meant thereby was that the creation of this dar-mokarari interest of Hari Narain had not been strictly proved. One Ram Das Chakravarti subsequently took a verbal settlement from Hari Narain of the land in dispute and this person Ram Das, after the death of Hari Narain, purchased from Hari Narain's daughter's son, who was the heir of Hari Narain, the interest which Hari Narain had in the land. That interest became vested in a charitable society by a gift from Ram Das and the plaintiff derived his title from the person representing this charitable society. On the other hand, in the year 1909 the defendants got a grant of the land from Dwarka Nath Roy, who admittedly had a mokarari interest in the property, and now the plaintiff brings the present suit to recover possession of this land. There was a certain criminal proceeding brought by Ram Das against the father of the defendants and a compromise was entered into in those proceedings, and one of the terms of the compromise was that the defendants' father recognized and admitted that Ram Das was entitled to the portion of the property now sued for. It was found by the learned Judge of the lower Appellate Court that the lease granted by Dwarka Nath Roy was to ignore the dar-mokarari right of Hari Narain. The learned Judge obviously meant that it was a fraudulent document granted by Dwarka Nath Roy to get rid of the subsisting interest then outstanding in the property in favour of Hari Narain. The learned Judge also found that Ram Das, at the time of the grant of this lease in favour of the father of the defendants, was in actual possession of the land and it was quite obvious, if that is so, that the defendants' father took with full notice of the right of Ram Das. It was also found that, after this admission and recognition in the solenama entered into in the criminal case, the land had been held and enjoyed by the two parties in accordance with the terms of the solenama. The learned Judge, therefore, held that the plaintiff's interest had been sufficiently established, at any rate, as against the persons claiming through the father of the defendants, as of course the present defendants do. I think the decision of the learned Judge is right. This is a case where there appears to have been an interest of some sort outstanding in Hari Narain's favour. The nature of that interest was not strictly proved before the Judge. But there was in this criminal case this recognition of the interest of Hari Narain and the defendants cannot set up this fraudulent patta, Exhibit A, against the interest in this land which was admitted by their father and recognized in this solenama entered into between the parties. I see no reason to disturb the conclusion arrived at by the learned Judge of the lower Appellate Court. The present appeal, therefore, fails and must be dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

ALLAHABAD HIGH COURT.

CRIMINAL REFERENCE No. 307 OF 1919.

December 1, 1919.

Present:—Mr Justice Piggott.

EMPEROR—APPLICANT

JULUA AND ANOTHER—OPPOSITE PARTIES.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), ss. 248, 345—Cattle Trespass Act (I of 1871), s 24, offence under, whether compoundable—Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860), s 323, offence under, charged with offence under Cattle Trespass Act—Compromise, effect of—Acquittal.

An offence under section 24 of the Cattle Trespass Act is not compoundable, but where that offence is charged along with an offence under section 23 of the Penal Code and the parties effect a compromise in respect of the latter offence, the Magistrate is entitled to deal with the compromise as a withdrawal of the complaint in respect of the alleged offence under the Cattle Trespass Act, for if no evidence were forthcoming on which to convict, an order of acquittal would result. [p. 465, col. 2; p. 466, col. 1.]

Criminal reference by the Sessions Judge, Cawnpore, dated the 5th November 1919.

ORDER OF REFERENCE.—In this case four men, Julua, Tirangua, Mulua and Baldeo, were accused by one Girand Singh of offences under sections 323 and 426, Indian Penal Code, and section 21 of the Cattle Trespass Act. On August 9th 1919 all four accused appeared and the complainant and some witnesses were examined. The case was then postponed to August 14th, on which day Julua and Baldeo alone of the accused appeared. That day a compromise was filed between the complainant and the two accused Julua and Mulua, whereupon Julua and Mulua were formally acquitted Mulua was not present that day and, though acquitted, he was called on to appear at the next hearing with reference to the proposed confiscation of his security for not appearing on the 14th. On the 20th he and the remaining two accused, Baldeo and Tirangua, appeared and the case proceeded against these last two. An application was filed by them for revision of the order of the Magistrate, that proceedings were to continue against them. This came up for hearing before me, but in the meantime the case had been dismissed owing to the absence of the complainant. The revision application was accordingly filed and the question raised in it, whether a case could be compromised against only some of the accused, was not decided. It came to my notice, however, that the case was under the Cattle Trespass Act as well as under sections of the Penal Code and so far as it was under the former Act, the offence was not compoundable. The order of 14th August 1919, by which Julua and Mulua were acquitted, was therefore, illegal, and I am of opinion that they should be ordered to stand their trial, on the accusation under the Cattle Trespass Act, if not for the offences under the Penal Code. It has been suggested to me by the learned Government Pleader that the compromise amounted to an illegal discharge and that I can pass orders under section 437 of the Criminal Procedure Code. But the last clause of section 34, Criminal Procedure Code, is quite clear and the effect of the compounding of the offence was an acquittal. I cannot, therefore, deal with the case myself and I forward the record to the Hon'ble High Court, with the recommendation that it be ordered that Julua and Mulua stand their trial on the accusation under section 30 of the Cattle Trespass Act at least. Before this is done, however, it will be sent to the Magistrate who tried the case for any observations he may wish to make.

JUDGMENT.—The order of the learned Sessions Judge has been carelessly drafted. The references to sections 21 and 30 of the Cattle Trespass Act (I of 1871) are incorrect and have caused me some trouble. The actual complaint before the Magistrate was one of causing hurt coupled with the forcible rescue of cattle punishable under section 24 of Act I of 1871. So far as the particular matter under reference is concerned, I have come to the conclusion that the Magistrate, although his procedure may not have been perfectly regular, was substantially right and that the interference of this Court is not called for. The learned Sessions Judge is of course right in pointing out that an offence under section 24 of Act I of 1871 is not compoundable under section 345 of the Criminal Procedure Code. A case under that section would, however, be a summons case and would result in an order of acquittal if no evidence were produced on which the Court could find the accused guilty. In the present case the complainant entered into a compromise with the two accused Julua and Mulua in respect of whom this reference has been made. The compromise involved the compounding of the offence of causing simple hurt under section 323, Indian Penal Code, and the Magistrate was entitled to deal with it as withdrawal of the complaint in respect of the alleged offence under the Cattle Trespass Act. Limiting himself to a consideration of that offence only, he had jurisdiction to acquit the accused under the provisions of section 248, Criminal Procedure Code, if he saw sufficient reason for doing so. I am not disposed to interfere and I order that the record be returned.

Recommendation not accepted.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), ss. 239, 337 (4), 393—Offences of rape and attempt to commit rape, whether can be jointly tried—District Magistrate sanctioning tender of pardon, whether can try case—Whipping, sentence of, when can be passed.

The offences of rape and an attempt to commit rape can be tried together jointly when they are committed in the same transaction. [p. 467, col. 2.]

Under section 337 (4) of the Criminal Procedure Code, it is only the Magistrate tendering the pardon who is debarred from trying the case, and not the District Magistrate who sanctions the tender of pardon. [p. 467, col. 1.]

A sentence cannot be passed of which the execution is prohibited by law. [p. 469, col. 2.]

The provision contained in section 393 (b) of the Criminal Procedure Code that the persons named therein shall not be punishable with whipping refers to the execution and not to the passing of the sentence of whipping. [p. 469, cols. 1 & 2.]

A sentence of whipping in addition to 7 years' rigorous imprisonment is illegal. [p. 469, col. 1.]

Appeal from the order of the District Magistrate, Rawalpindi, dated the 2nd January 1919, convicting the appellants.

Mr. Dalrymple (Assistant Legal Remembrancer), for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—At about 8·10 P. M. on Saturday the 24th August last a brutal outrage was committed on Miss Phillips and Miss Bower, two of the mistresses at the Lawrence School near Murree, when they were walking back to the school from Murree. At a lonely part of the road two men, who had their faces muffled, sprang up and seized them. Miss Phillips was draged by her assailant from the road and pulled violently down the hill side for some 500 or 600 feet till a level spot was reached, where the man raped her. He left her for a few moments, whistled and after a short interval returned and raped her again. He then let her go, and she scrambled up to the road. The man who had seized Miss Bower also started pulling her down the hill side, but apparently he must have slipped as she suddenly found herself free. She made for the road, managed to dodge past her assailant, and ran down the road to the school. She reached Sergeant Payne's house and gave the alaram. A party went out to search for Miss Phillips and discovered her and brought her to the house.

Suspicion fell on Sikandar, who had formerly been employed at the school, and subsequently also on his brother Akbar, and on the 31st August an identification parade was held by the Superintendent of Police, these two men being placed among seven others. The men were first paraded with muffled faces, and then with bare heads, and on both occasions Miss Phillips identified Akbar as her assailant.

Akbar and Sikandar were arrested the same day, but on the 14th September they were released. A detective was then obtained from the C. I. D. and employed as a bearer at the school, in the hope of his getting a further clue. In the latter part of November he obtained information which led to the re-arrest of Akbar and Sikandar, and to the arrest of two other men, Lal, a nephew of Akbar and Sikandar, who was a masalchi at the school, and Dost Muhammad. The last named made a statement to the Police on the 26th November, and was tendered a pardon by a Magistrate (Lala Labhu Ram) on the 2nd December. He has been examined as a witness in the case, and has described how he, Akbar, Lal, and Sikandar met at the school and started together in the direction of Murree, and how it was arranged between them that the two ladies should be seized on their way home from Murree and outraged. He states that when the ladies were seen coming he and his companions turned back, and while Akbar and Lal went on ahead he and Sikandar went up a side path to let the ladies pass, and then returned to the road and followed them. It was intended that Akbar and Lal should outrage the ladies and then whistle for Sikandar and Dost Muhammad that they might do the same. The witness describes how the ladies were seized by Akbar and Lal, and says that the one who was seized by Lal escaped, that he and Sikandar tried to intercept her, but failed, and that they then ran off to Nambal, where they live.

In respect of the offence committed on Miss Phillips the District Magistrate has convicted Akbar, under section 376, Indian Penal Code, of rape, and Lal and Sikandar, under sections 376/109, of abetting rape, and has sentenced each to 7 years' rigorous imprisonment, including 3 months' solitary confinement, and 30 stripes. In respect of the offence committed on Miss Bower he has convicted Lal, under sections 376/511, Indian Penal Code, of an attempt to commit rape, under sections 376/511/109, of abetting the attempt, and has sentenced each to 3 years' rigorous imprisonment, including 3 months' solitary confinement. The convicts have appealed to this Court.

It is contended that as the approver was tendered a pardon with the sanction of the District Magistrate, the latter was precluded from trying the case. This contention is not correct, as it is only the Magistrate tendering the pardon who is debarred, under section 337 (4) of the Criminal Procedure Code, from trying the case.

It is next argued that a joint trial for the two offences was illegal, but this contention also is wrong. The two offences were committed in the same transaction, and the appellants could be tried jointly for both the offences in accordance with the provisions of section 239, Criminal Procedure Code.

Coming to the merits of the case we consider Dost Muhammad's statement to be a reliable one. As the learned District Magistrate points out, the story told by Dost Muhammad is one which it is most improbable that he could have invented. He does not appear to have any object in falsely accusing the appellants and his statement agrees with the evidence given by the two ladies and is corroborated by other evidence as well. Against Akbar the most important piece of evidence in addition to that of the approver is the statement of Miss Phillips, who identified Akbar in the parade on the 31st August and was positive also, when giving evidence in Court, that he was her assailant. She says that although at the time of the occurrence it was getting dark and the evening was somewhat misty, it was light enough to see a person's features. She also mentions that her assailant's turban fell off. There appears to be no reason to doubt her ability to recognize him.

Next there is the evidence of three of the school servants, Muhammad Hussain P. W. No. 12, Fazl Din P. W. No. 13 and Fakir P. W. No. 17, who all corroborate the approver as to Akbar, Lal, and Sikandar having started with him from the school for Murree at about 7-30 on the evening of the 24th August. It is true that they did not disclose this information during the investigation that was being made in August and September, but they disclosed it when they were questioned by the Police on the investigation being resumed in November and there is no good reason for disbelieving their statements.

Fazal Din has also deposed that Akbar confessed his guilt to him at a feast which Akbar and Sikandar gave 8 or 10 days after they had been released on the termination of the first stage of the Police investigation.

AKBAR v. EMPEROR.

In addition to this there is the significant fact that when Akbar was examined by Dr. Chandu Lal, the Medical Officer of the school, on the 27th August, several abrasion marks and other injuries, 3 or 4 days old, were found on his person, and these were such as were likely to have been caused by thorns and stones when he was going down the hill side.

With regard to Lal Miss Bower is unable to say whether or not he is the man who assaulted her, but she says her assailant was of about the same height as Lal. She says that the man was wearing a black waistcoat, and the approver and P. W. Nos. 12 and 13 all say that Lal was wearing such a waistcoat.

Muhammad Hussain, Fazal Din and Fakir corrobarate the approver as to Lal leaving the school with him and the other two appellants on the evening of the occurrence. Muhammad Hussain also states that Lal made a confession to him a few days after the feast referred to above. He mentions also another incident which strengthens the case against Lal. It seems that some of the school mistresses used to go to the rink at Murree on Saturdays, and that on each of the three Saturdays preceding the day of the assault stones were thrown between the rifle range and school at the men who were escorting the ladies home. Muhammad Hussain says that one night he was coming back from the rink to the school with Miss Phillips and Miss McCallum, when near a corner Lal got up and asked him why he was with the ladies, saying that if he had not been there he would have caught them. He is corroborated in regard to this incident, which occurred on the 10th August, by Miss McCallum, though she does not know who the man was or what he said. It thus appears that Lal had intended to waylay Miss Phillips and Miss McCallum on the 10th August, a fact which strengthens the probability of his being concerned in the assault on the 24th.

The statement of the school Chaukidar Rusmat is of same importance. He says that after the party had gone out to search for Miss Phillips, Lal came down the path from the Murree direction, and that he was out of breath with running.

There is further the evidence of two other servants of the school (P. W. Nos. 18 and 19) to the effect that Lal came at about 9 o'clock on the night of the assault to the house in the school garden in which they were, and slept there that night instead of going to his house at Nambal as he usually did.

It is urged on behalf of Lal that he is not likely to have taken part in the assault, as he was a servant at the school and there was a danger of his being recognized. As to this, however, it is to be observed that although Lal seems to have been known to Miss Phillips he was not known to Miss Bower, who had never seen him.

With regard to Sikandar it is noticeable that on the morning of the 25th August he went to Dr. Chandu Lal to have his niece, who had a broken arm, treated, and that on being asked how he had got some scratches on his right hand, which the doctor had not noticed when he saw him the day before, he gave the apparently false explanation that he had cut himself with a sickle, and finally left the dispensary without waiting for the child to be treated. It is perhaps difficult to connect his suspicious conduct that morning with the occurrence of the previous evening, but we have also against him the evidence of Muhammad Hussain, Fazl Din and Fakir, already referred to in connection with the case of the other two appellants, and this is sufficient to corrobarate the approver's statement against Sikandar.

No evidence was produced for the defence, and we are of opinion that the guilt of all the appellants has been satisfactorily established. They have been rightly convicted in respect of the offence committed on Miss Phillips, but we think that the assault on Miss Bower amounted only to a preparation, and not to an attempt, to commit rape. The appellants are, however, guilty under sections 376/115, Indian Penal Code, of abetting by conspiracy the commission of the offence of rape on Miss Bower.

With regard to the sentences the question arises whether the appellants could legally be sentenced to whipping in addition to seven years' imprisonment. Section 393 of Criminal Procedure Code runs as follows:—

"No sentence of whipping shall be executed by instalments: and none of the following persons shall be punishable with whipping (namely)

(a) females;

(b) males sentenced to death, or to transportation, or to penal servitude, or to imprisonment for more than five years;

(c) males whom the Court considers to be more than forty-five years of age."

Mr. Ram Lal on behalf of the appellants contends that under clause (b) of that section a sentence of whipping cannot be combined with a sentence of imprisonment for more than five years, whilst Mr. Dalrymple on the other side argues that the word "sentenced" has no reference to the sentence passed in combination with the sentence of whipping, but means "already sentenced."

The only authority to which we have been referred in this connection is High Court Proceedings, 19*th April* 1876 (1), which relates to the construction of section 7 of the old Whipping Act, VI of 1864. That section ran as follows:—"No female shall be punished with whipping, nor shall any person who may be sentenced to death, or to transportation, or to penal servitude, or to imprisonment for more than five years, be punished with whipping." It was held that those words did not touch the legality of the sentence, but the legality of the punishment, and that the meaning was simply that the status of woman and that of persons under a particular sentence rendered it illegal to inflict the punishment of whipping.

We are inclined to take a similar view in construing section 393 of the Criminal Procedure Code. The first nine words of the section clearly relate only to the execution of the sentence of whipping, and the whole chapter in which the section occurs is one dealing with the execution of sentences. The one exception is to be found in section 391 (3), which provides that no accused person shall be sentenced to whipping in addition to imprisonment when the term of imprisonment to which he is sentenced is less than three months. The distinction between the words "shall be sentenced" in section 391 (3) and "shall be punishable" in section 393 is noteworthy.

We think, therefore, although the point is not free from doubt, that the provision contained in section 393, clause (b), that the persons mentioned therein shall not be punishable with whipping refers to the execution, and not to the passing, of the sentence of whipping. The section makes it illegal to execute the sentence of whipping on persons who have been sentenced to imprisonment for more than five years, and consequently the sentences of whipping passed in this case cannot be carried out. It follows that the sentences themselves are illegal, as a sentence cannot be passed of which the execution is prohibited by law.

The result is that while maintaining the convictions for offences under sections 376 and 376/109, Indian Penal Code, and the sentences of imprisonment and solitary confinement passed for those offences, we set aside the sentences of whipping. We also maintain the sentences passed for offences under sections 376/511 and sections 376/511/109, Indian Penal Code, but alter the conviction in the case of each appellant to one under sections 376/115, Indian Penal Code.

Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860), ss. 405, 403—Criminal breach of trust—Partnership—Fiduciary relationship—Case ex facie civil—Jurisdiction of Criminal Courts.

If the prosecution in a matter which is ex facie a civil dispute is unable to prove clearly and beyond doubt that the accused has acted dishonestly and with a view to enrich himself clandestinely at the expense of those with whom he was working and with whom he was bound by a fiduciary relationship the case should not be entertained by a Criminal Court on a charge of criminal breach of trust.

Appeal against the order of the Court of the Presidency Magistrate, George Town, Madras, in Case No. 3156 of the Calendar for 1919.

FACTS appear from the judgment.

Mr. V. C. Seshachariar (with him Messrs. A. Viswanatha Aiyer and K. V. Sesha Aiyangar), for the Appellant:—The matter is purely of a civil nature. The accused and complainant are partners. Each had advanced a capital of Rs. 2,500. The fact that accused drew moneys without complainant's consent is not evidence of guilty intention. The complainant allowed the accused to draw moneys on some occasions without demur.

The only thing that can be said against the accused is that he appropriated the money drawn towards a partnership debt in which he was interested and to have given it preference over a decree debt. That is not criminal dishonesty.

The Crown Prosecutor, for the Crown, conceded that the matter was ex facie civil.

JUDGMENT.—The learned Crown Prosecutor has placed the case for the prosecution with great frankness and clearness before us. As he said, if a prosecution in a matter which is ex facie a civil dispute is unable to prove clearly and beyond doubt that the accused has acted dishonestly and with a view to enrich himself clandestinely at the expense of those with whom he was working and with whom he was bound by a fiduciary relationship, the case should not be entertained by a Criminal Court. This case is an illustration in point.

There were two partners, the complainant and the 1st accused. They both advanced each a capital of Rs. 2,500. Beyond the usual arrangement to share the profits and bonus half and half no definite terms were settled. This is admitted by the complainant. The charge against the accused is that he drew two sums of money, Rs. 2,000 and Rs. 1,000 respectively, on two different occasions without the consent of the complainant and against the understanding between the parties. That moneys can only be drawn by consent is not proved. On the other hand the complainant, who admits to having occasionally examined the accounts, has deposed that he was aware of other drawings without consent. The limitation regarding the amount of drawing is also not proved. We find that the complainant himself received Rs. 200 on one occasion, which was wrong, if no more than Rs. 50 can be drawn in a month. Now as regards the use to which the two amounts have been put, there can be no doubt that the 1st item was applied towards discharging a debt binding on both the partners.

The Magistrate seems inclined to hold that this was wrong, because there was a more pressing debt which had fructified into a decree of Court. The learned Crown Prosecutor conceded that taking the most unfavourable view of the conduct of the accused this was an appropriation towards a binding debt in which the accused was interested at a time when he must have known or had reason to believe that the business was tottering. This kind of preference is not an indication of intention to cheat.

As regards the other item the accused had advanced Rs. 2,500 and a drawing of Rs. 1,000, when the accounts were not settled and when the complainant himself had been paid Rs. 200, is not evidence of guilty intention.

We think that the conviction is wrong. We set it aside and direct that the accused be set at liberty. The fine, if paid, should be refunded. The bail bound should be delivered up and cancelled.

DEVIDIN—APPLICANT

NARAYANRAO AND ANOTHER—NON-APPLICANTS.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), ss. 202,

DEVIDIN v. NARAYANRAO.

476—Civil Court ordering enquiry under s. 476—District Magistrate, whether can order enquiry under s. 202—"Proceedings according to law", meaning of—"Investigation" under s. 202, whether can be conducted by Magistrate other than the one entertaining complaint.

Where a Magistrate, to whom a case is submitted by a Civil Court, for inquiry under section 476, Criminal Procedure Code, has no power to try the case, and refers it to the District Magistrate, the latter has no power to order an investigation under section 202, Criminal Procedure Code, as that section is not applicable to such a case. [p. 472, cols. 1 & 2.]

The expression "proceed according to law" in sub-section 2, section 476, Criminal Procedure Code, requires the Magistrate receiving the reference to proceed under Chapters XVIII to XXI of the Code according to the nature of the offence supposed to have been committed. [p. 472, col. 2.]

Obiter.—The investigation allowed by section 202, Criminal Procedure Code, should be a local one, and the term "investigation" as defined in section 4 (1) of the Code expressly excludes an enquiry by a Magistrate other than the one entertaining the complaint. [p. 472, col. 2.]

Case reported by the District Magistrate, Multai, on the 17th July 1919.

Mr. S. K. Barlingay, for the Non-Applicants.

The Hon'ble Mr. G. P. Dick, for the Crown.

ORDER.—Devidin, the applicant for revision, brought Suit No. 38 of 1917 in the Court of the Munsif, Multai, against Narayan Rao and Harbaji, sons of one Sitaram Vidur, and Prabhakar Rao to obtain possession of a one-third share in 15 mango trees, which he originally described as standing in field No. 70. The defendants pleaded that these trees were leased to Sitaram along with the field by Kalu, a brother of the plaintiff's maternal grandfather, by a document (Exhibit D-1) dated the 29th January 1905. The Munsif eventually dismissed the suit on the ground that Kalu, the Malguzar of the village, had been the owner of both land and trees and that Devidin had no right to sue, his mother and her sister being still alive. He was, however, of opinion that the reference to 14 mango trees in the lease was an interpolation amounting to a forgery. The document was in the handwriting of one Prabhakar Rao, a petition writer, and the Munsif on the ground that all three defendants denied the existence of a forgery considered them to be guilty of offences punishable under sections 467, 471 and 474, Indian Penal Code. Accordingly he submitted the case for enquiry to the Sub Divisional Magistrate under section 476, Criminal Procedure Code, and bound over Narain Rao, Harbaji and Prabhakar Rao to appear before the Magistrate.

The Sub Divisional Magistrate, not being empowered under section 30, Criminal Procedure Code, referred the case to the District Magistrate for orders and the latter authority then passed the following order:—

"The Sub-Divisional Magistrate, being without the power to try the cases complained of by the Munsif, has referred them to me. I consider there are very strong reasons for holding a preliminary inquiry under section 202, Code of Criminal Procedure. Under that section, the Sub-Divisional Magistrate, Multai, is ordered to hold this enquiry and report to me his finding. The Sub-Registrar's register and certain written statements in litigation of 1907 (No. 554 of of 1907, Munsif, Multai, dated 4th September 1908) should be referred to. Copy of judgment filed by accused Harbaji is appended. The preliminary enquiry should be held at Sadar, as far as possible, and the fullest use made of accused's Counsel, if the latter elect to attend the enquiry."

The Sub-Divisional Magistrate thereupon examined a number of witnesses produced by Davidin in the presence of a Pleader representing the three accused persons. On the 17th July last he submited a report endorsing the Munsif's conclusion that the clause in the lease relating to 14 mango trees was a forgery and recommending that a regular trial be held. The District Magistrate then went into the merits of the case for himself and came to the conclusion that there was no forgery and that, even if the clause was not genuine, it must have been forged in the lifetime of Sitaram with the aid of the petition-writer Prabhakar Rao. He also regarded the clause as in any case a mere surplusage, on the ground that under the ordinary rule of law the trees would follow the land on a transfer. He concluded his order with the following words:—

"Therefore, on all grounds, both of fact and of law, I decline to sanction the prosecution of the three persons complained against."

The applicant for revision has not appeared to support the Rule which was issued by this Court. For the surviving defendants Narain Rao and Harbaji the Rule is opposed by their Pleader. The learned Standing Counsel has represented the Crown. The first point raised by the Rule is that the Munsif having ordered an enquiry under section 476, Criminal Procedure Code, the District Magistrate had no power to order an enquiry under section 202, Criminal Procedure Code, that section not being applicable. For the non applicants it is urged that section 476, Criminal Procedure Code, expressly requires the Magistrate to whom a case is sent under sub-section (1) to proceed according to law, and as if upon complaint made and recorded under section 200. It is urged that this provision necessarily makes section 202 of the Code applicable. No authority is cited in support of this contention, nor have I been able to trace in the authorised reports any instance in which a Magistrate receiving a case under section 476 has acted under section 202, Criminal Procedure, in respect of it. The object of the latter section is to enable a Magistrate who is not satisfied as to the truth of a complaint to postpone the issue of process for compelling the attendance of the person complained against, and either enquire into the case himself, or direct a previous local investigation. Now section 476 requires that the accused person shall be sent in custody, or shall give security for his appearance before the Magistrate, and the latter course was in fact taken. Moreover, the non-applicants' Pleader admits that they did in fact attend before the Sub-Divisional Magistrate besides being represented there by a legal practitioner. Section 476 further requires that the Court, Civil, Criminal or Revenue, making the reference to the Magistrate shall be of opinion that there is ground for enquiry into the offence in respect of which the case is sent to the Magistrate. As laid down in Shioshankarpuri v. Emperor (1) this opinion must be a judicial opinion founded on evidence: it follows that there should be no room for the preliminary enquiry which is contemplated by section 202, Criminal Procedure Code.

For the Crown it is conceded that this is a correct view. I must, therefore, hold that the District Magistrate's order is on the face of it illegal, inasmuch as it disposes of the case by refusing to grant a sanction for which he was not moved and which he, therefore, could not legally give.

If the District Magistrate's final order be regarded as tantamount to dismissing the complaint under section 203, Criminal Procedure Code, I think it is nonetheless ultra vires. In my opinion the expression "proceed according to law" in sub section (2), section 476, Criminal Procedure Code, requires the Magistrate receiving the reference to proceed under Chapters XVIII to XXI, Criminal Procedure Code, according to the nature of the offence supposed to have been committed. No express authority to this effect can be cited, but the view finds some eppport in Reg v. Amruta Nathu (2). Ex hypothesi a judicial opinion had already been formed as to the necessity for enquiry and it seems to follow that the receiving Magistrate should accept the referring Magistrate's opinion, there being no indication in the Criminal Procedure Code that he was intended by the Legislature to have power to revise it. Chapter XVII has of course no application, inasmuch as the accused must necessarily appear before the receiving Magistrate as a consequence of the reference itself.

Before leaving the question of the propriety of the District Magistrate's order, I may also point out that the investigation allowed by section 202, Criminal Procedure Code, should be a local one and that the terms "investigation" is expressly defined in section 4 (1) of the Code so as to exlude an enquiry by a Magistrate. If the District Magistrate considered an "investigation" necessary, he should not have selected the Sub Divisional Magistrate for the purpose. Further if he considered enquiry essential, he should have made it himself.

PRATT v. EMPEROR.

On the merits of the case, however, I am not prepared to order further proceedings to be taken against the non-applicants. The District Magistrate in his very carefully considered order has shown from the records of Civil Suit No. 554 of 1907, decided by the Munsif of Multai on the 4th September 1908, and No. 92 of 1908, decided by the same Court on the 18th August 1908, that the clause in the lease of 1905, which was said for the first time in suit No. 38 of 1917 to be a forgery, was undoubtedly in existence as far back as July 1907. Its existence is expressly mentioned by the Munsif in his finding on the third issue in Suit No. 554 of 1907. And paragraph 2 of the plaint in Suit No. 92 of 1908, which was brought by the applicant Devidin himself against Sitaram and others, prayed expressly for cancellation of so much of the lease as relates to the 14 mango trees. In his judgment in Suit No. 38 of 1917 the Munsif, while giving detailed reasons for holding the clause to be a forgery, did not explain why he considered the non applicants responsible for the forgery or cognisant of its existence. In his order under section 476, Criminal Procedure Code, he stated that their father, Sitaram, was a nominal person and that the non-applicants are guilty, inasmuch as they claimed title under the lease and filed it in Court. The reference contains no appreciation of the fact that the clause in question was relied upon in a Civil Court as far back as 1907 and again in 1908 without any suggestion that it was otherwise than a perfectly genuine one. Sitaram lived till 1916 and the allegation that Sitaram was a mere figurehead appears to be based merely on the evidence of the attesting witness, Jairam, and others that Harbaji conducted the negotiations which terminated in the lease. This fact could not furnish any ground for proceedings against Harbaji's brother Narain Rao.

In these circumstances I consider that the Munsif's order under section 476, Criminal Procedure Code, should not be further acted upon. If the applicant is in a position to adduce further evidence against the non applicants, it will be open to him to apply for sanction to their prosecution under section 195, Criminal Procedure Code. The present application for revision is accordingly dismissed.

Application dismissed.

CRIMINAL REVISION CASE No. 2 OF 1920.

January 7, 1920.

Present:—Justice Sir Asutosh Chaudhuri, Kt., and Mr. Justice Newbould.

T. R. PRATT—PETITIONER

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), s. 96—Search warrant, when to be issued—Magistrate, duty of.

In the course of an investigation which was being made by a Police Officer appointed by the Government to inquire into the dealings with the Munitions Board, a petition was presented by that officer to the Chief Presidency Magistrate of Calcutta stating that certain offences appeared to have been committed in connection with the dealings with the Munitions Board and praying for a search warrant against the firm of one T. R. Pratt. There was nothing in the petition to connect T. R. Pratt with those offences:

Held, that there were no materials before the Magistrate on which he could decide that a search warrant should be issued. [p. 475, col. 2.]

When there is no inquiry or trial or other proceeding under the Code of Criminal Procedure, a general search warrant cannot be issued under section 96 of the Criminal Procedure Code. [p. 475, col. 1.]

The provision of the law requiring the sanction of a Magistrate before the issue of a search warrant means that the Magistrate should apply his mind to the facts and ought not to issue a search warrant simply because a Police Officer asks him to do so. [p. 475, col. 2.]

Rule against the order of the Chief Presidency Magistrate, Calcutta, dated the 21st December 1919.

Mr. Langford James (with him Babu Manmathanath Mukerjee), for the Petitioner.—This Rule was issued by your Lordships calling on the Chief Presidency Magistrate of Calcutta to show cause why the search warrant issued by him to search the premises of my client's firm should not be cancelled or such other or further order passed as to your Lordships may seem fit and proper. The other side will show cause.

The Advocate General (with him Sir B. C. Mitter and Babu Hemendra Nath Mitter), for the Crown.—The matter is one of very considerable importance. It is in connection with the Munitions Board which was established shortly after the outbreak of the great war. There was a Controller in charge of the Board assisted by certain Deputy Controllers, amongst whom there was one Mr. Waite. The search warrant was granted by the Magistrate on certain information in which Mr. Waite's name was mentioned. It is not necessary that the information should be on oath. Neither is it necessary that there should be any proceeding when the Magistrate grants a search warrant. [Reads section 96 (3), Criminal Procedure Code, also Schedule 5 Form 8.] It is sufficient that there are suspicious circumstances. The Magistrate was acting judicially at the time he granted the search warrant. He acted on the information of Mr. Armstrong, the Deputy Inspector-General of Police. I submit that the learned Magistrate correctly followed the provisions of the law in issuing a general search warrant. Serious allegations having been made in the information against the Munitions Board and certain other firms including that of the petitioner, it was of the utmost importance to inspect the books of the petitioner's firm to ascertain the exact truth. (Reads the information.)

[CHAUDHURI, J.—The Police have got to show to the Court why they ask for a process against a particular firm which dealt with the Munitions Board.]

The existence of the suspicious circumstances justifies the proceeding, otherwise any prosecution is going to be stifled. The petitioner ought to willingly help the administration of justice by producing their books instead of refusing to do so. We have definite facts, but we cannot state them now as then our prosecution would be futile. It is necessary for the administration of justice that all the facts should not be made public. These warrants are necessary for the purpose of justice and with these facts before the Magistrate, the latter had no option but to grant the search warrant. [Refers to H. H. the Nizam of Hyderabad v. A. M. Jacob (1).] The Magistrate was perfectly within the law in issuing a general search warrant on the facts and suspicious circumstances stated in the information. [Refers to Clarke v. Brojendra Kishore Roy (2).] The Rule ought to be discharged in the interests of justice.

Mr. Langford James, in reply.—The information before the Magistrate was not on oath. The Magistrate had no power in law to issue a search warrant like the present. The books seized cannot be kept in Police custody. In fact there is no enquiry on foot at all. The books have been taken away for an enquiry to be made by the Magistrate. The Magistrate has absolutely no jurisdiction to do what he has done. The books have been taken away to some place outside the precincts of the Court by the Police so that they may find something against somebody in these books. That is not a Police enquiry but a Police search. It cannot be called a judicial enquiry. Mere making of general allegations is not sufficient. Some allegations must be made with regard to the petitioner. They must make definite statements. But that the prosecution is not prepared to do. What could be the inference therefrom? How can a statement of facts against a particular individual stifle the enquiry? Considerable harm will have to be suffered by my client if his current books are thus indefinitely kept in the custody of the Police, which they have no right under the law to keep. We have twice offered them to inspect our books, which they would not do. Administration of justice would not in the least be hampered if they desist from following a course not defined by the law. The cases cited by the learned Advocate-General have no application to the present case. There was no judicial enquiry at all. Section 96, clause (3), of the Criminal Procedure Code does not apply.

JUDGMENT.

CHAUDHURI, J.—We do not think that we can uphold the order which has been passed by

(1) 19 C. 52 at p 64.

(2) 16 Ind. Cas. 501; 39 C. 953; (1912) M. W. N. 760; 12 M. L. T. 171; 10 A. L. J. 193; 16 C. L. J. 231; 16 C. W. N. 865; 23 M. L. J. 32; 14 Bom. L. R. 717; 13 Cr. L. J. 693; 39 I. A. 163.

It is conceded that no enquiry is being made by the Magistrate and the enquiry which is therein mentioned probably refers to the investigation which is being made by the officer appointed by the Government to enquire into the dealings with the Munitions Board. The warrant does not refer to an enquiry "about to be made." What was prayed for was a general search warrant in respect of books and documents mentioned in the petition, namely, for the years 1917, 1918 and 1919. The warrant as issued is a general warrant referring to all accounts, ledgers, stock-books, etc., correspondence and documents which may have a bearing on the transactions with the Munitions Board. It is said that the order was made under section 96, clause 3, of the Criminal Procedure Code, that is to say, when the Court considers that the purposes of any enquiry, trial or other proceedings under the Code will be served by a general search or inspection, but there is no enquiry or trial or other proceeding under the Code.

Then, as regards the Court "considering" the matter, there is nothing stated in the petition about T. R. Pratt having any business transactions with the Munitions Board. It is urged that from the name of that firm appearing in the schedule to the petition, it ought to be inferred that there were business transactions between T. R. Pratt and the Munitions Board. We do not find that there is any material in the petition which the Magistrate could have considered in connection with the issue of a serach warrant so far as T. R. Pratt is concerned. No doubt, great weight is to be attached to the statements made in the petition by the officer engaged in the investigation. There is nothing to suggest that he is not doing his very best in the matter and it is not the intention of the investigating officer to cause any damage to the parties namd in the petition. In fact the petition has been very carefully worded so far as that is concerned. It seems to us, however, to be an investigation conducted by the officer to find out what offence, if any, was committed and by whom upon inspection of the books and other papers, if obtainable, of firms which had business transactions with the Munitions Board. It is not suggested that this is a case under chapter 14 of the Criminal Procedure Code, and, therefore, it is unnecessary for us to deal with it. Reference has been made to the case of Clarke v. Brojendra Kishore Roy (2), but we do not think that the decision in that case affects the question arising in the case before us.

We, therefore, make the Rule absolute and direct that all the books and documents taken from T. R. Pratt be returned to him forthwith.

NEWBOULD, J.—As I look at the case, the Rule must be made absolute on the following ground. That there were no materials before the Magistrate on which he could decide that a search warrant should be issued. A long petition was presented, stating that certain offences appeared to have been committed. There is nothing in the petition to connect T. R. Pratt with these offences. All that is stated to support the application for a search warrant against him is contained in paragraph 17 of the petition, which runs thus:—

"Enquiry is now being made into the offences mentioned above and it is essential for that purpose that the production of the books and accounts for the years 1917, 1918 and 1919 up to date of the firms stated below should be enforced by a search warrant, as for obvious reasons, the firms concerned are not likely to produce them otherwise." In other words, the Magistrate granted a search warrant simply because the Police Officer informed him that it was necessary. When the law requires the sanction of a Magistrate before the issue of a search warrant, that means that the Magistrate should apply his mind to the facts and he ought not to issue a search warrant simply becuse a Police Officer asks him to do so. On this ground I agree with my learned brother that the order passed by the Magistrate is illegal and ought to be set aside.

Rule made absolute.

SITA RAM—APPLICANT

EMPEROR—OPPOSITE PARTY.

Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860), s. 409—Postal Cash Certificate—Payment to certificate holder of sum less than that due—Appropriation of balance—Criminal breach of trust.

Where in cashing Postal Cash Certificates an officer of the Post Office pays to the holders of the certificates a sum less than what is due and appropriates the balance for his own use, he commits the offence of criminal breach of trust punishable under section 409 of the Penal Code. [p. 476, col. 2.]

Criminal revision against the order of the Sessions Judge, Gorakhpur, dated the 22nd September 1919.

Mr. Shiva Prasad Sinha, for the Applicant.

JUDGMENT.—Sita Ram has filed an application for revision of an order passed by the Sessions Judge of Gorakhpur, dated 22nd September 1919, whereby he has sentenced the said Sita Ram to undergo six months' rigorous imprisonment on each of three separate counts. The sentences are to run consecutively. They are passed under section 409 of the Indian Penal Code. There is also a sentence of solitary confinement and fine.

The grounds taken on which I am asked to revise are:—

(1) Because the evidence does not warrant the conviction of the applicant and the propriety of the finding, sentence and order;

(2) because no offence against the accused has in a proper view of the case been made out; and

(3) that the sentences are unduly severe.

The applicant at the time the offences were committed was Sub-Post Master of Bridgemanganj, Sub-Post Office. In the course of his official work he had to issue certain cash certificates.

The certificates were issued at Rs. 7-12-0. He was asked to encash them at a time when under each certificate the holder was entitled to receive Rs. 8-2-6. He encashed the certificates and handed over Rs. 7-6-6 on each certificate and took a receipt to the effect that he was paying over Rs. 8-2-6 while in fact he only paid over to each man Rs. 7-6-6. It is contended that inasmuch as no loss or damage has been caused to Government no offence has been committed under section 409. Now section 409 is criminal breach of trust by a public servant, and in substance the contention is that he may or may not have paid to the holder of the cash certificates less than they were entitled to but that he had committed no criminal breach of trust so far as the Government was concerned. I fail to understand this contention. The Government had made over to the accused upon each of these cash certificates the sum of Rs. 8-2-6. It had given this money to the accused as a trust and he had accepted it as a trust binding him to pay to each certificate holder the sum of Rs. 8-2-6. Out of that sum he paid Rs. 7-6-6 and there was a sum of annas 12 remaining with the accused as money entrusted to him for the purpose of payment to the cash certificate holder. He put annas 12 of this trust money into his pocket and did not pay it to the holder of the cash certificate. So far as appears from the record, he has not even now paid this deficient sum to the complainants. That is the offence which the accused has committed. He has not carried out the trust reposed in him by the Government but has diverted a portion of that trust to his own private ends. The learned Vakil who appears for the applicant has, in support of his contention, referred to the case of Queen-Empress v. Ganpat Tapidas (1). That case differs very much from the one before me and can be easily distinguished. At the time when the accused diverted a portion of the trust reposed in him, the date was the 26th June 1919. It is now all but six months since that portion of the money entrusted to him for payment to the complainants has been retained by the applicant. There is nothing in the record to show that the complainants, Ram Prasad Bhole and Thakuri, consented to the retainment by the accused of this money. Anyhow the annas 12 which the Government entrusted to the accused for payment to the certificate holders in part payment of the cash certificates has not been paid to them. That money has been retained by the accused. With all due respect to the learned Judges who decided the case referred to, I am not prepared to agree with them when they say that the appellant before them had fulfilled the trust reposed in him by Government. However, the evidence in that case is not before me and there may have been something in it which justified the statement. In the case before me I hold that the very fact of the accused taking annas 12 and putting it in to his own pocket, instead of paying it over to the holder of the cash certificate, was a criminal breach of trust. I see no reason to interfere and dismiss the application.

It is contended that the punishment is unduly severe. The punishment for an offence under section 409 may amount to transportation for life or to ten years' rigorous imprisonment. Bearing this in mind, I do not find the punishment in this case is unduly severe.

Application dismissed.

EMPEROR—RESPONDENT.

Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860), s. 84—Insanity as ground of exemption from criminal liability—Burden of proof.

Where it is proved that an accused person has committed the offence of murder, the onus lies upon him to show that he is exempted from criminal responsibility by reason of such unsoundness of mind as made him incapable of knowing the nature of the act or that he was doing what was either wrong or contrary to law. [p 478, col. 1.]

It is not every form of unsoundness of mind that would exempt a person from criminal responsibility: it is only unsoundness of mind which materially impairs the cognitive faculties of the mind that can form a ground of such exemption. [p. 477, col. 2; p. 478, col. 1.]

Criminal appeal against the order of the Additional Sessions Judge, Cachar.

Babu Suresh Chandra Taluqdar, for the Appellant.

Mr. Orr, Deputy Legal Remembrancer, for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.

SANDERSON, C. J.—In this case the appellant was convicted of the murder of his wife and was sentenced to transportation for life. He was tried by the learned Additional Sessions Judge of Cachar assisted by two Assessors. The opinions of the Assessors were as follows. The first Assessor said: "In my opinion the accused is not guilty. I give him the benefit of doubt. It is probable that the accused committed the murder under insanity." The second Assessor said: "In my opinion the accused is not guilty. The accused committed the murder while he was insane." It appears to me that the opinions expressed by the Assessors are not consistent, but I gather from them that the Assessors were really of opinion that the accused person murdered his wife, but that he was insane at the time he committed the murder. The learned Additional Sessions Judge has found that there is no doubt that the accused person did murder his wife. I think the evidence on that point is overwhelming, and I agree with the conclusion at which the learned Sessions Judge arrived on that point. That being so, the learned Judge was right in holding that it lay upon the accused to show that he was exempted from criminal responsibility, by reason of unsoundness of mind. He examined the evidence and he came to the conclusion that the accused had not discharged that onus. In my judgment, the learned Additional Sessions Judge was right on the second point. I quote from the decision in the case of Queen Empress v. Kader Nasyer Shah (1): 'It must also be borne in mind that it is not every form of unsoundness of mind that would exempt one from criminal responsibility. The law on the subject is that laid down in section 84 of the Indian Penal Code, which enacts that 'nothing is an offence which is done by a person who at the time of doing it by reason of unsoundness of mind is incapable of knowing the nature of the act, or that he is doing what is either wrong or contrary to law.'" Then the learned

MAKHNI v. FARZAND ALI.

Judges refer to the opinions of the Judges given in answer to the questions put to them by the House of Lords in M'Naghten's case and point out that it is only unsoundness of mind which materially impairs the cognitive faculties of the mind that can form a ground of exemption from criminal responsibility, the nature and the extent of the unsoundness of mind required being such as would make the offender incapable of knowing the nature of the act, or that he is doing what is wrong or contrary to law. In the present case, the allegation on behalf of the defence was that the accused person had been suffering from derangement of mind some days previous to the 24th of July, and the accused's statement was that he saw a large Rakshasa (which I understand means a demon) running towards him in a threatening mood and so he struck him with a spear. Then he saw that his wife had been killed. From that and other statements which he made, I understand him to have meant that he thought that there was a demon in his wife or that his wife was a demon and so he struck with the spear and killed his wife. Whether that was really the case depends almost entirely upon the accused's own statement: and, having regard to the medical evidence in this case, in my judgment, the learned Judge was right in coming to the conclusion that the accused had not discharged the onus which lay upon him of showing that he was exempted from criminal responsibility by reason of such unsondness of mind, as would make him incapable of knowing the nature of the act or that he was doing what was either wrong or contrary to law.

At the same time my learned brother and I are of opinion that the evidence does disclose that the accused person was suffering from mental derangement of some sort at the time the act was committed: and, although we dismiss the appeal and confirm the conviction for murder and the sentence of transportation for life, which is the only sentence besides the sentence of death which the law prescribes for the offence of murder, we direct that the proceedings be forwarded to the Chief Commissioner of Assam with a copy of our judgment and our recommendation that the case may be dealt with by the Local Government under section 401 of the Code of Criminal Procedure in such manner as it thinks fit.

FARZAND ALI AND OTHERS—OPPOSITE PARTIES.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), s. 209—Case triable by Court of Session—Magistrate, whether can dispose of case.

A Magistrate dealing with a case triable by a Court of Session is not competent to dispose of it himself; he must commit the accused for trial by that Court. [p. 479, col. 1.]

Criminal revision against the order of the District Magistrate, Mirzapur, dated the 1st of November 1919.

Mr. R. K. Sorabji, for the Petitioner.

The Hon'ble Mr. Raza Ali, for the Opposite Parties.

JUDGMENT.—The petitioner before me is one Musammat Makhni. Her prayer is that an order passed by the District Magistrate of Mirzapur, whereby he discharged five accused persons before him, persons accused of an offence under section 330, Indian Penal Code, may be revised, and a further enquiry directed. One of the persons accused is Farzand Ali, who is described as being a petty Zemindar of Mauza Manikpura. The others are persons more or less connected with the Police, and one of them is Abu Muhammad Khan, the Sub-Inspector in charge of Thana Ahraura.

The charge made against the accused is a serious one, namely, of having beaten Musammat Makhni, causing hurt to her to extort a confession and to compel restoration of property alleged to have been stolen by her. The offence is triable by the Court of Session.

The District Magistrate held a careful enquiry but came to the conclusion which he thus records in his order:—

"That one or more of the accused ill-treated the woman and that all of them know what happened seems to be not at all improbable; and they are lucky, in view of the unexplained injuries, not to find themselves in the dock of the Sessions Court."

Still he came to the conclusion that there was not a case to go before the Court of Session. The evidence did not seem to him such as would justify a conviction that the prosecution evidence was not free from taint. He, therefore, discharged the accused under section 209 of the Code of Criminal Procedure.

I purposely abstain from pronouncing any view whatever regarding the evidence. When the case was first before me, one of the contentions was that the provisions of section 209 of the Criminal Procedure Code had not been fulfilled and that the Magistrate was not competent to pass an order of discharge until he had fulfilled the conditions laid down there, and the contention was that there was still further evidence which the learned Magistrate ought to have sent for, called and examined. I accordingly asked what was this evidence and what was its nature. A petition has been put before me that there are two witnesses; their names and the nature of their evidence have been put in writing. I have, on several occasions, commented upon the inadvisability of Magistrates dealing with cases triable by the Court of Session, and taking upon themselves to come to a conclusion upon the evidence before them, and this case is certainly an illustration of that danger. The District Magistrate, who was not intended by the Code of Criminal Procedure to try a case triable by the Court of Session only, has considered it probable that some offence was committed upon this woman and that the accused know all about it more or less. It was eminently a case for trial by the Court of Session, who is considered an officer more experienced in dealing with criminal cases and who is generally an officer of higher standing than the Magistrate of the district. The District Magistrate justifies his action in the present case by saying that one or two of the accused were persons of standing, who ought not to be harassed by cases that proclaim in the evidence before him that they are cases which are false, vindictive or frivolous. He seems to have overlooked that if a person does bring a case of that kind, the law provides means whereby he can be brought to account. Musammat Makhni and her advisers must have known that if the Sessions Court should find a case of this kind to be of that nature, there is a strong probability that punishment will overtake them. As I said before, I do not pronounce the slightest opinion as to whether the Magistrate was right in what he said or whether Musammat Makhni is or is not able to prove the offence she alleges. The beating of a woman, as described in the evidence, is a very serious offence and the bringing of a false case against a Sub-Inspector of Police and a Zemindar is an equally serious matter. It is a case for the Sessions Court to decide. I set aside the order of discharge and return the case to the District Magistrate of Mirzapur to proceed with it according to law.

Order set aside.

KESAR DIN—CONVICT—APPELLANT

EMPEROR—PROSECUTOR—RESPONDENT.

Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860), ss. 300, 302—Murder—Dhatura poisoning—Intention, evidence of—Indication of intention, how to be ascertained.

In cases of dhatura poisoning it is always necessary to ascertain the object with which dhatura was administered, and the best indication of the intention of the offender can be gathered from the amount of dhatura administered.

Appeal from the order of the Sessions Judge, Jhelum, dated the 21st August 19.9, convicting the appellant.

Lala Mul Chand, R. S., Public Prosecutor, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The Sessions Judge of Jhelum, agreeing with the unanimous opinion of the Assessors, has sentenced the appellant Kesar Din to be hanged for the murder of one Gopi Chand and his wife by administration of dhatura. He has submitted an appeal through the Jail and his sentence is before us for confirmation.

It appears that Gopi Chand and his wife were much disappointed that they were childless and had made pilgrimages to find a remedy for their misfortune. During one of these pilgrimages they met the present accused, who is a resident of the District of Unao. Towards the end of May last he paid them a visit at their home at Chakwal and stayed with them for some 10 days. The prosecution case is that on the night of the 2nd June he administered dhatura for the purpose of robbery and fled as he was disturbed before he had obtained all the jewels which he desired. It appears that the murdered woman had not become unconscious as he thought, and raised an alarm as he was removing a jewel from her arms. Neighbours came and found Gopi Chand and his wife both unconscious and called in at once an Assistant Surgeon, who did whatever was possible, but Gopi Chand died at day break and his wife on the following afternoon. A report was made at once at the thana and a full description was given of the culprit whose name was unknown. He was arrested on the following evening at Chuha Saidan Shah. He was carrying at that time $4\frac{1}{2}$ tolas of dhatura seeds.

There can be no doubt whatever that Gopi Chand's guest caused his death and that of his wife, and the only questions for decision in this case are whether the appellant was that guest, and whether he administered dhatura with the intention of causing death or such bodily injury as he knew to be likely to cause death. As for the identification of the appellant there was a large amount of independent evidence. He was brought back to Chakwal with his face concealed. There is no reason whatever to distrust the truth of the witnesses' statement. There can also be no doubt that the accused administered a large amount of dhatura to both the deceased. This is proved by the medical evidence, and the fact that he was still carrying dhatura with him when arrested supplies good corroboration.

The only question remaining, therefore, is with what object dhatura was administered. In such cases its use may be merely in order to facilitate the commission of robbery and it does not per se and necessarily import contemplation of the victim's death as a means towards, or as incidental to, the main end of robbery, as is remarked by Plowden, J., in Fira v. Empress (1). In every case, however, of this description the circumstances of the particular case must be taken into consideration and the best indication of the intention of the offender can be gathered from the amount of dhatura which he administers [Emperor v. Gutsli (2)]. In the present case it is clear that a very large amount of dhatura was administered to the victims, as in spite of immediate medical assistance neither of them recovered. We think that there can be no doubt that the appellant hoped that the successful termination of his crime would be facilitated by the death of his victims and the subsequent difficulty of tracing him with the help only of persons little acquainted with him.

We agree with the decision of the Sessions Judge and the Assessors and dismissing the appeal confirm the sentence of death.

Appeal dismissed.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), s. 60—Agriculturist transferring his land on lease or mortgage, effect of—Property, whether attachable—Appeal, second—Plea abandoned in Appellate Court, whether allowable in second appeal.

A person does not cease to be an agriculturist merely because he transfers his land by lease or mortgage: he still continues to be an agriculturist and his property is protected from attachment.

A plea taken in the trial Court but abandoned in the first Appellate Court cannot be entertained in second appeal, especially where such plea depends for its decision upon a question of fact.

Appeal against the decree of the Additional District Judge, Nagpur, in Civil Appeal No. 105 of 1919, decided on the 13th September 1919.

Mr. W. R. Puranik, for the Appellant.

JUDGMENT.—The respondent Eknath is the tenatnt of certain absolute occupancy land. Amolaksao let the land to Eknath for the year 1326. Eknath failed to pay the rent and Amolaksao obtained a decree against him for the same. In execution Amolaksao attached two houses blonging to Eknath. Eknath pleaded that they could not be attached and sold, as he was an agriculturist. Amolaksao's reply was that Eknath was not an agriculturist, since his land was leased to himself and on the expiry of the lease was to be made over to Eknath's mortgagee Jhiblia. The lower Courts have rejected Amolaksao's contention.

In this Court the same contention is repeated. No authority is cited in support of it. In my opinion an agriculturist who makes a transfer of his land by lease or mortgage does not cease to be an agriculturist. It is argued that an agriculturist who puts himself in such a position that he will be unable to cultivate his land personally for a long time ceases to be an agriculturist. I cannot agree to this broad proposition. It has not been shown in this case that as a matter of fact Eknath has, from the nature of the transfers made by him, put himself in such a position. Eknath is the present tenant of the holding and the lease and mortgage might terminate at any moment, whatever conditions they may be given on, by surrender, forfeiture, redemption or otherwise.

A plea was taken in the first Court that in any case one house would have sufficed for Eknath's wants as an agriculturist. It is urged that neither of the lower Courts have taken any notice of this plea. From the grounds of appeal in the lower Appellate Court it appears that the plea was given up in that Court; that is also why the lower Appellate Court makes no mention of it. This objection, which depends upon the decision of a question of fact, cannot now be entertained.

The appeal fails and is dismissed without notice to the respondent.

Appeal from the decree of the Subordinate Judge, Bara Banki, dated the 26th March 1918.

Mr. John Jackson and Chaudhri Ram Bharose Lal, for the Appellant.

The Hon'able Syed Wazir Hasan, Babu Ram Chandra and Lala Parbhu Dayal Rastogi, for Respondents Nos. 1 and 2

Mr. Hyder Husain and Rai Bahadur Babu Nagendro Nath Ghoshal, for Respondents Nos. 3/1 to 3/3.

JUDGMENT.—Girdhari Lal, Panna Lal and Rani Sharafunnisa filed a suit against Bishambar Nath for a declaration that certain villages were not liable to sale in execution of a decree obtained by the latter against Ram Singh. The decree in question was obtained on foot of a mortgage made by Ram Singh in favour of Bishambar Nath. The mortgage comprised three villages, Allahdadpur, Mohammadpur and Akhyapur. Girdhari Lal and Panna Lal claim to have purchased the villages Allahdadpur and Muhammadpur in execution of a simple decree for money. Rani Sharafunnisa claims to have purchased the village Akhyapur in execution of the same decree. Their allegation was that the mortgage in question was effected after the said properties had been attached in execution of the above decree and the mortgage was consequently void and inoperative.

The suit was dismissed for default on the 18th June 1917. On the 27th June 1917 an application was filed for the restoration of the suit to the file. The application purported to have been made by Girdhari Lal, Panna Lal and others, plaintiffs; but was signed by Girdhari Lal and Panna Lal only, the latter being also called Basant Rai. On the 6th August 1917 this application was allowed with the reservation that the order would take effect in favour of Rani Sharafunnisa, so far as her interests were joint with those of Girdhari Lal and Panna Lal but not so far as she had a separate and independent interest in any property in dispute inasmuch as no application for restoration had been made on her behalf. The learned Subordinate Judge passed the above order on the assumption that the only applicants were Girdhari Lal and Basant Rai, who had signed the petition.

On the 10th September 1917 Bishambar Nath filed an application in the execution proceeding arising out of his decree, asking that the sale of the village Akhyapur should be proceeded with as the suit of Rani Sharafunnisa had been dismissed for default. Rani Sharafunnisa opposed that application, stating that the suit had been restored to the file on the application of the plaintiffs on the 6th August 1917 and that the order of restoration was effective in regard to her portion of that claim. She was apparently under a misapprehension as to the nature of the order passed on the 6th August 1917. On the 19th November 1917 the learned Subordinate Judge, before whom the execution proceeding was pending, held that the order of restoration did not operate in favour of Rani Sharafunnisa in regard to village Akhyapur. He accordingly directed that the sale of that village be proceeded with.

On the 3rd December 1917 Rani Sharafunnisa made an application for review of the order of the 6th August 1917 under Order 47, rule 1, of the Code of Civil Procedure, or for its rectification under section 151 of that Code and prayed in the alternative for the restoration of her suit to the file under Order IX, rules 9 and 10, of the Code, read with section 5 of the Indian Limitation Act. This application was granted by the Court below so far as it related to the rectification of the order of the 6th August 1917 under section 151 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and the propriety of that order forms one of the grounds of this appeal and is also the subject of a miscellaneous proceeding in revision.

Having restored this suit to the file, the learned Subordinate Judge proceeded to decide it on the merits and decreed the claim. His finding is that the mortgage in question was made after the properties comprised in the mortgage had been attached before judgment in satisfaction of the claim, which culminated in a decree in execution of which the plaintiffs have purchased the said properties.

The first point for consideration in this appeal is whether the suit was properly restored to the file so far as the interest of Rani Sharafunnisa was concerned. Rani Sharafunnisa was one of the plaintiffs, and though her interest was confined to a portion of the property claimed, the threatened sale of that property, along with the other properties claimed by the other two plaintiffs in execution of the decree obtained by Bishambar Nath against Ram Singh, gave her a common cause of action to file a suit with them. Order I, rule 1 of the Code of Civil Procedure, allows all persons to be joined in one suit as co-plaintiffs, in whom any right to relief in respect of or arising out of the same act or transaction or series of acts or transactions is alleged to exist, whether jointly, severally or in the alternative, where if such persons brought separate suits, any common question of law or fact would arise. Where there are more plaintiffs than one, Order IX, rule 10, permits one or more of them to represent the remainder, though the latter may not appear at any of the hearings. When an order dismissing a suit for default is set aside under Order IX, rule 9, such order may operate in favour of all the plaintiffs, as the Court setting aside the order of dismissal may direct. There is evidence to show that Rani Sharafunnissa had agreed with her co-plaintiffs that the latter should prosecute the claim on her behalf and that she would pay them one-third of the costs which may be incurred in connection therewith. The evidence of Raja Abul Hasan Khan, the husband of Rani Sharafunnisa, shows that he paid Rs. 300 to Girdhari Lal on that account at the instance of Khan Bahadur Buniyad Husain, the father of the lady, who mentioned to him the terms of the agreement above referred to. The Court below believed his statement and we see no reason to take a different view.

When the suit was dismissed for default, it was open to Rani Sharafunnisa to have made a separate application for its restoration to the file or to have allowed her co-plaintiffs to move the Court for the purpose. On the 6th August 1917 the Court restored the suit to the file so far as the joint interest of all the three plaintiffs was affected but refused to restore it so far as the separate interest of Rani Sharafunnisa was concerned. When it was subsequently discovered that there had been an agreement between the Rani and the other plaintiffs, whereby the latter were authorised to represent her in the suit, and that the application purported to have been made by them on behalf of all, the Court very rightly varied its previous order and allowed the entire suit to be re-heard. The Rani was a pardanashin lady who in the ordinary circumstances would have to depend largely for the prosecution of her interest on her servants or relations. In the present instance she depended on the plaintiffs. She treated the application made by the plaintiffs for the restoration of the suit to the file and the order passed thereon as operating to her benefit and when she discovered that that was not so, she took legal advice and made the application of the 3rd December 1917 which the Court below granted. Whether her application is treated as an application under Order XLVII, rule 1, of the Code of Civil Procedure or an application under section 151 of the Code, there is sufficient reason to excuse the delay, and the order of the Court below is thoroughly justified. If she was not a party to the application of the 27th June 1917, she could not have applied for a review of the order passed on that application, and in the event the order passed could be varied under section 151 of the Code of Civil Procedure so as to allow the restoration to operate in her favour, because the ground on which the dismissal was set aside was in view of the above agreement common. If she is treated to have been a party to that petition, the order passed thereon could be varied on review under Order XLVII, rule 1, of the Code of Civil Procedure read with section 5 of the Indian Limitation Act. In either view the contention of the learned Counsel for the defendant-appellant, anent the propriety of that order, cannot be challenged.

The next point raised in this appeal is whether a completed and valid attachment of the disputed property had been made before the mortgage in question was obtained by the defendant-appellant. During the pendency of the suit filed by Abdul Majid Khan against Ram Singh for the recovery of the money due to him, an application was made by the former on the 23rd May 1912, purporting to be under Order XXXIX, rule 1, of the Code of Civil Procedure for the attachment of the villages in dispute. The Court, before which the suit was pending, ordered an attachment to issue, and in pursuance of that order, a prohibitory order was issued to Ram Singh, restraining him from transferring or charging the disputed property by sale, gift or otherwise until the further order of the Court and prohibiting all other persons receiving the same by purchase or otherwise. A copy of this order was affixed on a conspicuous place in each of the villages sought to be attached and on the door of the Court-house. A servant of Ram Singh, whose name does not appear from the report of the process-server, was also served with the copy of that order; and the attachment was proclaimed throughout the villages in question in a loud voice. It is probable that Ram Singh was not present or traceable when the process server, to whom the attachment was entrusted, went to the villages in question. The report of the process-server (Exhibit 7), which has not been challenged, is sufficient to show that the order of attachment was properly carried out in the manner required by law. To that report a list of the property attached was also appended. A vernacular order, purporting to have been passed by the Subordinate Judge on the application for attachment, has been referred to show that only the issue of a temporary injunction under Order XXXIX, rule 1, of the Code of Civil Procedure was intended, but that order was apparently written under some misapprehension and cannot be deemed to prevail over the order which the learned Subordinate Judge wrote with his own hand in English directing the attachment to issue. The omission to issue a notice was nothing more than an irregularity which could have justified Ram Singh in moving the Court to discharge that order or asking a higher Court to set it aside. The order having been passed and carried out in the manner required by Order XXI, rule 54, read with Order XXXVIII, rule 7, of the Code of Civil Procedure, the mortgage made by Ram Singh after that attachment had been made cannot be held to prevail over the rights acquired by the plaintiffs-respondents at the sale effected in pursuance of that attachment. Order XXXVIII, rule 10, protects the rights of persons not parties to the suit, which existed prior to the attachment. All rights acquired subsequent to the attachment are void as against all claims enforceable under the attachment under section 64 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The reference to a wrong rule in the application for attachment is of no consequence, because the contents of the application showed that it was an application for attachment before judgment; and it was dealt with as such. The procedure adopted in enforcement of the order passed on that petition was that prescribed for the making of an attachment before judgment. It is immaterial whether the defendant-appellant acted in good faith. He has acquired no rights which can be enforced against the claims arising out of the attachment.

The appeal fails and is dismissed with costs.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. XLI, r. 23; O. XLIII, r. 1 (u)—Appeal—Remand, order of, for re-decision, nature of—Appeal, whether lies.

The case contemplated by rule 23 of Order XLI of the Civil Procedure Code is a case where the Court from whose decree the appeal is preferred has disposed of the suit upon a preliminary point and the decree is reversed on appeal, and not a case decided upon the whole evidence and upon all the issues which were raised. Where in the latter case an Appellate Court concludes that the trial Court has allocated the burden of proving a particular issue on the wrong party and remands the case for re-trial in the light of the evidence already taken and authorises the taking of fresh evidence, the rule has no application, and consequently the order of remand is not appealable. [p. 485, cols. 1 & 2.]

Appeal from a decision of the District Judge, Gaya.

Mr. S. N. Dutt, for the Appellant.

JUDGMENT.—In this case the plaintiffs brought a suit for recovery of possession of certain property, basing their claim upon a Kobala granted by the landlord. The defendant, who had deprived them of their possession, relied upon a Kobala granted by the sons of the landlord. When the case came before the Munsif, one of the questions was whether the landlord at the time he granted the Kobala to the plaintiffs was of sound mind. The Munsif, putting the onus on the defendant, came to the conclusion that it had not been proved that he was of unsound mind at the time when he executed the Kobala. The case came on appeal to the District Judge, who came to the conclusion that the Munsif had placed the onus on the wrong party. Then instead of deciding the case, according to the law which he laid down, upon the evidence already taken, the District Judge remanded the case to the Munsif for further trial upon the issue of the sanity of the plaintiffs' landlord and directed the Munsif to pass judgment in the light of the whole of the evidence including further evidence which he was authorised to take. The plaintiffs have appealed to this Court from that order of the District Judge and the question has been raised whether an appeal lies from such an order. It is contended on behalf of the plaintiffs that the case is covered by Order XLIII, rule 1 (u), which allows an appeal from an order under Order XLI, rule 23, remanding the case where an appeal would lie from the decree of the Appellate Court. Undoubtedly an appeal would lie from the decree of the Appellate Court had the Appellate Court dealt with the case itself and passed a decree on appeal, but turning to Order XLI, rule 23, it is perfectly clear that the case there contemplated is a case where the Court from whose decree the appeal is preferred has disposed of the suit upon a preliminary point and the decree is reversed on appeal. In such a case the Appellate Court may, if it thinks fit, by order remand the case and direct what issue or issues shall be tried in the case so remanded and give directions to re-admit the suit under its original number and order the lower Court to proceed to determine the suit. This was merely not a case decided by the lower Court upon a preliminary point. It was decided upon the whole evidence and upon all the issues which were raised and the Court came to a definite conclusion, not upon any preliminary point, but on questions of fact which were raised in the case. It appears to us, therefore, that in remanding this case in the manner the District Judge did, directing the lower Court to retry the case and record further evidence, the District Judge was certainly not acting under Order XLI, rule 23. Therefore, it follows that in so far as the plaintiffs are seeking to appeal on the ground that the order made by the District Judge remanding the case comes within the provisions of Order XLI, rule 23, they must fail. This appeal cannot, therefore, be entertained.

We have been asked by the learned Counsel for the plaintiffs to treat the case as though it were an application for revision. It does not appear to us that this is a case in which we should make that order at the present moment. It is open to the plaintiffs, if they should be so minded, to file a petition asking the Court to revise the order made by the District Judge on the ground that he had no jurisdiction to make it. If and when that application is presented, we will then consider whether the time for making such an application should be extended in the particular circumstances of this case. We are not in a position at present to deal with that point, and, therefore, make no order such as that which is asked for.

papers to Collector after failure of latter to effect sale —Application, whether necessary—Limitation applicable.

When the proceedings connected with a sale are transferred to a Collector, the Collector has full power to proceed with the sale or to adopt any of the methods laid down in Schedule III of the Code of Civil Procedure for the satisfaction of the decree transferred to him for execution. If he fails in effecting a sale of the property, it is open to him to return the papers, but it is equally open to the Court which passed the decree to send back the papers, if the reason which prevented the sale was not such as to operate as a complete impediment to the execution of the decree. In sending back the papers to the Collector, the Court merely enforces what it has already ordered and no fresh application for execution is necessary.

An application to send the papers back to the Collector is governed by Article 181 or 182 of Schedule I to the Limitation Act, according as it may be for the continuance of the previous execution proceeding or for taking a step-in-aid of execution, and not by Article 163.

Appeal against the order of the District Judge, Rae Bareli, dated the 6th December 1918, upholding the order of the Assistant Collector, 1st Class, Partabgarh, dated the 28th September 1918.

Syed Ali Mohammad, for the Appellant.

Messrs. P. Kaul and Seetla Prasad, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—In execution of a decree for arrears of profits certain landed property belonging to the judgment-debtor was attached and an order was passed for its sale. The property was ancestal within the meaning of the notification issued by the Local Government under section 68 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The proceedings connected with the sale were, therefore, transferred to the Collector. On the date fixed for the sale by the Collector no bidder turned up. The Collector thereupon directed the papers to be returned to the Revenue Court.

The decree-holder subsequently applied to the Assistant Collector, who had passed the decree and directed the sale of the attached property, to send back the papers to the Collector with a direction that a fresh proclamation for sale should be issued. The Assistant Collector allowed that application.

The contention of the learned Counsel who appears for the judgment-debtor-appellant is that the Assistant Collector had no power to send back the papers to the Collector until he was moved for the purpose by an application for the execution of the decree in the form required by law. It is further contended that if the application made by the decree-holder be treated as an application for revival, it was barred by Article 163 of the Indian Limitation Act.

Neither of these contentions is, however, entitled to any force. When the proceedings connected with a sale are transferred to a Collector, the Collector has full power to proceed with the sale or to adopt any of the methods laid down in Schedule III of the Code of Civil Prcedure for the satisfaction of the decree transferred to him for execution. If he fails in effecting a sale of the property, it is open to him to return the papers, but it is equally open to the Court which passed the decree to send back the papers, if the reason which prevented the sale was not such as to operate as a complete impediment to the execution of the decree. In sending back the papers to the Collector, the Court was merely enforcing what it had already ordered and no fresh application for execution was necessary. An application of that kind is governed by Article 181 or Article 182 of the Indian Limitation Act, according as it may be for the continuance of the previous execution proceeding or for taking a step-in-aid of execution, and not by Article 163.

The appeal is, therefore, dismissed with costs.

Adverse possession, whether question of law or

SATGUR PRASAD v. RAJ KISHORE LAL.

Fact—Hindu Law—Widow, asserting full possession—Reversioners, position of.

The question whether possession is adverse or permissive may often be one of legal inference from documents, concurrent findings on which of the lower Courts will not be binding on the Privy Council. [p. 489, col. 2.]

Where a Hindu widow is in exclusive possession of her husband's property as his heir, and openly asserts her title to exclusive possession of the property, and publicly obtains mutation of names in respect of that property, her possession is adverse to the reversioners, and is not possession in lieu of maintenance. [p. 490, col. 1.]

Appeal from a decree of the Allahabad High Court, dated July 13, 1911, affirming a decree of the Subordinate Judge, Gorakhpur.

FACTS.—This suit was brought by the reversioners of two Hindu brothers to recover from the defendants certain property formerly held by Dilla Kunwari, a widow of the surviving brother. Dilla Kunwari's husband died in 1851; in 1831, on the death of her husband's surviving brother, she obtained possession of a moiety of her husband's property: she died in 1895.

The only substantial question in the case was whether her possession was adverse to that of the reversioners or whether, as contended by the plaintiffs, she had been all along allowed to remain in possession in lieu of maintenance. The High Court (Sir H. Richards, C. J., and P. C. Banerji, J.) affirming the Subordinate Judge of Gorakhpur adopted the second view, and refused leave to appeal on the ground that the question was purely one of fact.

The Board granted special leave to appeal.

Sir W. Garth, for the Appellant.

Mr. DeGruyther, K. C., and Dr. Abdul Majid, for the Respondents.

Sir W. Garth, for the Appellant.—The plaintiffs' claim is long since barred by limitation. The High Court have erred in holding that Dilla Kunwari held in lieu of maintenance and by permission: it is clear from the evidence and especially from the documents that throughout she set up her own title. When a Hindu widow openly asserts, as here, an absolute title, a suit by the reversioners of her husband is barred after the statutory period of 12 years: Lachhan Kunwar v. Anant Singh (1), Sham Koer v. Dah Koer (2).

Mr. DeGruyther, K. C., for the Respondents.—The question whether Dilla Kunwari's possession was adverse or permissive is one of fact and is no longer open; we have concurrent findings in our favour. The possession of Dilla not being adverse, time did not run against the reversioners till her death in 1895: Srinath Gangopadhya v. Mahes Chandra Roy (3).

Sir W. Garth, in reply.—The question is not really one of fact, it is a question of the construction of documents and the proper inferences to be drawn from those documents and from the admitted facts; it is essentially a question of law. The High Court came to a wrong conclusion, and the Board are not bound by their decision.

JUDGMENT.

VISCOUNT HALDANE.—This is an appeal from a judgment of the High Court of Allahabad, affirming the conclusion come to by the Subordinate Judge of Gorakhpur. The only question of substance is when time began to run under the Indian Limitation Act against a claim to recover possession made by the first respondent. The property in dispute was held by a Hindu lady called Dilla Kunwari. She died in 1895, and the controversy turns on whether her possession was that of one claiming adversely as against any other title, or whether, as the Courts below have held, that possession was not adverse but under licence from or by permission of the predecessors-in-title of the first respondent, a licence or permission granted during the lady's lifetime, in order to afford her the maintenance which she claimed as a widow. In that case time did not begin to run against his claim until she died in 1895, and the Limitation Act has not operated so as to defeat this action.

(3) 4 B. L. R. (F. B.) 3; 12 W. R. (F. B.) 14.

It will be convenient, in order to make the situation of the parties intelligible, to set out the pedigree in a table:—

It is not now in dispute that Bhawani and Basant, who appear in the pedigree, were at the time of the death of the former in 1851 joint, and that Basant became entitled to the entire family property, subject to such rights as Kishen and Dilla, Bhawani's widows, possessed. When Basant died in 1859, his widows, Raghubans and Jadubans, had similar rights, and subject to these, his Sapindas, the male cousins and his reversioners, Hanuman and Hanwant, took the property. In 1861 Raghubans and Jadubans, the widows of Basant, both died, and it is of importance to see what happened then. The learned Subordinate Judge held that the two widows of Bhawani got possession of the estate in equal moieties. As will appear, the controversy is confined to the share held by Dilla, for as to the other half taken possession of by the other widow, Kishen, an independent title, under a deed of gift, as to which title there is no dispute in this appeal, became vested in her daughter, Jadunath, and was transmitted to the defendant. Jadunath took possession of this half in 1879 under the deed of gift. It is immaterial whether the deed was valid or not, so far as concerns what she took possession of in that year, for any claim of the respondent-plaintiff against her has, as is not in dispute, become barred by limitation. The only question is as to what was held by her aunt, Dilla.

The period prescribed by the Indian Limitation Act, 1877, section 144 of Schedule II, as that within which a suit for possession has to be brought, is twelve years from the time when the possession of the defendant became adverse to the plaintiff. It is, therefore, obvious that if the possession of Dilla, after Basant's death, was really adverse, the respondents' claim fails. It is important to see what was the position of the lady after the death of her husband, Bhawani, in 1851. In November of that year, she and the other widow, Kishen, entered into a written agreement with Bhawani's brother, Basant, the terms of which were that the name of Basant as inheriting should be entered in the Government register in place of that of Bhawani, and that he should "pay the Goverment revenue, manage the ilaka (or property), and make collections and give expenses and clothes (and money) when required for charitable purposes" to Kishen and Dilla, that the messing should continue to be joint, and that both widows should exercise control over the servants and ilaka as heretofore. Their Lordships are of opinion that if this were all, it left the possession as a provisional arrangement undisturbed in Basant. All that the ladies were to do was to live as before on the property and be maintained there, without any occupation of an exclusive or adverse kind. But did the non-exclusive character of this occupation change after Basant's death in 1859? The answer to this question turns on what Bhawani's widows, Kishan and Dilla, did in the way of publicly asserting a claim to exclusive possession and ownership. The learned Subordinate Judge thought that it had been proved, as regards the share of Dilla, that in controversy in this suit, by (1) her statements and the manner in which she entered into possession; (2) the admissions of the defendants; and (3) certain earlier judgments of the High Court in other suits, that Dilla was in possession only in lieu of her maintenance for life, and not in adverse possession. The High Court expressed the same view, but without giving detailed reasons for it.

It is with reluctance that their Lordships differ from the concurrent opinions of the two Courts below on this point; but it is one in reality of legal inference from documents and not of finding of fact, and their Lordships are unable to draw the inferences made by the Subordinate Judge and followed by the High Court. To begin with, the so-called "compromise" with Basant was not a compromise at all. It was a mere arrangement that, according to the alleged family custom, his name should be entered in place of that of his deceased brother, Bhawani, so that he might pay the Government revenue and manage the estate, the ladies messing jointly with him and controlling the servants and the property. Such an arrangement was probably a convenient one under the circumstances, as is further explained in an application of the ladies to the Tahsildar, dated the 8th December, 1851, on the ground that the step was customary when ladies were pardanashin and, as the document says, was an arrangement designed to obviate disputes. But it does not appear to settle any questions of title, or to show, as the learnd Judge thought, that Basant was made the owner to the exclusion of the ladies from every title excepting one to maintenance. It renders natural the subsequent conduct of Dilla in what appears to their Lordships to have been a succession of assertions of ownership after Basant's death. Even from the written statement of the 19th June 1867 relied on by the learned Subordinate Judge as showing that Dilla claimed possession in mere enforcement of a right to maintenance, it is clear that she claimed much more; for she asserts that she was the "Patni" or wedded wife of Bhawani, and as such entitled as full heir to a share of the separate property which she alleges was what he possessed. In another written statement, which she put in in a suit brought against her by Jadunath in 1870, she asserts that she and Kishen were their husband's heirs and had all along been in possession as such. It is only as an alternative plea that in this document she sets up a title to possess on the footing of a right to maintenance. The application of Dilla, dated the 6th September 1861, made for a record of title after the deaths of Basant's two widows, contains an assertion, thus publicly made, that she and Kishen had become by these deaths the heirs and the only heirs to the property. It appears that mutation into Dilla's name duly followed on this application. Again in 1870 Dilla made an absolute gift for religious purposes of a part of the property. Their Lordships think that it is impossible, in the face of these open assertions of full title, to draw the inference that Dilla claimed no more than such a possession as would yield her maintenance during her life; nor does it appear to them that certain admissions, suggested as having been made by the defendants in the various proceedings referred to by the learned Judge who tried the case, are such as to preclude them from setting up the real nature of Dilla's possession. Further, they do not think that anything decided in the previous suits referred to by the Subordinate Judge, to which neither the respondents nor any person through whom they claim were parties, precludes the appellant from now setting up in the present suit that Dilla's possession was adverse as against the respondents.

If the true inference be that the lady was in possession and asserting a title to full ownership of her share, at all events from the death of Basant in 1859 down to her own death in 1895, it is clear that the title of the plaintiffs was barred by limitation. This makes it unnecessary to consider the other questions raised in the suit. There is a concurrent finding as to the age of the first plaintiff, Raj Kishore, according to which he was born before a deed of gift, dated the 8th September 1866, by which Hanuman Parshad and Debi Sahai purported to transfer the whole estate to Jadunath. This finding, which is binding on their Lordships, disposes of a defence which might otherwise have been open to the defendants, for it shows that the deed of gift, which was of ancestral property, was wholly void. The plaintiffs were, therefore, neither hampered by this deed nor affected by admissions based on it.

But for the reasons given earlier their Lordships are of opinion that they must humbly advise His Majesy that this appeal should be allowed, and that a decree should be made in favour of the appellant dismissing the suit. The first and second respondents, who were plaintiffs in the suit, will pay the costs here and in the Courts below.

Appeal from the decree of the Subordinate Judge, Fyzabad, dated the 16th May 1917, confirming the order of the Munsif, Fyzabad, dated the 31st January 1916.

Mr. Muhammad Wasim, for the Appellants.

Pandit Harkaran Nath Misra, for Respondents Nos. 1 and 3.

JUDGMENT.—The dispute in this case relates to certain plots of land situated in the village Gokul. It appears that Sheo Ratan, Sheopal and Beni Madho, representing three branches of the family of Bholai Dube, obtained a decree for birt rights in respect of 46 bighas and 14 biswas of land subject to the payment of an under-proprietary rent of Rs. 120 per year. One of the members of the family on behalf of which the under-proprietary decree was obtained was Jagroop. He died leaving a widow Musammat Sheokora. She was in possession of 5 bighas 5 biswas of land appertaining to the share of her husband, which, it is alleged, she sold to Raghubar, the predecessor-in-title of the plaintiffs, in 1287 Fasli. The allegation of the plaintiffs was that by virtue of that sale Raghubar and after him his sons had been in possession of the said land as under-proprietors but they have been incorrectly entered in the revenue papers as tenants. An attempt was made by them to get the entry in the revenue papers corrected but they were unsuccessful. The present suit was, therefore, filed by the plaintiffs, who are the descendants of Raghubar, for a declaration that they were the under-proprietors of the disputed plots.

The Courts below dismissed the claim. Their finding was that they had failed to establish the alleged purchase on which they based their title. Both the Courts below held that the plaintiffs had been in possession of the disputed plots. While the Court of first instance expressed no opinion as to the nature of their possession, the lower Appellate Court said that their possession could not be adverse because they were entered in one of the Jamabandis as holding the said land as tenants on behalf of Sheo Raj Dube, one of the contesting defendants. The Courts below, however, agreed in treating the suit as barred by time by reason of an application for the correction of the entries in the revenue papers having been disallowed more than six years prior to the suit.

The important question for consideration at first is whether the plaintiffs and their predecessor-in-interest have been holding the disputed land as under-proprietors or as tenants. If they held the said land as tenants, they are estopped from setting up under-propietary rights.

If they have been holding the same as under-proprietors and have continued in possession from the time of the alleged purchase in 1237 Fasli, any adverse order passed by the Revenue Court refusing to enter their names in the revenue papers as under proprietors would not destroy their under-proprietary rights so long as their possession and enjoyment of the same remained undisturbed. In Jevanand v. Beni Madho (1) and Allah Jilai v. Umrao Hussain (2) it has been held that where a plaintiff has got a right, every invasion of that right gives him a fresh cause of action so long as his title to the disputed property subsists. If the plaintiffs remained in adverse possession for more than 12 years, their title was perfected and could not be disturbed by any adverse order passed by the Revenue Court, provided their possession was not prejudicially affected thereby.

(1) 4 Ind. Cas. 159; 12 O. C. 320.
(2) 24 Ind. Cas. 535; 36 A. 492; 12 A. L. J. 810.

The lower Appellate Court relied on certain entries made in the Jamabandi for 1314 Fasli in support of its finding that the plaintiffs held the disputed land as tenants on behalf of Sheo Raj Dube, but a mere entry in the Jamabandi is not sufficient proof of the alleged tenancy. No payment of any rent by the plaintiffs to Sheo Raj Dube was established: on the other hand, the plaintiffs filed receipts dating as far back as 1311 Fasli, showing the payment of under-proprietary rents to the superior proprietors. In the Khetaunis and Khasras for 1301, 1306, 1308 and 1309 Fasli their predecessors, Raghubar and Ram Dat, the latter being one of the sons of the former, were recorded in succession as under-proprietors. It does not appear how the name of Ram Dat was subsequently removed from the under-proprietary register. His possession, however, continued as such and since his death the plaintiffs have remained in possession in the same capacity throughout.

The sale-deed relied on by the plaintiffs related to 5 bighas 5 biswas of land. It contained no specification of the numbers comprised in the said area. A slip of paper is attached to the sale-deed which gives these numbers; but the Courts below doubted whether the list given in the slip formed a part of the original sale-deed or not. The sale-deed was not registered. The subsequent possession of the plaintiffs and their predecessors-in-interest and the payment of under-proprietary rent by them to the superior proprietors afford some indication as to what was intended to be sold and establish their right as under-propietors from the date of their purchase in 1287 Fasli, or at any rate from 1301 Fasli when their predecessor Raghubar was entered as an under-proprietor in the revenue papers. Their under-proprietary title cannot be challenged after their possession has continued as such so long. The earlier Khasras and Khetaunis do not, however, make any mention of plot No. 1458/5 Khasra measuring 1 biswa and No. 1419 Khasra measuring 3 biswas. The plaintiffs do not claim to have purchased more than 4 biswas out of plot No. 1487 Khasra.

The appeal is, therefore, allowed and the claim of the plaintiffs decreed for a declaration of their under-proprietray title in respect of the disputed plots other than plot No. 1458/5 Khasra measuring 1 biswa, No. 1449 Khasra measuring 3 biswas, and such portion of plot No. 1487 Khasra as is outside of No. 1357/1 Khasra measuring 4 biswas. The plaintiffs will get their costs here and hitherto from the defendants, who will bear their own costs throughout.

Appeal allowed.

THE PUNJAB NATIONAL BANK, LTD., RAWALPINDI, THROUGH DESRAJ, MANAGER—PLAINTIFF AND BIR BAL AND OTHERS—DEFENDANTS—RESPONDENTS.

Evidence Act (I of 1872), s. 115—Estoppel—Sale of mortgaged property—Mortgagee informing vendee what sum is due on mortgage—Mortgagee, whether can claim larger amount.

Where in the case of a sale of mortgaged property, the mortgagee informs the intending vendee that a certain sum is due on the mortgage, he is estopped from claiming a larger amount subsequently. [p. 493, col. 1.]

First appeal from the decree of the Senior Subordinate Judge, Rawalpindi, dated the 23rd March 1915, decreeing the claim.

The Hon'ble Pandit Sheo Narain, for the Appellant.

Kanwar Dalip Singh, for the Plaintiff-Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—(April 9, 1919).—The dispute in the case out of which present appeal arises was as to the amount due to the Punjab National Bank, plaintiff, on the mortgages of certain property executed by Radha Kishen and Ram Chand, now represented by defendants Nos. 1 to 3, respondents. The property was sold by the mortgagors to the Trustees of the Khalsa Educational Committee on 26th February 1903, who in their turn transferred it to the Secretary, Chief Khalsa Dewan, Amritsar, defendant-appellant. Plaintiff claimed Rs. 5,376-3-6 and the Senior Subordinate Judge, Rawalpindi, having decreed the claim in full, the Secretary, Chief Khalsa Dewan, has applied to this Court for a reduction of the amount to the extent of Rs. 1,900.

There are several grounds of appeal, but all of them except those dealing with the question of estoppel were given up by Pandit Sheo Narain, Counsel for appellant.

Appellant's contention is that prior to the sale of 26th February 1908, Sardar Sewa Ram Singh, acting on behalf of the vendees, himself being one of them, went to the Punjab National Bank and on enquiry was told by the Manager, or by a clerk on his behalf, that the sum due to the Bank on the mortgages was Rs. 7,896-10-6 calculated up to 1st March 1908, that acting on this representation this sum was kept by the vendees for payment to the Bank, the balance of the purchase-money being paid to the vendors, and that the Bank cannot now turn round and say that the interest had been calculated wrongly and that really about Rs. 1,093 more was due on the date in question.

Sardar Sewa Ram Singh was the chief witness for the defendant-appellant. His evidence is given in the judgment. The lower Court does not say that it disbelieves his statement, but holds that plaintiff is not bound by any informal admissions that may have been made at the time when the memo. Exhibit D-4 was written.

We see absolutely no reason for not accepting Sardar Sewa Ram Singh's evidence. It is admitted by Mr. Dalip Singh, Counsel for respondent, that Sardar Sewa Ram Singh could not have found out the exact sum due to the Bank without making enquiries from the latter. Various payments had been made by the mortgagors and the lower Court is in error in thinking that the sum due could have been ascertained by a perusal of the deeds of mortgage. The sum which Sardar Sewa Ram Singh states was mentioned to him by the Bank officials is entered on the memo. D-4 and is the very sum which under the deed of sale was kept by the vendees for payment to the Bank.

It also is consistent with the sum calculated by the Bank to be due on 1st January 1908, about which the Bank's legal advisor sent the letter of demand Exhibit D-3, page 21 of the paper-book.

It is quite certain then that Sardar Sewa Ram Singh ascertained the sum due by himself going to the Bank, and his further statement that Ram Chand went with him must be accepted, as the Bank officials would not have told him what was due unless and until authorized to do so by one of the mortgagors.

We see no reason to disbelieve his statement that the Manager of the Bank told one of the clerks to give him the desired information. It is admitted before us that the amount of Rs. 7,896-10 6 was the amount due on 1st March 1908, calculating the interest with half yearly rests. The fact that the Bank was entitled to calculate it with monthly rests does not affect the question. The vendees were entitled to accept the representation of the responsible official of the Bank as to the amount due. They did accept and act upon it, and the Bank is, therefore, now estopped from saying that more than Rs. 7,896-10 6 was actually due on the date in question.

Counsel for appellant admits that plaintiff is entitled to charge interest after that date at the rate agreed upon with monthly rests.

Parties' Counsel will inform us after making up accounts what was the amount due on the date of institution of the suit, starting with the fact that Rs. 7,896-10-6 was due on 1st March 1908. For 22nd April.

JUDGMENT.—Pandit Sheo Narain has now submitted a calculation by which he shows Rs. 3,782-11-2 as due on the date of institution of the suit. Mr. Dalip Singh on behalf of the plaintiff respondent has examined this and says he is not prepared to dispute its correctness.

We, therefore, accept the appeal so far as to reduce the decree to one for the sum above mentioned. The result is that the appeal is accepted to the extent of Rs. 1,592-7-4. We direct that the plaintiff-respondent shall pay appellant's costs in this Court upon Rs. 1,600 and that the parties shall bear their own costs in the lower Court.

Appeal partly accepted.

Madras District Municipalities Act (IV of 1884), s 24—Drains in public streets, vesting of, in Municipality—Adverse possession, proof of, requisites of.

Drains on both sides of a public street into which water falling on the street flows, vest in the Municipality under section 24 of the Madras District Municipalities Act, even though the sites of the drains belong to private owners. [p. 494, col. 1.]

Unless the enjoyment by the Municipality of a drain as a drain is prevented openly as of right, there can be no adverse possession against the Municipality. [p. 494, col. 2.]

Second appeals against the decrees of the District Court, Tanjore, in Appeal Suits Nos. 256 to 263, 265 to 271, 273, 274 and 279 of 1917, preferred against the decrees of the Court of the District Munsif, Mayavaram, in Original Suits Nos. 80 to 86, 88, 90 to 94, 96, 98, 100, 101 and 95 of 1915.

Messrs T. V. Muthukrishna Aiyar and N. Muthuswami Aiyar, for the Appellants.—The sites of the drains belong to the appellants. They own shops on the streets. The Mayavaram Municipality never repaired the drains. On the other hand, the repairs were effected by the appellants who looked after them. The appellants, at any rate, acquired title by adverse enjoyment.

Mr. T. R. Venkatrama Sastriar, for the Respondents.—Under section 24 of the Madras District Municipalities Act the drains vest in the Municipality. It is immaterial that private individuals own the sites on which the drains stand. Since 1824 the Municipality owned the drains, their enjoyment consisting in the water in the street falling into and being carried by the drains. There is no proof that the appellants openly enjoyed and prevented the enjoyment by the Municipality. The mere doing repairs will not suffice.

JUDGMENT.

S. A. Nos. 1859 TO 1875 OF 1918.

SADASIVA AIYAR, J.—The plaintiffs are the appellants in these 17 second appeals, the common defendant being the Municipal Council of Mayavaram. The plaintiffs are the owners of the shops alongside the Tirumanjana Street, which is vested in the Mayavaram Municipality. There are drains on both sides of the street into which the rain water falling on the street flows and hence the drains are attached to the street in a real sense. Assuming that the sites of the drains belong to the owners of the shops, the question is whether these drains vest in the Municipality under section 24 of the District Municipalities Act. It is unnecessary for the purpose of these cases to consider whether, if a drain is wholly unconnected with the street, such as being carried on a low side wall above the level of the street (though the wall is just alongside the roadway) and being used by the owner of the wall for carrying off water along his own wall sites, such a drain also will vest in the Municipality as part of the street [see the definition in the Madras City Municipal Act, section 3 (27) (c), where it is made clear that the drain should be attached to the street in order to vest in the Municipality]. In the present cases the drains were clearly useful and intended for carrying off water falling in the street itself. The question we have to decide seems to be concluded by the decisions of this Court, of which it is only necessary to refer to Mothe Achayya Garu v. Municipal Council of Ellore (1), Basaweswaraswami v. The Bellary Municipal Council (2), Chairman, Municipal Council, Srirangam v. Subba Pandithar (3) and Corporation of Madras v. Mohan Lal Sowcar (4). The Mayavaram Municipality was established in 1866. The Thirumanjana Street itself is admitted to be a public street. The drains became, therefore, vested in the Municipality under section 24 at least in 1884 under the Act of 1884. The plaintiffs can acquire adverse title against the Municipality only if they did any acts, by which the Municipality were prevented from enjoying the drains as drains. The Municipality's possession and enjoyment consisted principally in the water of the street falling into and being carried off by the drains. Unless that was prevented openly as of right, there can be no adverse possession against the Municipality. The learned District Munsif himself says in paragraph 15 of his judgment that "title by adverse possession can be acquired against the Municipality even in respect of a portion of a street if the mode of occupation by the person in possession has been such as to exclude any enjoyment of it by the Municipality as a street." Substituting the word "drain" for "street", unless the enjoyment of the drain by the Municipality as a drain is prevented there could be no adverse possession. The mere fact that the Municipality did not repair the drains or that the plaintiffs have been repairing or looking after the drains cannot prevent the enjoyment by the Municipality of the drains as drains so long as they are carrying off the street rain water, and hence no adverse possession has been established.

The next question is whether, even if the drain space ceased to be vested in the Municipality as a drain, the plaintiffs could obtain an injunction against the removal of the encroachment over the drain space or whether they could only claim compensation. The Municipality's power to remove encroachments over what was once a drain is a question on which conflicting opinions were expressed in Mothe Achayya Garu v. Municipal Council of Ellore (1) and Corporation of Madras v. Mohan Lal Sowcar (4). That question need not be gone into in these cases, though I may be permitted to say that I adhere to the opinion expressed in Corporation of Madras v. Mohan Lal Sowcar (4), with the greatest respect to the contrary opinion expressed in Mothe Achayya Garu v. Municipal Council of Ellore (1).

In the result these second appeals are dismissed with costs. I would allow Rs. 340 as Vakils' fees for all the 17 cases at Rs. 20 a case.

Where one member of a joint Hindu family separates, the presumption of jointness as regards the remaining members is destroyed and an agreement amongst the remaining members of the family to remain united or to re-unite must be proved like any other fact. [p. 496, col. 1.]

Appeal from the decree of the Subordinate Judge, Bara Banki, dated the 31st May 1919, upholding that of the Munsif, Ram Sanehi Ghat, dated the 14th December 1918.

Mr. Haidar Husain, for the Appellant.

Mr. Rudra Datt Sinha, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This appeal arises out of a suit brought by the plaintiff to recover certain property in the possession of the defendants.

The parties belong to the same family and are admittedly descended from a common ancestor Dund Singh. Broadly put, the case for the plaintiff was that the property in suit was joint family property belonging to a branch of the family descended from Dund Singh; that Musammat Sukh Basi, who died in the year 1907, had unlawfully made a mortgage in favour of the predecessors-in-title of the present defendants; that she had no authority to dispose of the property in this way inasmuch as her husband Hewanchal Singh was a member of a joint family with the predecessors-in title of the plaintiff, and that consequently the plaintiff was entitled to have possession as against the defendants.

The case for the defendants was that Hewanchal Singh, the husband of Musammat Sukh Basi, had a separate estate from his brothers, that his widow was entitled to inherit, that Sant Bakhsh's father Lachman Singh was the nearest reversioner at the time of the death of Musammat Sukh Basi and that the plaintiff, therefore, had no title to the property in any way.

The Courts below have decided that the suit must fail on the ground that the plaintiff had failed to prove that this property was joint family property.

In appeal here the case has been argued practically on one ground, and that is this. It is said that the Courts below were guilty of an error of law in raising a presumption in favour of the defendants to the effect that the members of the family of Dund Singh had separated.

In order to understand the force of this plea it is necessary to say that Dund Singh died leaving three sons Zabar Singh, Sardar Singh and Mardan Singh. The defendant Sant Bakhsh is descended from Zabar Singh. The plaintiff Mahabir Singh is a descendant of Mardan Singh and Hewanchal Singh, the husband of Musammat Sukh Basi, was the son of Sardar Singh.

It was admitted, on both sides that Zabar Singh, one of the three sons of Dund Singh, had separated from the rest of the family. In view of this admission both the Courts below held that it ought to be assumed that the separation of Zabar Singh involved a disruption of the joint family and that consequently there was a presumption that the two other brothers Sardar Singh and Mardan Singh had become separate; and relying upon this presumption, both the Courts below held that it was for the plaintiff to prove that Sardar Singh and Mardan Singh had re-united after the separation of Zabar Singh.

The learned Counsel for the appellant argues that the case has been wrongly dealt with on this footing and that there is no authority in law for the position taken up by the Courts below. In this connection reference was made to the judgment of their Lordships of the Privy Council reported as Bolabux v. Rukhmabai (1). At page 736 of the report their Lordships, after dealing with the facts of the case, remark:—

"It appears to their Lordships that there is no presumption when one co-parcener separates from the other that the latters remain united. In many cases it may be necessary, in order to ascertain the share of the outgoing member, to fix the shares which the other co-parceners are or would be entitled to, and in this sense the separation of one is said to be a virtual separation of all and their Lordships think that an agreement amongst the remaining members of a joint family to remain united or to re unite must be proved like any other fact."

According to the learned Counsel for the appellant, this pronouncement of their Lordships means that in cases where separation of one member of the joint family is proved, the only result is the withdrawal of the presumption in favour of jointness. It is argued that the judgment does not mean that separation by one member gives rise to a presumption that the other members of the family have also separated. I should not be disposed to accept this argument, although the learned Counsel has referred to two authorities which do appear to support it, namely, Babaji Akoba Kasar v. Dattu Laxman Kasar (2) and Ranganatha Rao v. Narayanasami Naicker (3).

It is not, however, necessary for me to deal with this matter. Assuming, without deciding, that the view taken by the learned Counsel is correct, it remained for the plaintiff to prove by positive evidence that the family, consisting of the two brothers Sardar Singh and Mardan Singh and their descendants, was a joint Hindu family and that the property in suit was joint family property.

It is not correct to say that the Courts below have dealt with this matter merely on the basis of a presumption. The Munsif in his judgment has made an exhaustive analysis of the evidence produced by the plaintiff for the purpose of showing that the family was joint. I have perused the evidence myself and am satisfied that the Munsif was perfectly right in holding that the plaintiff's evidence fell far short of showing that Sardar Singh and Mardan Singh and their descendants lived as members of a joint family. The lower Appellate Court did not deal with the evidence in detail. The Subordinate Judge says in his judgment that on the evidence he agrees with the opinion arrived at by the Court of first instance. It would perhaps have been more correct for the Subordinate Judge to have analysed the evidence in his judgment and to have expressed his own independent opinion. But after perusal of the evidence myself I think the Munsif's view was perfectly correct. The plaintiff produced some eight witnesses, one or two of whom knew nothing about the facts at all. A few others were obliged to admit that their acquaintance with this family was of a most casual character; and one witness in particular, namely, the plaintiff's witness No. 5, gave evidence which was distinctly against the plaintiff's case. It was not sufficient for the plaintiff to show that his family had been entertaining Musammat Sukh Basi since the time that her husband died. Her living with members of the family would not, as the Courts below observe, be proof that the family was joint. There was, of course, certain documentary evidence before the Courts, which was relied on principally for the purpose of showing that Musammat Sukh Basi's name was never entered in the village papers. That is certainly the case, but it is by no means conclusive proof that the property was joint family property, and as the Court of first instance observes, although the lady's name was not in the papers, she must have been in possession, for under the mortgages which she executed she delivered possession of the property. Moreover, it was stated by one of the plaintiff's own witnesses that Musammat Sukh Basi on several occasions had received a share of the profits. If that statement is true, it cannot be the fact that Musammat Sukh Basi was living with the plaintiff's family as the widow of the deceased member of a joint family.

This was the only point which was argued in appeal and I think it must be decided against the plaintiff-appellant. The decision of the Court below appears to me to be correct. The appeal fails and is dismissed with costs.

Madras Estates Land Act (I of 1908), s. 12—'Every occupancy ryot', meaning of—Trees on holding—Right of ryots admitted subsequent to enactment to cut down trees.

The words 'every occupancy ryot' in section 12 of the Madras Estates Land Act are not restricted to ryots in occupation at the date of the passing of the Act but include also ryots who may be admitted subsequently. The latter are entitled to enjoy the trees according to custom. [p. 498, col. 1.]

Second appeal against the decree of the District Court, Salem, in Appeal Suit No. 50 of 1917, preferred against the decree of the Court of the District Munsif, Dharmapuri, in Original Suit No. 65 of 1915.

FACTS.—A landlord let a fresh tenant into his land in 1913. The question was whether the landlord was entitled to cut and remove the trees already on the land and not planted by the new tenant.

Mr. T. V. Muthukrishna Aiyar, for the Appellant.—Section 12 of the Madras Estates Land Act (Madras Act I of 1908) lays down the law. The landlord has no right to the trees at all.

Mr. T. R. Venkatrama Sastri, for the Respondents.—Section 12 has no application, for it provides only as regards tenants on the land at the time the Act was passed in respect of the trees before or after the Act. "Now in his holding" are the words. The contract to the contrary must be of a date not later than that of the Act. The section is based on I. L. R. 26 Madras.

Supposing that the landlord plants trees between 1908 and 1913, those trees are not affected by the Act.

[WALLIS, C. J.—They are. If the landlord wanted them separate, he ought to have kept the land for himself and not granted the patta to another.]

The suit land is private homefarm land let for cultivation. The trees are the subject of a separate patta and they have been reserved. By unduly stretching the section, it will come to this that no landlord can reserve anything when granting a land for cultivation.

WALLIS, C. J.—Do you ask us to say that the section is inoperative as regards ryots who are brought on the land after the Act?]

No. Suppose a landlord contracts that within a short time after the grant to the ryot he will cut and remove the trees, is it to be held that section 12 will stand in his way even though he could cut and remove them on the date of the grant?

[WALLIS, C. J.—It may possibly be that the landlord has some liberty of disposal in such a special case.]

Then, it is competent to the landlord to let the land and reserve the trees; and it is so in the present case. 'Holding' means land comprised in a patta.

[AYLING, J.—I don't think that such a separation is contemplated by the Act. So far as I know, the Government took steps to abolish the system of dual pattas in Tinnevelly at the time the Act was passed.]

The Act does not expressly put an end to the prevailing system of dual letting.

[WALLIS, C. J.—So far as we can see, the Act does not cover only those trees as were planted by the landlord. Trees of natural growth are included in the Act.]

[AYLING, J.—Were any trees planted by the landlord after 1908?]

None.

[AYLING, J.—Then the 1st clause of section 12 governs the case. 'Now in the holding' do not refer to any tenant.]

The words in the patta are "The patta Palmyra trees have been reserved." The word 'patta' dose not refer to the land forming the subject of the patta but to the trees which form the subject of a separate patta. Otherwise the word patta would have been unnecessary and the trees were held under a separate patta before 1908.

[WALLIS, C. J.—Supposing there was a custom, won't the custom bind?]

Mr. T. V. Muthukrishna Aiyar.—The custom has been found against. The mere letting separately before does not in law amount to a custom. The letting of trees separately from the land is repugnant to the whole scheme of the Act. See section 77, which authorises a distraint of the trees on the land.

JUDGMENT.—This case raises a question under section 12 of the Madras Estates Land Act, which occurs in Chapter II of the Act which is headed "General Rights," the general effect of which is to put the rights of landholders and ryots, whether admitted before or after the passing of the Act, on a statutory basis. Section 12, which deals with the ryot's rights as regards the trees on his holding, makes an exception from this principle in the cases of trees in existence at the date of the passing of the Act, as to which the ryot's rights are made "subject to any rights which by custom or by contract in writing executed by the ryot before the passing of this Act are reserved to the landholder," while as regards trees which after the passing of the Act are planted by the ryot or naturally grow upon the holding, the ryot's rights are absolute and not to be affected by custom or contract to the contrary. As regards trees in existence at the passing of the Act, the section says that "Every occupancy ryot shall have the right to use, enjoy and cut down all trees now in his holding." It is argued by Mr Venkatarama Sastri that every occupancy ryot here means every occupancy ryot at the date of the passing of the Act and does not extend to ryots admitted subsequently, because the section speaks of trees "now in his holding," and ryots admitted subsequently had no holding at that date. This contention is entirely opposed not only to the policy of the Act but also to the words "every occupancy ryot" in the section itself, and would lead to the result that, at any rate as regards trees in existence at the passing of the Act, ryots subsequently admitted would be altogether outside the scope of the section. The use of the word "holding," which is defined in section 3 as "a parcel or parcels of land held under a single patta or engagement in a single village" does not, in my opinion, require us to hold that the land must have been held by the ryot claiming under the section at the time or the passing of the Act, but means in this connection land which either was a holding at that time or subsequently became one. It might have been more accurate to say "trees which now at the passing of the Act are growing on land which now forms part of a holding or may subsequently have become part of one," but the meaning is, in my opinion, clear. It is said in the present case that the trees were in existence at the passing of the Act. Contract is, therefore, excluded, as the ryots were admitted subsequently. The term in the patta "The patta Palmyra trees are reserved" may, however, be enforceable as in accordance with custom as regards trees in existence at the passing of the Act.

The District Judge has not considered whether any such custom is established, and we, therefore, set aside his decree and remand the appeal to him for disposal according to law. Costs to abide.

Held, that his legal representatives were not bound by the decree and that the appeal must be re-heard [p. 499, col. ..]

Appeal from the decree of the Subordinate Judge, Gonda, dated the 30th January 1918, modifying the decree of the Probationary Munsif, Gonda, dated the 8th August 1917.

Syed Ali Mohammad, for Respondents Nos. 1 to 8.

JUDGMENT.—I am very reluctantly obliged to allow this appeal and to send back the appeal for re-hearing in the Court below on a technical preliminary ground. It appears from an affidavit filed by the appellants and is not disputed that the original sole plaintiff, who is now represented by the appellants in this Court, died on the morning of the day on which the appeal was heard in the lower Appellate Court and before the hearing took place. No blame attaches to the present respondents in the matter, as they could not possibly be aware of the plaintiff's death, nor probably was the plaintiff's own Counsel aware of it. At the same time it seems to me impossible to hold that the appellants can be bound by a decree passed in an appeal in which they were not represented, when their predecessor-in-interest was already dead when the hearing took place. The case is distinguishable from Vellayan Chetty v. Jothi Mahalinga Aiyar (1), which otherwise I should have been glad to follow, inasmuch as in that case the party who raised the technical objection had been fully represented at the hearing in the Court below. It was the opposite party who had died. Here the party raising the objection is the same party which was not represented. This is no doubt a highly technical point and it was not brought forward by the appellants' Counsel until he had fully argued the appeal on the merits. Under the circumstances while sending back the case under Order XLI, rule 23, for re-hearing by the Court below I direct that whatever be the result, the appellants shall not be entitled to any costs of the hearing of this appeal or of the original hearing in the Court below. Should the respondents be successful costs may follow the event.

The learned Subordinate Judge is requested to fix an early date for the re-hearing.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), s 66, applicability of, to successors-in-title of certified purchaser—Limitation Act (IX of 1908), s 28, effect of—Adverse possession, whether confers title.

Section 66 of the Civil Procedure Code applies to the successors-in-title of a certified purchaser. [p. 499, col. 2.]

Inasmuch as under section 28 of the Limitation Act it is not merely the right to sue that is extinguished but the right to the property itself, a person who has been in adverse possession for a period of more than twelve years cannot be considered as a trespasser. [p. 500, col. 1.]

Appeal against the decree of the District Judge, Nagpur, in Civil Appeal No. 165 of 1917, decided on 1st December 1917.

Mr. M. R. Indurkar, for the Appellant.

Mr. M. D. Khandekar, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The plaintiff's case was that his father had purchased the field in suit at an auction sale in the name of his agent Ambadas and he and his father had since been in possession adversely for 24 years. The defendant has got the holding sold in execution of a decree against Ambadas and has purchased it. He sued for a declaration that the defendant had no right as auction-purchaser to take possession of the field from him. The defendant pleaded that the suit was barred under section 66 of the Civil Procedure Code. The plaintiff urged that section 66 did not apply, as the suit was not against the certified purchaser himself and that it was one merely for a declaration. The learned District Judge has in appeal rejected the plaintiff's contentions and has held that the suit is barred under section 66.

As regards the plaintiff's contention that the suit is maintainable as the defendant is not the certified purchaser himself, the difference in the wording of section 66 of the new Code and the corresponding section 317 of the old Code seems to show that section 66 applies to the successors-in-title to the certified purchaser. Even section 317 of the old Code was held to apply to persons who stood in the shoes of the certified purchaser: see Hari Govind Joshi v. Ramchandra Narayan Gole (1) and Manji Karimbhai v. Hoorbai (2).

As regards the second point reliance is placed upon Sasti Churn Nundi v. Aunopurna (3), but in that case the suit was treated as one based upon existing possession which in itself gave a good title against all the world. The view in Bishan Dial v. Ghazi-ud din (4), relied on by the District Judge, seems to be the correct one.

Apart from his title as the original owner for whom Ambadas was the benamidar, the plaintiff relied on the fact of his possession for over 12 years adversely to Ambadas. The District Judge on this point writes as follows:—

"It is next urged that the plaintiff need not rely on his title as beneficiary purchaser since possession for 24 years has rendered his position unassailable. But it seems obvious that a declaratory decree cannot and should not be granted in favour of a trespasser on the ground that the defendant has lost his right to sue through lapse of time."

If the plaintiff and his father have been in adverse possession since the purchase in the name of Ambadas, it is difficult to see how the plaintiff can at the date of the suit be considered to be a trespasser, that is, one who unlawfully enters upon the land of another. Under section 28 of the Limitation Act it is not merely the right to sue that is extinguished but the right to the property itself. If Ambadas' right to the property is extinguished, the plaintiff cannot be a trespasser. It is, therefore, necessary to decide the question of plaintiff's adverse possession and his title acquired thereby. The case is remanded to the lower Appellate Court for a fresh decision with advertence to the above remarks. No order is made for refund of Court-fees. Costs throughout will follow the result.

Held, that the relationship of landlord and tenant existed between the parties. [p. 501, col. 2.]

Appeal against the decree of the Officiating Subordinate Judge, 1st Court, Faridpur, dated the 24th of April 1919, affirming the decree of the Munsif, 1st Court at Chikandi, dated the 31st of January 1918.

FACTS appear from the judgment.

Babu Dwarka Nath Chakrabarty (with him Babu Kali Kinkar Chakrabarty), for the Respondents, took a preliminary objection that the appeal was barred under section 153 of the Bengal Tenancy Act.

Babu Hira Lal Sanyal (with him Babu Ramendra Mohan Majumdar), for the Appellant.—I come within the exception to section 153 of the Bengal Tenancy Act, inasmuch as the lower Court has decided a question of title as between parties having conflicting claims thereto. My contention is that having purchased the land in suit from the proprietors of the estate I became a proprietor in respect of the land so purchased. The amount stated in the kobala as payable by me as Sadar Jama is only the share of the Government revenue payable by me. The fact that I was paying the amount through the proprietors did not change my status and convert me into a tenant of the proprietors.

Babu Dwarka Nath Chakrabarty, for the Respondents.—The conduct of the defendants for something like more than 50 years conclusively shows that the sum payable by the defendants is payable as rent to the proprietors. A perusal of the kobala also will convince your Lordship that the amount payable by the defendants is payable as rent. It is also well known that payment of rent even by a proprietor to another person for a period of 50 years will convert the proprietor to a tenant of the person to whom the rent is paid.

Babu Hira Lal Sanyal briefly replied.

JUDGMENT.—This appeal arises out of a rent suit. A preliminary objection is taken on behalf of the plaintiffs that the appeal is barredby section 153, Bengal Tenancy Act. I think that this contention is right; but I cannot state my reasons for so thinking without mentioning the facts necessary for the point raised by the appellant. So I do not rest my decision only upon section 153. The facts are as follows:—There is an estate No. 3197 of the Backergunge Collectorate. The proprietors thereof sold a piece of land measuring 3 Kanis and odd comprised in the estate to the predecessor of the defendant in March 1857. Some years later they granted a putni of the estate to the plaintiffs' predecessors. By the kobala in favour of the defendant's predecessor it was agreed that the defendant should pay Rs. 3 and odd annually as Sadar Jama to the proprietor; and it appears that the defendant paid this sum annually to the proprietor and afterwards to the putnidar. It is the putnidar who now sues to recover that sum as rent, and the defendant's contention is that he is really the proprietor of the land and the money which he pays to the plaintiffs is not rent but his share of the Government revenue.

The learned Subordinate Judge held that the relationship of landlord and tenant existed between the plaintiffs and the defendant. He examined the kobala which is Exhibit A, and he gave his reasons for the view. He pointed out that the Sadar Jama which the defendant's predecessor was directed to pay was not proportionate to the area of the land bought. It was evidently fixed as Re. 1 per Kani. Secondly, he pointed out that the parties had behaved for something like 50 years or more as though the sum annually payable by the defendant was payable as rent of the putnidar. Next, he pointed out that twice over when the Record of Rights was prepared the defendant has been shown as tenant under the putnidar. The learned Vakil who appears for the plaintiffs in this Court has further pointed out that the kobala ends with a sentence which is more consistent with a lease than with a conveyance. It runs as follows: 'You shall enjoy and possess.....by getting your name recorded in the Huzur Malik on payment of Sadar rent." This is a sentence which seems out of place in a deed of conveyance. It appears to me that the learned Subordinate Judge was right in taking the view that he did and, therefore, on the merits I hold that the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

The facts that a document is more than 30 years old and is registered and that the genuineness of the signature of its executant on it is admitted, may go to raise a presumption as to its genuineness, but such a presumption does not exclude the right of the person against whom the document is set up to rebut that presumption by showing that it was not properly attested and was, therefore, inoperative. [p. 502, col. 1.]

Appeal from the decree of the Subordinate Judge, Lucknow, Tahsil Mohanlalganj, dated the 20th May 1916.

SIRDAR SINGH v. CHRISTIAN.

The Hon'ble Syed Wazir Hasan and Messrs. J. N. Chak, Abid Husain and Al Mohammad, for the Appellants.

Messrs. W. Wallach and L. M. Bannerji, Rai Nagendro Nath Ghoshal Bahadur and the Hon'ble Dr. Tej Bahadur Sapru, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—One of the points for consideration in this appeal is whether the agreement, executed by Raja Hanwant Singh on the 30th October 1871 (Exhibit A 98), was properly attested in the manner required by law. In the judgment of the Court below no reference is made to that agreement, and no objection was consequently taken by the plaintiffs appellants in the grounds of appeal to the admission of that document in evidence.

The agreement bears the signature of Hanwant Singh and purports to have been written by a scribe named Nawal Kishore and attested by four witnesses, none of whom has been examined. Two witnesses, Mohammad Mustafa Khan (D. W. No. 3) and Bande Ali (D. W. No. 11), were examined to prove the signatures of some of the attesting witnesses, but it was not shown whether all the attesting witnesses were dead. On the 17th November 1914 the plaintiffs admitted the genuineness of the signature of Hanwant Singh on the said document. The Court below, reading that admission with the evidence adduced, treated the agreement as duly proved.

The learned Counsel for the plaintiffs-appellants, however, rightly contends that the mere proof or admission of the genuineness of the signature of the executant of a document would not dispense with the proof of its proper attestation, if the document is one required by law to be attested before it can effectuate a transfer.

The agreement was executed over thirty-six years ago and in view of the facts that the genuineness of the signature of Hanwant Singh thereon is admitted by the plaintiffs-appellants and that the agreement is registered, a presumption can be made as to its genuineness But such a presumption would not exclude the right of the plaintiffs-appellants to rebut it by showing that it was not properly attested and was, therefore, inoperative.

As the agreement was not expressly put in issue and is material for the purposes of determining the question of title arising out of the compromise, which it purports to carry out, the effect of the compromise being the subject-matter of contention in this suit, we consider it desirable that the following issues should be remitted to the Court below for trial:—

1. Whether the agreement executed by Raja Hanwant Singh on the 30th October 1871 (Exhibit A 98) was properly attested in the manner required by law?

2. Whether any of the attesting witnesses are alive and if not, were the attestations borne by the document made by the persons whose names they bear?

The parties will be allowed to produce additional evidence relevant to the above issues. Two months and fifteen days' time will be allowed for the return of the findings and ten days from the date of the findings will be allowed to the parties for filing objections.

Issues remitted.

An order dismissing a memorandum of appeal on the ground that it is insufficiently stamped, is open to review under Order XLVII of the Civil Procedure Code and no application for restoration of the appeal can in such a case be made under rule 9 of Order XLI of the Code The proper procedure is by way of application for review bearing Court-fees prescribed for such applications. [p. 503, col. 1.]

Application against a decision of the 2nd Subordinate Judge, Monghyr.

Mr. Chander Shekhar Banerji, for the Petitioners.

MANSAB ALI v. SAKHAWAT HASAIN.

JUDGMENT.—This is an application which arises out of the dismissal of an appeal on the 24th of April 1918 by a Division Bench of this Court.

It appears that a suit was lodged by the plaintiffs, who are 211 in number, for a declaration that a decree, which was under execution against them, should be set aside on the ground of fraud. The Subordinate Judge before whom the plaint was lodged came to the conclusion that an ad valorem Court-fee should be paid and that the contention of the plaintiffs, that a Court-fee of Rs. 10 was sufficient, could not be accepted. The plaintiffs declined to pay the ad valorem Court-fee and the suit was dismissed, and against that decree of dismissal an appeal was filed in this Court on the 13th of February 1918.

On the 15th March 1918 the learned Counsel for the appellants, on being told that a Court-fee of Rs. 10 was not sufficient for the memorandum of appeal, asked for time to pay the deficit Court-fee, which was allowed till the 4th April 1918. On the 8th April further time was given till the 22nd. On the 24th April the deficit was not paid and no one appeared on behalf of the appellants. The appeal was accordingly dismissed.

The present application was made on the 4th June 1918 for the restoration of the case, and it is prayed that the deficit ad valorem Court-fee payable upon the memorandum of appeal may be accepted and that the appeal may be allowed to proceed.

Now it is quite clear that Order XLI of the Civil Procedure Code, which relates to appeals after admission, does not apply to this case and that no application for restoration can be made under rule 19 of that Order. The order of this Court of the 24th April 1918 was an order rejecting the memorandum of appeal on the ground that it was insufficiently stamped, which was open to review under Order XLVII of the Civil Procedure Code. The present application is not an application for review and is not adequately stamped for that purpose and, therefore, there is this legal defect in the way of the applicants.

But apart from that the applicants must fail on the merits. They from the institution of the suit were aware that the amount of the Court-fee payable was in dispute and indeed the only ground upon which the appeal was filed in this Court was on that of Court-fees. So they were fully alive to the necessity of paying the ad valorem Court-fee if the Court should demand it. They were aware of the Court's demand on the 15th March and they took time till the 4th April and again till the 24th April. The excuse now made for the non-appearance of either Counsel or the applicants on the 24th April is that although Counsel had communicated with the applicants at the address given by them, they were in fact in a different village because cholera had broken out in their village. If that was so, then it is difficult to understand why the applicants did not take the precaution of leaving their address with their legal advisers when removing to the other village. Having regard to the fact that they knew that there was a substantial dispute as to the Court fee and that the suit had already been dismissed in one Court for non-payment of that Court-fee, it was clearly necessary on their part to be diligent in the matter in the High Court. In my opinion the cause shown for their absence on the 24th April is not sufficient and, therefore, the application must fail on the merits also.

In this view of the case the application will be rejected.

Application rejected.

the full mortgage money. A mortgagor cannot, therefore, sue the mortgagee for mesne profits for the period prior to the passing of a final decree in his favour in the redemption suit filed by him.

Appeal from the decree of the First Subordinate Judge, Bahraich, dated the 7th April 1919, confirming the decree of the Munsif, Qaisarganj, dated the 30th August 1918.

Syed Ali Mohammad, for the Appellant.

Mr. Mohammad Ayub, for Respondents Nos. 1and 2.

JUDGMENT.—In my opinion this appeal cannot succeed. The order of the lower Appellate Courts appears to me to be perfectly correct. The simple facts are that on the 31st of March 1914 the plaintiff-appellant got a preliminary decree for redemption. The amount which he was directed to pay by that decree was Rs. 1,046 0-4. There was an appeal to the District Judge and the amount payable for redemption was reduced to Rs. 952-8-0. The date of this order in appeal was the 26th of February 1915. The plaintiff deposited this amount in Court on the 26th of April 1915 and the mortgagees withdrew the money. There was a second civil appeal to this Court, and this Court directed that a further sum was due to the mortgagees in respect of the payment of certain Government revenue. An order was accordingly sent to the Court of first instance to determine what this amount was and to prepare a final decree. Accordingly an inquiry was held in the Court of first instance and on the 5th of September 1917 the Munsif held that the sum so payable amounted to Rs. 198-7-6. This additional sum was paid into Court by the plaintiff; thereupon the final decree in the redemption suit was drawn up on the 15th of September 1917, and the plaintiff duly got possession of the property.

In this suit an attempt has been made to sue the mortgagees for mesne profits for the period between the 26th of April 1915 the date on which the plaintiff deposited the sum which was afterwards found to be inadequate, and the date upon which he obtained possession. The Courts below have dismissed the suit, on the ground that no mesne profits can be sought unless it can be shown that the mortgagees wrongfully withheld possession for the period in dispute. There can be no question as to this, for a mortgagee is not obliged to vacate possession until he has received the full mortgage money. In this case the full mortgage money was the sum awarded by the lower Appellate Court, namely Rs. 952 8-0 plus the sum which was afterwards found payable on account of payments made for Government revenue, namely, Rs. 198-7-6. This sum was paid into Court on the 14th or 15th of September 1917, and the final decree was at once prepared. If there was any accounting to be done between the parties in respect of this mortgage transaction, whether on account of receipt of profits in lieu of interest or on any other account arising out of the mortgage relation between the parties, that ought to have been done before the final decree was passed. The plaintiff cannot now after redemption bring a suit for mesne profits for the period prior to the date of the final decree in the redemption suit. This was the view taken by the lower Court and is, in my opinion, a correct view. I dismiss the appeal with costs to the answering respondents.

Appeal dismissed.

SAKLI v. RAM KISUN DAS.

Appeal from a decision of the Subordinate Judge, Chapra.

Mr. A. P. Upadhya, for the Appellant.

Mr. Sambhu Saran, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The suit out of which this appeal arises was instituted for the recovery of rent of certain holdings appertaining to a Muth in possession of the defendant.

The plaintiff's case is that the Muth was in possession of a Mahanth named Jairam Das, who executed a Will whereby he appointed one Mangni Lal Sahu as executor. On the death of Jairam an application for Probate was made by Mangni Lal before the District Judge of Saran. The plaintiff Ram Kishen Das entered caveat. On the 26th of April 1919, however, a compromise was entered into and on the 28th of July 1919 Probate was granted to Mangni Lal Sahu and it appears that the terms of the compromise were annexed to the grant. The suit was resisted by the defendant on the ground that the plaintiff had no right to recover the rent, and she also pleaded payment. The first Court held that the plea of payment was false and, therefore, decreed the suit. On appeal by the defendant the Judge agreed with the trial Court on the question of payment of rent but remanded the suit for determination whether there was relationship of landlord and tenant between the parties. After remand the defendant put in a petition before the trial Court contending that inasmuch as Probate had been granted to Mangni Lal Sahu, the plaintiff could not maintain the suit. The Munsif held that the suit was not maintainable and dismissed it. There was an appeal to the Subordinate Judge and the Appellate Court reversed the decision of the trial Court. Hence this second appeal.

The learned Vakil appearing on behalf of the appellant has urged that under section 82 of the Probate and Administration Act and Order XXXI, rule 1, Civil Procedure Code, none but the executor is competent to institute the suit. In my opinion this contention is sound. Section 82 of the Probate and Administration Act runs as follows:—"After any grant of Probate or Letters of Administration, no other than the person to whom the same shall have been granted shall have power to sue or prosecute any suit or otherwise act as representative of the deceased, throughout the province in which the same may have been granted, until such Probate or Letters of Administration shall have been recalled or revoked."

It is admitted that the Probate granted to Mangni Lal Sahu has not been recalled or revoked. But it is contended on behalf of the respondent that the grant must be read together with the terms of the compromise which were annexed to the grant and as the terms of the compromise were made a part of the Probate and the respondent had under the terms of the compromise power to realise rent, the suit was rightly instituted by the plaintiff.

First of all, as was observed by Starling, J., in Dawubai Haji Khan Habib Khan, In the matter of the Will of (1) "in a testamentary proceeding the subject-matter of the suit is the property of which the executor is the legal owner under the Will of the testator and of which the Probate by declaring him to be executor recognises him before the Court as legal owner." Therefore, the grant of Probate established the Will from the death of the testator and conferred the title upon the executor who had obtained Probate, as legal owner. Courts will not recognise any compromise of an action with the facts of which it is entirely unacquainted and, therefore, will not allow the terms of compromise arranged between the parties before the trial to be made an order of the Court, inasmuch as it has no power to enforce compliance with the terms. It was laid down by Woodroffe, J., in the case of Kamal Kumari Devi v Narendra Nath Mukherji (2) that the terms, when they are beyond the scope of the suit, are not the subject-matter of the decree, and if not carried out, must be enforced by a separate suit. Therefore, I cannot go beyond the grant itself and when I find that the grant is in favour of Mangni Lal Sahu, I must hold that he, and he alone, can under section 82 of the Probate and Administration Act sue or prosecute any suit with respect to matters arising out of the estate of the deceased. I will not be justified in looking to the terms of the compromise at all.

(1) 18 B. 237.

(2) 1 Ind. Cas. 573; 9 C. L. J. 19.

BUDHAI SINGH v. KARAN SINGH.

The learned Vakil appearing on behalf of the respondent, however, argues that the terms of the compromise are part of the grant and under the terms the parties agreed that all that the executors had practically to do in the administration of the estate should be performed by the respondent. In fact he went to the length of saying that Mangni Lal was under the terms a nominal executor and the real executor was the respondent. It has, however, been held that the Court will not recognise a compromise, one of the terms of which is that some of the executors named in the Will should renounce. [See Hargreaves v. Wood (3).]

Apart from that, if one of the terms of the compromise were that, the executor will not have the right to sue, but that such right would be vested in the respondent, that would be a clear violation of the statutory right given to the executor and expressly forbidden to be exercised by any one else, under section 82, Probate and Administration Act.

The learned Vakil on behalf of the respondent, appreciating this difficulty in his way, contended that section 82 has no application where the suit relates to the recovery of rent after the death of the deceased. I do not find the slightest foundation for such a contention. No authority has been placed before me to show that there is any limitation on the powers of the executor to institute suits.

The section deals generally with actions relating to debts which accrued before or after the death of the testator. A reference to sections 88 and 89 only confirms me in the interpretation that I have put on section 82.

Even if the terms of the compromise were looked into, one is struck by the absence of any term authorizing the plaintiff to institute suits. It is, however, suggested that the right to "manage the property" includes the right to institute suits for realization of rent. In my opinion this contention cannot be accepted. It is a well-known rule of interpretation that terms of compromise like powers of attorney must be strictly pursued and construed as giving only such authority as they confer expressly or by necessary implication. "A power granted to the donee to manage certain property, followed by general words giving him full power to do all lawful acts relating to the donor's business and affairs, of what nature or kind soever does not necessarily include authority to indorse bills, for the general words are construed as having reference to managing the donor's property, for which indorsing bills may not be incidental or necessary." See Halsbury's Laws of England, Volume 1, page 162. Much less then can the power to manage the property confer the right to sue for rent.

In the end the learned Vakil appearing on behalf of the respondent contended that the suit ought not to have been dismissed but that Mangni ought to have been made a plaintiff under Order I, rule 10, Civil Procedure Code. No such prayer was ever made in the lower Courts and I think it is too late in the day to make that prayer in this Court.

Under these circumstances the appeal should be allowed and I, therefore, vacate the judgment and decree of the Subordinate Judge, dated the 9th February 1918, and restore the judgment and decree of the Munsif and dismiss the suit of the plaintiff with costs in all Courts.

Appeal allowed.

Mr. G. H. Thomas, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—Certain Umrai Singh owned landed property, which on his death passed into the possession of his widow Musammat Gulab Kuar When she died, the property would ordinarily have gone either to the sons of Mathura Singh or the sons of Chandan Singh, the brothers of Umrai Singh, for Umrai Singh was apparently separate from his two brothers, as is shown by the fact that his widow was in possession of his property. Mathura Singh had three sons, Ganga Singh, Ram Singh, and Chhotkai Singh, and on the death of Gulab Kuar the property passed into the possession of Budhai Singh, the son of Ram Singh. Subsequently Mooley Singh and Munga Singh, the sons of Chandan Singh, raised an objection and the question of the devolution of the property was referred to the arbitration of Baldeo Singh, Rustam Singh, Gopal and Nand Lal. These arbitrators arrived at the following arrangement:—

They said that the property should remain in possession of Budhai Singh, provided that he paid Rs. 60 to Mooley Singh and Munga Singh and that he abandoned all his rights in the property of the joint family to which his father, Ganga Singh, and Chhotkai Singh belonged. Chhotkai Singh was not present at the arbitration. In subsequent mutation proceedings he made no objection and the property has since then remained in the possession of Budhai Singh, who has transferred it by mortgage. Subsequently Baldeo Singh in the name of two minor sons and Rustam Singh (two of the arbitrators who made the award) have purchased the claims of Chhotkai Singh to the property and sued for its possession. The learned Munsif dismissed the suit but the learned Subordinate Judge decreed it. Chhotkai Singh has stated in his written statement that he is bound by the family arrangement. Leaving this point on one side, this suit must fail. Baldeo Singh and Rustam Singh are clearly estopped in the matter. It is on their own award that Chhotkai Singh received a right to a portion of Budhai Singh's share in the joint property and relinquished, in consequence, his right to the property of Umrai Singh. Having made that arrangement they cannot dispute it, and the circumstance that Baldeo Singh has chosen to put the names of his minor sons into the sale-deed instead of his own does not affect the case. I agree with the learned Munsif that Baldeo Singh and Rustam Singh have acted most dishonestly in the matter. I do not accept the conclusion of the learned Subordinate Judge who has completely overlooked the true nature of the transaction.

I allow the appeal and direct that the suit be dismissed. The plaintiffs-respondents will pay their own costs and those of the parties on the other side in all Courts.

Appeal allowed.

and 4th of June 1918, affirming those of the Munsif, 2nd Court at Feni, dated the 16th and 29th of June 1917 respectively.

FACTS appear from the judgment.

Dr. Dwarkanath Mitter, (with him Babus Narendra Chandra Bose and Satyendra Nath Mitter), for the Appellants.—The appeals arise out of a suit for rent. The question is whether the defendant is liable to pay interest at the rate of 2 per cent. per mensem under the terms of the contract. The land was described as shikmi taluka land in the plaint. The defendants do not traverse that. There was a stipulation in the kabuliyat that the tenant would be liable to pay interest at 2 per cent. per mensem on the over due amount of rent. My point is that the tenancy is a permanent one, being a mourasi mokarari tenure. Hence the plaintiff ought to be awarded interest at the stipulated rate.

Moulvie Nurul Huq, for the Respondents.—The first question, whether the lease is a permanent mokarari tenure, has been decided in my favour. There must be distinct words of mokarari grant in the lease. In the second place the landlord cannot claim interest from me at that rate as it is penal. Although I did not file a distinct written statement I filed a petition of objection. My last contention would be that the rate of interest is penal.

Dr. Mitter replied in brief.

JUDGMENT.

S. A. No. 1678 of 1918.

This appeal arises out of a suit for rent with interest at 2 per cent. per mensem. The liability for the rent was not denied by the tenants. No written statement was filed, and it was not necessary in such cases to file a written statement. The plaintiffs in their plaint alleged that the rent claimed was in respect of a shikmi kaimi taluk with a rent of 49 rupees payable per annum. The defendants on the day of hearing filed a petition, in which they stated that the claim for interest at the rate of 2 rupees per cent. per mensem was an exorbitant and penal rate. There was no allegation that the Jama was not a permanent Jama. But in their plaint the plaintiffs also did not say anything as regards the fixity of rent. The Courts below have not based their decision on the question as to whether the rate of interest was or was not penal, and I doubt if on the authorities it could be held that the rate was a penal rate. But the decision is based on the provisions of section 67 of the Bengal Tenancy Act and the Court below has, instead of interest, awarded damages to the plaintiffs at the rate of 25 per cent. Section 67 would only apply if the tenancy was not a permanent mokarari tenancy situated within a permanently settled area (section 179, Bengal Tenancy Act).

It is argued on behalf of the appellants that upon a proper interpretation of the kabuliyat executed by the tenants in this case it should be held that the tenancy was a permanent mokarari tenancy. The learned Vakil for the respondents, for obvious reasons does not want categorically to say that the lease hold interest of his clients is not permanent or that the rent is not a fixed rent. The document has been placed before me and, although there can be no doubt that a permanent tenancy was created, there are no clear expressions to show that the rent was fixed. But reading this inference may be drawn from the tenor of the document as a whole and specially from the provision that if at any time the land on measurement is found to be larger in area than that on the basis of which the rent was fixed, the additional rent payable for such additional area would be in proportion to the rent originally fixed. I, therefore, hold that the lease was not only a permanent but also a mokarari lease.

In this view of the case I think the plaintiffs are entitled to the rate of interest claimed by them. The appeal is, therefore, allowed and the plaintiffs' suit decreed with costs in all the Courts.

This judgment will govern also Second Appeals Nos. 1773 and 2174 of 1918.

[p 50', col. 2.]

As consolidation has the effect of interfering with the right of a mortgagor to redeem a mortgage on one property without being required to redeem another mortgage relating to a different property, a Court of Justice will always struggle against an interference with the mortgagor's right, unless the covenant is shown to be express and unequivocal. The Hon'ble Pandit Sheo Narain, R. B., and Mehta Bahadur Chand, for the Appellants.

The Hon'ble Mr. Fazl-i-Husain, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This was an action for the redemption of certain property mortgaged to the defendants, and the sole question, which arises in this second appeal preferred by the mortgagees, is whether they are entitled to consolidate the different mortgages effected in their favour. Now, there are altogether five mortgages, and as regards three of them the District Judge has upheld the contention of the defendants, and his finding on that point has not been questioned before us. The learned Judge, however, holds that the defendants cannot compel the plaintiffs to pay at the same time the money due to them on the strength of the remaining two mortgages effected on the 9th September 1882, and 8th February 1889, respectively; and the question for determination is whether the defendants have established their right of consolidation in respect of these two securities.

We may clear the ground by stating that it is beyond dispute that the aforesaid two mortgages do not comprise any property covered by the other mortgages, and are absolutely separate transactions. The principle of law, which finds expression in section 61 of the Transfer of Property Act, is to the effect that a mortgagor seeking to redeem any one mortgage shall, in the absence of a contract to the contrary, be entitled to do so without paying any money due under any separate mortgage on property other than that comprised in the mortgage which he seeks to redeem. It is, therefore, clear that the onus lies upon the defendants to establish a contract which precludes the plaintiffs from redeeming the property affected by the three mortgages without paying the money due on the two mortgages in question. It must be remembered that as consolidation has the effect of interfering with the right of a mortgagor to redeem a mortgage on one property without being required to redeem another mortgage relating to a different property, a Court of Justice will always struggle against an interference with the mortgagor's right, unless the covenant is shown to be express and unequivocal.

Have the defendants satisfied this requirement of the law? Now, the clauses in the two deeds, upon which the learned Advocate for the appellants places his reliance, are briefly as follows:—"In the mortgage of the 9th September 1882 there is a stipulation that the mortgage would be redeemable along with the prior mortgage effected on the 18th August 1882 (one of the three mortgages referred to above). In the mortgage deed of the 8th February 1889 the covenant is that "should the mortgagors redeem the land mortgaged by the deeds of the 18th August 1882 and 9th September 1882 they will redeem the present charge at the same time."

We have bestowed our careful consideration upon the wording of these covenants in the light of the arguments advanced by the learned Advocate, and we are not prepared to hold that they amount to a clear and express contract depriving the mortgagors of their right to redeem the mortgage of August 1882 without redeeming these two mortgages. It may be that the parties contemplated that the money due on all the mortgages should be paid at the same time, but that is not enough. The defendants, in order to succeed, must shew that the plaintiffs expressly and unequivocally contracted themselves out of their right to redeem the first mortgage without redeeming at the same time the two mortgages relating to a different property.

In Ganga Ram v. Kirtarath Rai (1) the learned Judges, in dealing with a stipulation by which the mortgagor agreed to redeem a later mortgage before redeeming a prior mortgage, held that the covenant was nothing more than a provision fixing the time for payment, and that there was no agreement in the second mortgage that the mortgagor would not be entitled to redeem the first mortgage without paying the money due under the second mortgage. To the same effect is the judgment of the Oudh Court in Gaya Din Singh v. Har Karan Singh (2). The ruling of the Chief Court in Parabh Dial v. Kharku (3), relied upon by Mr. Sheo Narain, appears to deal with a case of two charges created on the same property and has no bearing upon the present case, in which the question of the consolidation of mortgages comprising different properties is involved. Further the judgment follows the Allahabad ruling in Allu Khan v. Roshan Khan (4), which has been expressly dissented from in Sheo Shankar v. Parma Mahton (5).

In view of the wording of section 61 of the Transfer of Property Act, and the law as the consolidation enunciated above, we must hold that the defendants, on whom the onus rested, have failed to prove any express contract which entitled them to prevent the plaintiffs from redeeming the mortgages on one property without redeeming the mortgages affecting another property.

We accordingly confirm the decree of the lower Appellate Court and dismiss the appeal with costs.

Babu Jyotish Chandra Sirkar, for the Appellants.

Mr. A. K. Fazlul Huq, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The defendants in this case appeal against the decision of the learned Subordinate Judge of Chittagong dated the 3rd February 1919, whereby the learned Judge affirmed the decision of the Munsif of Patiya, dated the 6th August 19 7. The main point raised in the appeal can be stated in a few words. The plaintiff brought the suit for Khas possessions on the allegation that he purchased the property at an auction sale held under the provisions of Act XI of 1859, the property being sold for arrears of Government revenue. The present appellants were some of the co-sharer landlords of the property and it is not disputed that the landlord's interest passed to the auction-purchaser. But what has happened is this: Prior to the sale, that is, more than twelve years before the sale, one of the co-sharer landlords had purchased the occupancy right of a raiyat in the land sought to be recovered in the present suit. Now the decision of this Court in the case of Ram Mohan Pal v. Sheikh Kochu (1) establishes that when a co-sharer landlord acquires the occupancy right of a raiyat, the co-sharer landlord holds the raiyat's interest without the right of occupancy. That is the decision of a Full Bench and the decision of a Full Bench is binding upon me. It is said that it is quite true that that decision must be followed but, after the purchase of the occupancy rights the co-sharer landlord continued in occupation for more than twelve years and although he could not be in possession as against himself so as to acquire a right of occupancy, he could become a settled raiyat of the village and, therefore, would not be liable to be evicted from his holding. The direct point has not been the subject of any judicial decision, but a point very close to it was decided by a Bench of this Court in the case of Ramlal Sukul v. Bhela Gazi (2), and the argument that was put forward by the learned Vakil on behalf of the appellants was, not that the co-sharer landlord had become a settled raiyat of the village prior to the auction sale under the provisions of Act XI of 1859, but that immediately following the sale by the Government under the provisions of the Act the defendants were entitled to set up this 12 years' possession prior to the sale and claim as a settled raiyat of the village, and that such a right was acquired and could only be annulled at the option of the purchaser within a reasonable time and that the time for annulling that interest had long since expired. I do not agree with this view. I think the observations in the case of Ramlal Sukul v. Bhela Gazi (2) above referred to apply equally well to a landlord acquiring interest as an occupancy raiyat or in any other character against himself, and I do not think that a landlord by being in possession of his own property can acquire an interest against himself as a settled raiyat of the village or as any raiyat of any other village. The result is that I agree with learned Judges of the Courts below that the plaintiff is entitled to recover possession of this land which he purchased.

The other point involved in the appeal is the question of mesne profits. It is conceded by Mr. Huq who appears for the plaintiff respondent that the purchaser at the auction sale-having an option to treat this interest in the defendant as void, is not entitled to recover mesne profits prior to the institution of the suit. The judgment and decree of the lower Appellate Court will, therefore, be varied by directing that mesne profits be recovered by the plaintiff only from the date of the institution of the suit down to the date of the actual delivery of possession or until the expiry of three years from the date of the decree as ordered by the primary Court. As both parties have partly succeeded in the appeal, I make no order as to the costs in this Court. The order as to costs made by the lower Appellate Court will stand.

Decree varied.

The Hon'ble Syed Wazir Hasan, for the Appellant.

Pandit Harkaran Nath Misra holding brief of the Hon'ble Pandit Gokaran Nath Misra, for Respondent No. 1.

JUDGMENT.—This is a plaintiff's second appeal and the sole question for discussion is whether or not a certain deed of sale executed in favour of the plaintiff-appellant was validly registered and conferred upon the plaintiff a title to the property so as to enable her to maintain the suit for redemption.

The facts may be briefly stated. In the year 1899, a mortgage of certain property was executed in favour of the defendants by one Sri Dat, who is impleaded in this suit as defendant No. 2. The property affected by this mortgage was situated in Tahsil Kunda in the Partabgarh district. On the 26th of May 1915 Sri Dat sold certain property, including the property under mortgage, to the present plaintiff Babuain Jadunath Kunwar. This sale-deed also purported to transfer to the plaintiff a certain plot of land in the village called Gopalpur described as No. 82 and measuring about 1 bigha. This land is admittedly situated in Tahsil Partabgarh. The deed of sale was registered by the Sub-Registrar of Tahsil Partabgarh, and the question is whether this registration was an effective registration so as to render the transfer by sale a good and valid transfer.

When this suit for redemption was brought, a plea was raised by the defendants to the effect that the sale-deed upon which the plaintiff was relying for her right to ask for redemption was an invalid document inasmuch as the registeration had not been carried out in accordance with law. This plea was founded upon the allegation that the plot No. 82, situated in the Tahsil of Partabgarh, had never belonged to the vendor Sri Dat and consequently he had no right whatever to dispose of or to offer to dispose of it to Jadunath Kunwar; and so it was stated that as this plot in question included in the sale-deed executed in the plaintiff's favour was not the property of the vendor, the result was that the Sub-Registrar of Partabgarh had no jurisdiction to register the deed and that consequently there was no valid registration. In this connection the law on the subject may be referred to. It is contained in section 28 of the Registration Act (XVI of 1908). This section lays down that evey document mentioned in certain sections and clauses of the Act must be presented for registration in the office of a Sub-Registrar "within whose sub-district the whole or some portion of the property to which such document relates is situate." There can be no question that the deed now under consideration, being a sale-deed, falls within the operation of this section.

The evidence which was led in the Court of first instance satisfied both the Courts that Sri Dat had no title to this plot No. 82. The first Court, however, held that this matter did not affect the validity of the registration of the document and relied for this opinion upon a case of this Court reported as Janki Bibi v. Bisheshar Nath (1). The lower Appellate Court took a different view and following the judgment of their Lordships of the Privy Council reported as Harendra Lal Roy v. Hari Dasi Debi (2), held that the registration was invalid. The Subordinate Judge was of opinion that there had been a fraud on the registration department, and he based this opinion mainly upon the fact that the vendor Sri Dat was proved to have no title to the plot No. 82 situated in Tahsil Partabgarh.

It has been argued before me here that the principles laid down by their Lordships of the Privy Council in the case just mentioned do not govern the decision of this case; and a reference has been made to several other cases in which this judgment of their Lordships has been considered and interpreted. The cases are Mangali Lal v. Abidyar Khan (3), Pahladi Lal v. Musammat Laraiti (4) and Brojo Gopal Mukerjee v. Abhilash Chandra Biswas (5). The main argument here is in substance that the evidence on the record does not support the conclusion that fraud was practised upon the registration department. It is contended that mere want of title on the part of the transferor does not render the registration invalid. In support of this general proposition the learned Advocate for the appellant relied strongly upon the case reported as Pahladi Lal v. Musammat Laraiti (4).

(2) 23 Ind. Cas. 637; 41 C. 972; 27 M. L. J. 80; 12 A. L. J. 774; 16 M. L. T. 6; (1914) M. W. N. 462; 1 L. W. 1050; 18 C. W. N. 817; 19 C. L. J. 484; 16 Bom. L. R. 400; 41 I. A. 110 (P. C.).

It seems to me, after a careful consideration of all these cases to which I have been referred, that the judgment of the lower Appellate Court in this case must be maintained, and I agree with the view taken by the learned Subordinate Judge that the case is directly governed by what was laid down by the Privy Council in Harendra Lal Roy v. Hari Dasi Debi (2). That was a case in which a suit was brought upon a mortgage. It was proved that the document of mortgage was registered in Calcutta. It purported to mortgage amongst other properties a certain property described in the schedule attached to the mortgage-deed as "No. 25, Guru Das Street, Calcutta." It was proved that no property to which this description applied existed in Calcutta. It was made to appear, during the trial of the case which their Lordships were considering, that in a previous suit instituted on this mortgage a case had been set up that the entry "No. 25, Guru Das Street, Calcutta," was a mistake and that in fact the intention of the parties to the mortgage-deed was to create a mortgage upon another plot described as "25, Ashutosh Dey Lane." This property was an existing property and was situated in Calcutta. This plea of mistake was raised in a suit brought by the mortgagee against the mortgagor and was accepted by the Judge of the High Court who tried the case on the Original Side. In the case which came before their Lordships, however, the defendants to the suit were parties other than the mortgagor and they claimed that they were not in any way bound by the judgment in the mortgage suit. It is stated in the judgment of their Lordships that it was proved that although there was an existing property in Calcutta which went by the description of "25, Ashutosh Dey Lane," nevertheless it was further proved that the mortgagor had never had at any time any title to this property. The result of the evidence in the case was to convince their Lordships that there had been a fraud practised upon the department by the mortgagor and the mortgagee, and that in consequence the registration was invalid and the deed conferred no title. From the report of the case it appears that neither the mortgagor nor the mortgagee went into the witness-box in order to explain how it came to pass that the mortgagor purported to transfer either a property which was non-existent or a property to which he had no title whatsoever. The defendants in the suit had established by positive evidence two propositions, namely, (1) that the item "No. 25, Guru Das Street," had never existed, and (2) that, if the case was that the description was a mistake and that the property was really a property known as "25, Ashutosh Dey Lane," then the mortgagor had never any title to this item. In these circumstances it was laid down by their Lordships of the Privy Council that it lay upon the plaintiff-mortgagee to discharge the burden of showing that the entry in the deed of mortgage was not a fictitious entry; and as he failed to discharge that burden, their Lordships held that the only conclusion possible was that the mortgagor and the mortgagee had acted fraudulently and collusively. At pages 984 and 985* of the report the failure of the parties to the deed to go into the witness-box and give evidence is commented on in the following language:—

"Neither the plaintiff nor Mani Mohan Roy (mortgagor) went into the box to give evidence as to there being any mistake in the description of the parcels. On the other hand, the defendants proved that there is not, and has never been, any such property as No. 25, Guru Das Street, in Calcutta, and they further proved that the property lying within the metes and bounds set out in parcel No. 28 did not belong to Mani Mohan at the date of the mortgage bond, and that on the contrary he had not then and never has had any interest in the property within those metes and bounds.....

"It follows, therefore, that No. 25, Guru Das Street, which is the parcel No. 28, was a non-existing property. It was no doubt open to the plaintiff to prove that there was a clerical or other error in the description of the property, and that in fact an existing property situate in Calcutta was intended by both parties to be mortgaged and to be described in parcel No. 28. But there is not a particle of evidence that such was the case.

"Neither the mortgagor Mani Mohan nor the mortgagee the plaintiff Harendra Lal Roy went into the box to give evidence as to this. As to Mani Mohan their Lordships cannot see how it would have been possible for him to give any such evidence because it would amount to stating that he intended that the deed should purport to mortgage an existing property in which he had not and knew that he had not any property or interest whatever."

At page 986* their Lordships refer to the sole piece of evidence which was put forward on behalf of the mortgagee relating to this house "No. 25, Guru Das Street." It was a statement by a clerk to the plaintiff's Attorneys who had some knowledge regarding the execution of the deed. It was admitted by this clerk, who was acting, of course, on behalf of the mortgagee, that he had never made any inquiry regarding the mortgagor's title to the house "No. 25, Guru Das Street." This fact was relied upon by their Lordships and coupling it with the fact that neither the mortgagor nor the mortgagee gave evidence in the case, they came to the conclusion that there was no ground for presuming that there had been any mistake of the parties and that the only other conclusion available was that there had been fraud and collusion. I may refer also to another passage of the judgment at page 987* of the report, which seems important in deciding how cases of this kind are to be dealt with. It reads as follows:—

"The defendants having proved that the house which purported to be mortgaged did not exist and that the property contained in the metes and bounds mentioned in parcel No. 28 was property of strangers in which the mortgagor had not and never had any interest had proved all that was necessary to throw upon the plaintiff the burden of showing that the entry of this parcel was not a fictitious entry. He might have done this by showing mistake or otherwise, but he did not do so but abstained from giving any evidence whatever on the subject, although both he and Mani Mohan were available to give evidence, and were the persons who could establish the facts of the case. Taking all these matters into consideration, their Lordships can come to no other conclusion than that parcel No. 28 was to the knowledge of the parties to the deed a fictiticus entry probably designed to give to the deed the appearance of relating to property situated in Calcutta and, therefore, within the jurisdicton of the Sub Registrar and the Calcutta High Court, so that registration could be obtained and actions brought in Calcutta."

What do we find in the present case? We have it that the defendants have been able to show by positive evidence that Sri Dat, at the time this sale was executed in favour of the plaintiff, had no title whatever in plot No. 82 in Gopalpur. Sri Dat did not appear to give evidence in the case, nor has the plaintiff, nor any one who was acting on her behalf in the matter of the sale; and acting on the principles laid down by their Lordships, it appears to me that it must necessarily be held that the burden of proving that this entry regarding plot No. 82 was not a fictitious entry was cast on the plaintiff, who has failed to discharge it; the result, therefore, must be the same as was the result in the case before the Privy Council, namely, that it must be held that the entry was fictitious and that the proceedings were collusive and fraudulent.

It was stoutly argued that the case before the Privy Council was really a different case and that what influenced their Lordships principally to their decision was the fact that the item "No. 25, Guru Das Street," was a non-existing property. It seems to me, however, that this argument is not maintainable for, as I have already mentioned, their Lordships refer to the case which had been set up in the suit originally brought on the mortgage deed and in which it was sought to be made out that this description of the property was a misdescription and that another item of property, namely, the house at 25, Ashutosh Dey Lane, was the property intended to be mortgaged. Their Lordships pointed out that even if there was this misdescription, it was nevertheless clear that according to the boundaries set out in the schedule this other property "25, Ashutosh Dey Lane," was not and had never been the property of the mortgagor. It seems to me, therefore, that the decision of the Court below is correct and that in the circumstances the learned Subordinate Judge was entitled to conclude that a fraud had been committed.

With regard to the case reported as Mangali Lal v. Abidyar Khan (3), an examination of the facts of that case shows clearly that there was a finding of deliberate collusion between the parties to a sale deed. On the other hand the case upon which the learned Advocate for the appellant relies, namely, Pahladi Lal v. Musammat Laraiti (4), was a very different case from the one which I am now considering. There certain property had been mortgaged by one Bijai Singh, and it was proved that one of the items which he purported to mortgage was not his property but the property of his minor brother. But it was also shown that although the property belonged to the younger brother, nevertheless mutation had been made in favour of Bijai Singh and that at the date upon which the mortgage was made, the revenue papers contained an entry to the effect that Bijai Singh was the proprietor and in possession. In these circumstances it was held that although as a matter of fact Bijai Singh had no real title to the property, the fact that there was an entry in Bijai Singh's favour in the revenue registers was sufficient to dispose of any presumption that the mortgage transaction between Bijai Singh and his mortgagee was fraudulent. The mortgagee had relied on the entries in the revenue papers and was satisfied from those entries that Bijai Singh had really a title to the property, although subsequently it turned out that he had not. That is a very different case from the case before me now. The fact is that no general rule can be laid down which will cover all cases of this kind. Fraud may be committed in many ways and it is impossible to lay down any universal standard of proof of fraud. Every case must be judged on its own facts. In the case now before me there is a clear guide for decision in the judgment of their Lordships of the Privy Council to which I have referred at great length and I am satisfied, therefore, that the lower Appellate Court came to a correct decision. The result, therefore, is that the appeal fails and is dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

CIVIL RULE No. 50 OF 1919.

December 12, 1919.

NANDA LAL BOSE—DEFENDANT No. 5—PETITIONER

ASHUTOSH GHOSE—PLAINTIFF—OPPOSITE PARTY.

Limitation Act (IX of 1908), s. 10, Sch. I, Art. 145—Suit to recover money from depository—Limitation applicable—Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), ss. 2, cl. (17), 80—Manager of Court of Wards, whether public servant.

Article 145 of Schedule I to the Limitation Act applies to a suit to recover money deposited by the plaintiff as a security for his appointment as Tahsildar under the manager of a Court of Wards. [p. 516, col. 2.]

The manager of a Court of Wards is not a public servant within the meaning of section 2, clause (17) of the Code of Civil Procedure, and is, therefore, not entitled to a notice under section 80 of the Code. [p. 516, col. 2; p. 517, col. 1.]

Rule against the order of the Subordinate Judge, 3rd Court, 24-Parganas.

FACTS appear in 52 Ind. Cas. 65.

Babu Samatul Chunder Dutt, for the Petitioner.—Defendant No. 5, who is the petitioner, was a manager of the Court of Wards. The plaintiff was a Tahsildar under the Court of Wards from July 1909 to February 1910, Defendant No. 5 was appointed manager after the dismissal of plaintiff. Several proceedings were instituted against plaintiff. At the time of plaintiff's appointment he had to deposit as security a Savings Bank Pass Book. In 1913 defendant with the sanction of the Collector withdrew money with interest on plaintiff's account under the Pass Book. The estate was released from the Court of Wards in 1917. The present suit was brought in February 1918, which has been decreed against the defendant personally. The defendant No. 5 then applied for review which was dismissed, and the plaintiff's receipt for the money which was sought to be put in in the review proceedings was also rejected. My points are:—(1) The defendant No. 5 was a public officer and as such was entitled to a notice under section 80, Civil Procedure Code. Refers to section 2 (17), Civil Procedure Code, Collector of Bijnor v. Munuvar (1), section 59 (a), Act I of 1906 (B. C.) (2). The suit is barred by limitation. The money was withdrawn in 1913 while the suit was brought in 1918. The learned Judge was wrong in holding that the defendant was a trustee. The true test of trust property is whether the trustee has full control over it. Article 62 of the Limitation Act would apply. Section 10 does not apply as there was no express trust. Refers to Kathiawar Trading Company Limited v. Virchand Dipchand (2), Khirode money Dossee v. Durgamoney Dossee (3), Mathuradas v. Vandrawandas (4), Bhurabhai v. Bai Ruxmani (5), Balwant Rao v. Puran Mal (6). (3) My third point is that the defendant No. 5 having been sued as a manager the Court was wrong in granting a personal decree against him. (4) My last point is that the receipt granted by the plaintiff for the money withdrawn was an important document and ought to have been considered after granting review.

Babu Bijan Kumar Mukherji, for the Opposite Party.—I submit the case is not barred. Article 145 applies to this case. See Lala Gobind Prasad v. Chairman of Patna Municipality (7). That case is on all fours with the present case. See also Upendra Lal Mukhopadhya v. Collector of Rajshahye (8). The defendant No. 5 was not a public servant. Reads section 2 (17), Civil Procedure Code. The suit was not bad for want of notice. The judgment of the trial Court is quite clear, explaining its reasons for rejecting the document and as to why a personal decree was granted against defendant No. 5. (Reads judgment.)

Babu Samatul Chunder Dutt replied briefly.

JUDGMENT.—This Rule was heard ex parte by Mr. Justice Chatterjea and Mr. Justice Panton some months ago, but later at the instance of the opposite party an order was passed that the Rule should be heard again. I have now heard the learned Pleaders on both sides. The facts are stated in the judgment delivered on the 24th of March last. There are now four points to be considered. The first one is that the lower Court ought to have set aside its order when the defendant made his application for review of judgment. I have read the learned Judge's judgment in regard to this application and I think that he was correct and that there is no ground for interference on that score.

The second point urged is that the suit is barred by limitation. The point taken by the lower Court was that the suit was saved by the operation of section 10 of the the Limitation Act. When the case was heard by this Court, the learned Judges took a different view and held that the suit was subject to the rule of 3 years' limitation. The learned Pleader who appears to day for the opposite party does not rely upon section 10, but refers to Article 145 and quotes the case of Lala Gobind Prasad v. Chairman of Patna Municipality (7). It appears to me that he is right in this contention and that in consequence the suit cannot be held to be time-barred.

The third point is that the defendant was a public servant and, therefore, entitled to the benefit of a notice under section 80 Civil Procedure Code. I cannot find that he falls within any of the classes enumerated in clause (17) of section 2 of the Civil Procedure Code and, I, therefore, think that he was not entitled to a notice.

The fourth point is that the defendant was sued as manager of the estate but the decree was made against him personally. It appears to me that on the findings of the learned Judge of the Court below it is right that the decree should be made against him personally.

Taking these views, I discharge the Rule with costs,—hearing fee one gold mohur.

Court Fees Act (VII of 1870), s. 7, cl. IV (b), Sch. II, Art. 17 (VI)—Partition, suit for, by co-tenant—Valuation—Court-fee payable.

A suit for partition by a co-tenant, alleging himself to be in possession on behalf of himself and the other co-tenants, is for purposes of Court-fee not governed by clause IV (b) of section 7 of the Court Fees Act, but is incapable of valuation within the meaning of Schedule II, Article 17 (VI) of the Act. [p. 518, col. 1.]

Tara Chand v. Afzal Beg, 13 Ind. Cas. 185; 34 A. 184; 8 A. L. J. 1329, and Ahamuddin v. Amiruddin, 44 Ind. Cas. 216, followed.

Appeal against the order of the Court of the Temporary Subordinate Judge, Guntur, dated the 18th February 1918, rejecting the plaint in Original Suit No. 10 of 1917, sought to be filed by Mr. G. V. Srinivasa Rao, Vakil, on behalf of Mr. R. P. Gill, the plaintiff.

FACTS.—The suit was by a co owner for separate possession of his share. The only question in appeal was the amount of Court-fee payable on the plaint.

Messrs. P. Narayanamurti and K. Kamanna, for the Appellant.—In a suit by a co-owner for separate possession of his share, the relief is not capable of valuation and so the Court-fee is payable as under clause (vi) of Article 17 of Schedule II to the Court Fees Act. In Reference under Court Fees Act, section 5 (1) it was held that the relief was capable of valuation. In Boganadam Rangiah Chetty v. Boganada Subramaniam Chetty (2) it was held that though the relief was incapable of valuatior, section 7, clause IV (b), applied as it referred to the case of joint family property expressly. The rulings in Calcutta treat the relief as incapable of valuation, whether it be relating to joint family property or mere joint property. Bidhata Roy v. Ram Charitra Roy (3). The latest ruling is in Ahamuddin v. Amiruddin (4). Allahabad takes the same view: Waliullah v. Durga Prasad (5), Tara Chand v. Afzal Beg (6). But see Dagdu v. Totaram (7).

Mr. K. G. Babu Rao, for Defendant No. 9.—I am not contesting the point. The case in Reference under Court Fees Act, section 5 (1) being an exact ruling in point, ought to be upheld.

Mr. P. Narayanamurti in reply.

JUDGMENT.—In this case the plaintiff sues for partition of certain immoveable property of which he alleges he is in possession as a co-tenant on behalf of himself and the other co-tenants. This is not a suit to enforce a right to share in the possession of property on the ground that it is joint family property within the meaning of section 7 (IV) (b) of the Court Fees Act, VII of 1870, and, therefore, the question of the applicability of the sub-section to suits for the partition of joint family property, which was decided by a Full Bench of this Court in Boganadam Rangiah Chetty Boganadam v. Subramania Chetty (2), does not arise.

There is a long course of decisions in Calcutta that a suit, such as the present, for partition by a plaintiff alleging himself to be already in joint possession is incapable of valuation within the meaning of Schedule II, Article 17 (vi), and is not governed by clause V of section 7 and though the point was not expressly decided by the Full Bench in the case reported as Boganadam Rangiah Chetty v. Boganadam Subramania Chetty (2), the reasoning of all the learned Judges who heard the reference is in accordance with this view. The same view is taken in Tara Chand v. Afzal Beg (6).

In these circumstances we are not prepared to agree with the decision in Reference Case No. 5 of 1894 [Reference under Court Fees Act, section 5 (1)] that the value of the subject matter of such a suit is not incapable of valuation but easily ascertainable, or with the decision in Dagdu v. Totaram (7), assuming that the point arose in that case which is not clear. The balance of authority appears to us to be strongly in favour of the view that such a suit as the present is governed by Schedule II, Article 17, clause 6, the latest case being Ahamuddin v. Amiruddin (4), and we must so hold and set aside the order rejecting the plaint and remand the case to the lower Court for disposal according to law. Where a taluqdar ignorantly collects rent from a vendee from a perpetual and heritable but non-transferable lessee, and it is found that before him the Court of Wards in management of his estate did the same with full notice of the sale, this would prove that the vendee was recognised merely as an ordinary tenant but not as a person holding special rights. JUDGMENT.

HARRISON, J. M.—This is a second appeal in a suit to contest a notice of ejectment.

The land in suit formed part of a property leased by a perpetual lease to Dhaunkal Singh and others in 1271 Fasli (1163-4 A. D). The lesse's rights were clearly heritable, but the document was silent as to the right to alienate. A portion of the land (now in suit) came into the plaintiff's possession by sale of the rights of Dhaunkal Singh in 1907, since when first the Court of Wards and afterwards the taluqdar (defendant) himself have collected the rent from plaintiff at the same amount as used to be collected from the original lessees. The present suit arose from the recent action of the taluqdar in issuing a notice of ejectment against the plaintiff.

Here in second appeal the argument has proceeded upon two main lines, first, that in the absence of express provision in the lease for forfeiture there is no right of re-entry, and, secondly, that the acceptance of the old rent in any case ratified the transactions leading up to the suit as given in the Commissioner's judgment, dated 20th September 1917, in a suit between the parties to contest a previous notice (copy on record). Dhaunkal Singh, etc., had claimed under-proprietary rights but had withdrawn their suit on being granted the lease now in question, which the then Commissioner held to be heritable but not transferable. In 1907 the estate was under the Court of Wards and during that year a share of the lessee's right was sold to the plaintiff. The Court of Wards contested the subsequent application for mutation, but unsuccessfully. (They, therefore, had notice of the transaction.) Afterwards it collected rent from the plaintiff (as is further proved directly in this case). The estate was released in 1915 (and it is now in evidence that the defendant taluqdar himself collected rent from plaintiff after that).

As to the first line of argument before me, the judgment in Ali Muhammad Khan v. Ohheddan (1) (the material passage appears on page 96*) seems to me to contain the best statement of the law in such a case. Where there is no express penalty of forfeiture in respect of a lease or license (transfers not being specifically forbidden by Statute), a mortgage does not give a cause of action for ejectment, but a sale does, as it involves an entire abandonment of the transferor's rights in favour of another person. The decision was given by a Bench of the Judicial Commissioner's Court and is based on general principles of law. Further in connection with another sale of a portion of the rights secured by this very lease the Judicial Commissioner held in a judgment, dated 30th July 1917 (copy on record), that the transfer was invalid against the taluqdar. I, therefore, find the sale invalid. In the same judgment of 1917 the Judicial Commissioner held that as the transferee then in question had never been recognized by the acceptance of rent, he was liable to ejectment (by the Civil Court). The implication was, I presume, that had rent been collected, a tenancy would have been recognized and the remedy would have lain in the Revenue Courts. In this case there is evidence that rent was collected both by the Court of Wards and by the taluqdar himself. But it has been held by the Judicial Commissioner in Deputy Commissioner, Rai Bareli v. Mahesh Bakhsh (2), that the Court of Wards is not an agent for a disqualified proprietor and its action is not, therefore, binding in matters of this sort. Further, as the Commissioner remarked in his judgment in the previous suit, the mere receipt of rent by a taluqdar for a year or two after release of the estate (i. e., before there was time to acquire knowledge of intricate matters affecting his rights) cannot be held to provide an admission. The taluqdar doubtless continued to collect as a matter of course without any consciousness that the plaintiff asserted special rights and obviously he did not lose much time in challenging the plaintiff's right, for the case had already got up to the Commissioner's Court in appeal in 1917. I hold that the plaintiff was recognised by these transactions merely as a tenant, but not as a person holding special rights. The Board in the previous proceedings merely held that he was not a trespasser.

A study of various rulings after the hearing of the case has drawn my attention to section 6 (i) of the Transfer of Property Act, which seems to me further to weaken the plaintiff's case. It forbids the assignment of a lessee's interest while the estate is under the management of the Court of Wards and has been law since this clause was added by Act III of 1365.

In the result I find that the transfer was invalid and extinguished the rights Dhaunkal Singh, etc., had under the original lease: while the subsequent acceptance of rent did no more than acknowledge the plaintiff as an ordinary tenant. In this view the appeal fails and is dismissed with costs. As the case is of some importance, I lay it before my colleague for his opinion.

Punjab Pre-emption Act (I of 1913), s. 3 (3)—Town and villages definition, cf—Padhana, Lahore Tahsil, whether town—Question whether a place is town or village one of law—Appeal, second, whether lies.

A town may be defined as an area inhabited by residents not bound together by a common interest in agriculture, that is, a place which depends mainly on trade, while a village appears to mean the area occupied by a body of men mainly dependent upon agriculture or occupations subservient thereto. [p. 521, col. 1.]

The question whether a place is a town or a village for the purposes of the Pre-emption Act is one of law and, therefore, a second appeal lies in respect thereof. [p. 520, col. 2.]

Gosain Sant Das v. Musammat Ram Bai, 20 Ind. Cas. 295; 38 P. R. 1913; 264 P. L. R. 1913; 184 P. W. R. 1913; Daulat Ram v. Gadi Ram, 49 Ind. Cas. 138; 1 P. R. 1919; East Indian Railway Co v. Changu Khan, 28 Ind. Cas 245; 42 C. 888; 22 C. L. J. 212; 19 C. W. N. 1034, distinguished.

For the purposes of the Pre-emption Act, Padhana in the Tahsil and District of Lahore is a village. [p. 521, col. 2.]

"The question in this appeal and Appeal No. 2389 is whether Padhana is a town or village for the purposes of the Pre-emption Act. The Courts below have decided that it is a village. It is contended for the respondent that this is a finding of fact and that, therefore, a second appeal would not lie. In Mahmud v. Jumma (1) the learned Judges doubted whether a second appeal lay in such a case, but did not decide the point. It has been decided in Bhamba Ram v. Allah Bakhsh (2) that the question whether on certain facts a building should be held to be a shop is a question of law, and in Feroze uddin v. Rahim Bakhsh (3) a similar ruling was given in regard to the question whether a certain plot was a Serai. I see no essential distinction between such cases and the present one, in which the question is whether on the facts Padhana should be held to be a town or a village. Counsel for the respondents has referred to Gosain Sant Das v. Musammat Ram Bai (4) and Daulat Ram v. Gadi Ram (5). In these cases the question was whether certain property had been dedicated to public, charitable or religious uses. Such a question is of a different kind from the one arising in the present case. East Indian Railway Co., v. Changu Khan (6) is also cited but seems to be hardly in point. I hold that the question in the present case is one of law and that, therefore, the appeal lies.

Padhana had a population of 4,587 in 1911. It has a Record of Rights. It is divided into Tarafs and Pattis and it has Lambardars. In support of the contention that Padhana is a town, Counsel for the appellant has laid stress on the fact that it was constituted a notified area in 1895 and that it was described as a town in the notification issued under section 210 of Act XX of 1891. I agree, however, with the learned District Judge that the mere fact that it was thought proper to apply to Padhana certain provisions of the Municipal Act relating to such matters as sanitation, would not show that Padhana is to be regarded as a town for the purposes of the Pre-emption Act. Other facts which are relied upon by Counsel for the appellant appear to be similarly inconclusive, such as that Padhana was described as a town in a notification published in 1896, by which section 34 of the Police Act was extended to it, that Padhana is also described as a town in a geography book issued by the Education Department for teaching in primary schools, that it is so described in a plan of the notified area or that there are a number of Pukka houses and shops and paved streets in Padhana as well as a Vernacular Middle School and a branch post office. With regard to judicial decisions there is a judgment by the Divisional Judge, Lahore, in 1898, holding Padhana to be a town, but on the other hand there is a judgment of Mr. Ellis in 1913 to the contrary.

The word 'town' is not defined in the Pre-emption Act, but the essential distinction between a town and a village appears to be correctly indicated by Mr. Ellis on pages 125 and 130 of his Pre emption Act. He suggests that a town may be defined as an area inhabited by residents not bound together by a common interest in agriculture, that is, a place which depends mainly on trade; while a village appears to mean the area occupied by a body of men mainly dependent upon agriculture or occupations subservient thereto.

Now Padhana has a culturable area of nearly 46,000 kanals, and all but about 79 kanals is owned by Jats. The learned District Judge says: 'It is a village with 4 Tarafs and 13 Pattis, and though in its population of 4,587 according to the Census of 1911, there were no doubt Khatris and a number of non-proprietors, it appears that they really administer to the needs of the agricultural population of the village. It is the very large agricultural area and the considerable agricultural population and population directly dependent upon agriculture that gives it its size. Traders no doubt there are, but there is nothing whatever to show that they are there for any reason apart from the existence of a large agricultural population whose needs are sufficiently great to make it worthwhile for a number of traders to live among them.' Counsel for the appellant wishes to challenge the District Judge's finding on this point, but I agree with Mr. Govind Das that he cannot do so in second appeal, the finding being one of fact.

Another important point to consider in determining whether Padhana is to be regarded as a town or village is the position of the non-proprietors. The number of alienations by non-proprietors does not appear to have been large, and several are of quite recent dates, and it has not been shown that non-proprietors have power to alienate their houses and sites occupied by them; while the District Judge finds as a fact that the Bazar is owned by the village Sardars. Further it has been proved by the entry in the wajib-ul-arz that certain village dues, namely, Thanna Patti and Haq Atrafi, are levied from the non proprietors at Padhana and also that the tax on sales known as Dharat is charged and is applied to defray the village expenses.

It is not necessary to refer to other minor matters to which my attention has been drawn. The chief points are: (1) that Padhana is inhabited mainly by persons dependent on agriculture, while those of the inhabitants who live by trade are principally occupied in supplying the wants of the agricultural population; and (2) that the same distinction which is found in other villages between the position of the non-proprietors and that of the proprietors exists at Padhana. In the circumstances the lower Appellate Court was right in finding that Padhana was a village and I accordingly dismiss both the appeals with costs."

ORDER.—The question whether Padhana is a town or a village for the purpose of the pre-emption is no doubt a difficult one, and there is a good deal to be said on both sides. But a Judge of this Court, after considering the whole material, has come to a conclusion, and we are not prepared to hold that it is wrong. We dismiss the appeal.

APPEAL FROM THE BOMBAY HIGH COURT.

HARIDAS RANCHORDAS AND ANOTHER —APPELLANTS

versus

THE MERCANTILE BANK OF INDIA, LIMITED—RESPONDENTS.

Evidence Act (I of 1872), s. 92—Banker and customer —Customer allowed to overdraw—Interest, agreement to pay—Compound interest charged for a long time—Implied agreement to pay compound interest, whether can be proved—Acquiescence.

The appellants had for many years been allowed to overdraw their account with the respondent Bank. The Bank in fact charged them compound interest with monthly rests and such charge appeared on the face of their pass books. The appellants annually gave the Bank a letter in a printed form in which they merely agreed to pay interest on the daily balances:

Held, that section 92 of the Evidence Act did not prevent the Bank from proving an agreement by the appellants to pay compound interest with monthly rests, and that such an agreement could be implied from the appellants' long acquiescence in such a method of calculation. [p. 525, col. 1.]

Appeal from a decree of the Bombay High Court (Sir Basil Scott, C. J., and Heaton, J.), dated the 20th November 1916, affirming a decree of Macleod, J.

FACTS of the case sufficiently appear from their Lordships' judgment, where also the material parts of the printed letter signed by the appellants are set out. Macleod, J., decreed the Bank's claim for Rs. 36,427 due upon a balance of account, and dismissed the respondents' counter-claim for damages for the dishonour of two cheques. With reference to the amount charged for interest the learned Judge observed:—

"It was contended that the plaintiffs are not entitled to charge compound interest. Now there is not the slightest doubt that the defendants knew that the plaintiffs were charging compound interest and agreed to that interest being charged in that way with monthly rests. And the only question is whether, when the plaintiffs are suing on the accounts, they can ask the Court to give them interest calculated in that way considering the terms of the letter of hypothecation. Clause 2 of that letter merely gives the rate at which interest will be charged: and if the case had stopped there, interest would run in law at that rate, perhaps with half-yearly rests, certainly with yearly rests But there is no reason, as far as I can see, why the plaintiffs should not be entitled to prove that the method by which interest should be charged was not included in the letter of hypothecation. That was arranged orally between the Bank and the defendants. I do not think that section 92 of the Evidence Act prevents the plaintiffs from proving such an agreement. That section has always caused me considerable difficulty. But proviso 2 to the section seems to apply to this case: 'The existence of any separate oral agreement as to any matter on which a document is silent and which is not inconsistent with its terms may be proved.' The document is silent as to the way in which interest should be charged, and it is no answer to that to say that if there had been no oral agreement, the law would allow interest either simple or with yearly rests. The suggestion that the plaintiffs are not entitled to charge compound interest after all these years is a very dishonest one, and altogether the attitude taken up by the defendants at their own suggestion or very likely at the suggestion of their Solicitors does them very little credit. No doubt they have suffered like many other people owing to the outbreak of war: but there is no reason why if they have so suffered they should lose all sense of decency."

Elsewhere in his judgment he characterised the defendants' attempt to re-open the accounts for two years as a most dishonest one, which was only made when they went to their Solicitors.

The Appellate Bench of the High Court (Sir Basil Scott, C. J., and Heaton, J.) affirmed this decision. Upon the question of interest Heaton, J., (with whom Scott, C. J., concurred) held as follows:—

"On the question of interest the defendants have not a clear case at all. The rate was fixed by the contract, but the method of calculation by the long existing practice between the parties.

"The case of Daniell v. Sinclair (1) has been relied on as justifying the counter-claim in respect of the compound interest charged. The appellants' case there was differentiated by the finding from a case of settled accounts between merchants, and the rule prevailed that in the absence of express agreement interest as between mortgagor and mortgagee is simple interest only. There was thus in Daniell v. Sinclair (1) a clear case of mistake on the part of the appellant as to his private rights, which may be treated as a mistake of fact.

(1) (1881) 6 App. Cas. 181; 50 L. J. P. C. 50; 44 L. T. 257; 29 W. R. 569.

"Here the case is entirely different. The account is between banker and customer, to which the security given for overdraft was merely subsidiary: and by long settled fact compound interest was always calculated and accepted without demur."

Hence this appeal.

Messrs. DeGruyther, K. C., and E. B. Raikes, for the Appellants, submitted that the fact that the appellants' pass books showed that compound interest with monthly rests was being charged was immaterial. No agreement to pay such charge could be implied, for proof of any such agreement was excluded by section 92 of the Indian Evidence Act. In the absence of special agreement simple interest only can be charged, and an account, even if long standing, can be re-opened when this rule has been infringed.

Daniell v. Sinclair (1).

(They further contended that the appellants were entitled to damages for the dishonour of their cheques.

Their Lordships intimated that they would not call upon respondent's Counsel on this latter point.)

Mr. Wootten (with him Mr. F. Gore-Brown, K. C.), for the Respondents, submttted that the appellants' acquiescence in the Baulis system of charging interest sufficiently established an agreement on their part to accept that system, and that such agreement might be proved notwithstanding the silence of the written contract.

JUDGMENT.

SIR JOHN EDGE.—This is an appeal from a decree, dated the 20th November 1916, of the High Court at Bombay, which confirmed a decree of that Court made in a suit which was instituted in that Court in its Ordinary Civil Jurisdiction on the 27th May 1915 by the Mercantile Bank of India, Limited, against Haridas Ranchordas, Ludha Dossa, and Bhanji Madhavji. The Mercantile Bank of India, Limited, is the respondent here. Bhanji Madhavji, named as a defendant to the suit, was not served and has, it is said, disappeared. The appellants here are Haridas Ranchordas and Ludha Dossa.

The defendants, under the name of Dharamsay Jaitha & Co., carried on business at Bombay as cotton merchants, their bankers were the plaintiff Bank, and the suit was brought by the Bank to recover from them a balance due by the defendants to the Bank and interest on that balance. The defendants Haridas Ranchordas and Ludha Dossa filed a written statement and counter-claim in which they claimed an account, and damages for the dishonour on the 1st August 1914 by the Bank of two cheques drawn by their firm upon the Bank. Their Lordships are informed by Counsel that by rules of the High Court at Bombay relating to suits in its Original Civil Jurisdiction counter-claims are permitted.

The trial Judge ordered that the suit as against the defendant Bhanji Madhavji should stand adjourned and on the claim of the Bank made a decree against the defendants Haridas Ranchordas and Ludha Dossa, as two of the partners in their firm of Dharamsay Jaitha & Co. and also in their individual capacities, for Rs. 39,025-10 annas for the debt (including compound interest with monthly rests) with future simple interest from the date of the decree until payment, and by his decree dismissed the counter-claim. The High Court in appeal made a decree confirming that decree of the trial Judge. From that decree of the High Court this appeal has been brought.

The questions now in dispute are: (1) Was the Bank entitled to charge compound interest with monthly rests on the amounts from time to time overdrawn by the defendants, and (2) was the Bank entitled to refuse to honour the two cheques. To understand these two questions it is necessary briefly to refer to the course of dealing between the Bank and the defendants' firm. For several years, at least from 1903, the Bank had allowed the defendants' firm to overdraw their account. The practice was that annually on the 1st December the defendants, in the name of their firm and individually, signed a letter in a printed form addressed to and given to the Bank, and in accordance with those letters the Bank allowed the defendants' firm to overdraw their account. The last of such letters was given to the Bank on the 1st December 1913, and so far as it is material it was as follows:—

"In consideration of your allowing us an overdraft to the extent of, but not exceeding at any one time, Rs. 10 lacs in current account it is hereby agreed that all moneys advanced and hereafter to be advanced in pursuance of these presents (hereinafter referred to as 'the said overdraft' or 'such overdraft') shall be advanced upon the terms and conditions hereinafter mentioned:—

"1. The said overdraft shall be repayable within twelve months from this date and/or at your option on demand being made therefor.

"2. Interest shall be charged at 7 per cent. per annum and shall be calculated on the daily balance due to you in respect of the said overdraft, till 30th June, 1914, and thereafter till 1st December 1914, at 5 per cent. per annum.

"4. As security for the said overdraft we hereby agree to pledge with you all cotton pressed and unpressed at present stored in your godowns and/or Jethas and/or which may hereafter be stored by us in your godowns and/or Jethas.

"5. Notwithstanding anything hereinbefore contained you shall be under no obligation to advance any moneys except against the deposit of cotton by us from time to time as provided by clause 4 hereof and in no case shall such advances exceed Rs. 10 lacs outstanding at any one time and such advances shall not exceed seventy-four and a half per cent. (74½ per cent.) on the net market value of the cotton for the time being deposited in your godowns and/or Jethas against which cotton such advances shall from time to time be made.

"6. If at any time a margin of twenty-five and a half per cent. (25½ per cent.) on the net market value of the cotton stored in your godowns and/or Jethas shall not be fully maintained you are to have full right to dispose of the cotton stored in the said godowns and/or Jethas and apply the proceeds thereof towards making up such margin and/or claim on us for any such margin and/or for any balance due in respect of the same after the disposal of the cotton in pursuance hereof.

* * * * * * * *

"10. A register shall be kept by you of all cotton deposited in and/or removed from any godown and/or Jetha in pursuance of this agreement and such register shall be open to our inspection at any time during the usual business hours: no cotton shall be removed from the said godowns and/or Jethas except on a delivery order or orders signed by you

* * * * * * * *"

Whatever may be the strict construction of clause 2 of that letter, the Bank invariably struck a balance of its customers' accounts on the last day of each month and charged interest on the amount of that balance. The interest so charged was added to the monthly balance and the resultant balance, which included the interest, was carried forward to the debit of the customer as the balance due on the 1st of the following month. The pass-book of the defendants with the Bank shows clearly that that was the way in which interest was computed and charged in their account with the Bank. The defendants never, until after the 1st August 1914, raised any objection to that principle of charging them compound interest or to compound interest being charged by the Bank on their overdrafts. It was the course of business to which it must be taken that the defendants agreed. As long ago as 1813 Lord Ellenborough in Bruce v. Hunter (2) held that the fact that the defendant in that case had not objected to a charge of compound interest in accounts which for several years he had annually received from the plaintiff afforded sufficient evidence of a promise by him to pay interest in that manner. In addition to the evidence afforded by the pass books to which their Lordships have referred, there is the uncontradicted evidence of the manager in Bombay of the Bank that the defendants knew that their account was charged by the Bank with compound interest with monthly rests and had never objected to that course of business.

The trial Judge, on a very careful consideration, found that there was not the slightest doubt that the defendants knew that the Bank was charging compound interest and agreed to that interest being charged in that way with monthly rests, and made the decree upon the claim against the defendants Haridas Ranchordas and Ludha Dossa which has been already mentioned. He rightly held that section 92 of the Indian Evidence Act did not prevent the Bank from proving that agreement as to compound interest. The High Court in the appeal taking the same view of the facts as the trial Judge confirmed that decree, and their Lordships, agreeing with the findings of the Courts below on the question of interest, are of opinion that the decree of the High Court should be affirmed.

The counter-claim relates to the dishonour by the Bank on the 1st August 1914 of two cheques drawn by the defendants upon the Bank and presented for payment on that day. On the 1st August 1914 the overdraft of the defendants' firm amounted to Rs. 5,81,454. On the 31st July 1914 the Bank issued a notice to the defendants' firm that the Bank was not advancing further against cotton and would be obliged by the defendants reducing "the present advance." That notice was not received by the defendants until after office hours on the 1st August 1914. On the 1st August 1914 the Bank held as security for the overdraft cotton which at the market rates at the end of July 1914, as deduced from the daily circulars of Messrs. P. Chrystal & Co., represented Rs. 8,45,065, or, less the 25½ per cent. margin, Rs. 6,29,574. On the 25th July 1914 in the cotton market, prices at Bombay began to fall owing to political events in Europe. In their daily cotton report of the 30th July 1914 Messrs. P. Chrystal & Co. made the following remark: "There is practically no business in the local market pending developments in Europe." In their daily cotton report of the 31st July 1914 Messrs. P. Chrystal & Co. remarked: "The local market is demoralised on account of grave political situation." On the 1st August 1914 Messrs. P. Chrystal & Co. in their daily cotton report remarked: "The local market is practically closed. Quotations are only nominal." Those remarks of Messrs. P. Chrystal & Co. were fully justified by the facts then known, and under the circumstances existing on the 1st August 1914 the realisable value of the cotton then held by the Bank as security for the overdraft was not sufficient to cover the then overdraft; the evidence shows that there was then practically no market. Their Lordships agree with the Courts below that the Bank was justified in refusing to increase the overdraft by honouring the cheques. It is to be observed that the Bank could at any time have demanded repayment of the whole overdraft. It is proved that after the 1st August 1914 the Bombay cotton market got gradually worse, and that there were very few purchasers of cotton at Bombay during August 1914 and only in small lots. In August 1914 there was a large stock of about 500,000 bales of unsold cotton in Bombay. The trial Judge by his decree rightly dismissed the counter-claim and the High Court in appeal confirmed that decree.

Before concluding this judgment their Lordships think it right to say that they see no reason for questioning the propriety of action of the Solicitor for the defendants in the suit.

Their Lordships will humbly advise His Majesty that this appeal should be dismissed. The appellants must pay the costs of this appeal.

SUBRAMANIA PATHAR—PLAINTIFF—APPELLANT

APPU MUDALIAR AND OTHERS—DEFENDANTS—RESPONDENTS.

Execution of decree, application for—Removal of application from file for statistical purposes—Application, whether pending or judicially determined—Limitation Act (IX of 1908), Sch. I, Arts. 181, 182.

The removal of an application for the execution of a decree, for statistical purposes, from the file is not a judicial termination of the application. The application is still pending, and the Court should be moved to deal with it and to terminate it legally. No fresh application is necessary in such a case either under Article 181 or under Article 182 of Schedule I to the Limitation Act.

Appeal against the decree of the Court of the Subordinate Judge, Kumbakonam, in Appeal Suit No. 21 of 1918, preferred against the order of the Court of the District Munsif, Valangiman, in E. P. R. No. 532 of 1917, in Original Suit No. 321 of 1907.

FACTS appear from the judgment.

Mr. K. S. Jayarama Aiyar, for the Appellant.—The present application is not barred, as the prior execution applications were only struck off the file. The petition was closed only for statistical purposes. There has been no judicial termination. The previous applications must, therefore, be deemed to be pending and can be revived by the party mentioning it to Court and praying for further proceedings. To such a procedure neither Article 181 nor Article 182 applies.

See Chalavadi Kotiah v. Poloori Alimelammah (1) and Subba Chariar v. Muthuveeram Pillai (2).

Mr. K. R. Narayanaswami Ayyar, for the Respondents, relied on Singaravelu Pillai v. Santhana Krishna Mudaliar (3).

JUDGMENT.

OLDFIELD, J.—It seems to me that the applications of 24th June 1911 and 24th June 1914 were never really dismissed but were merely removed from the file for what have frequently been referred to as statistical purposes. I take this view, because the endorsements on them indicate that they were disposed of without notice or hearing and in the course of office routine. The principle to be applied is then that enunciated in Chalavadi Kotiah v. Poloori Alimelammah (1) and in Subba Chariar v. Muthuveeram Pillai (2), from which I regard Singaravelu Pillai v. Santhana Krishna Mudaliar (3) as a departure, and the consequence is that these applications are still pending and must be disposed of. The lower Appellate Court's order is, therefore, set aside and that of the District Munsif restored. The petition is remanded to the latter for further proceedings. Costs to date will follow the event and be provided for in the order to be passed.

SESHAGIRI AIYAR, J.—I agree. I only wish to say a word about Singaravelu Pillai v. Santhana Krishna Mudaliar (3), which was relied on by the learned Vakil for the respondents. The principle enunciated in Chalavadi Kotiah v. Poloori Alimelammah (1) and confirmed in Subba Chariar v. Muthuveeram Pillai (2) is that a disposal for statistical purposes is not a judicial termination of an application. That has been the accepted view in this Court except with reference to disposals to which the amendment in Order XXI, rule 57, of the Code of Civil Procedure applies. That being the true position in law, there can be no fresh application to revive the original application. The Court has to be appraised in some recognised manner that the application is still pending and steps should be taken either to bring it to fruition or to terminate it legally. This procedure of asking the Court to deal with the application is not one to which either Article 181 or 182 of the Limitation Act has application. I must say, with great respect to the learned Judges who decided Singaravelu Pillai v. Santhana Krishna Mudaliar (3), that the expression in the judgment that the application has to be revived is not reconcilable with the view that it is pending.

I agree in the order proposed by my learned brother.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), s. 73, O. XXI, r. 72—Bombay High Court Manual of Circulars, Ch. II, r. 91 (16) (c)—Execution of decree, transfer of, to Collector—Sale—Power of Collector to grant decree-holder leave to bid—Set-off, power to allow, whether in Court or Collector.

Where a decree is transferred to a Collector for execution, he has power to grant express permission to the holder of the decree to bid for, or purchase the property sold in execution, but he has no power to allow the decree-holder to set off the decretal amount against the purchase-money. Permission to allow such set-off can only be granted by the Court which transferred the decree for execution. [p. 527, cols. 1 & 2; p. 528, col. 1.]

Appeal from the decision of the District Judge, Poona, in Appeal No. 9 of 1915, confirming the order passed by the Subordinate Judge, Haveli, in Darkhast No. 763 of 1914.

Mr. P. V. Nijsure, for the Appellants.

JUDGMENT.

MACLEOD, C. J.—In this case the decree was transferred to the Collector for execution. Under rule 91 (16) (1) at page 105 of the Manual of Circulars regarding the powers of the Collector, the Collector can grant express permission to the holder of a decree, in execution of which property is sold, to bid for or purchase the property: Provided that the Collector or other officer aforesaid to whom an application for such permission may be made shall not grant such permission, unless the decree holder inter alia agrees that if the decree holder or any one on his behalf becomes the purchaser, the purchase-money shall be paid to the Collector or other officer executing the decree.

The Collector, therefore, has no power to allow a decree-holder to set off the decretal amount against the purchase-money. The question before us is whether the decree-holder having received from the Collector permission to bid, and having been declared to be the highest bidder, can apply to the Court for permission to set off the decretal amount. If the sale is held in execution under Order XXI of the Code, under rule 72 (1), "where a decree-holder purchases with such permission, the purchase-money and the amount due on the decree may, subject to the provisions of section 73, be set off against one another, and the Court executing the decree shall enter up satisfaction of the decree in whole or in part accordingly."

It would naturally follow from the fact that a decree-holder obtains permission to bid, that he should be entitled to set off the decretal amount against the purchase-money, provided that there are no other attaching creditors entitled to rateable distribution under section 73 of the Code, and it appears to me that power to give permission to set off was not granted to the Collector because the Collector would not be in a position to know what other attachments there were against the property sold in execution, but I see no reason why a decree-holder, after getting permission from the Collector to bid, should not apply to the Court for an order entitling him to a set-off. It would naturally follow from a permission to bid granted by the Court itself. We have been referred to a decision of a Bench of this Court in Shriniwas Appacharya v. Jagadevappa (1). In that case the defendant who had applied to execute a decree, and whose decree had been transferred to the Collector for execution, applied to the Court in the first place for leave to bid at the sale, and then for permission to set off the price against the decretal debt. It was held that the Court had no power to entertain the application for leave to bid, nor could it permit a set-off. It is quite clear that the Court had no power, once a decree had been transferred to the Collector for execution, to entertain an application by the decree-holder for leave to bid. But I do not think that the point that arises in this case was before the Court in that case, and although there was an expression of opinion on the part of the Court that an application to set off could not be entertained, that must be read in connection with the application which was then made, which was primarily one for permission to bid. It is certainly unreasonable to suppose that a decree-holder who has obtained permission to bid from the Collector, should not be able to obtain from the proper authority the right to set off, which is the natural consequence of having received permission to bid. The reason why he must apply to the Court is clear. The Court which transferred the decree for execution would be the Court which would know what other applications for attachment had been made and it would, therefore, be the only authority to know whether the decree-holder could set off the whole of the decretal amount against his purchase-money, or what amount he should pay into Court in order that there might be rateable distribution in favour of himself and other attaching creditors. If the Court had not this authority to grant leave to set off after the decree has been transferred to the Collector for execution, it follows that a successful decree-holder at the sale would have to pay to the Collector the whole of the purchase-money, and might then have to wait a very considerable time before he got back the money again to which he was entitled under his decree. In my opinion, therefore, this appeal should be allowed, and an order made giving the decree-holder permission to set off the decretal amount against the purchase-money, as it is not suggested that there are any attaching creditors who have executed their decrees against this particular property which has been sold.

It follows that the agreement the applicant had to make with the Collector to pay in the whole of the purchase money becomes null and void to the extent of the set-off. The appeal is allowed with costs throughout.

HEATON, J.—I concur. There can, I think, be no doubt that when leave is given to a decree-holder to bid at an auction-sale, a necessary consequence is that he shall ordinarily be permitted to set off the amount due to him under his decree against the amount he is required to pay, if he is the highest bidder at the auction. That is apparent from rule 72 of Order XXI of the Code, and as my Lord the Chief Justice has pointed out, it has convenience to recommend it, and great inconvenience would result from any other course. As the power to allow a decree-holder to bid at an auction sale is transferred to the Collector in cases of the kind we are considering, I should infer, if there were nothing to the contrary, that the Collector also had power to allow a set-off, because by allowing it he would be merely exercising what would be an ordinary and reasonable ancillary power in the conduct of the business entrusted to him. There is, however, specific provision in the rules which implicitly forbids the Collector to allow a set-off. That is clause (16) (c) of rule 91 of the rules which appear on page 106 of the Manual of Circulars of this Court. Now is that limitation on the Collector's powers intended to prevent a set-off in such cases, or is it merely intended to provide that the Court, and not the Collector, shall allow the set off? It seems to me that this clause is not intended to prohibit a set-off altogether, because to do so is unnecessary. It is inconvenient, and it is contrary to the general purpose of the law in cases of this kind. But the Collector is not the person to allow the set-off, for the simple but very sufficient reason that in many cases he would not be in a position to know whether there were other attaching creditors who had a claim to rateable distribution. That information is in the possession of the Court, and I conclude that as that information is in the possession of the Court, it is intended that the Court, and not the Collector, should give leave to set off. It is true that the rules might have made this clearer. It is also true that in the case of Shriniwas Appacharya v. Jagadevappa (1) there is an expression of opinion to the contrary. But that expression of opinion was not necessary for the purpose of the decision arrived at, nor in that case was any mention made of what seems to us to be the dominating consideration in this matter, and that is that by reason of the possibility of rateable distribution the Collector is not, whilst the Court is, in a position to decide whether a set-off should be allowed or not. Therefore, I agree in the order proposed.

Appeal allowed.

The Hon'ble Pandit Gokaran Nath Misra holding brief of the Hon'ble Syed Wazir Hasan and Syed Ali Mohammad, for the Appellant.

Babu Bisheshwar Nath Srivastava, for Respondents Nos. 6 to 9.

JUDGMENT.—Ali Husain, Mehdi Husain and Raza Husain, three brothers, owned a four-annas share in the village of Sewain. This share was mortgaged with possession in 1270 to Haidar Husain. In 1880 Haidar Husain instituted a suit under old Regulation XVII of 1806 to obtain foreclosure of the mortgaged property under a condition in the deed of mortgage on which he relied. He alleged in his plaint that Mehdi Husain had, in addition to the one anna and four pies share which he possessed in Sewain, acquired the one anna and four-pies share of his brother Ali Husain by purchase. He, therefore, made parties to the suit Mehdi Husain in respect of two annas and eight pies of the mortgaged property and Raza Husain in respect of one anna and four pies of the mortgaged property. He obtained a decree for foreclosure against the whole four annas share. This was in 1880. Several years afterwards Mehdi Husain and Raza Husain sued to redeem the original mortgage, alleging that the proceedings of 1880 did not prevent their so doing. Mehdi Husain clearly asserted in his plaint that he was the owner of two annas and eight pies, having purchased the share of his brother Ali Husain. These latter proceedings terminated by a compromise, dated the 9th September 1915, under which the right to redemption was admitted. The amount due under the mortgage was paid. Mehdi Husain took a two annas and eight-pies share and Raza Husain took a one-anna and four-pies share. Ali Husain was dead, His son Muhammad Husain sold on the 8th April 1916 his one anna and four-pies share to Musi Raza. Musi Raza relying on this transfer instituted a suit for redemption against Mehdi Husain and the heirs of Raza Husain. The suit was not contested. It is to be noted that Mehdi Husain in this suit did not suggest that he had purchased Ali Husain's share. In fact he set up no defence. In consequence Musi Raza obtained a decree for redemption of the one-anna and four-pies share. Mehdi Husain then instituted a suit for pre-emption against Musi Raza who in the meantime had sold the share to Saiyad Husain. The suit has been dismissed by the trial Court. The decision dismissing it has been upheld in appeal. Muntazim Husain, one of the sons of Mehdi Husain, Mehdi Husain having since died, has instituted the present appeal.

The suit was dismissed on two grounds, the first being that inasmuch as Mehdi Husain had previously denied the title of Ali Husain, he had lost any right to pre emption which he might otherwise have possessed. The second ground was that the transfer by Muhammad Husain son of Ali Husain to Musi Raza did not constitute a sale of the property but was merely the sale of a share in a law suit. It may well be questioned whether Mehdi Husain did at any time actually deny the title of his brother Ali Husain. In the proceedings of 1880 Haidar Husain had himself asserted that Mehdi Husain had purchased Ali Husain's share. Acquiescence in this assertion can hardly be considered as a denial of the title of Ali Husain by Mehdi Husain and even when Mehdi Husain instituted proceedings for redemption, the fact that he asserted that Ali Husain had transferred his share to him is hardly denial of Ali Husain's title. It was an assertion of Ali Husain's title coupled with an assertion that Ali Husain had transferred that title to him, Mehdi Husain. As Mehdi Husain was appearing as a representative of Ali Husain by transfer, he can hardly be considered to have denied Ali Husain's title. But in any circumstances a previous denial of title does not deprive a person of a right of pre-emption under the Oudh Laws Act, according to a recent decision in Thepai v. Mahabir Prasad (1) which, being the decision of a Bench, is binding upon me sitting as a single Judge. So in so far as the dismissal of the present suit is based upon the alleged denial by Mehdi Husain of Ali Husain's title, the dismissal cannot be supported.

The second question remains—did Muhammad Husain transfer to Musi Raza a share in a law suit? If he did so, there can be no doubt as to the fact that no right of pre-emption arises. This is clear on the decision of their Lordships of the Privy Council in Abdul Wahid Khan v. Shaluka Bibi (2), the reference being to the remarks of their Lordships at page 502. But as has been pointed out recently in Balwant Singh v. Lallu Ram (3), the question whether a sale is a genuine sale or a mere sale of a share in a law suit is one to be determined on the facts of each case. The mere fact that legal proceedings are necessary to obtain possession of the property sold is no ground for holding that the sale does not give rise to a right of pre-emption. I have examined the sale deed executed by Muhammad Husain in favour of Musi Raza on the 8th April 1916 in respect of the transaction in question. The deed is a sale out and out of the share of one-anna and four pies, which had formerly belonged to Ali Husain and which had descended to the vendor. There is no question of selling a part of the share. The whole is sold. There is no question of enlisting the assistance of an outside party for contribution towards the expenses of legal proceedings, on the consideration that he is to be rewarded by a portion of the subject-matter of the suit in event of the litigation being successful. The whole property is sold. It is true that Muhammad Husain was out of possession. He necessarily would be out of possession because the property had been mortgaged to Haidar Husain and although the mortgage had been redeemed by the other mortgagors, neither Ali Husain nor his successor had paid their share of the amount required for redemption. The only point upon which it can be suggested that the transaction was of a speculative nature is contained in the statement that Muhammad Husain had written to Mehdi Husain offering to redeem his share and that Mehdi Husain had not answered the letter. It is established that Muhammad Husain did write such a letter and that Mehdi Husain did not answer it. It is further established that Mehdi Husain was not ready until the proceedings came into Court to recieve the amount due and give up the one-anna and four pies share. But these circumstances do not show that what was transferred was a share in a law suit.

(3) 49 Ind. Cas. 462; 6 O. L. J. 29.

I can find nothing to establish that Mehdi Husain ever denied that Muhammad Husain had a right to redeem. His refusal to accept the money need necessarily mean no more than that at the time he did not consider the tender sufficient. It is true he accepted it afterwards. The case remains that when Musi Raza instituted the suit for redemption, Mehdi Husain consented to a decree. The position of a person with a right of pre-emption, who at the same time is a defendant in a suit for redemption, is a very peculiar one. I have been referred to a decision in Raj Bahadur v. Jagrup Pande (4) to which I was a party. I there was of opinion that, when a vendor transferred a purely speculative claim having no more than a possible right to recover possession, such transfer did not give rise to a right of pre-emption even although the speculative claim subsequently succeeded. I am still of that opinion. But the peculiar circumstances of the present suit were not and could not have been in my contemplation when I was deciding that appeal, and I do not consider that the view which I am now taking is in any way inconsistent either with my view in that appeal or the views laid down in Mirza Mohammed Abbas Ali Khan Bahadur v. A. Quieros (5). Mehdi Husain's position was as follows: He had asserted in prior proceedings that Ali Husain transferred him his share. When he was actually faced, however, with the position that Ali Husain's transferee was seeking possession of that share, he had every right to come to the conclusion (at which he apparently arrived) that there was no good transfer made to him from Ali Husain. Now if no good transfer was made to him from Ali Husain, the share remained Ali Husain's. If Ali Husain transferred it to a stranger, Mehdi Husain had a right of pre-emption. In view of the fact that when the suit for redemption was brought he admitted that Ali Husain's successor-in-interest had a right to redeem, why should he be deprived of his right of pre-emption? He was not setting up inconsistent claims. He admitted the right to redeem and in the circumstances had a right to retain his right of pre emption. Holding as I do that the transfer was a transfer of property and not of a share in a law suit and finding that Mehdi Hussain had admitted his brother's title, I fail to understand why he should be deprived of the right of pre-emption which he undoubtedly possessed. The circumstances in this case have been a little complicated by the fact that Musi Raza who purchased the property for Rs. 5,000 sold it to Saiyad Husain for Rs. 5,500. The sale in respect of which pre-emption is sought is the sale to Musi Raza. This may be hard on Saiyad Husain. But the circumstance that he paid Rs. 500 more for the property than he will now get for it cannot deprive the appellant of his right to exercise pre-emption.

I, therefore, allow this appeal. I direct that if the appellant pays Rs. 5,000 to Saiyad Husain within six months of the date of the decree following judgment, Saiyad Husain shall transfer to him the one-anna and four-pies share in question. Nothing will be paid to Musi Raza, as he has already received the Rs. 5,000 which he paid and more. In view of the peculiar circumstances of the case I direct that the parties bear their own costs in all Courts.

Appeal allowed.

JUDGMENT.—This second appeal includes little else except questions of fact. The defendants claim as transferees from Bhagawa, the widow of Ramappa, alleging that she relinquished absolutely her life-estate in her husband's property in favour of the 1st defendant, her mother-in-law. Admittedly there is no transfer of the widow's interest in writing. An attempt has been made to prove it by oral evidence. But even supposing that this evidence were admissible to prove a tansfer, the Court has held as a matter of fact that the relinquishment is not proved. I myself should very much doubt whether it could be held that the widow could entirely relinquish her life estate in her husband's property merely by making an oral statement before the Mamlatdar, or agreeing to the transfer of the Khata to the transferee's name. Then it has been proved that although Bhagawa gave her age as twenty when she made the statement before the Mamlatdar, as a matter of fact she was a minor at the time. Therefore, it seems obvious that even if as a matter of fact there was a relinquishment, if it was done by a widow who was a minor, the decision of both Courts was correct. The appeal must be dismissed with costs.

The respondent-plaintiff filed cross-objections to that part of the decree of the learned Appellate Judge which laid down that the plaintiff took the property awarded to him subject to the obligation to provide sufficient maintenance to the 1st defendant, and directed that the Subordinate Judge should determine what was proper and sufficient maintenance for the defendant, and should secure the same for her benefit. I think that Mr. Desai is right when he says that the plaintiff purchaser from defendant No. 6, the adopted son of Bhagawa, took the property free of all claim for maintenance by the 1st defendant. It is settled law now that a claim for maintenance by a female member of a joint family is a personal claim against members of the family, and can only be made a charge on the family property by an order of the Court or by a properly executed document. Generally speaking, the transferee of joint property from the properly authorised member of a joint family takes that property free of any claims to maintenance by female members of the family. The case referred to by the learned Appellate Judge, Yellawa v. Bhimangavda (1), lays down an equitable principle that a Court will not allow the heir to recover the family property from the widow, entitled to be maintained out of it, before securing proper maintenance for her. That decision is founded on the equity that the heir is personally bound to maintain the widow, and if the Court allows him to recover the property from the widow, he must in equity secure the widow's rights to maintenance. But it is an entirely different question when a person entitled to dispose of family property not charged with any maintenance disposes of that property in favour of an innocent purchaser without notice of any personal claims imposed on the transferor. Even if he had such notice, I apprehend there would be no obligation upon him to fulfil the personal obligations of his vendor. Therefore, in my opinion, the decree of the lower Appellate Court must be amended and the order of the trial Court restored. It is open, of course, to the 1st defendant to claim maintenance from the 6th defendant, who holds the family property now in the shape of cash instead of land. The appellants must pay the respondents' costs of the appeal and the costs of the 1st respondent's cross objections.

Limitation Act (IX of 1908), Sch. I, Art. 113—Specific Relief Act (I of 1877), s. 27—Contract of sale—Specific performance, suit for—Subsequent purchaser with notice of contract joined as defendant more than three years after date fixed for performance—Limitation.

In a suit for specific performance of a contract of sale of a house, a subsequent purchaser of the house with notice of such contract was joined as a defendant more than three years from the date fixed for the performance of the contract, and it was contended that as against him the suit was barred by limitation and should be dismissed:

Held, that as the subsequent purchaser was not the person who was primarily the party to perform the contract and was joined under section 27 of the Specific Relief Act in order that the plaintiff might have full reliefs and might not be driven to a separate suit against him, the suit was not barred by limitation. [p. 534, col. I]

Appeal against the decree of the Court of the Subordinate Judge, Bezwada, in Civil Suit No. 115 of 1913.

Mr. M. O. Parthasarathy Aiyangar (with him Mr. M. O. Tirumalachariar), for the Appellants.—The lower Court was wrong in holding that the suit was barred as against the 7th defendant. The joinder of the 7th defendant was only as a matter of form. As against the 1st defendant the suit is within three years of his refusal to perform the contract and so is in time. The 7th defendant did not enter into the contract. He was joined only to avoid multiplicity of suits. There is no averment in the plaint that he refused to perform the contract more than 3 years before suit. It would be a hardship on the buyer that he should be compelled to know all transactions subsequent to the contract. It is enough that the suit is brought within 3 years of the refusal to perform by the person who entered into the contract.

Messrs. T. Ramachandra Row and A. Krishnaswamy Aiyar, for the Respondents.—As against the 7th defendant who is a subsequent purchaser, the suit is barred. He was impleaded after 3 years from the date of the refusal by the 1st defendant to perform his contract. The 7th defendant purchased on 17th April 1913 and the suit should have been instituted against both 1st and 7th defendants simultaneously.

JUDGMENT.—The question of limitation raised in this suit is one of first impression. The suit is for specific performance. The 1st defendant was the person who agreed to sell the plaint house to the plaintiff. This was on 17th February 1907. The 7th defendant bought the property in execution of a money decree against the owner of the property on the 17th April 1913. It has been found that he had knowledge of the agreement in favour of the plaintiff The suit was instituted on 26th November 1913 and that, as found by the Subordinate Judge, was within 3 years of the date of refusal on the part of the 1st defendant to perform the contract. The 7th defendant was not originally made a party to the suit, but was added on the 22nd December 1914, which would be more than 3 years from the date of refusal to perform the contract on the part of the 1st defendant. The question is whether the suit ought to be dismissed against the 7th defendant as being barred.

Article 113, which is the only Article applicable to this case, says that for a suit for specific performance the limit of time is 3 years from the date fixed for the performance (which is not the case here) or, if no such date is fixed, when the plaintiff has notice that performance is refused. The suit was filed within 3 years of the refusal to perform the contract; and so far as the 7th defendant is concerned, it is not suggested that he had refused performance of the contract more than 3 years prior to the date on which he was joined. It is argued that the 7th defendant is a necessary party to the suit and that the decree must be both against the 1st defendant who entered into the contract and the 7th defendant, who purchased the property with notice of the contract. It is not necessary for us to decide whether he is a necessary party or merely a proper party, for, even on the supposition that he is a necessary party, we do not see how it can be said that the suit is barred against him unless he is able to show that it has been instituted against him more than three years after the refusal on his part to join in the conveyance in performance of the contract. He is not the person who is primarily the party to perform the contract. He is joined under the provisions of section 27 of the Specific Relief Act, in order that the plaintiff may have full reliefs and may not be driven to a separate suit against him. The plaintiff suing for specific performance may not know to what person the owner of the property has purported to sell it, after entering into the contract with him. It would be altogether unreasonable to hold that though the suit was brought within 3 years from the date of the refusal on the part of the owner of the property who entered into the contract, yet the plaintiff would not be entitled to any remedy against a person who subsequently brought the property with notice of such contract, even though the plaintiff did not know the existence of such a person until after the expiration of 3 years or until after the institution of the suit. The result, no doubt, of holding that time is to be reckoned against the purchaser with notice from the date of refusal to perform the contract on the part of the person who entered into the contract of sale, except where there has been a refusal on the part of the purchaser with notice within the meaning of the article, would be that the plaintiff would be at liberty to proceed against the purchaser with notice even after 3 years have expired. But we do not think that such a purchaser has much to complain of. If, however, he has been in possession and enjoyment of the property for 12 years, he may plead limitation on that score to any suit for recovery of possession. But that is another matter. We, therefore, hold that the conclusion of the trial Judge on the question of limitation is wrong.

Appeal from the decree of the District Judge, Fyzabad, dated the 16th December 1918, setting aside the decree of the Additional Munsif, Fyzabad, dated the 10th April 1918.

The Hon'ble Pandit Gokaran Nath Misra and Babu Jiban Krishna Bannerji, for the Appellant.

Mr. Niamatullah, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The defendant-appellant is the superior proprietor of the village Kauro Raghopur. Kalwant Singh and Subhdhan Singh obtained a decree for the sub-settlement of that village as against the then superior proprietor on the 24th of July 1868. Out of the said village 65 Bighas 11 Biswas of land were claimed by Mahant Bhao Gir as having been held by him and his ancestors under birt grants made by the ancestors of Kulwant Singh and Subhdhan Singh. On the 27th August 1869 Mahant Bhao Gir obtained a decree in respect of the said land as a birtdar (Exhibits 2 and 3). The result of these two decrees was that while Kulwant Singh and Subhdhan Singh remained under-proprietors of the entire village, some of the plots appertaining to that village became subordinate under-proprietary holdings of Mahant Bhao Gir, who was liable to pay under-proprietary rent amounting to the Government revenue and a malikana allowance of 5 per cent. on account of the same to the former.

Kulwant Singh and Subhdhan Singh appear to have made default in paying the under-proprietary rent due by them to the superior proprietor. The superior proprietor obtained a decree for the arrears due to him and in execution of that decree the whole of their under-proprietary rights were sold and were purchased by the superior proprietor (Exhibit A-1). This sale took place on the 27th January 1880. In the course of the inquiry which preceded the sale, the Deputy Commissioner recommended that the sale should be made subject to a reservation of the occupancy rights of the judgment-debtors Kulwant Singh and Subhdhan Singh in respect of certain sir lands which were in their possession and of similar occupancy rights in favour of certain shankalapdars whose land was specified but whose names were not mentioned. With the exception of these two parcels of land in which occupancy rights were to be reserved, the Deputy Commissioner proposed to wipe out all other subordinate tenures in order that the arrears of under-proprietary rent due to the superior proprietor may be recovered. His recommendation appears to have been accepted by the Chief Commissioner, who sanctioned the sale in the manner proposed (Exhibit A 28). The sale certificate purported to convey the entire rights of the judgment-debtors in the said village subject to the reservations above mentioned. At the last settlement Raghubar Gir, the son of Mahant Bhao Gir, was recorded as holding the disputed plots as an occupancy tenant. The area then held by him in his possession was 33 Bighas 11 Biswas (Exhibit A-40). The plaintiff is the son of Raghubar Gir. In 1909 Thakurain Sri Ram Kuar, the predecessor-in-title of the defendant-appellant, issued a notice of ejectment against the plaintiff respondent treating him as an ordinary tenant. The plaintiff respondent contested the notice on the ground that he was a birtdar, but he was unsuccessful except as regards two plots Nos. 1433 and 1445 measuring 9 Biswas in respect of which his occupancy rights had been reserved at the time of the sale The superior proprietor obtained formal possession under section 60, Oudh Rent Act (XXII of 1886), over the remaining plots on the 16th June 1905. There was no crop standing at the time.

Despite his formal ejectment the plaintiff-respondent, however, continued in possession of the said plots. The superior proprietor gave a lease of the said plots to a person named Sitla Bakhsh, but he does not appear to have succeeded in getting possession. He took proceedings in ejectment against Lachhmi Narain, the son of Sitla Bakhsh, also and obtained a formal order of ejectment against him. But the finding of the Courts below is that neither the ejectment proceedings taken by Thakurain Sri Ram Kuar in 1909 nor the ejectment proceedings taken by the defendant against Lachhmi Narain in 1917 had the effect of disturbing the possession of the plaintiff-respondent, and the validity of that finding is not challenged.

The present suit has been brought by the plaintiff for a declaration that he is still the birtdar or subordinate under-proprietor of the disputed land. Both the Courts below found in his favour so far as his title as birtdar went, but the Court of first instance dismissed the claim on the ground that he ought to have first taken action to get back his under-proprietary holding under section 108, clause 10, of the Oudh Rent Act. The lower Appellate Court held on the other hand that section 108, clause 10, of the Oudh Rent Act did not apply to a person who was already in possession. It accordingly decreed the claim.

The main contention of the learned Counsel who appears for the defendant appellant is that the rights of the plaintiff-respondent and his predecessor-in-interest as a birtdar were extinguished by the auction sale of the 27th of January 1880 and that the claim was at any rate barred by time and by section 108, clause 10, of the Oudh Rent

Act. It is also urged that the suit is not maintainable.

The sale in question was made under section 125 of the Oudh Rent Act (XIX of 1868). That section provided that, if it appeared to the Court that the satisfaction of a decree could be made in the manner provided in sections 243 and 244 of the Code of Civil Procedure, it might appoint the Deputy Commissioner as manager of the property in respect of which the arrears were due and the Deputy Commissioner when so appointed might exercise, for the satisfaction of the decree against the judgment-debtor, all the powers which, under any law in force in Oudh, he might have exercised for the recovery of an arrear of revenue due by such judgment-debtor to the Government. Section 243 of the old Code of Civil Procedure (VIII of 1859) authorised a Court to appoint a manager of the property intended to be sold with power to collect the rents or other reciepts and profits of the land or other immoveable property directed to be sold and apply such rents, profits and reciepts towards the payment of the amount of the decree and costs. It appears that the Depnty Commissioner was appointed manager in respect of the under-proprietary tenure belonging to Kulwant Singh and Subhdhan Singh under the above provisions. The Deputy Commissioner appears to have proceeded with the sale under section 125 of the Oudh Rent Act read with sections 132 and 133 of the Oudh Land Revenue Act (XVII of 1876). Section 248 of the old Civil Procedure Code (VIII of 1859) was extended to Rent Courts by section 109 of the old Oudh Rent Act (XIX of 1868). The effect of the sale under sections 133 and 150 of the Oudh Land Revenue Act (XVII of 1876) was that all grants and contracts previously made by any person other than the purchaser in respect of such land became void as against the purchaser at the auction-sale.

In the lower Appellate Court it was, however, conceded that the plaintiff was a birtdar, holding subordinate under-proprietary rights under a decree of the Settlement Court, and the matter cannot now be opened. The claim is not barred by limitation or by section 108, clause 10, of the Oudh Rent Act (XXII of 1886) because it is conceded that the possession of the planitiff has all along remained undisturbed. A person who is in possession is not bound to sue for a declaration of his title, and a suit on his behalf for the recovery of the occupancy of land from which he has not actually been dispossessed is out of the question.

The appeal is, therefore, dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

RESPONDENT.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. XXXIV, r. 14—Mortgage, usufructuary—Mortgagor left in possession as tenant—Rent, decree for—Mortgaged property, whether can be sold in execution of such decree.

At the time of executing a usufructuary mortgage, the mortgagor executed a rent-note in favour of the mortgagee and continued in possession of the property. He failed to pay the rent due and the mortgagee obtained a decree for the amount due, which he assigned to a third person, who sought to issue execution by sale of the mortgagor's equity of redemption in the mortgaged property:

Held, that the claim on which the mortgagee got a decree was really a decree for payment of money in satisfaction of the claim arising out of the mortgage, and, therefore, within rule 14 of Order XXXIV of the Civil Procedure Code and that the assignee, therefore, was not competent to apply for sale of the mortgaged property. [p. 538, col. 1.]

A mortgagee who obtains a decree which he cannot execute by sale of the mortgaged property, cannot put his mortgagor in a worse position by assigning his decree to a third party. [p. 538, col. 1.]

IBRAHIM GOOLAM HUSENBUX v. NIHALCHAND WUGHMAL.

JUDGMENT.—This is an appeal from the order of the District Judge of Thana, disallowing the appellant's contention that the execution of the decree passed against him in favour of Fojmal Navlaji and others could not proceed by bringing the mortgaged property to sale. Fojmal Navlaji and others were mortgagees of the appellant under a mortgage of the 10th of June 1913. That was a usufructuary mortgage. On the same day the defendant mortgagor executed a rent-note in favour of the mortgagees for a period of twelve months, and as he did not pay the rent under that rent-note the mortgagees filed a suit and obtained a decree for Rs. 1,000. Then they assigned that decree to the present respondents, who sought to issue execution by sale of the mortgagor's equity of redemption in the mortgaged property.

It has been contended for the appellant that the respondents cannot be allowed to bring the mortgaged property to sale otherwise than by instituting a suit for sale in enforcement of the mortgage under Order XXXIV, rule 14, of the Civil Procedure Code. Now in cases of usufructuary mortgages it is not unusual for the mortgagees to allow the property to remain in the possession of the mortgagor on his executing a rent-note. But as a matter of fact that is merely a method of securing the interest by special agreement, that is to say, the mortgagor collects the usufruct and pays a certain amount to the mortgagee under the rent-note instead of the mortgagee collecting the usufruct himself.

It does not seem that the question which arises in this appeal has been decided in any reported case of this Court, although in more than one case which has lately come before this Bench, it has appeared that a mortgagee has obtained a rent note from his mortgagor and issued execution on a decree under that rent-note. At first sight it might appear that that is not a decree for the payment of money in satisfaction of a claim arising under the mortgage.

This question was considered very fully in a recent Allahabad decision in Kadma Yasin v. Muhammad Ali (1). The facts were very similar to the facts in this case. There the property was mortgaged by a usufructuary mortgage, and a subsequent agreement was entered into between the parties, whereby the mortgagor bound herself to pay annually a fixed sum of money in lieu of the offerings, and also, in case of default, to pay interest thereon. Default having been made, the mortgagee sued on the agreement and obtained a decree for money against the mortgagor. In execution of this decree he attached the mortgaged property and sought to have it sold. Upon objection by the mortgagor, judgment-debtor, it was held that the mortgagee could not bring the mortgaged property to sale in execution of the decree, as the claim under the subsequent agreement was one arising under the original contract of mortgage within the meaning of Order XXXIV, rule 14, of the Code of Civil Procedure. Mr. Justice Piggott at page 407* says:—

"In the case now before us the money for which this decree was obtained represented the usufruct of the mortgaged property to which the mortgagee was entitled as part of his contract of mortgage. His right to receive this money rested upon his position as mortgagee. The mortgagor had become liable to pay the mortgagee this money in consequence of an agreement entered into between the parties subsequent to the mortgage; but it seems to me, in the first place, that the money for which the decree was passed was an essential part of the mortgage money, just as much as arrears of interest, which, if falling due on a contract of simple mortgage, become part of the mortgage money; in the second place, it seems to me that it would be doing violence to the plain language of the rule to say that the claim in satisfaction of which this decree was passed was not a claim arising under the original contract of mortgage."

I agree with these remarks; and they apply even more strongly to the facts of this case, as the agreement whereby the mortgagor agreed to pay rent was passed at the same time as the mortgage, and was, therefore, part of the mortgage transaction.

It has been urged that the respondents, who are assignees of the original mortgagee's decree, are in a better position than their assignors. But it seems to me perfectly clear that a mortgagee who has obtained a decree which he cannot execute by sale of the mortgaged property, cannot put his mortgagor in a worse position by assigning his decree to a third party. That question was considered in Chhogan v. Lakshman (2). The learned Judges there referred to a dictum by Tindal, C. J., in Booth v. Bank of England (3): "Whatever is prohibited by law to be done directly, cannot legally be effected by an indirect and circuitous contrivance."

(1) 50 Ind. Cas. 134; 41 A. 399; 17 A. L. J. 481.

Therefore, on the facts of this case, it seems to me that this claim on which the mortgagee got a decree was really a decree for payment of money in satisfaction of the claim arising out of the mortgage; and, therefore, comes within Order XXXIV, rule 14, of the Code. The appeal must be allowed with costs throughout.

Appeal allowed.

CHINTAMANIBHATLA VENKATA REDDI PANTULU GARU AND ANOTHER —APPELLANTS

HER HIGHNESS SRI MAHARANI SRI SITABA GARU, RANI SAHEBA OF WADHWAN – RESPONDENT.

Hindu Law—Alienation by widow—Necessity—Burden of proof—Efflux of time, effect of.

An alienation by a Hindu widow is challengeable on the ground that it was made without legal necessity, however long a time might have elapsed since the date of the alienation, and the onus is on the defendant to prove that there was necessity for the alienation. But when the transaction took place very many years ago, such full and detailed evidence as to the state of things which gave rise to the sale cannot be expected as in the case of alienations made at more or less recent dates. In such circumstances presumptions are admissible to fill in the details which have been obliterated by time. [p. 540, col. 1.]

Appeal from a decree of the Madras High Court (Abdul Rahim and Phillips, JJ.), dated the 29th February 1916, reversing a decree of the District Court of Vizagapatam, dated the 7th October 1914.

FACTS.—Ananta Row, the owner of the estate in suit, died in 1829 leaving a widow Hanumayamma and a daughter. In 1830, Hamumayamma sold the estate to a purchaser from whom the respondent derived title. Hanumayamma died in 1907 and in 1912, three days before the period of limitation, the present appellants, who were Ananta Row's reversioners, sued claiming the estate on the ground that the sale was without legal necessity and was binding only during the widow's lifetime.

The District Judge held that the price was adequate but that legal necessity was not proved to have existed. He observed:—"This" (whether the sale was for legal necessity) "is the crux of the case. I have been referred to numerous reported decisions with regard to the law on this point; but in the present case I do not think that any legal problem is involved. It is pithily laid down in Harihar Ojha v. Dasarathi Misra (1) that when the plaintiff has proved that he is the next heir of the husband of the widow alienor and that the defendant is in possession of the property, the plaintiff would then be entitled to a decree, unless the defendant then proves that the alienation was justified by legal necessity. To summarize Mayne (Hindu Law, page 844) who, I think, clearly explains the recognized law, granting that there is necessity, i.e, actual pressure such as an outstanding decree or impending sale a widow is at liberty within a reasonable latitude to sell such part of her property as will meet that necessity."

After dealing with the evidence of necessity, he summed up as follows:—

"The case, therefore, resolves itself into this question. Can a widow who, after making the highest possible estimate of her husband's liabilities, has a reasonable prospect of liquidating those debts within 5 years, (and, as the event proved, could have liquidated them well within that period) plead legal necessity to sell, or legal justification in selling the reversioner's estate, when she is not being pressed by any process of attachment? I know of no legally accepted definition of 'necessity' which permits of any but a negative answer. Accordingly I find on the 5th issue that the sale was not for legal necessity."

(1) 33 C. 257 at p. 268; 9 C. W. N. 636; 1 C. L. J. 408.

He accordingly decreed the suit. On appeal the High Court (Abdur Rahim and Phillips, JJ.) reversed this decision. After reviewing at length the evidence as to necessity, the learned Judges observed:—

"The above facts show that the debts payable, including the peishcush already due which would become due on the 10th May, entirely covered the value of the property. It is almost certain (so far as it is possible to be certain about the state of things which existed in 1830 that the Taluk would have been summarily sold by the Government for arrears of revenue if it had not been sold to Suryaprakasa Row. Under compulsory revenue sale the property would have fetched something wholly inadequate, perhaps only a few hundred rupees. The widow and her daughter would have absolutely nothing left for maintenance and the debts incurred by her husband would have remained undischarged. Under the Hindu Law and religion, it is regarded as the pious duty of a widow to discharge the liabilties of her deceased husband and even the payment by her of debts which had already become barred has been upheld as proper on such grounds. [See Kandasami Mannavan v. Rajagopalasami Thevan (2) which follows Kondappa v. Subba (3).] But the sale under consideration was a very clear case of actual necessity. By actual necessity it is not to be understood that the widow is bound to wait till she is pressed for payment of her husband's debts or other just liabilities either by the institution of suits or by clamant letters of demand and that she must not take any action until the very last moment. She is not a trustee of the property in the ordinary sense of the word. She is entitled to it in her own right though only to a limited extent. If she finds that the most prudent course to adopt for discharging her just liabilities and for saving what is yet reasonably possible to save is to sell the property, she should be allowed to do so. The law does not compel her, in a case where the debts amount to the full value of the property, to go on borrowing and struggling on the merest chance that at some distant date, she might be able to realise enough by way of income to discharge the debts. The law allows her discretion to judge what is the best course of action in the interest of the estate as well as of herself. Even judging her conduct in this case, by the strictest standard, we should hold that the sale of the property was inevitable. By selling it in time she was able to save out of the wreck not only Rs. 1,100 on the interest of which she maintained herself and her daughter but also the house, some maniam lands and certain palmyra topes."

They accordingly allowed the appeal and dismissed the suit. Hence the present appeal.

Messrs. DeGruyther, K. C., and Dube, for the Appellants.—The onus was on the respondent to prove legal necessity for the sale, and she has not done so. No doubt after a very long interval of time less evidence may be required, but the burden of proof is not shifted; moreover in the present case we have documents showing the position at the time of the sale.

[Mr. Upjohn, K. C., for the Respondent, referred to Nanda Lal v. Jagat Kishore Acharjya (4)]

In that case there was a deed reciting necessity: there is no such deed here. Even allowing there were debts, there was no need for the widow to sell the whole estate. The District Judge has rightly held that the debts could easily have been paid out of income.

Mr. Upjohn, K. C., Sir W. Garth, K. C., and Mr. Parikh, for the Respondent, were not called on.

decree of the High Court of Madras, dated the 29th February 1916. It reversed a decree of the District Court of Vizagapatam, dated the 7th October 1914.

The object of the suit, which was by a reversioner, was for the purpose of setting aside a deed of sale—an alienation by a widow: and the pinch of the case, as argued in the Courts below and before their Lordships, is whether that alienation is challengeable on the ground that it is made without legal necessity. The sale took place so far back as the 5th May 1830. The widow in question survived that sale by no less a period than 70 years, she having died on the 15th December 1900. The suit in the present case was instituted in the year 1912, within a few days from the expiry of the period of limitation under the Statute. It results accordingly that the investigation subsequent to the initiation of the suit in 1912 was an investigation with regard to the circumstances of a transaction more than 82 years after that transaction took place.

In these circumstances their Lordships —the case being singular in these points of date—are moved to repeat as part of their own judgment the following propositions, which represent, in their view, both the sense as well as the law of the situation so disclosed. In the judgment appealed from the learned Judges of the High Court lay down the law as follows:—

"It is not disputed that the onus lay upon the defendant to prove the necessity for the sale, but having regard to the great lapse of time since the transaction took place, that is, about 82 years, perhaps the highest on record, it will not be reasonable to expect such full and detailed evidence as to the state of things which gave rise to the sale in question as in the case of alienations made at more or less recent dates. In such circumstances, presumptions are permissible to fill in the details which have been obliterated by time."

Their Lordships adopt that statement of the law.

They desire indeed only to add that it is matter of some surprise that so much documentary evidence still remains: and from a perusal of it and the whole proceedings in the case they see no cause to doubt that the decree pronounced by the High Court is one which ought to be affirmed. They have the less reason to doubt this on account of the argument of the appellants presented to the Board, which appears to have exhausted every avenue of attack open to a person challenging an ancient transaction.

Their Lordships will humbly advise His Majesty that this appeal stand dismissed with costs.

Landlord and tenant—Mulgeni tenant—Transfer of lease—Rent, liability of transferee for.

The transfer by a mulgeni tenant of his permanent lease has the effect of creating privity of estate between the landlord and the transferee, and the former is entitled to recover from the latter the rent due under the lease. [p. 54', col 1]

Second appeal from the decision of the District Judge of Kanara, in Appeal No. 197 of 1917, confirming the decree passed by the Subordinate Judge at Kumta, in Civil Suit No. 103 of 1913.

Mr. G. P. Murdeshwar, for the Appellant.

Mr. V. R. Sirur, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.

MACLEOD, C. J.—The plaintiff sued in this case to recover Rs. 129-15-0 as three years' rent from the defendants, who he alleged were his Mulgeni tenants. The suit has been dismissed in the trial Court, and an appeal against that order has been dismissed by the lower Appellate Court. It is admitted that the plaintiff is the landlord of the lands in question, but the defendants dispute the claim on the ground that there is no privity of estate between themselves and the plaintiff because they claim to be sub-tenants from the original Mulgeni tenants. It has been admitted in argument that a Mulgeni tenant, who is a permanent tenant, can transfer the whole of his interest, and if he does so, then privity of estate arises between the landlord and the transferee. It is perfectly immaterial whether you call the document of transfer a sub lease or an assignment or a transfer. We have only to consider what is the actual effect of the document, and if it leaves no interest remaining in the transferor, then it must follow that the transferee gets the whole of the transferor's interest. In that case the transferee becomes the permanent tenant, and there is privity between him and the landlord. I asked the respondents' Pleader whether the document in the defendants' favour left any interst remaining with the previous tenant and he was not able to show us that there was any interest left. I asked whether under that document the defendants had paid any rent to their transferors, but that question could not be answered in the affirmative. The result is that the defendants have been holding as Mulgeni tenants, and disputing the right of the landlord to get rent from them, on the allegation that their transferor as the original Mulgeni tenant is the person who is liable to pay rent. It seems to me that that contention on the part of the defendants is absolutely wrong and that the plaintiff was entitled to recover. We allow the appeal. There will be a decree for the amount claimed with costs throughout. The lower Court will find what is a reasonable rent to allow for the three years in suit and certify its finding to this Court within one month.

SHAH, J.—I agree. I desire to add that even though the permanent tenancy in favour of the defendants Nos. 1 and 2 may be in form a sub lease by the original Mulgenidar, still the lease in favour of the present defendants is a permanent lease, i. e., for the whole term for which the original Mulgenidar held the lands. It is clear that in substance it is an assignment by the original Mulgenidar of a permanent lease in favour of defendants Nos. 1 and 2, and that consequently there is a privity of estate between the plaintiff and the defendants.

It is not and cannot be disputed that a sub-lease of a tenancy for a definite period for the whole of that period operates as an assignment thereof. I do not see any reason why the same rule should not apply to a permanent tenancy. On this point I am unable to agree with the view taken by the learned District Judge.

Appeal allowed.

AMMUNNI AND OTHERS—PLAINTIFFS AND DEFENDANT No. 2—RESPONDENTS.

Provincial Small Cause Courts Act (IX of 1887), s. 15, Sch. II, Arts. 11, 15—Suit to recover amount due under sale-deed, whether cognisable by Small Cause Court.

A suit, brought after the completion of a sale, to recover from the vendee the cash amount due under the sale-deed is cognizable by a Small Cause Court. [p. 542, col. 2; p. 543, col. 1.]

Petition under section 25 of Act IX of 1887, praying the High Court to revise the decree of the Court of the Subordinate Judge, South Malabar at Palghat, in Small Cause Suit No. 984 of 1918.

FACTS.—The suit was for the recovery of money due as the balance of sale price. There was a contract of sale. Subsequently a document of sale was executed and registered and possession given. The question was whether the suit was cognisable by a Court of Small Causes.

Mr. K. P. Ramakrishna Aiyar, for the Petitioner.—The suit is in essence for specific performance of the contract of sale; Bhashyakarlu

THEVAR alias CHERUNI KOOTHAN v. AMMUNNI.

Naidu v. Nungambakkam Andalammal (1), Veerasalingam v. Sathapally Sathirasu (2) and Rajagopala Aiyar v. Davood Rowther (3). Such a suit comes under Article 15 of the 2nd Schedule to Act IX of 1887 and does not, therefore, lie in a Small Cause Court.

The basis of the suit being the contract of sale, it necessarily involves the determination of an interest in immoveable property within the meaning of section 16 (d) of the Code of Civil Procedure. Maturi Subbayya v. Kota Krishnayya (4). So Article 11 of Schedule II of Act IX of 1887 applies.

Further title does not pass until the sale is complete in every respect and hence the question of title also is involved.

Mr. P. S. Narayanaswamy Aiyar, for the Respondents.—The right of the unpaid vendor is only a right in equity. The present suit is, therefore, one in the nature of a suit for damages and not for specific performance. In Bhashyakarlu Naidu v. Nungambakkam Andalammal (1) there was no executed conveyance and possession. I submit that the case does not come under Article 15 of the 2nd Schedule to Act IX of 1887.

In the present case, the conveyance is executed and possession given. Title has, therefore, passed to the vendee and the remedy of the vendor is a mere suit for his purchase-money. Subbaier v. Moniam Subramania Iyer (5). Maturi Subbayya v. Kota Krishnayya (4) was a case under the Code and it has been dissented from in Sowdager Nabheekan v. Muhammad Hussain (6). See also 37 Bombay [Kondu v. Vishnu (7)].

Mr. K. P. Ramakrishna Aiyar, in reply.—The English Courts have held that such a suit is one for specific performance and given relief accordingly. See Fry on Specific Performance, page 33.

JUDGMENT.—In this petition it is argued that the suit was not triable by a Court of Small Causes on the ground that the subject matter falls within the mischief of Schedule II, Articles 11, and 15 of the Provincial Small Cause Courts Act.

The plaint alleges that the plaintiffs agreed to assign certain nilam items to the 1st defendant for Rs 400. This was partly to be discharged by cash payment and partly by 1st defendant discharging an encumbrance on the property. The plaint further alleges that the assignment deed was registered on 9th June 1916 and that the defendants were put into possession of the property. The prayer is for a decree that defendants should pay the cash amount due. The written statement of 1st defendant merely traverses the plaint and says that the allegations are false. The 2nd defendant does not join in this petition.

The findings of the learned Subordinate Judge are to the effect that the sale-deed has been duly executed and registered by plaintiffs and that 1st defendant has been put in possession prior to suit. With regard to the point under Schedule II, Article 11, much reliance was placed on the case in Maturi Subbayya v. Kota Krishnayya (4), which decided that a suit for unpaid purchase money under a contract for the sale of land fell within section 16, clause (d), of the Civil Procedure Code for the purpose of determining the jurisdiction of the Munsif's Court, the contract having been made within the jurisdiction of the District Munsif of Masulipatam and the land being situate within that of the District Munsif of Gudivada.

This was not a case under the special provisions of the Small Cause Courts Act and, moreover, has not been followed in the more recent case reported as Sowdager Nabheekan v. Muhammad Hussain (6), where it is distinctly laid down that a suit to recover the price of land is one cognisable by the Small Cause Court, though such a suit may incidentally involve the question of title. The nature of a suit is to be inferred from the allegations set forth in the plaint and I have no hesitation in finding that, on the authority of the case last quoted, on an examination of the plaint, this is a suit for money

As to Schedule II Article 15 it was argued that this was in effect a suit for specific performance of the contract to buy and sell land and the case Bhashyakarlu Naidu v. Nungambakkam Andalammal (1) was quoted in support of this view. As there laid down, the question is whether the plaint discloses a suit for specific performance and the lower Court's judgment says that the form is that the plaintiff is to prepare a conveyance as an escrow and deliver to the defendant if money is paid within a limited time, the averment being that plaintiff is ready and willing to perform his part of the contract. The learned Chief Justice (at page 837*) says: "Although the prayer only asks for the payment of Rs. 301-13-0, taking the plaint as a whole with the averment that the plaintiff is ready and willing to perform her part of the contract, I think it must be taken as a prayer for the specific performance. That is sufficient to dispose of the present case." It is thus a question in each case to be decided on the allegations raised.

As already stated, the assignment deed so called was executed and registered on or about 9th June 1918; the suit was instituted on 20th September 1918. The plaintiffs have moreover put the 1st defendant into possession before the date of the suit and have thus fully and entirely performed their part of the contract. There is nothing more left for them to do. I am clearly of opinion from this fact and from the fact that the plaint naturally contains no such allegation as that in Bhashyakarlu Naidu's case (1) that the latter case is wholly different from the present. The petition on the point of specific performance, therefore, also fails.

The result is the petition is dismissed with costs of respondents Nos. 1 and 2.

JUDGMENT.

VISCOUNT HALDANE.—Their Lordships entertain no doubt that the judgment, on the appeal in this suit, of the High Court of Judicature at Allahabad, in favour of the plaintiffs, who are the respondents before the Judicial Committee, was right.

The suit was brought against the appellant, who is Raja of Aul, to recover the price of goods sold and delivered. The 1st plaintiff, Bhola Nath, was the dealer who supplied the goods, and the 2nd plaintiff, Wahid Ali, was his agent in the transactions in question, and was the person to whom certain promissory notes were given. The claim was for Rs. 14,152-13-0 and interest. The appellant Raja succeeded to the Raj on the 21st March 1905. The general manager of his estate, from a date just after his succession down to March 1900, when the Raja dismissed him, was Prasanna Kumar Sen. A person who is still more important for the purposes of this appeal was Shankar Nath, who was "Kote" manager until his dismissal in December 1909, with authority from the Raja, independently of the general manager, to purchase and pay for all things required for the use of the Raja himself and his household. About this there is on the evidence no room for question. Prasanna Kumar Sen stated it in the box, and the Courts below concur in accepting him as a truthful witness, and it is borne out by other evidence. That the goods the price of which is claimed were delivered is not now in serious dispute. They were supplied soon after the accession of the appellant in 1906. They were not paid for in cash, but Shankar Nath gave a note of hand on behalf of the Raja promising to pay the balance then due on the 12th November in that year. This note was not paid; and on the 6th February 1908, Shankar Nath gave another note promising payment and to the effect that the Raja having purchased goods, Rs. 13,394-9-9 were due on account of the price. Both notes were given to the 2nd plaintiff on behalf of the first, and the amount of the second note includes the price of goods now sued for.

The reason why a second note was obtained in February 1908 was doubtless to exclude the operation of section 19 of the Limitation Act of 1908, which bars such a claim after three years from the delivery of the goods, unless an acknowledgment in writing has been signed by the party to be charged or by some person through whom he derives title or liability. The signature may be that of an agent duly authorised on behalf of the party to be charged. It is clear that the last note or "ruqqa" was sufficiesnt as such an acknowledgment, and was given in time to exclude the operation of the Limitation Act, provided it was signed by a person duly authorised on behalf of the Raja. The Subordinate Judge of Benares who tried the case thought that in giving the second note Shankar Nath did so in order, without authority from the Raja, to save the plaintiffs' claim from being barred by limitation. This was the real ground on which he dismissed the action. But the High Court made the obvious criticism that, as it had been satisfactorily established by the evidence of Prasanna Kumar Sen that it was within the general authority of Shankar Nath as "Kote" manager to settle the purchase and price of goods of the kind in question, there was no relevance in the point raised by the Subordinate Judge, for if he could pay the amount of the claim, he could plainly also arrange to prevent time from becoming a bar to it.

Their Lordships entirely agree with the conclusions come to in the Court of Appeal as to this point, and as to preponderance in weight of the evidence in the case generally. They will humbly advise His Majesty that this appeal should be dismissed with costs.

An alienation by way of mortgage to pay off antecedent debts incurred by the mortgagor prior to the mortgage, and due partly to the mortgagee and partly to others, is an alienation in respect of antecedent debts, and can be enforced against the sons of the alienor. [p. 545, col. 1.]

In the Bombay Presidency the rule prevails whereby a co-parcener can alienate his share in joint family property for consideration. [p. 545, col. 2.]

Second appeal from the decision of the Assistant Judge, Thana, in Appeal No. 601 of 1913, confirming the decree passed by the Subordinate Judge at Bassein, in Civil Suit No. 116 of 1910.

Mr. Bahadurji (with him Messrs. S. R. Bakhale and B. V. Desai), for the Appellants.

Mr. Jayakar (with him Mr. H. V. Divatia), for Respondents Nos. 1 to 3 and 5 to 9.

JUDGMENT.

SHAH, J.—This appeal arises out of a suit filed by the sons of the original mortgagee against the sons of the original mortgagor to enforce the mortgage executed on the 1st of June 1891 by the defendants' father Narayan in favour of the plaintiffs' father. Both the lower Courts have allowed the plaintiffs' claim.

In the appeal before us it has been argued that the mortgage was null and void as it was executed by Narayan not for an antecedent debt but for a debt incurred at the time of the mortgage. The mortgage bond contains the following recital: "After taking accounts of the past dealings by me with you, I find myself indebted to you for a sum of Rs. 700, and to-day I have taken Rs. 799 to pay off the debts due to others, so in all I have to pay you Rs. 1,499." The property mortgaged was the ancestral property of Narayan. The lower Appellate Court has found, and it is not disputed before us, that the recital as to the consideration in the deed is true. Thus as regards Rs. 700 the debt was clearly antecedent. It is, however, contended that the sum of Rs. 799 borrowed at the time of the mortgage to pay the debts due to others cannot be treated as an antecedent debt in view of the decision in Sahu Ram Chandra v. Bhup Singh (1). It seems to me, however, that having regard to the observations cited with approval by their Lordships at page 136* of the report, it is clear that the object of this alienation by way of mortgage was to pay off the antecedent debts incurred by the father prior to the mortgage. These debts were partly due to the mortgagee himself and partly to others. There is nothing in the judgment of Sahu Ram Chandra v. Bhup Singh (1) which supports the contention urged before us that the antecedent debts must be due to the mortgagee himself, and that the object of the alienation must be to satisfy the antecedent debts due to the alienee. If, as is the case here, the money is borrowed on the security of a mortgage to pay off the antecedent debts, it would be an alienation in respect of antecedent debts according to the decision which has been relied upon on behalf of the appellants. I see, therefore, no force in the contention that the mortgage cannot be enforced against the sons as it is not shown to be for an antecedent debt.

It is further argued in support of the appeal that Narayan, who was then joint with his brother Damodar, had no power whatever to mortgage the joint property. In this Presidency, however, the rule is well established that a co-parcener can alienate his share in the joint family property for consideration. See Vasudev Bhat v. Venkatesh Sanbhav (2) and Fakirapa v. Chanapa (3). It is urged that this cannot be treated as a good rule in view of the decision in Sahu Ram Chandra v. Bhup Singh (1). That was, however, a case which went up to the Privy Council from the High Court at Allahabad, and no doubt with reference to that case the position as stated at page 130* of the report, that "under the law of the Mitakshara the joint family property owned, as stated by all the members of the family as co-parceners, cannot be the subject of a gift, sale, or mortgage by one co-parcener except with the consent, express or implied, of all the other co-parceners," was perfectly applicable. But there was no question in that case as to the correctness of the rule recognised in this Presidency that a co-parcener can alienate his undivided share in the family property for consideration. The general proposition which has been relied on on behalf of the appellants must be taken to have been made with reference to the particular case and cannot be treated as overruling the current of decisions of this Court on that point. We must, therefore, give effect to the rule as recognized in this Presidency and must hold that the mortgage was valid so far as it related to Narayan's share in the property mortgaged.

Lastly, it is urged that the suit is barred under Article 120 of the Indian Limitation Act. It is clear, however, that that article cannot apply to a suit based on a mortgage. The point was urged on the footing that the mortgage was void. But the point as to the validity of the mortgage having failed, this point also must fail.

The result is that the decree of the lower Appellate Court must be confirmed

THE ADVOCATE-GENERAL OF MADRAS AND OTHERS—RESPONDENTS.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), s. 92, O. I, r. 10—Trust, suit for protection of—Court, power of, to add parties—Advocate-General, joinder of, as plaintiff, propriety of.

As in a suit, under section 92 of the Civil Procedure Code, for the protection of a trust the most important questions to be decided are those which relate to the administration of the trust, the Court has power, under Order I, rule 10, of the Code, to add parties for the effectual adjudication of those questions, and the addition of the Advocate-General as a plaintiff in such a suit is not improper. [p. 547, col. 1.]

Petitions, under section 115 of Act V of 1908 and section 107 of the Government of India Act, praying the High Court to revise the orders of the Court of the Subordinate Judge, Kumbakonam, dated the 5th August 1919, in I. A. No. 486 of 1919, in Original Suit No. 8 of 1918, and in I. A. No. 487 of 1919, in Original Suit No. 71 of 1918, respectively.

Mr. T. Rangachariar, R. B., for the Petitioner.—The joinder of the Advocate-General as party after the other relators to whom he accorded sanction to sue, is illegal. If the suit in its inception is bad it should go. The defect will not be cured by the addition of a new plaintiff. The exercise of the right by the plaintiffs is a bar to the Advocate General exercising his own right.

Mr. K. V. Krishnaswami Aiyar (with him Messrs. T. V. Gopalaswami Mudaliar and A. C. Shanmuga Nayanar), for the Respondents.—The Court has a wide discretion to add parties to enable it to effectually adjudicate on the points involved in the suit. The High Court should not interfere in revision, unless there was something patently wrong in doing so. The decision in Darves Haji Mahamad v. Jainudin (1) has not been followed by the Madras High Court See Ramayyangar v. Krishnayyangar (2) and Appeal Suits Nos. 310 and 373 of 1918 and No. 9 of 1918. Both the original plaintiffs and the Advocate-General are persons interested in the trust.

The exercise of the right of suit by the original plaintiffs does not debar the Advocate-General from exercising his statutory right. The one does not exhaust the other. They are not exclusive. They can act jointly or independently of each other.

JUDGMENT.—The learned Subordinate Judge has directed the addition of the Advocate-General as a plaintiff to two suits under section 92 of the Civil Procedure Code which relate to the administration of a Mutt and a temple, and the question we have to decide is whether we should, in the exercise of our powers of revision, interfere with that order.

It is argued that, if it be shown as the defendant proposes to do that the other plaintiffs are not persons having an interest in the trust, the suit will be liable to be dismissed and that the addition of the Advocate-General is not necessary for the complete disposal of the suit as originally instituted.

Order I, rule 10 (2), Civil Procedure Code, provides for the addition of parties whose presence is necessary in order to enable the Court effectually and completely to adjudicate upon all the questions involved in the suit. We are not disposed to place a narrow construction on these words. The case in Darves Haji Mahamad v. Jainudin (1) certainly supports Mr. Rangachariar's arguments for the petitioner that a suit which is bad at its institution cannot be bettered by the addition of another plaintiff. But the view taken in Bombay has not been followed in this Court. See Ramayyangar v. Krishnayyangar (2) and

(1) 30 B. 603; 8 Bom. L. R. 751.

Appeals Nos. 310 and 373 of 1918 and Appeal No. 9 of 1919 (unreported).

We think that both the original plaintiffs and the Advocate General represented the public interest when they sued for the protection of the trust under section 92 of the Civil Procedure Code, and in such a case the most important questions to be settled in the suit are those which relate to the administration of the trust, and the Court has power under Order I, rule 10, to add parties for the effectual adjudication of those questions. [See Parameswaram Munpu v. Narayanan Namboodri (3).] We cannot read into the rule the words "as between the parties to suit" after the words "questions involved in the suit," as to do so would be to defeat the object of this salutory provision of law for the final settlement of disputes, seeing that in almost every case a similar objection might be taken to the exercise of this power.

Another argument based on the wording of section 92 of the Civil Procedure Code is that a suit brought by the Advocate-General in conjunction with two other worshippers, to whom he has given his consent in writing to sue, would be not maintainable. It is argued that the exercise of the right of action by one party exhausts the right of the other.

As we understand the section, the Advocate-General has the power to sue and the other parties have the same right and they may exercise that right separately or in conjunction with each other.

The right of each to sue in his own name is not exclusive of the right of the other. Cases in which there is a competition between two or more plaintiffs will be governed by Order I, rule 1, Civil Procedure Code, subject to rules 2 and 11 of the same Order. As the other plaintiffs have agreed in the lower Court to the Advocate-General having the conduct of these suits, the defendants will not be embarrassed nor will the trial be delayed by the procedure which the lower Court has adopted.

These revision petitions, therefore, fail and are dismissed with costs (1 set for each petition).

SASHI BHUSAN HAZRAH—DECREE-HOLDER—RESPONDENT.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), s. 47, O. XXI, rr. 89, 90, 91, 92—Execution of decree—Sale in respect of amount not due at date of sale—Sale, whether can be confirmed—Limitation Act (IX of 1908), Sch. I, Art. 181, applicability of—Application to set aside sale—Limitation in suspense.

A sale held in execution of a decree for an amount in respect of which there was no decree existing at the time is illegal, and the Court would be justified in refusing to confirm it. The fact that subsequently to the sale the decree-holder obtained a decree entitling him to the amount for which the sale was held would not validate the sale. [p. 549, cols. 1 & 2; p. 550, col. 1.]

On the application of the judgment-debtor a sale was set aside on the 31st July 1913. On the 3rd April 1917 the High Court on appeal ultimately reversed the order setting aside the sale. On the 29th September 1917 the decree-holder applied for confirmation of the sale, whereupon the judgment-debtor put in an application to have the sale set aside. It was objected that this application was barred by limitation, having been made more than three years after the date of the sale:

Held, that the period for making the application was prescribed by Article 181 of Schedule I to the Limitation Act and that period commenced from the time when the right to apply accrued, that the right to apply arose on the 3rd April 1917 and that, treating the interval between the 31st July 1913 and the 3rd April 1917 as under suspense, the application was not barred by limitation. JUDGMENT.

CHATTERJEA, J.—These appeals arise out of proceedings for setting aside two sales held in execution of two decrees for rent on the ground that the sales were illegal.

It appears that in two rent suits brought in the year 1912 the plaintiff claimed rent at the rate of Rs. 22 and Rs. 18 respectively, those being the rents entered in the settlement proceedings. The defendants pleaded that the rents were Rs. 12-9-0 and Rs. 11 only. The suits were decreed on the 18th February 1913 on the following terms:—"The suits be decreed with costs, but the plaintiff will be at liberty to execute the decree to the extent based on the Jama admitted in the defence after one month. As regards the balance of the decretal sums, the plaintiff will execute them as soon as the review be rejected, if the review be granted, the plaintiff should postpone execution of the balances for two years and nine months or earlier when the settlement suits are disposed of." As a matter of fact there was no application for review pending at that time, and the order was based on a mistake of fact. The decree-holder on the 12th April 1913 took out execution for the full amounts. On the 16th May the judgment debtor applied for review of judgment stating that no application for review was pending when the decree was passed, and applied for postponement of the sale pending the disposal of the application for review. The sale was postponed till the 16th June if the decretal amounts were deposited by that date, and again postponed till the 23rd June 1913, but the money not being deposited the sale took place on that date. The judgment-debtor on the 21st July 1913 applied to have the sales set aside on deposit of the decretal amounts. The amounts to be deposited were settled by the Court, and they were deposited on the 22nd July, and the sales were set aside on the 31st July. The decree-holder appealed against the said order, and the Appellate Court remanded the cases on the 4th June 1914 for re-settlement of the decretal amounts. As a result of the re-settlement the orders setting aside the sales were confirmed. The decree-holder again appealed, but the Appellate Court confirmed the order of the Court of first instance setting aside the sales. The decree-holder moved this Court, and this Court on the 3rd April 1917 set aside the order setting aside the sales, on the ground that the amounts mentioned in the sale proclamation had not been deposited.

In the meantime the application for review made on the 16th May 1913 was allowed on the 18th November 1913, and the following order was passed:—"This is an application for review. The ground is that there is a palpable error in the judgment. In the order portion of the judgment it is stated that 'the plaintiff will execute them (the decrees) as soon as the review be rejected.' But I am informed by the Pleader on both sides that at the time the judgment was delivered or at any time no review regarding any suit concerning the Jamas in dispute was pending. The review was with regard to other Jamas in dispute in a number of analogous suits. With regard to the disputed Jamas a title suit was pending and is still pending between the parties. The reference to the review is evidently a mistake and on this ground a review may be granted. Evidently what the Court meant is that the parties should wait till the suits are disposed of or for a reasonable time. Ordered that the application be allowed but without costs. In the order portion of the judgment instead of the words 'as regards the balance of the decretal sums' etc., the following words will be substituted in the judgment and the decree: 'As regards the balance of the decretal sums plaintiff will execute them as soon as the appeal be disposed of or within two years and six months if the appeal be disposed of earlier, and it is further ordered that the decree of the appeal will govern these cases.'"

As stated above, the order of the Courts below setting aside the sales was set aside by the High Court on the 3rd April 1917, and the decree-holder on the 29th September 1917 applied for confirmation of the sales. The judgment-debtor thereupon put in an application to have the sales set aside under section 47 and Order XXI, rule 90, of the Civil Procedure Code, and also objected to the confirmation of the sale applied for by the decree-holder. The Court of first instance made an order setting aside the sales, but on appeal that order was reversed. The judgment-debtor has appealed to this Court.

It is contended on behalf of the appellant that the original decree was set aside or amended on review on the 18th November 1913; under that decree the decree-holder was entitled to take out execution only for a portion of the amount decreed and could not take out execution for the entire amount until the disposal of the appeal in the suit then pending. The sale, therefore, held in execution of the said decree was illegal, and the Court could not confirm such illegal sale, and that no question of limitation applies with respect to the objection to the confirmation of the sale. Secondly, that even if the question of limitation arises, the right to apply to set aside the sale arose on the 3rd April 1917 when the High Court set aside the orders of the Court below setting aside the sales, and that in any case the judgment-debtor is entitled to a deduction of the period between the 31st July 1913, when the sales were set aside by the Court of first instance, and the 3rd April 1917, the date of the order of the High Court, and deducting the said period the present application under section 47 was well within 3 years under Article 181 of the Limitation Act.

With regard to the first contention it appears that at the time when the sales took place (23rd June 1913), the application for review was pending, and the order passed upon the application shows that the decree-holder was not entitled to take out execution for the entire decretal amount until the disposal of the suit (or the appeal in the suit) which was then pending. The sale held for realization of the entire amount of the decree, according to the order passed on review, was, therefore, illegal, and the question is whether the Court would be justified in refusing to confirm the sale if it finds that the decree under which the sale was held has subsequently been set aside or amended. It is contended on behalf of the respondent that under the present Civil Procedure Code the sale really does not require confirmation if there is no application under Order XXI, rules 89, 90 and 91, or if there is any such application and the application is disallowed. It is pointed out that the proviso to section 316 of Act XIV of 1882 has been left from the present Code. That proviso ran as follows:

"Provided that the decree under which the sale took place was still subsisting at that date."

It is contended that the result of the omission of the proviso is that the Court is bound to confirm the sale if there is no application under rules 89, 90 or 91 or if such an application is made and disallowed, whether or not there was a subsisting decree under which the sale is held. Now, if there is no subsisting decree the sale must be set aside under section 47 of the Code, and although there may be an application under section 47 to set aside the sale on such a ground pending, the sale must (according to the respondent's contention) be confirmed under Order XXI, rule 92, though the next moment the sale will have to be set aside under section 47 on the ground that there was no subsisting decree. We do not think that that is contemplated by Order XXI, rule 92. Order XXI, rules 89, 90, 91 and 92, presupposes a valid decree under which the sale is held, and the first three rules provide for setting aside the sales, and rule 92, says that if there be no application for setting aside the sale, or such an application is made and disallowed, the sale shall be confirmed. Rule 92 does not affect the power of the Court to refuse to confirm a sale, or make it compulsory to confirm the sale when the Court finds that the sale is held under a decree which did not authorize the sale. It seems unreasonable that the Court must confirm a sale under Order XXI, rule 92, although it finds that the foundation for the sale is gone, and then proceed to set aside the sale which it has confirmed, being fully aware that the sale was illegal. In the present case having regard to the order passed on review, it must be held that execution could not be taken out for the amount for which execution was taken out, and the sales took place for amounts in respect of which there were no decrees existing at the time.

In these circumstances we think the Court would be justified in refusing to confirm the sale. The learned Pleader for the respondent has brought to our notice that the suit which was pending at the date of the sale has been decided against the judgment-debtor, the result of which is that the decree-holder is entitled to the full amounts of the decrees passed in the rent suits, but the decision of the title suit was subsequent to the sale, and cannot validate the sale held in execution of the decree under which the full amount could not at that time be recovered.

The next question for consideration is whether the application under section 47 is barred by limitation. The Article applicable is Article 181 of the Limitation Act, which provides for a period of 3 years from the time "when the right to apply accrues." Now before the 18th November 1913 when the order was passed on review, the judgment-debtor could not apply under section 47, and before that order was passed, the sale had been set aside by the Court of first instance on the 31st July 1913. It is contended on behalf of the respondent that the sale was set aside under Order XXI, rule 89. That is so, but the judgment-debtor could not apply under section 47 to set aside a sale which had already been set aside on the 31st July 1913, though under Order XXI, rule 89, the order setting aside the sales was ultimately set aside by this Court on the 3rd April 1917. Whether it be held that the right to apply to set aside the sales under the circumstances did not arise until the 3rd April 1917 when the order of the High Court was made, or that the limitation remained in suspense between the 31st July 1913 and the 3rd April 1917, the application is not barred by limitation.

The order of the Court of Appeal below is accordingly set aside, and that of the Court of first instance restored. Having regard to all the circumstances of the case we direct that each party do bear his own costs in all Courts.

Thakur JAI INDRA BAHADUR SINGH—RESPONDENT.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), s. 145—Surety bond hypothecating property—Personal liability of surety—Bond, how to be enforced.

Where, for the due carrying out of any order that might be passed against a party to a suit, a security bond is given whereby the obligors make themselves liable for a specified sum by hypothecating property therefor, which they declare shall serve as security and be liable to the extent of the sum specified, the obligation created is not personal to the sureties, but is only a charge upon property and, inasmuch as a Court is not a juridical person and cannot be sued, nor can it take property or assign it, the only mode of enforcing the bond is by the Court making an order in the suit upon an application to which the sureties are parties, that the properties be sold, unless before a day named the sureties find the money. [p. 552, col. 2; p. 555, col. 1.]

Appeal from a decree of the Judicial Commissioner, Oudh, dated the 20th November 1916, affirming a decree of the Subordinate Judge, Malihabad.

FACTS of the case are sufficiently stated in their Lordships' judgment, where also the terms of the security bond are set out. The Subordinate Judge held that the sureties (the appellants) were liable to the extent of one lakh, and an appeal against his decision to the Judicial Commissioner was dismissed. On the present appeal

Mr. Dunne, K.C. (with him Mr. E. B. Raikes), for the Appellants, submitted that the Subordinate Judge had no jurisdiction to make the order appealed from, declaring the liability of the sureties. All that the Judicial Commissioner had directed him to do was to find the amount of the mesne profits. The Code of Civil Procedure governing the proceedings at the time in question was that of 1908. Under that Code there was no power to make the appellants parties to the proceedings. Sections 47 and 144 refer only to applications by and against the parties themselves, section 145, which deals with sureties, applies only where the surety is personally liable. This is not the case here.

Further, even if the Court had jurisdiction, the procedure acutally adopted was inappropriate. It was held over and over again under the old Code that you could not proceed against the properties in execution, when the security was the hypothecation of immoveable property; you must proceed by regular suit.

Tokhan Singh v. Girwar Singh (1).

The bond could only be enforced by a suit under section 90 of the Transfer of Property Act.

Further, the liability of the sureties ceased when the appeal for which they became sureties was dismissed. This is clear, not only from the terms of section 546 of the old Code, under which the security was taken, but from the order in pursuance of which the bond was executed. Prima facie security given pending an appeal relates only to the pending appeal: if that appeal is dismissed, the security is gone:

Ranee Birjobuttee v. Pertaub Sing (2).

What the Code contemplates is security to be given for the execution of the decree of the Court taking security.

Shek Suleman v. Shivram Bhikaji (3).

The decision in Narayan Dev v. Gajanan Dikshit (4) turned upon the special terms of the bond then in question.

In any case the Courts in India erred in making a personal decree against the appellants.

Mr. DeGruyther, K. C. (with him Mr. Kenworthy Brown), for the Respondent.—The application here was for the assessment of mesne profits and for a declaration of the liability of the opposite parties: we did not ask for an order to bring the property to sale, that would be matter for a further proceeding. Upon the application which we made the sureties were properly made parties, and their liability has been limited, as was just, to the amount covered by the bond.

As to the procedure for enforcing the liability, the Allahabad High Court held under the old Code that section 253 of that Code applied.

Janki Kuar v Sarup Rani (5).

Sections 47 and 144 of the new Code empower the Court to make the order it has made here. Section 144 is not part of the execution procedure and its application is not limited to the parties.

The bond here did not name any obligee. Under the old Code such bonds were sometimes made in favour of an officer of the Court, and it was then feasible to assign them to the successful party to sue upon: but this could not be done here.

The Court retains its inherent jurisdiction to make such orders as are necessary for the ends of justice—section 151 of the new Code—and this is the case whether or not section 145 also applies.

[Reference was also made to Prosunno Kumar Sanyal v. Kali Das Sangal (6) and to Order XXI, rule 2.]

Mr. Dunne, in reply.—The Subordinate Judge had no power to declare any liability against me: he could not make any order against the land. The only section of the new Code affecting sureties is section 145, which does not apply here. Section 144 is merely an enlargement of the old section 533, and is confined to the parties.

If the Subordinate Judge had no jurisdiction to make the order appealed against, the acquiescence of the parties cannot give him jurisdiction.

JUDGMENT.

LORD PHILLIMORE.—This is an appeal from the Court of the Judicial Commissioner for Oudh.

Thakur Balbhaddar Singh, Talukdar of Mahewa, died in December 1893 intestate and childless, leaving the Taluka and other property, and leaving a widow, Raghubans Kunwar, and a brother, Sheo Singh.

On his death his brother, Sheo Singh, took possession of all his property; but his widow, Raghubans Kunwar, brought a suit against Sheo Singh to recover the property in the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Sitapur, and on the 6th August 1902 obtained a decree for possession of the same.

After she had obtained this decree the widow applied to be put into possession of the property in dispute, and she was given possession by an order of the Subordinate Judge upon her providing security to restore the mesne profits, to the extent of one lac of rupees. The persons who gave that security are or are now represented by the present appellants.

The decision of the Subordinate Judge in favour of the widow was affirmed by the Court of the Judicial Commissioner of Oudh. But on an appeal being presented to His Majesty in Council, the decree was varied, and it was declared that the Taluka with its accretions had passed to the defendant, the brother, though the other property left by the deceased would pass according to Hindu Law to the widow. It was referred to the Court of the Judicial Commissioner to ascertain, if there was any dispute, how much of the property formed part of the Taluka, and how much was the private estate of the deceased which would pass to his widow.

The Court of the Judicial Commissioner remitted the case for enquiry to the Subordinate Judge, and he reported accordingly, and thereupon the Court of the Judicial Commissioner decided by decree, dated the 4th March 1907, that all the villages claimed by the widow except thirty-one belonged to the Taluka, and that the suit of the widow must now be dismissed except as to these thirty-one.

Both parties appealed from this decree to His Majesty in Council, but with some variations immaterial to the present purpose the decree was affirmed on the 22nd March 1918.

There were, of course, some villages which must belong to the Taluka, and in fact the widow admitted that 117 villages formed part of the Taluka. Possession of them was forthwith given to the respondent, the son of the original defendant, who had by this time died. And on the 21st August 1908 the Court of the Judicial Commissioner directed that the order of His Majesty in Council and its own decree of the 4th March 1907 should be sent to the Subordinate Judge, and ordered him to ascertain the amount of the mesne profits of the 117 villages during the period that the widow had been in possession of them, but he was not to make any order for payment until the whole case had been decided.

Thereupon, on the 6th January 1909 the respondent made an application purporting to be under sections 47 and 144 of the Civil Procedure Code for fixation of mesne profits and damages. The parties against whom the application was made were the widow and the present appellants, the sureties, and the relief prayed was that they might be declared liable for mesne profits of the 117 villages, the liability of the sureties being limited to one lac only. The widow put in a defence which it is not material to consider. The sureties filed a written statement, in which they denied that the respondent was entitled to the relief claimed, and pleaded the following additional pleas:—

ADDITIONAL PLEAS.

"20.—The so-called judgment-debtors Nos. 3 and 4 are not liable for the decree of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. Their liability ended with the decree of the Judicial Commissioners, dated the 26th March 1903, which was in favour of judgment-debtor No. 1.

"21.—The liability, if any, of the so-called judgment-debtors Nos. 3 and 4 cannot be determined and enforced in execution proceedings."

The Subordinate Judge, on the 21st November 1914, decided that there was due from the widow over three lacs of rupees, and that the sureties were liable to the extent of one lac. From this decision the sureties appealed, giving as their grounds:—

"1. That the lower Court ought to have held that the liablity of the appellant as a surety ceased as soon as the Court of the Hon'ble Judicial Commissioner of Oudh dismissed the appeal of Takur Sheo Singh on the 26th March, 1903.

"2. That the lower Court has taken a wrong view of the security bond executed by the appellant, and that according to the correct interpretation of the deed the liability was restricted only to the time when the order of the learned Judicial Commissioner was passed on the 26th March 1903 and for due performance of the said order.

"3. That it has not been shown by the appellant as to what collections were made by the late Rani Raghubans Kunwar during the said period and for this reason there is no definite amount for which the sureties or any one of them are liable.

"4. That the application against the appellant ought to have been dismissed with costs."

On the 20th November 1916 the Court of the Judicial Commissioner dismissed the appeal with costs. Thereupon the sureties, the present appellants, applied for leave to appeal to His Majesty in Council, giving as their grounds:—

"(1) That on a correct interpretation of the security bond, dated the 16th September 1902, executed by the appellants it should have been held that the liability of the petitioners as sureties ceased on the 26th March 1903, when this Honourable Court dismissed the appeal by Thakur Sheo Singh.

"(2) That the bond ought to have been construed not only with reference to the order of the Subordinate Judge, but also with reference to the terms of section 545 of the old Code of Civil Procedure corresponding to Order XLI, rule 6, of the new Code, interpreted in the form of the security bond given in it.

"(3) That if the security bond in question had not been filed, execution of decree would have been stayed only till the decision of the case by the Honourable Court. After that Rani Raghubans Kunwar would have obtained execution of her decree under the orders of this Honourable Court, which was never stayed, and in respect of which no action was taken under section 608 of the old Code of Civil Procedure."

Leave was given accordingly.

In their case on appeal before the Board they raised three points: That the appellants had not undertaken any personal liability, but had only charged their estate, that their charge only applied to and secured orders passed by the Court of the Judicial Commissioner in deciding the appeal then pending to it, and that the Court had no jurisdiction over them in the present proceedings and no order should have been made against them in these proceedings.

Of these points the first was not specifically raised in either of the Courts below. There is just enough in the general denial of liability and in the general words in the grounds of appeal to make it open to the appellants before their Lordships. It seems probable that the estates charged are so ample that it was hardly worth the while of the sureties to make this point. But as it has been made before their Lordships it must be decided, and in the opinion of their Lordships the true construction of the document is that it is an instrument of charge only and not a bond imposing any personal liability and the decree must be corrected in this respect.

The second point, and that which has been principally fought throughout, is whether the appellants became sureties for the restitution of the mesne profits according to the ultimate decision of the Courts, or whether they were only to be liable in the event of the first Court, that of the Judicial Commissioner, deciding against them, and not liable if that Court decided in their favour, though the decree was finally reversed in the Privy Council.

Upon this point their Lordships are in agreement with the Subordinate Judge and the Court of the Judicial Commissioner. The other construction would give a strange result. According to it if the Court of the Judicial Commissioner had reversed the decree of the Subordinate Judge, but wrongly reversed it and been itself corrected on final appeal, so that the widow was really entitled to possession and the mesne profits, still the Court of the Judicial Commissioner having decided against her, the sureties would have had to pay to the defendant, who had no title, the amount of the mesne profits from the date of the original decision to that of the intermediate Court of Appeal.

It would be strange indeed if the language of the instrument had been such as to create a kind of wagering contract of this nature; but there is really no difficulty in the language of the instrument. These are its terms:—

"We are Raj Debi Bakhsh Singh, Raj Raghubar Singh and Raj Mangal Singh.

"Whereas a decree for possession of Taluka Mahewa, etc., has been passed on 6th August, 1902, by the Subordinate Judge of Sitapur, in favour of Rani Raghabans Kunwar, widow of Thakur Balbhaddar Singh, Talukdar of Mahewa, against Thakur Sheo Singh; and whereas, for the purposes of delivering possession in execution proceedings, the said Court of the Subordinate Judge has, under order dated the 21st August, 1902, required the Rani, plaintiff-decree holder, to furnish security in the amount of Rs. 1,00,000, so that any order that might be passed by the Court of the Judicial Commissioner of Oudh be made binding on the surety for the said sum of Rs. 1,00,000; and whereas Thakur Sheo Singh preferred an appeal to the Court of the Judicial Commissioner against the order of the 21st August, 1902, at the end of August, 1902, and it was dismissed on the 12th September, 1902, we, the declarants, furnish security for Rs. 1,00,000, hypothecating the following property therefor, and declare that the hypothecated property shall serve as security, and be liable to the extent of Rs. 1,00,000 for carrying out the aforesaid purpose. Wherefore this security bond has been executed so that it may serve as an authority."

By this instrument the obligors make themselves liable to the amount of one lac as security for any order that might be passed by the Court of the Judicial Commissioner, not the first order but any order; and the ultimate orders of the Judicial Commissioner were that of March 4th 1907, decreeing that the claim of the widow be dismissed as to all but a few villages, and that of the 20th November 1916, by which, inter alia, the assessment of the Subordinate Judge finding that the mesne profits amounted to more than three lacs of rupees was affirmed. On this point, therefore, the appellants fail.

There remains a matter which has given their Lordships considerable trouble. When this suit began the old Code of Civil Procedure was in force; but when the application against the widow and the sureties for the recovery of the mesne profits was started the new Code of Civil Procedure of 1908 had come into force and, as already stated, the application purported to be made under sections 47 and 144 of that Code.

In the course of the judgments in India section 145 was referred to; but whatever might have been its effect if the sureties had been personally liable, it has no application now that their Lordships have construed the instrument as giving only a charge upon property; and indeed the application did not purport to rely upon this section. What, then, is the authority for it? Sections 47 and 144 provide for the decision of quesions relating to the execution, discharge or satisfaction of the decree, and for restitution, including the payment of mesne profits, when a decree has been varied or reversed; and they enact that any such questions shall be determined in the suit and not by a fresh suit. But these sections apply only to the parties or the representatives of the original parties and do not apply to sureties. No reliance can, therefore, be placed upon these sections as authorising the inclusion of the sureties as parties to the application made against the widow.

The assessment of damages, however, is one to be made once and for all as between the parties to the suit. The sureties are bound by that assessment and have no right to question it, as was not only admitted but contended by Counsel for the appellants before their Lordships' Board.

It is possible that in an extreme case the Court to which application was made to enforce such an instrument of suretyship, if it thought that there had been no real trial of the amount of the mesne profits, might, upon terms, admit the sureties to question the amount; but it would be an extreme case, and no such case is made here. So far, therefore, as the applicant sought to have the assessment determined in the presence of the sureties no harm was done, and indeed the sureties need not have appeared.

But the questions of their liability upon the instrument, whether they were personally liable and whether, in the events which happened, it had become applicable, were matters which they were entitled to have determined against them in a regular and authorised manner. The contention for the appellants is that for this purpose there should have been a separate suit to enforce the charge, and that this must have been one according to the procedure provided by section 90 of the Transfer of Property Act.

In order to see whether this is so, their Lordships turn to the instrument itself. For a proceeding under the Transfer of Property Act there must be a mortgagor and a mortgagee. Their Lordships have to examine whether in this case there is any mortgagee, any person to whom the security was given. Now, no person is mentioned in the instrument. It recites the decree that the widow has been ordered to furnish security and then the declarants furnish security, by hypothecating their property. The form of an instrument such as this, in the absence of any special form being provided by the Code, and there is no suggestion that there was any such form provided under the Code then in force, must vary according to the practice of the Court. It appears that in the High Court at Calcutta, in instruments of this nature, the parties bind themselves to some named officer of the Court, and that, if the instrument has to be put in suit, either the officer sues or he, under order of the Court, assigns the security to the party who wishes to avail himself of it; but this instrument does not purport to bind the sureties to any individual officer or to anyone.

It is suggested that they are bound to the Court. But the Court is not a juridical person. It cannot be sued. It cannot take property, and as it cannot take property it cannot assign it. It remains, therefore, that here is an unquestioned laibility, and there must be some mode of enforcing it, and that the only mode of enforcing it must be by the Court making an order in the suit upon an application to which the sureties are parties, that the property charged be sold unless before a day named the sureties find the money.

This form of procedure is that to which the High Court of Allahadad gave its sanction in the case of Janki Kuar v. Sarup Rani (5).

The new Code of Civil Procedure, that of 1908, provides a special form of security bond to be given during the pendency of an appeal (Appendix "G," No. 3). The form shows that it is intended to be given to someone and not to be a mere undertaking to the Court. Whether that someone should be the other party or an officer of the Court is not made clear; but with this form in use it is not likely that the difficulty which surrounds the present case will arise in future.

It appears to their Lordships that the proper way of dealing with the present case is to consider that there are three steps:—

(1) The assessment of the mense profits to which the sureties need not be parties.

(2) The construction of the instrument determining that the property charged is liable as security in the events which have happened.

(3) The order that the property be sold unless the sureties pay.

It might have been more regular to take the first by itself and without the sureties, and to take the second with the third; but unles it be that there is possibly some increase of costs, no harm has been done. It is idle to talk of the proceedings as if they had been taken before a Court which had no jurisdiction; and no serious objection was raised to the form of procedure; nor can the appellants point to anything which would show that justice has not been done to them.

In the result, therefore, their Lordships think that except as to the matter of the personal liability of the appellants, the decree appealed from is right. The variation which they would propose is as follows:—"That the decree of the Court of the Judicial Commissioner dismissing the appeal from the Subordinate Judge should be set aside. and that instead it should be decreed that the decree of the Subordinate Judge should be varied by striking out the words 'the two sureties are liable,' and substituting the words 'the property hypothecated by the instrument of security of the 16th September, 1902, is liable,' but otherwise affirmed."

Their Lordships see no reason to disturb the decrees as to costs in either of the Courts in India; but as the appellants have succeeded to some extent, there will be no costs of the appeal to His Majesty in Council. Their Lordships will humbly advise His Majesty accordingly.

Decree varied.

JUDGMENT.

MULLICK, J.—The allegation of the plaintiffs, who are money-lenders, is that on the 21st of April 1914 the defendants executed a hand note for the sum of Rs. 906-4-0 in favour of plaintiff No. 1 with interest at Rs. 1-8-0 per cent. per mensem. The suit was brought on the 17th of April 1917 for a claim of Rs. 1,308. The allegation in the plaint was that there had been dealings between the plaintiffs' firm and the defendants for some years previously. It is said that on the 21st April 1914 after an adjustment of accounts it was found that the total sum due to the plaintiffs was Rs. 906-4-0 and in conformity with the account then stated a hand-note was executed by the defendants.

The defendants denied that there had been any previous dealings or that they had executed the hand-note. The issues framed by the trial Court were: (1) is the hand-note in suit genuine and for consideration and (2) what amount, if any, are the plaintiffs entitled to? The Munsif found that the hand-note was a forgery. He also found that upon the books of account produced in the case by the plaintiffs, the plaintiffs were not entitled to any decree because the claim was barred by limitation. The books of account show that the last loan given by the plaintiffs is dated the 16th July 1912 and the trial Court disbelieved the allegation that there was part payment within the period of limitation.

The District Judge on appeal came to the same conclusion as the Munsif, but it is contended that his judgment is defective and that he has dismissed the suit because he was under the impression that if the plaintiffs failed to prove the hand-note, then they were not entitled to any decree. It is contended that the plaintiffs were entitled, even though the hand-note was proved to be a forgery, to prove the claim by other evidence and that in this case the learned District Judge has declined to consider the plaintiffs' account books at all.

Now the law on the subject is, in my opinion, clearly settled. In the case of Sheikh Akbar v. Sheikh Khan (1) it was stated thus by Chief Justice Garth, "When a cause of action for money is once complete in itself, whether for goods sold, or for money lent, or for any other claim, and the debtor then gives a bill or note to the creditor for payment of the money at a future time, the creditor, if the bill or note is not paid at maturity, may always, as a rule, sue for the original consideration, provided that he has not endorsed or lost or parted with the bill or note under such circumstances as to make the debtor liable upon it to some third person. In such cases the bill or note is said to be taken by the creditor on account of the debt, and if it is not paid at maturity, the creditor may disregard the bill or note and sue for the original consideration....But when the original cause of action is the bill or note itself, and does not exist independently of it, as for instance, when, in consideration of A depositing money with B, B contracts by a promissory note to re-pay it with interest at six months' date, here there is no cause of action for money lent, or otherwise then upon the note itself, because the deposit is made upon the terms contained in the note, and no other. In such a case the note is the only contract between the parties, and if for want of a proper stamp or some other reason the note is not admissible in evidence the creditor must lose his money."

In this latter class of cases if for any reason the note does not prove the claim, then no other evidence can be given on the principle that the writing being the repository of the intentions of the parties and being the best evidence, no other evidence is admissible if that evidence fails. Sheikh Akbar's case (1) has been followed in a number of other case, namely, Pramatha Nath Sandal v. Dwarka Nath Dey (2), Moti Lal Saha v. Monmohan Gossami (3), Yarlagadda Veera Ragavayya v. Gorantla Ramayya (4), Parsotam Narain v. Taley Singh (5), Benode Behari Patra v. Janki Kalwar (6).

Really, therefore, there is no dispute as to the law applicable to this class of cases. The only question is whether in the case now before us the decision of the learned District Judge was wrong and whether the appeal should be remanded to him for re-hearing.

Now if the hand-note is a forgery, then undoubtedly the plaintiffs can fall back upon their claim on the account stated. But the finding of both Courts is that the allegation that there was a stated account is false and that in fact and truth no account was stated or adjusted between the parties. If that is so, then clearly the case is concluded by findings of fact and no point of law arises. But then the learned Counsel for the plaintiffs-appellants before us urges that even if it is found that a claim on the stated account fails, he is entitled to ask for a decree after an account has been taken upon the basis of his books upon the whole series of dealings between the parties from the outset. Now that is not the case made anywhere in the plaint and it would be impossible at this stage to convert the plaint into one for a claim on an open account. It was open to the plaintiffs to bring such a suit, but they did not choose to do so. They relied upon a settlement made on the 21st April 1914 and although they succeed in their contention that the hand-note was not an essential part of the contract and, therefore, failure to prove it was not fatal to the suit, nevertheless they must be restricted to the claim on the footing of an account stated and cannot be permitted to open up the whole account in this suit.

The learned District Judge has no doubt devoted the greater part of his attention to the question of the genuineness of the hand-note, but it cannot be said that he has declined to look at the accounts, because he says at the outset that he accepts the accounts as corroborative evidence in support of the claim and at the end of his judgment he comes to the finding that he has no reason to disagree with the findings of fact of the lower Court. In these circumstances there is no reason for ordering a remand and the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

ABDUL HAKIM v. KULSUM.

s. 15 B (1)—Mortgage—Redemption, suit for—Court, power of, to award interest to mortgagee and direct taking of accounts of mesne profits.

In a suit for accounts and redemption under the Dekkhan Agriculturists' Relief Act, a Court has power under section 15 B (1) of the Act to award interest to the mortgagee and to direct the mortgagee to account for mesne profits.

Second appeal from the decision of the District Judge, Thana, in Appeal No. 303 of 1914, varying the decree passed by the Second Class Subordinate Judge at Mahad, in Civil Suit No. 356 of 1911.

Mr. V. B. Virkar, for the Appellant.

Mr. D. R. Manerikar for Mr. S. S. Patkar, Government Pleader, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The plaintiffs sued for accounts under the Dekkhan Agriculturists' Relief Act and redemption. Accounts were taken, and by the decree of the lower Appellate Court the plaintiffs had to pay into Court the amount of Rs. 1,961-2-0 with interest at 6 per cent. on the principal amount of Rs. 1,895-0 5 form date of suit and costs of various kinds, the whole amount to be paid by instalments of Rs. 300 every year commencing from any date in January 1915. The plaintiffs were held entitled to recover possession of the property mortgaged at once, the mortgagee being liable to account for profits received from the date of suit till restoration of possession to the plaintiffs. The mortgagee has objected to that part of the decree which gives him 6 per cent. interest on the one hand, and directs him to account for profits received from the date of suit till restoration of possession to the plaintiffs on the other hand. The argument was based on the decision of this Court in Ramchandra Venkaji Naik v. Kallo Devji Deshpande (1). But there the facts were entirely different, as it was evidently held that the mortgage had been paid off at the date of suit, and it was held by the Chief Justice that as the accounts were taken under the Dekkhan Agriculturists' Relief Act which are far more favourable to the mortgagor than the mortgage contract, and as nothing was said in the Act as regards mesne profits from the date of suit, the Court was not entitled, although the mortgage was paid off at the date of suit, to order the mortgagee in possession to hand over mesne profits from the date of the suit onwards. But here the mortgage is continuing and the Court under the Dekkhan Agriculturists' Relief Act has taken an account of what was due on the mortgage up to the date of suit, and under section 15 B (1) has directed as to what shall happen after the date of suit. The Court has allowed interest to the mortgagee at 6 per cent. and has directed the mortgagee to account for mesne profits. That the Court was entitled to do under the last lines of the sub-section. It is impossible for me to imagine that the learned Judges in the Courts below, who must have passed numbers of decrees of this nature, were not acting in accordance with their usual practice, and if that practice was wrong, it must have been long before considered in appeal in this Court. In my opinion the decision was correct and the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Mr. Panchanan Banerji, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This is an appeal against the decision of the District Judge of Patna dismissing an appeal from a decree of the Munsif. The suit was brought by one Musammat Kulsum for a declaration that a certain house with the land appertaining thereto is her property purchased under a Kobala, dated the 30th March 1915, and that it is in her possession and that the defendants Nos. 1 to 4 have no right to attach and bring it to sale in execution of a money decree obtained by them in suit No. 2 of 1911, which they had obtained against the defendant No. 5.

This house, which is the subject-matter of the suit, originally belonged to defendant No. 5. The mother of the defendants Nos. 1 to 4 obtained a decree against the defendant No. 5 and in execution of this decree attached the house on the 25th March 1912. Subsequently the execution proceedings in that case were dismissed. In 1914 one Mr. Miller also obtained a decree against the defendant No. 5 and in execution of that decree he attached the house on the 8th January 1914. The house was sold and purchased by Mr. Miller, who subsequently on the 3rd March 1915, sold it to the present plaintiff. She obtained delivery of possession in April 1915. Subsequently the mother of the defendants Nos. 1 to 4 applied for execution of the decree. A fresh attachement was made and the house was advertised for sale on the 16th August 1915. The plaintiff made a claim. The claim was rejected and consequently she has brought this suit.

The defence made to the suit was that the decree, sale and purchase by Mr. Miller were collusive, that the sale to the plaintiff was also collusive and that the plaintiff was a Farzidar of defendant No. 5. There are findings of both the lower Courts that Mr. Miller's decree, sale and purchase are not collusive and that the plaintiff is the Farzidar of the defendant No. 5. The suit was decreed in the Court of first instance and the appeal against that decree, as I have already said, has been dismissed.

This second appeal has been preferred by the defendants Nos. 1 to 4. Two points have been raised by the learned Vakil for thr appellants. The first is that the defence is one of collusion between the plaintiff and the defendant No. 5 and that this defence has not been considered by the Courts below. The second point urged is that Mr. Miller, whose decree was in the Munsif's Court, did not acquire a valid title, because the attachment of 1912 in the Subordinate Judge's Court was subsisting at the time of the sale to him and that this attachment being an attachment by a higher Court, the sale under the decree of the Munsif was not a valid sale.

With regard to the first of these points, I find that although in the written statement it was contended that Mr. Miller's decree, sale and purchase were collusive and that the purchase by the plaintiff was also collusive, the issue framed on the pleadings was: "Were Mr. Miller's decree, sale and purchase collusive? Is plaintiff a Farzidar of defendant No. 5?" Both these points are concluded by the findings of fact arrived at both by the Court of first instance and by the learned District Judge and cannot be re-opened in second appeal. But it is urged that the question of the plaintiff's purchase being collusive has not been considered by either Court and that the fact that the plaintiff is the mother-in-law of the defendent No. 5's son is strong evidence that the purchase was collusive. Having gone to trial on certain issues the appellants, in my opinion, are not entitled to raise this plea in second appeal, but the matter is of little consequence, because it is perfectly clear from the judgment of the learned District Judge that he considered the question of the plaintiff's purchase being collusive and decided on the evidence that it was not. He realized the relationship between the plaintiff and the defendant No. 5's son, because he states in the body of his judgment: "In view of the relationship between Kulsum and Aziz it seems to me not improbable that she should have purchased the house in order to save it for her daughter, the wife of Aziz." Subsequently he says the "sale-deed was a genuine deed and that Mr. Miller received the consideration" and at the end of his judgment he says—"I see no justification for regarding this transaction with any suspicion." It is perfectly clear, therefore, that not only did the District Judge consider the question of the plaintiff being the Farzidar of the defendant No. 5 but he also considered the question of the genuineness of the sale.

The second contention is one which has not been raised in either of the Courts below and as it depends on a consideration of evidence, the appellants cannot, in my opinion, raise it now. But here again, the question is not of much consequence, because even on this point the appellants cannot succeed. In support of the contention I have been referred to section 63 of the Civil Procedure Code, which runs as follows :—

" Where property not in the custody of any Court is under attachment in execution of decrees of more Courts than one, the Court which shall receive or realize such property and shall determine any claim thereto and any objection to the attachment thereof shall be the Court of highest grade, or, where there is no difference in grade between such Courts, the Court under whose decree the property was first attached."

But clause (2) of the same section says: " Nothing in this section shall be deemed to invalidate any proceeding taken by a Court executing one of such decrees," and it has been consistently held by the Calcutta High Court that when property is sold in execution of a decree, it cannot be sold again at the instance of another decree-holder, who may have attached it before the attachment effected by the decree-holder under whose decree it is actually sold, and that when a judicial sale takes place, all previous attachments effected on the property sold fall to the ground. This was the decison in Kashi Nath Roy Chowdhry v. Surbanand Shaha (1), and this decision, as I have already said, has been consistently followed in the Calcutta High Court. The same view was also taken in this Court in an unreported case, Bhobatara Bhattacharya v. Hira Lal biswas (Miscellaneous Appeal No. 210 of 1918). This ground, therefere, must also fail.

The appeal is accordingly dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

SEN AND PUNDIT—DEFENDANTS—APPELLANTS

versus

E. S. OAKES—PLAINTIFF—RESPONDENT.

Trade reputation acquired by misrepresentation—Injunction or other relief, whether may be granted for protection of such trade reputation.

Where a person acquires a trade reputation, of whatever nature, by misrepresentation, the Courts will not grant him an injunction or other relief for the purpose of protecting the reputation so acquired. [p. 566, col. 2; p. 568, col. 1; p. 572, col. 1.]

Appeal from the judgment of Mr. Justice Greaves, dated the 20th August 1917.

Messrs. N. Sircar, S. K. Chakraburty and S. M. Bose, for the Appellants.

Messrs. Langford James and A. K. Roy, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.

SANDERSON, C. J.—This is an appeal by the defendants from the judgment of Greaves, J., whereby he granted an injunction against the defendants "restraining them and their servants and agents from passing off or attempting to pass off or in any manner representing any bicycles not imported by the plaintiff as and for bicycles imported by the plaintiff and as and for Warrior Bicycles and in particular from selling, offering for sale or causing, procuring or enabling to be sold any bicycles not imported by the plaintiff with or bearing the stamp or device of Warrior in the plaint in this suit mentioned or any other device resembling or colourably resembling the plaintiff's said stamp or device or under the name of Warrior Cycles and from fixing to any bicycles or otherwise employing or using in connection therewith any such stamp or device or any such name or any equivalent thereof in any manner whatsoever." And it was further ordered that the defendants should furnish to the plaintiff on oath a list of all bicycles in their possession or under their control with the Warrior Transfer attached.

There was a further direction as to the taking of an account of all bicycles sold by the defendanat with the Warrior Transfer attached thereto.

The injunction restrains the defendants not only from selling bicycles, not imported by the plaintiff, with or bearing the stamps or device of Warrior referred to in the plaint, but also from selling such bicycles under the name of Warrior Bicycles.

The claim of the plaintiff mainly was with regard to the above-mentioned device, or "transfer" as it has been called.

This appears from paragraph 5 and prayers (b) and (d) of the plaint. Paragraph 5 is as follows:—

"The stamping of bicycles with the said transfer indicates to dealers and purchasers that bicycles so stamped are bicycles imported and sold by one particular merchant, namely, the plaintiff, and purchasers when buying bicycles so stamped expect to obtain bicycles imported and sold by one particular merchant, namely, the plaintiff, and bicycles so stamped are known in the Indian market as the Warrior Cycles."

And prayer (b) is:—

"For an account and payment of the profits made by the defendant firm in selling or disposing of any bicycles not of the plaintiff's importation sold or disposed of under the device, stamp or name aforesaid."

And prayer (d) is:—

"For the delivering up by the defendant firm upon oath to the plaintiff of all bicycles stamped or marked with the device or stamp aforesaid and for destruction and cancellation thereof."

The evidence of the plaintiff also shows this. The plaintiff was asked the following question:—

Q. Whenever you have put forward any claim, your claim has been the use of the Warrior Transfer?

A. Yes, that is all—we are claiming the sole right to the use of the Warrior Transfer on cycles.

Messrs. Morgan's letter of the 24th July 1914 to the defendant in the 2nd paragraph makes it clear that this was what the plaintiff was claiming and the learned Counsel in cross examining the defendant Sen, after referring to this letter, put it to the witness that the letter implied that it was the transfer which the plaintiff was after, to which the witness agreed.

I think, therefore, it may be taken that the plaintiff's main claim was to have his alleged right to the exclusive user of the Warrior Transfer protected. Such claim was based upon notoriety and long user, it being alleged that the Warrior Transfer stamped on bicycles indicated to dealers and purchasers that bicycles so stamped were bicycles imported and sold by one particular merchant, viz., the plaintiff, and the bicycles so stamped were known as the Warrior Cycles.

The first issue was:—

"Whether the stamping of bicycles with the Warrior Transfer indicated to dealers and purchasers that bicycles so stamped are imported and sold by the plaintiff only."

And the learned Judge's finding was as follows:—

"For the reasons already stated I think that the plaintiff acquired a reputation in the market by the import of bicycles of the Warrior specification with Warrior Transfers, and I think that the word Warrior had become associated in the market with the plaintiff firm, so that it indicated to dealers generally that bicycles bearing the word Warrior were imported by the plaintiff only.

I find on the evidence that this repute existed generally in Calcutta, but I am not able to say on the evidence how far it extended outside Calcutta."

It was argued by the learned Counsel on behalf of the defendants that the evidence did not establish the plaintiff's contention that the stamping of bicycles with the Warrior Transfer indicated to dealers and purchasers in India that bicycles so stamped were imported and sold by the plaintiff only.

It appears that in May 1909 a Company, called Veloce Ltd., carrying on business at Birmingham and manufacturing Veloce Cycles, made arrangements with S. Oakes & Co. of Calcutta, which is the name of the plaintiff's firm to act as agents for the sale of Veloce Cycles. This agency came to an end on or about the 27th September 1911, when Veloce Ltd. placed the sole agency for the Veloce Cycles in the hands of a firm called Levetus and Co. Levetus took up the sale and export of cheap cycles, lists were prepared with respect to the Warrior Cycles upon which the name Levetus & Co. appeared as "sole exporters" and the defendants "Sen & Pandit" as import agents. The learned Judge has found that these were not circulated in India until September or October 1912. It may here be mentioned that on October 18th 1911, after the agency of the plaintiff with regard to the Veloce Cycles had come to an end, Veloce Limited registered in England the word "Warrior" as a trade mark in connection with cycles.

It further appears that in 1910, while the above agency of S. Oakes & Co. still existed, a question arose as to whether Veloce Limited, whose managing Director was Mr. John Taylor, could supply Stanley Oakes & Co. with cheap cycles for sale to them, and by them in India.

Correspondence ensued between Stanley Oakes & Sons of London and Veloce Limited as to the specification, and on the 15th March 1910 Veloce Limited sent the specification upon which they were prepared to make the cheaper cycle.

In October 1910 Mr. Darnell, who was connected with the plaintiff's firm in Calcutta in some capacity, was in Birmingham and representing the plaintiff.

Discussions took place between Mr. Taylor and Mr. Darnell as to the cheap cycles and as to the so called "nondescript" transfer which should be put upon them, and on the 10th November 1910 there is a letter from Mr. Taylor to Mr. Darnell:—

"I am in receipt of yours and note you now suggest the Challenge Cycle Co., Birmingham. I regret this name is impossible as there already exist a Challenge Cycle Co. in Birmingham run by the new Hudson Cycle Co., and another well-known in this country run by O'Brien, so we shall have to drop this. I see no objection to the "Centurion," specially as it is now pretty certain that the Centurion Cycle Co. will go into liquidation. It is of course possible that this company will be resurrected, but nevertheless I see no objection to the word "Centurion" and enclose herewith a rough sketch partly in colours of the suggested transfer which please return. I know it is very difficult to find a suitable name without treading on some one's toes. I can suggest "The Marvel" or "The Warrior" but am not sure whether even these names are not already in use; however, as the machine is for India, I do not think it matters much. I note your remarks re accessories but have not had time to look through Lowman's list.

"Certainly I shall make the cheap cycles, but I am determined to do these in another place altogether in order to keep the two qualities quite separate. I have already arranged for a small place which is not very far away, and I hope in course of a week or two shall be in working order there. I shall be in London on the 21st instant and shall probably stay at the Bedford Hotel but will advise you, at any rate, I could meet you by appointment at the Olympia Show any time from Monday till Thursday. Perhaps it may be as well for you to make an appointment by some well-known stand."

It, therefore, appears that the Veloce Limited were going to manufacture the cheap cycles; but not under the name of Veloce Limited. Mr. Darnell suggested the Challenge Cycle Co., Birmingham; this, however, could not be adopted as there was already a Challenge Cycle Co. in Birmingham run by the new Hudson Company.

Mr. Taylor suggested the name "Warrior," which was subsequently adopted. This according to the evidence was the first time the word 'Warrior" had been mentioned in connection with the cheap cycles.

Mr. Taylor decided to make the cheap Warrior Cycles in another place altogether and under the name of the Warrior Cycle Co., in order to keep the two qualities quite separate: he had at that time apparently arranged for a small place not for away, which he hoped would be in working order in a week or two. This place was No. 5, Fleet Street, Birmingham.

According to Mr. Taylor's evidence in this case there was no name attached to the premises, although in an affidavit sworn in October 1914, he had said that business was carried on at 5 Fleet Street under the name or style of the "Warrior Cycle Company," and Mr. Sen said he had seen a brass plate on the premises showing the "Warrior Cycle Co."

This was the origin of the name "Warrior Cycle Co." There was no registered Company of that name. It was a name to be used by the Veloce Limited in connection with the manufacture of the cheap Warrior Cycles, one of the reasons being that the Veloce Limited were unwilling to produce such cheap bicycles under the name of Veloce Limited, it being alleged that the Veloce Cycles were high grade cycles.

Prior to November 1910, cheap cycles had been made by Veloce Limited for the plaintiff under the name of "Royal London" and other names.

In November 1910 lists were prepared by Veloce Limited and were forwarded by Oakes and Son to the plaintiff in Calcutta in December 1910. According to Mr. Oakes' evidence the original lists which were sent out were like Exhibit C produced at the trial in Calcutta. (This Exhibit was called during the hearing of the appeal "Calcutta C," to distinguish it from another Exhibit marked C which was referred to in Mr. Taylor's evidence taken on commission).

A copy of a specimen of the original lists circulated by the plaintiff and marked C is set out at page 335 of the paper-book, Volume II. It is headed "Warrior Cycles." There is an illustration of the cycle British materials and British labour are advertised.

The specification is then set out.

There is a note, that the cycles can be had with Warrior or customer's own transfer.

Then come the words in large letters:—

"The Warrior Cycle Company, Birmingham."

Then in smaller print:

"Sole Export Agents
Oakes and Son,
80-81, Wool Exchange, London, E. C.
Stanley Oakes & Co.,
6, Mangoe Lane,
Dalhousie Square,
Calcutta."

The original circulars like this, Exhibit C, were circulated in India by the plaintiff. According to his evidence about 2,000 of these circulars were circulated. The plaintiff's business was entirely wholesale and the circulars were sent to the trade only. As the result of these first circulars, the plaintiff, according to his evidence, obtained a number of enquiries about Warrior Cycles, and in addition to the circulars the plaintiff sent out his travellers. Other circulars, of which Exhibit D. is a specimen, were issued by the plaintiff; the date of the issue is not clear, but it was after he had severed his connection with Veloce Limited. In this circular, i. e., Exhibit D, there is no reference to the Warrior Cycles.

The first envoice received by the plaintiff in Calcutta in respect of cycles with the Warrior Transfer on them was in September 1911, and it seems that it was about that time that cycles bearing the Warrior Cycles were first put on the market in Calcutta by the plaintiff. The Warrior Transfer attached to the cycles is the one exhibited in the plaint. It consisted of a picture of the head and shoulders of a man supposed to be a warrior, above the picture were the words "The Warrior" and below the picture the words "Cycle Company," Birmingham. This transfer in the first instance was made by Veloce Limited. It was alleged that the special transfer mentioned in the letter of the 25th September 1911 from Mr. Taylor to S. Oakes and Sons which the Veloce Limited had made and reserved for S. Oakes and Sons was the "Warrior Transfer." Mr. Taylor, however, denied this and said that the sentence was not clear, but that they had made several thousand transfer under the name of Veloce with the initials S. O. C. (representing S. Oakes and Company), and that it must have been these transfers to which they referred in that letter.

This explanation was not challenged in cross-examination.

There is no doubt, however, that as between Veloce Limited and S. Oakes and Co. the words "Warrior Cycle" represented the cheap machine which Veloce Limited had undertaken to make for the plaintiff. This mark or transfer upon the face of it represents it as the mark of the manufacturers, viz., the Warrior Cycle Co. of Birmingham, and the transfer together with the circulars like Exhibit Calcutta C, issued by the plaintiff, in my judgment, represented to the trade that there was a company called the Warrior Cycle Co. which manufactured the Warrior Cycles, that such manufacture was carried on at Birmingham, and that the transfer, above mentioned, was the manufacturing company's mark, that S. Oakes and Sons of London were the sole export agents and that S. Oakes and Co. of Calcutta were the representatives of the sole export agents in Calcutta.

The evidence in my judgment shows that the dealers and purchasers so understood the matter.

Some of the indents which have been produced referred to "Makers' usual Transfers," "Usual Warrior Transfer," "Makers' own Transfer" and K. Bhattacharjee, the plaintiff's broker, said in his evidence that "Makers' own Transfer" indicated the "Warrior Transfer."

I think it is clear, therefore, that the "Warrior Transfer" was looked upon by the dealers and purchasers in India as the transfer or mark of the manufacturers, viz, the Warrior Cycle Co.

I think the evidence also shows that S. Oakes and Co. were regarded by the trade as the representatives of the Warrior Cycle Co. It is only natural that this should be so, having regard to the terms of the circulars already referred to which the plaintiff issued to the dealers in the trade. The letter of 24th October 1912, exhibited at page 195 of the paper-book, Volume II, from a company called the Provincial Cycle Company to S. Oakes and Co., is an instance of the reputation which S. Oakes and Co. had established and which existed in October 1912.

In that letter the writers say:—

"We have received a leaflet direct from the Warrior Cycle Co., Birmingham, offering cycle at £ 2 C. I. F. Indian ports.

"As you are their representatives, we request the favour of being informed of the rates for large contracts about this cycle as early as possible."

There is evidence of considerable number of enquiries addressed to S. O. and Co. for Warrior Cycles, among other cycles. There is also evidence that up to the time when Sen & Pandit, the defendants, advertised their intention of importing the Warrior Cycles, the traders, if they wanted Warrior Bicycles, used to communicate with the plaintiff who was known as the sole importer. This was only to be expected in view of the circulars which the plaintiff had issued holding out S. Oakes and Sons of London and S. Oakes and Company of Calcutta as the sole export agents.

But that is not decision of the question whether the mark stamped on the bicycles indicated to the dealers and purchasers that the bicycles so stamped were imported and sold by the plaintiff only or, in other words, whether the Warrior Transfer was regarded as a symbol or guarantee of the plaintiff's importation and selling.

There is nothing on the Warrior Transfer itself to indicate that the plaintiff is the importer or seller of the cycles; on the contrary the transfer on the face of it purports to be solely the manufacturers' mark.

In my judgment the evidence falls far short of proving that the mark had come to be understood and regarded by the dealers and purchasers as indicating importation or sale by the plaintiff.

On the contrary I think the evidence shows that the Warrior Transfer was regarded by the trade and the dealers as the manufacturers' mark, and that the plaintiff's connection with the cycles stamped with the Warrior Transfer was solely that of the representative of the Warrior Cycle Co.

The plaintiff, however, in this suit asks the Court to give him protection for an alleged right of exclusive user of the "Warrior Transfer," as being one employed by him and understood by the dealers and purchasers as indicating importation and sale by him only irrespective and independent of any connection between him and the Warrior Cycle Co.

In my judgment the plaintiff has not made out a case for such protection.

The learned Counsel for the defendant relied upon a further ground, viz., that in any event the Court should not have granted an injunction or any relief in favour of the plaintiff on the ground that the plaintiff in selling bicycles with the Warrior Transfer, which included the word "Birmingham," was guilty of misrepresentation as to the place of origin of the bicycles.

It was urged by the learned Counsel for the plaintiff that the consideration of this point must be confined, having regard to the pleadings, to the use of the word "Birmingham." In my judgment this is not so. The form of the issue is wide enough to allow the Court to consider the whole of the misrepresentation, if any, involved in the use of the Warrior Transfer by the plaintiff. The learned Judge evidently so understood it, for he said in his judgment:—"I think the plaintiff is entitled to relief unless the description on the transfer 'Warrior Cycles Co., Birmingham' is so misleading as to disentitle him to relief."

He then proceeded to discuss the above mentioned description in two parts, first the "Warrior Cycle Company" and then the word "Birmingham."

The learned Judge held that upon the evidence there was no Warrior Cycle Co. and that being so, he did not think the words "Warrior Cycle Co." were calculated to deceive.

With great respect to the learned Judge I do not agree; it seems to me that when the plaintiff placed the cycles stamped with the Warrior Transfer containing the words "Warrior Cycle Co." before the dealers in the trade, he thereby represented to them that there was a company in existence called "The Warrior Cycle Co." which was in fact manufacturing the "Warrior Cycle," and if it is to be assumed that there was no such company in existence, as is now contended on behalf of the plaintiff, this was a misrepresentation of a material fact and it certainly was calculated to deceive.

As regards the use of the transfer, the learned Judge has found that with the exception of a small number of bicycles, said to be 18, imported by the plaintiff with Warrier Transfers, the other "Warrior Transfer" bicycles all came from Glasgow and had no connection with Birmingham, although this appeared on the transfers. This finding is not disputed: and indeed it was admitted by the learned Counsel for the plaintiff that the plaintiff began almost at once ordering Warrior Cycles in Glasgow.

It appears that the Warrior Cycles were made for the plaintiff by the Victoria Motor Cycle Company, Limited., Glasgow: From the plaintiff's evidence it appears that there was an invoice, dated the 31st July 1911, for Warrior Cycles with Warrior Transfers supplied by Victoria Motor and Cycle Company, Limited and on reference to pages 68 and 70 of Volume II of the paper book the order for these cycles seems to have been given on the 4th May 1911.

The plaintiff in his evidence speaking from memory said that in December 1910 orders were sent to the Victoria Motor and Cycle Company, Glasgow, for cycles to be made with Warrior Transfers.

The arrangement between the plaintiff's representative and Mr. Taylor as to the manufacture of the Warrior Cycles with the Warrior Transfers was completed about November 1910, and yet in December 1910, or at any rate in May 1911, the plaintiff was ordering these Warrior Cycles with Warrior Transfers from the Victoria Company in Glasgow.

These facts are material: because the plaintiff or his London firm must have given instructions for the making of the "Warrior Transfer," so that it could be affixed to the "Warrior Cycles" which were made by the Victoria Motor and Cycle Company, Limited, Glasgow, and when the plaintiff was asked why he went on putting on the same transfer (i.e., the Warrior Transfer) when he got the bicycles manufactured by the Victoria Cycle Company in Glasgow, he said it did not occur to him to alter the transfer. "The transfer was already established in the market."

I think this was an incorrect answer.

The invoice for the first consignment of Warrior Cycles, bearing the Warrior Transfer, imported into Calcutta by the plaintiff was not received by the plaintiff until September 1911. It may be that the plaintiff was mistaken in saying that orders to the Victoria Company in Glasgow were given in December 1910, but in any event orders were certainly given in May 1911. This was some considerable time before any bicycle, bearing Warrior Transfers, had arrived in Calcutta. The Warrior Transfer did not appear on the circulars issued by the plaintiff and it is obvious, therefore, that the "Warrior" transfer could not have been established in the market when the plaintiff in his London firm first gave orders to the Victoria Cycles Company at Glasgow; his reason, therefore, for putting the Warrior Transfer on cycles made by the Victoria Company in Glasgow cannot be accepted.

I think the reason for his continuing to use the Warrior Transfer is obvious. He had issued the circulars, Exhibit C (Calcutta), which he received from the Veloce Limited advertising the Warrior Cycle, as being made by the Warrior Cycle Co., Birmingham. If he had changed the name of the manufacturers and had substituted the name of the Victoria Cycle Co, Glasgow, for that of the Warrior Cycle Co., Birmingham, it would not have been in accordance with the representation which he had made in the circulars and it would have broken the continuity of his dealings.

The learned Judge has come to the conclusion that it was immaterial to the purchasers whether the word "Glasgow" or "Birmingham" was used on the transfer, and he has relied on the evidence given in that respect on behalf of the plaintiff.

With much respect to the learned Judge, this is a conclusion with which I cannot agree.

There was evidence on behalf of the defendants by persons in the trade that Birmingham and Coventry are two places famous for bicycles, that importance is attached to the place of manufacture, that manufacturers never omit "Birmingham" and "Coventry" if cycles are manufactured there, that at first preference was given to Coventry cycles and subsequently Birmingham cycles received preference.

One witness, representing the Standard Cycle Company, said he had not heard of any cycle manufactured at Glasgow. Mr. Walton, one of the plaintiff's witnesses, said he had never sold a cycle with Glasgow on it to his knowledge.

In view of this I find it very difficult to accept the evidence that it would make no difference to buyers, whether "Glasgow" or "Birmingham" were upon the cycle so long as the bicycle bore a British name.

If that were really so, why did the plaintiff continue to use the word "Warrior Cycle Co., Birmingham" when the cycles were in fact made by the Victoria Motor and Cycle Company, Glasgow. But even if I were satisfied that in general it would make no difference to the trade whether "Glasgow" or "Birmingham" was on the cycle (which I am not), I think that in this particular case the matter was of importance, because the plaintiff had already, by issuing the circulars, represented to the dealers and the trade that the cycles were made by the Warrior Cycle Co. in Birmingham.

I think it must have been the object of the plaintiff to make the dealers and the trade believe that he was continuing to have the Warrior Cycles made by the same company and at the same place, as he had represented to the dealers and the trade in the first instance when he distributed the circulars, otherwise I do not understand why he did not state the true facts to those who were dealing with him.

In my judgment the plaintiff acquired his reputation, of whatever nature it was, in connection with the Warrior Cycles, by misrepresentation. He represented to the trade and dealers that there was a company in existence called the "Warrior Cycle Co.," this, according to his case as now presented, was untrue: he represented that this company were the manufacturers of the Warrior Cycles, imported by him. This admittedly was untrue, for all the Warrior Cycles imported by the plaintiff were made by the Victoria Motor and Cycle Company, Glasgow, except a small number of bicycles said to be 18, which were made by Veloce Limited under the name of the Warrior Cycle Company: he represented that the bicycles imported by him were made at Birmingham, whereas in fact, with the exception of 18, they were made in Glasgow.

A party seeking the protection of the Court in such a case as this must come to the Court, as it has been said "with clean hands" and even if the plaintiff had established his case to the effect that the stamping of the bicycles with the Warrior Transfer indicated to dealers and purchasers that bicycles so stamped were imported and sold by him only or that the word "Warrior" had become associated in the market with the plaintiff so that it indicated to dealers generally that bicycles bearing the word "Warrior" were imported by the plaintiff only (which I do not think he has), in my judgment it would not be right for the Court to grant him the injunction or other relief claimed for the purpose of protecting his alleged right by reason of the misrepresentation of which, in my judgment, he was guilty.

There is one other matter, to which it is necessary to refer: the claim in this case was based mainly upon an allegation that the defendants had been importing into Calcutta bicycles, stamped with a transfer similar to that used by the plaintiff, and were offering the same under the name of "The Warrior Cycles" with the fraudulent intention of passing off such bicycles as and for bicycles imported and sold by the plaintiff. See paragraph 6 of the plaint which runs as follows:—

"The plaintiff on or about 21st July 1914 came to know that the defendant firm has been importing into Calcutta bicycles stamped with the same transfer and has been advertising and offering the same for sale under the name of 'The Warrior Cycle" with the fraudulent intention of passing off such bicycles as and for the bicycles imported and sod by the plaintiff as aforesaid."

The learned Judge on this point has found as follows:—"Except that the defendant firm under what they considered a genuine claim of right have sold Warrior Bicycles with Warrior Transfers, I find no evidence that the defendants have passed off any bicycles sold by them as and for bicycles imported by the plaintiff."

I can see no basis for the charge of fraudulent passing off: the evidence showed that it was known in October 1912 that the defendants were going to import the Warrior Cycles, and the learned Judge has found that the defendants' circulars were distributed in September or October 1912. These circulars showed that the defendants were acting as import agents for the Warrior Cycles. Under these circumstances there was no ground for saying that the defendants were attempting fraudulently to pass off the Warrior Cycles imported by them as bicycles imported by the plaintiff.

In my judgment this appeal should be allowed and the plaintiff's suit should be dismissed.

We think that the plaintiff must pay the defendants' costs of the proceedings in the first Court and of the proceedings in the Appeal Court, and those costs will include the costs of the reference and all reserved costs and the costs of the commission. The sum of rupees one hundred and fifty, which we understand has been paid by the defendants as damages, must be refunded to them.

WOODROFFE, J.—As developed, the argument of the plaintiff in appeal seems to resolve itself into this. The plaintiff says that he wanted some cheap bicycles for sale in the Indian market with a special transfer. He approached the Veloce Company, Limited, who were willing to make bicycles according to specification and suggested the distinguishing name of "Warrior," which is on the transfer. As the making of such bicycles might affect the sale of Veloce Company's own cycles, they were sent out as the product of a non-existent company called the Warrior Cycles Company, Birmingham, at which city Veloce Company manufacture. The plaintiff company first placed such bicycles on the Calcutta market.

Now the first question the plaintiff argued is that the title in the name Warrior and its mark is in him. Apparently the claim to this is made by Veloce Company, Limited. The point then taken is that the Veloce Company did not make these bicycles under this name and mark for themselves at the suggestion of the plaintiff in order to sell to the latter and that the name and the mark are thus not the property of the Veloce Company, but that this company made the bicycles with this name and mark for the plaintiff and, therefore, they were his property and the defendant company cannot infringe his right. It is next said that even if the plaintiff fail to establish that the name and mark were his property and they were in fact that of the makers, an importer can yet set a reputation on the maker's mark and thus may get a right against the manufacturers themselves. The third paragraph of the plaint alleges that bicycles were specially manufactured for the plaintiff by Veloce Company, Limited, but it is not said that the name and mark were made for and were the property of the plaintiff. In section 4 the pleading states that to distinguish such bicycles the plaintiff caused the bicycles to be stamped with a Warrior Transfer which has the design of a Warrior with the words "The Warrior" above and "Cycle Company, Birmingham" underneath. Then it is said (section 5) that the stamp indicates that bicycles so stamped are imported and sold by the plaintiff and the bicycles so stamped are called "Warrior Cycles." On the facts the learned Judge seems to have found in favour of the plaintiff, his finding being supported before us by reference to the facts that the transfers were made and specially reserved for the plaintiff and that the Veloce Company did not stock the goods but waited until they got orders to put them in hand. I am disposed to think that the question raised by the first part of this argument is not open on the pleadings and issues. But even if it were, it is to be observed that only a small number of bicycles were manufactured and sent to the plaintiff by Veloce Company and afterwards the bicycles were made by a Glasgow firm. As regards the alleged reputation and passing off I am disposed to agree with what the Chief Justice has said. But in my view of the case it is not necessary to finally decide these matters, because I am of opinion that the appeal must be decreed and the suit must be dismissed on the ground that the mark of which protection is sought contains a misrepresentation. I need not consider whether it is necessary that the misrepresentation should be material. It seems to me to be right that in a case of this kind where the Court's protection is asked that it should demand the strictest accuracy and that any misstatement should disqualify for relief. For the Court should not have to enter into such enquiries in the case of those who wilfully state what is not the fact. I need not, however, enquire whether the law warrants this view, because in the present case I am satisfied that the misrepresentation was material for reasons I give later. It has been further held that if a statement is calculated to deceive, it is for those who made it to show that it has not in fact deceived: Newman v. Pinto (1). In Leather Cloth Co. v. American Leather Cloth Co. (2) Lord Westbury held that if a trade mark contain a material misrepresentation as to the character of the goods to which it is applied, the Court will not interfere to protect the use of it; even though the misrepresentation should be so obvious that no purchaser would be deceived.

When the plaintiff got his cycles from the Victoria Company at Glasgow, the obvious question is why he did not so state but continued the words "Warrior Cycle Co., Birmingham," which were a misstatement. Mr. James suggests as an answer that the plaintiff had started business with cycles discribed as those of Warrior Cycle Co., Birmingham, and that in giving the order to the Victoria Cycle Company he has overlooked the statement on the transfer as though it was a matter of no importance. I am unable to accept this explanation, which is not that which Mr. Oakes has himself given.

In his evidence Mr. Oakes says that when the agency of Veloce Company, Limited, of Birmingham ceased, he got the Victoria Cycle Company and Motor Company, Glasgow, to manufacture them. He says, he went on putting on the same transfer and was asked:—Q. "Did it occur to you to alter the transfers?" and the answer was "No. The transfer was already established in the market." Later after stating that "Birmingham" simply means "British manufacture," he was asked: "Q. If that is so, Why did you not put in Glasgow?" and the answar was "We could easily, that would make no difference." All this evidence does not suggest and is opposed to the suggestion that it was an oversight. He does not say that it did not occur to him that the the transfer should be changed, but that it did not occur to him to alter the transfer because the transfer was already established in the market (the accuracy of which answer I need not here discuss), and further I suppose from his answer he would have us believe that he considered the matter one in itself of indefference. I myself think that the transfer was deliberately retained so that the continuity of the sale of these bicycles might not be affected. The cycle had been sold with the "Warrior Cycle Company, Birmingham" on the transfer; it was probably thought that if the words were Victoria Cycle Company, Glasgow, on them (the word Victoria replacing the word Warrior in big letters at the top of the transfer) purchasers might have some doubt whether they were buying the same article as they had hitherto done. Then was the statement material? I think it was in two respects, both as to the suggestion that the cycle was the make of the Warrior Cycle Company which it was not, whether we regard the title "Warrior Cycle Company" as having no real company behind it or referring to Veloce Company working at Birmingham under that name. In fact the cycle was made by the Victoria Cycle Company.

Next the statement suggests that the cycles were made at Brimingham, whereas in fact they were made at Glasgow. This is a misrepresentation as to place of origin. Mr. James has contended that the issue is limited to the use of the word "Birmingham." The actual issue (the second) framed was wider, as is shown by the judgment which holds that the description "Warrior Cycle Co., Birmingham" is not so misleading as to disentitle the plaintiff to relief. The learned Judge has held the misdescription to be immaterial. The plaintiff's case is that it does not matter if the goods come from Glasgow or Birmingham; that the word "Birmingham" does not represent that the cycle is made at Birmingham but that it is British manufacture. If this last were so, then the name of any place would do and preferably the place where it was in fact manufactured.

There is some evidence both ways as to the respective merits of Birmingham and Glasgow as centres of cycle industry. I should have thought that it was a matter of common knowledge that Birmingham was, as some of the evidence states, a famous seat of manufacture of bicycles. On the other hand Mr. Walton says that he has never, to his knowledge, sold a bicycle having Glasgow on it and that there is only one firm of cycle manufacturers in Glasgow which he knows of.

The place of origin seems to me of some importance. And in fact we find that the word is retained by the plaintiff even after he was getting cycles from Glasgow. But even if it were the fact that abstractedly considered it was indifferent to the buyer (particularly to those ignorant of the seats of manufacture) whether a cycle bore the words "Glasgow" or "Birmingham," the case here is not to be so regarded. I must look at the other facts, viz, that "Birmingham' was retained because the alleged reputation had been gained on a mark bearing that word and not "Glasgow." We have to remember that in this instance there was, in my opinion, a deliberate statement which was incorrect with a view to keeping the trade. For, I cannot, for the reasons stated, accept the explanation of a mere oversight. As regard the words, "Warrior Cycle Company," we find from the indents the name of persons who were asking for cycles so described, doubtless in the belief that there was a company of this name which made them. Either, however, there was no such company or if we regard it as an alias of Veloce Limited, then bicycles were not manufactured by them after the plaintiff purchased them from Glasgow. For these reasons I think that the appeal should be decreed and the suit dismissed with costs in terms of the Chief Justice's judgment.

CHAUDHURI, J.—As I take a view different from that of the trial Court, I think I should shortly state the grounds for my decision. The plaintiff is an importer and seller of bicycles of various kinds. In the early part of 1910 he approached Veloce Limited, a firm of manufacturers at Birmingham, whose agent he was for the sale of Veloce Cycles, for the manusacture of a cheap quality which he thought would have a good market in India. A specification was settled in consultation, but the company said that they would have to use a non-descript transfer or stamp for the new make so as not to spoil their market for Veloce Cycles. The plaintiff has a firm in London known as Oakes & Son. That firm wrote on the 27th September 1910 leaving the question of transfer or stamp on the cycle in the hands of the company. A representative of the plaintiff went to Birmingham at the end of October and on the 10th November 1910. The Managing Director of Veloce Limited suggested the "Warrior Transfer" and sent a sketch partly in colours for approval. He said in his letter that in order to make the cheap cycles they would engage a separate place. At the same time they prepared a large number of lists, Exhibit C, for circulation in India and the plaintiff's London firm sent them out to Calcutta in the beginning of December 1910. These circulars were apparently printed at the cost of Veloce Limited. They contained a specification with a note that the bicycles could be had with Warrior or customers' own transfers, and were issued in the name of the Warrior Cycle, Co,, Birmingham, and described Oakes & Son as their sole export agents and Stanley Oakes & Company, agents in Calcutta. These circulars were issued by the plaintiff firm in India. Shortly thereafter the plaintiff gave orders for some of these bicycles from Veloce Limited. Taylor, their Managing Director, said in his examination that as between them and the plaintiff the words "Warrior Cycle" represented the cheap machine which they had undertaken to make for him. They used the name Warrior Cycle Company to keep the manufacture of the cheap article separate. There is no reason for not accepting his statement that they engaged a separate place for its manufacture at Birmingham. The follwing portion of the plaintiff's evidence in this connection is important:—

Q.—The Warrior Cycle Company, Birmingham, do they exist?

A.—No.

Q.—What is the point of putting Warrior Cycle Co?

A.—It is a sort of trade name. You have to give trade description to show that they are of English manufacture, that is all, and that there is some firm behind it.

Q.—What do you mean by that there is some firm behind it?

A.—Because it is necessary for trade out here for a native buyer to have a name behind. He wants an English name to show it is English manufacture.

The plaintiff appears to have ordered only a very few of such cycles from Veloce Limited. He says that the first consignment with the Warrior Transfer was received in Calcutta on the 11th September 1911. The plaintiff's agency for Veloce Cycles terminated on the 25th September 1911. There is a letter on that date from Veloce Limited, in which they say that they had made and reserved for the plaintiff a special transfer of which they had several thousands in stock and that they would be pleased to supply the plaintiff under any other transfer excepting the Veloce. The plaintiff, however, had begun employing another firm at Glasgow known as the Victoria Cycle Company to manufacture cheap bicycles for him and he got them also to stamp them with the same transfers. This firm supplied the bulk of these goods to the plaintiff. In addition to the list, Exhibit C, another list, Exhibit D, was issued by the plaintiff sometime later, the precise date of which cannot be obtained. The plaintiff, however, said that it was issued after his connection with Veloce Limited was severed. It was headed "Warrior Cycle" and contained the following note: "can be had with Warrior, various stock or customers' own transfers: charge will be made for the cost of latter. Sole Importers Stanley Oakes & Company, Calcutta." The plaintiff says that a large number of such cycles came out, some of them with the Warrior Transfer and some with his customers' own transfer or other non-descript transfers, and that he got a reputation as the importer and seller of such bicycles. He said that up to the end of 1911 he got out 72 bicycles of Warrior specifications with Warrior Transfer; that he bought out Warrior Cycles with other transfers which were about 50 per cent. He said he got bicycles on his Warrior specification in 1912, 1913, 1914 and 1915 numbering 522, 636, 504 and 228 respectively. The correctness of these figures has been challenged. Exhibit E, which is relied upon by the plaintiff, has not been rightly accepted by the trial Court as correct, but it can be safely assumed that he imported a fairly large number. He said that when he went to the Glasgow manufacturer, he did not change the transfer "as it was already established in the market". It contained the name "Warrior Cycle Company, Birmingham, as it did not matter at all to the buyers whether the bicycles came from Birmingham or Glasgow." It has been suggested that he kept the name of the company as it was a fictitious name, and as such a company did not exist he had a right to use that name. No one had a greater right to it. In 1912 a list came out from England (Exhibit F on commission) describing the defendant firm as agents for Warrior Cycles. It purported to have been issued by the Warrior Cycle Company of 7, Fleet Street, Birmingham, the exporting agent being Levetus & Co., London, and the Calcutta agents Sen and Pundit. The plaintiff thereupon went to the customs office in Calcutta and wrote to them on the 23rd October 1912 that the Warrior Transfer had been used by him for some years past on cycles imported by him, but that a circular had come out bearing the name of the defendant firm as importing agents for the Warrior Cycle Company, which he said had been mailed direct to Indian dealers from London during the past fortnight. He alleged that for some years past he had been doing considerable business in Calcutta and throughout India "on his Warrior Brand Cycles," and asked the customs to stop importation of cycles bearing the Warrior Transfer other than those shipped and invoiced out by his London firm, and he said that he would take necessary legal action. He continued to apply to the customs from time to time and then this suit was instituted in September 1914.

It appears that after the termination of the agency of the plaintiff with Veloce Limited, Levetus and Company were appointed their agents and they employed Sen and Pundit, the defendants, as their sub-agents in India. Circulars were issued, as I have said, in the name of the Warrior Cycle Company mentioning the new agencies, and orders were obtained by Sen and Pundit, but they had great difficulty in getting the cycles out owing to the interference of the customs. Veloce Limited registered the Warrior mark in England on the 18th October 1911. The plaintiff claimed in the correspondence that he was the owner of the transfer in India, but it is very difficult to make out from the way in which the plaint had been drawn and the case conducted on his behalf as to the precise nature of his claim. His Counsel has claimed that he is entitled to protect the mark as seller of these bicycles in India, and that nobody else can use it in India and he has also claimed title to the mark. The point has been left vague and ambiguous in the plaint, a characteristic not unfrequent in pleadings which our Courts find it very difficult to cure.

From the orders received by the plaintiff himself this mark appears to have been frequently referred to as "the maker's own mark". The plaintiff has been described in some of the orders as the representive of the manufacturers. He himself was a party to issuing the circulars which described him as the agent of the Warrior Cycle Company, Birmingham. The reputation he obtained was clearly reputation as agent of the makers, the Warrior Cycle Company. Orders were obtained by him in the name of that company; several of such indents are on the record. The plaintiff does not claim any right in respect of the specification. As to this the following portion of his evidence is important:

Q.—Whenever you have put forward any claim your claim has been to the use of the Warrior Transfer? Yes, that is all. We are claiming the sole right to use of the Warrior Transfer on cycles.

Q.—Have you anywhere put forward any claim to the Warrior specification? We originated the warrior specification.

Q.—You cannot claim it? It is impossible for any body to put forward any claim for specification.

* * * * *

Q.—What do you say the Warrior Bicycle and Transfer indicate to people in the market? That the machine is reliable in every respect which they can buy without taking the risk of getting hold of shoddy stuff.

Q.—Do persons know who deal with these bicycles, who the importer is? Yes, absolutely, they know us as importers.

He admitted that the Warrior specification had nothing peculiar about it.

The plaintiff said that "he was entitled to the mark by priority of importation: one who got the market first was entitled to it." The evidence of the dealers is that they came to know that those cycles were to be had from the plaintiff: that Oakes was bringing out these articles which were manufactured in England. That he used to import them was known in the market and that they could be had with any transfer. They stated that they got their own transfers or the Warrior Transfer in combination with other transfers. I am not satisfied upon the evidence that the word Warrior or Warrior Transfer had come to be identified with the plaintiff alone. The specification was changed: other transfers were used and it was known in the market from about the middle of September 1911 that such cycles could be had from the plaintiff and dealers came and ordered them from him, but I do not think that he has established that the mark or transfer was identified with him. He received orders for the Warrior Cycle Company's Warrior Cycles and brought them out with a transfer bearing that name, which was taken by the buyers to have come from that company.

The evidence about his identity with the mark is very meagre and indefinite. I am unable to hold that the plaintiff is the owner of the mark or transfer or the name, or that he has a right to use them alone in India. I do not think he is entitled to the relief he seeks.

I am also strongly of opinion that he is not entitled to any relief having regard to the misrepresentations made by him in respect of these cycles. The transfer contains the name Warrior Cycle Company, Birmingham. That the Warrior Cycles Company was the name adopted by Veloce Limited cannot be doubted. It was done to keep the manufacture of these cycles separate from their manufacture of Veloce Cycles: that that firm had a separate place of manufacture for them at Birmingham, I hold established. The plaintiff had no right to use that name. Veloce Limited registered the disputed name and mark. When the plaintiff got the cycles actually made at Glasgow by the Victoria Cycle Company, it was a false representation to the public that these articles were made by the Warrior Cycles Company, Birmingham, which was the transfer on them. Birmingham is a well-known place of manufacture of bicycles. The plaintiff said that he did not change the transfer as it was already established in the market, which means that it was established as an article manufactured by the Warrior Cycle Company at Birmingham, and the plaintiff had no business to use that name or the transfer in respect of articles manufactured at Glasgow, which has apparently no reputation for bicycles. No one has imported a single bicycle from Glasgow and although one witness said that he had heard that there was a cycle manufactory at Glasgow, he had never seen one cycle from that place. It is no use saying that the buyers in India did not care about the name so long as the article was manufactured in Great Britain. The conduct of the defendants' firm cannot be said to be dishonest or deceitful. They were appointed agents by the Veloce Limited and they openly obtained orders as such agents. Having regard to the plaintiff's own statement that he went to the Glasgow firm some months before the termination of his agency with Veloce Limited, even as early as December 1910, I think his idea was to get better terms from the Glasgow firm and he utilised the specification settled with Veloce Limited and the name suggested by them without notice to them and without their knowledge. The fact that he had gone or was going to another firm was suppressed from the Veloce Limited, but he deliberately used the name of the Warrier Cycle Company in obtaining orders. He represented himself as their agent and obtained orders upon that basis. I do not think that he can claim any relief having regard to these misrepresentations. I am of opinion that the misrepresentation was material. The name was adopted by him, according to his own statement, to induce the belief that there was a firm behind the name. Not much reputation for the articles could have been established if it was known that the article was being manufactured by different people at different places. It was certainly to create an impression that one particular firm in Birmingham were the manufacturers that the plaintiff kept on the original name, which he knew was the name adopted by Veloce Limited. I think he also knew that Veloce Limited had registered the mark. He never disputed reference to the mark by his customers as the "maker's own mark." When Veloce protested against its use, he claimed to be "the proprietor of the Warrior Cycle Company Transfer" as far as India was concerned. He also claimed that by notoriety and long user he had acquired the exclusive right to the Warrier Transfer. In his letter to the customs dated the 23rd October 1912, he untruly stated that he had for some years past had the Warrior Transfer on cycles imported by him. The name Warrior and the transfer were for the first time proposed in November 1910, and had not been used before June 1911. We have no evidence about the terms between him and the Victoria Cycle Company, or how he went to them. Taking all the facts and circumstances together I agree that the appeal should succeed.

Appeal accepted.

NAGPUR JUDICIAL COMMISSIONER'S COURT.

FIRST CIVIL APPEAL No. 45 OF 1918.

November 26, 1919.

Present:—Mr. Findlay, A. J. C., and Mr. Mittra, A. J. C.

GANPAT RAO—PLAINTIFF—APPELLANT

KUAR DAULATSHA—DEFENDANT—RESPONDENT.

C. P. Tenancy Act (XI of 1898), s. 45—Ex-proprietor, sale of rights of—Occupancy rights, accrual of, in sir lands.

An ex-proprietor whose rights in a village are sold in execution of a decree is relegated to the position of an occupancy tenant of the sir land, unless the decree expressly directs the sale of his rights in that land also. [p. 576, col. 1.]

Appeal against the decree in Civil Suit No. 33 of 1917, in the Court of the Additional District Judge, Nagpur, decided on 25th February 1918.

Messrs. Gupta and Kinkhede, for the Appellant.

Messrs. Kotwal and Bobde, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.

FINDLAY, A. J. C. (14th August 1919.)—The plaintiff-appellant, Ganpatrao Sadasheo Deshmukh, sued the defendant-respondent, Kuar Daulatsha, for possession of the whole of the sir and khudkasht field in Mouzas Bandhara and Ghorpad, Nagpur, as well as for certain houses, kothas and trees standing thereon. An injunction was also claimed against the defendant-respondent to prevent him from interfering with the plaintiff's enjoyment of his rights in respect of the land comprised in these two villages and damages were also claimed in respect of cutting of certain teak trees by him. The defendant-respondent and his father purchased these villages in 1868 from Government under the waste land rules then in force as a jadkharid. The two apposite sanads are Exhibits P-2 and P-3, and there was an express convenant that the villages should be enjoyed by the purchasers and their heirs perpetually free of Government revenue. On the 21st of July 1895 the two purchasers executed a mortgage deed transferring, without reservation, all their interests in these two villages in favour of one Anandrao Vinayak Kaptan. In Suit No. 13 of 1908 the said mortgagee obtained a decree for sale of the mortgaged property in 1911 and the property was accordingly brought to sale on the 17th June 1916 and purchased by the present plaintiff appellant. It is the latter's case that the defendant-respondent had withheld possession of the sir lands, trees, houses and kothas in his occupation and had also dispossessed the plaintiff from the khudkasht lands on or about the 13th October 1916. The pleadings of the defendant need not be adverted to at length here, but the result of the suit in the lower Court was that the plaintiff got a decree for possession of the khudkasht lands in question and of the trees standing thereon as well as of the kothas. As regards the sir fields, however, the plaintiff was only declared to have the proprietary rights therein and the defendant was declared to be an occupancy tenant thereof. Against this judgment and decree the present appeal has been lodged.

The first point urged on behalf of the plaintiff-appellant in this appeal relates to an alleged admission made by the defendant. Reference has been made in particular to paragraphs 3 to 6 of the plaint. In paragraph 5 thereof it was expressely avered that under the auction-sale the plaintiff became the owner of all rights and interests the mortgagors possessed in the two villages and that he was as such entitled to full possession, amongst other things of all the sir lands. Paragraph 6 of the plaint again reads as follows:—

"That as the aforesaid decree, in pursuance of which the sale referred to above was held, was passed on a mortgage deed duly registered before the Central Provinces Tenancy Act of 1898 came into force and as the mortgaged villages were waste land villages, the right of the plaintiff as the full owner of the aforesaid village tracts to occupy the sir lands situate therein is not affected by the provisions of section 45 (1) of the said Act, nor by the provisions of section 42 of the Central Provinces Tenancy Act of 1883."

In the defendant's written statement of the 17th October 1917 it was expressly stated that the contents of paragraph 6 of the plaint were admitted. In other words, the position was then apparently accepted that the plaintiff's right to occupy the sir lands as full owner thereof was not so far affected by the provisions of either of the two Tenancy Acts quoted. At a latter stage in the case, however, Counsel for the defendant made allegations which were entirely inconsistent with this admission of paragraph 6 of the plaint. On the 17th October 1917 this Counsel stated as follows:—

"The Central Provinces Tenancy Act of 1883 was applicable to the villages in question * * * *As a matter of fact cultivating rights in sir lands were not also sold. The defendant does not, however, claim occupancy rights but proprietary rights in so-called sir lands and khudkasht lands * * * The defendant claims proprietary rights in sir and khudkasht lands because the lands are named so and (but?) are not really so within the meaning of the Central Provinces Land Revenue Act and the Central Provinces Tenancy Act. Section 42 of Act IX of 1883 applies only so far as it needs an express mention of the lands to be mortgaged."

In reply to this latter statement a pleading was further made on behalf of the plaintiff in the lower Court, to the effect that the mortgage-deed of 1895 included the sir and khudkasht appurtenant to the share held in the villages by defendant and that under section 8 of the Transfer of Property Act, in the absence of any express reservation of any interest in the mortgaged property, the whole of the interest of defendant did pass under the mortgage and decree in question. It is perfectly obvious that there was an inconsistency in the pleadings of the defendant-respondent in this connection in the lower Court, but I do not think that in the present appeal he can be held bound by what was after all a possibly mistaken admission on a point of law made by his Counsel [cf. Harihar Ota v. Dasarathi Misra (1)]. It is, therefore, in my opinion open to the defendant-respondent to urge that the provisions of either of the Tenancy Acts quoted do apply in the circumstances of the present case.

The lower Court, in coming to the findings it did, held that the sir and khudkasht lands were not expressly excluded from the sale at the auction and it further held that the cultivating rights in the sir lands did not pass to the plaintiff thereunder.

(1) 9 C. W. N. 636; 1 C. L. J. 408; 33 C. 257.

Objection has been taken on behalf of the defendant-respondent to the finding of the lower Court, that the cultivating rights in the sir and khudkasht were not expressly excluded from the auction-sale. The lower Court's finding on this point may be reproduced here:—

"The defendant has filed Exhibit D-1, which is a copy of the order passed by Mr. Thakur on 18th July 1916 in the Collector's proceedings in execution of the final decree for sale. It appears therefrom that the plaintiff had applied that he should be considered as owner of sir rights, by which expression I think the cultivating or occupancy rights in sir lands are meant. Mr. Thakur ordered on the application that there was no direction to sell the sir rights in the C form and they (bidders) were explained that these could not be sold. But it appears to me that the defendant has not established from this that Mr. Thakur had expressly excluded sir rights from the sale, but simply gave as his own opinion on the question as to what would pass by the sale of the villages. This is, I think, a different thing from saying that the cultivating rights were not at all put to auction. If this had been the fact, nothing could have been easier for the defendant than to have produced a copy of the sale proclamation to establish his contention. But he did not do so. So also defendant did not show any document to establish that the khudkasht lands and house property were expressly excluded. I, therefore, find that sir and khudkasht lands as well as house property were not expressly excluded from the auction sale."

It is, however unfortunate, that neither of the parties in this litigation produced in the lower Court a copy of the proclamation or proclamations relating to the auction-sale in question. This document might have thrown considerable light upon what was after all a mere question of fact involved. Then again, the application presented before the confirmation of sale by the auction-purchaser, Ganpatrao, which is referred to in Exhibit D-1, was also not produced and this document might have in the circumstances proved peculiarly illuminating. As a matter of fact we are left to imagination as to what this latter document actually contained and in its absence it is extremely difficult to interpret the meaning of part of the order of the Extra Assistant Commissioner. The part I refer to reads as follows:—

"The auction-purchaser also presented an application yesterday and Mr. K. P. Vaidya appeared with him to-day. They have been explained that there was no doubt left before the auction started and that there was no direction in the C form to sell sir rights and that sir rights could not, therefore, be sold. Mr. K. P. Vaidya then said that there was no remedy then. I have passed an order on the application itself rejecting it."

The deduction of the lower Court from this passage seems to me to be one that cannot possibly stand on the evidence at present on record. The learned Additional District Judge remarks as follows:—

"But it appears to me that the defendant has not established from this that Mr. Thakur had expressly excluded sir rights from the sale but simply gave as his own opinion on the question as to what would pass by the sale of the villages."

Now, I find it somewhat difficult to reconcile this conclusion with the statement of the Extra Assistant Commissioner, to the effect that he had explained to Counsel and parties that there was no doubt left before the auction started that cultivating rights were not to pass under the auction sale. The matter as it stands is practically incapable of solution except by a process of mere guess work, and the present seems to me a case where the Court must itself call for the copies of proclamation of sale and for the application of the auction-purchaser already referred to, if the parties had not produced these documents. Without them it is practically impossible to give any satisfactory finding of fact on the 1st issue involved in the case. The sale certificates, I may say, are silent on the question: they included no doubt the area of the sir fields included in either village, but in my opinion this would have been the case even if cultivating rights in sir lands were reserved because in any event the proprietary rights in sir had to pass. I can, therefore, draw no conclusion favourable to the plaintiff-appellant from this circumstance, which seems to me a quite immaterial one. Finding as I do, that it is impossible to come with any reasonable decree of certitude to a satisfactory conclusion on the 1st issue unless the documentary evidence, I have referred to, is produced, it seems to me that the case must be remanded under Order XLI, rule 25, of the Civil Procedure Code for a fresh finding on issue No. 1 with reference to the above remarks. The lower Court should arrange to have the documentary evidence I have referred to or any other evidence, oral or documentary, apposite to the point brought on record before giving its fresh finding on issue No. 1. The case will be remanded accordingly for this purpose. The finding should be re-submitted to this Court by the 16th of October 1919, thereafter 10 days will be allowed for the filing of objections thereto and the appeal will be finally heard on the 27th October 1919.

MITRA, A. J. C.—The question involved in this case is whether the auction-purchaser is entitled to possession of cultivating rights in sir land in the two villages of Bandhara and Ghorpad in the Nagpur District. These two villages were granted in 1868 and 1869 by the Government under the Waste Land Rules then in force as jadkharid. They were sold outright, the title of the purchaser including both full ownership and perpetual exemption from land revenue, as well as rights in minerals. These two villages were mortgaged in the year 1895. The mortgage-deed contains no reference to sir, though I find that at the Settlement of Sir Reginald Craddock, some land of about the same area as is now in dispute was recorded as sir. In the recent settlement too probably the same land is recorded as sir. Upon the basis of the mortgage the mortgagee obtained a decree for sale. Neither the plaint in the mortgage suit, nor the decree, nor the sale proclamation, nor the certificate of sale makes express mention of sir. The case is governed by the provisions of the Tenancy Act of 1883.

It is contended that as the two villages were not Malguzari villages, the Settlement Officer had no jurisdiction to record the land as sir. The argument is that the land does not come under the definition of "mahal." It is contended that in order to determine whether the land in suit is sir, we must see whether it is so recorded at the current settlement and for this purpose we must look to the definition of "sir" as given in the Tenancy Act of 1898, which refers us to the definition in the Land Revenue Act of 1881, as modified by Act XII of 1898. The land is undoubtedly recorded as sir in the current settlement. The land satisfied the definition of sir as given in section 4A of the Central Provinces Land Revenue Act. But it is urged that section 69, as now amended, contains a proviso which shows that sir land can be recorded only in a mahal. I do not propose to go into the soundness of this argument, as even accepting it to be correct, it overlooks that the Settlement Officer has under section 43 power to declare any local area to be a mahal.

I have sent for the settlement record of 1894 and I find in the wajib-ul-arz the word "mahal" used, though it is no doubt a part of the printed form. The owner of the village signed an acceptance in terms of section 54 of the cerses. Under these circumstances we may presume that the Settlement Officer under section 43 declared the local area to be a mahal. Though we can find nowhere a specific declaration to this effect, the fact that he makes investigations, which he can only make in a mahal, necessarily involves his making a declaration under that section, especially as the section does not lay down any procedure for making such declarations. I, therefore, come to the conclusion that there is nothing to show that the Settlement Officer had no jurisdiction to record the land as sir either at the previous settlement or at the current settlement.

I think the finding of the lower Court after remand comes to this, that the sir land was neither expressly excluded nor included in the sale. What Mr. Thakur told the bidders may, therefore, be regarded as merely an expression of opinion which may be ignored.

Under section 42 of the Central Provinces Tenancy Act, 1883, every person whose proprietary rights in land comprising sir land are, after this Act comes into force, transferred in any of the following cases, namely:— * * * *

"(c) when those rights are sold in execution of any decree which does not expressly direct the sale of his rights in the sir land," shall become an occupancy tenant of that sir land. It is, in my opinion, as argued before me, not necessary to have the words "cultivating rights" mentioned in the decree, but the ex-proprietor will become an occupancy tenant, unless the decree expressly directs the sale of his rights in sir land. It is true that having regard to the provisions of section 8 of the Transfer of Property Act and its analogue which applies to execution sales, all rights are impliedly ordered to be sold. As pointed out in First Appeal No. 82 of 1916 (Diwan Bahadur Ballabhdas v. Gulab-Singh), section 42 is a departure from the ordinary rule contained in the Transfer of Property Act. Here the decree did not expressly direct the sale of the mortgagor's rights in sir land, obviously because it was not asked for in the plaint, nor did the mortgage contain any express reference to sir. First Appeal No. 82 is distinguishable from the present case. There it was held that there was an express direction in the decree within the meaning of the section, as the decree referred to the mortgage as part of it and practically treated it as a schedule to the decree. As there is no express direction in the decree for the sale of the proprietor's rights in sir land, the proprietor becomes an occupancy tenant and the appellant is not entitled to khas possession of the sir land. For the reasons given above the appeal is dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

MADRAS HIGH COURT.

SECOND CIVIL APPEAL No. 2294 OF 1917.

November 5, 1919.

Present:—Mr. Justice Seshagiri Aiyar and Mr. Justice Moore.

MUTHUSAMI GURUKKAL—PLAINTIFF—APPELLANT

MEENAMMAL AND OTHERS—DEFENDANTS NOS. 1 TO 4 AND 6 TO 8—RESPONDENTS.

Hindu Law—Mitakshara—Inheritance—Insanity, when ground for exclusion from inheritance.

Under the Mitakshara School of Hindu Law, in order to exclude a person from inheritance on the ground of insanity, the insanity need not be congenital. [p. 580, col 2.]

Deo Kishen v. Budh Prakash, 5 A. 509 (F. B.); A. W. N. (1883) 105, approved.

The right of a Hindu co-parcener to a share in the family properties comes into existence at birth and subsists all through, but is incapable of enforcement at the time of partition. if insanity supervened at that time [p. 583, col. 2, p 584, col. 1.]

(Hindu Law texts and authorities reviewed.)

Second appeal against the decree of the District Court, Madura, in Appeal Suit No. 364 of 1916, preferred against the decree of the Court of the Principal District Munsif, Dindigul, in Original Suit No. 1332 of 1912.

FACTS.—Suit by a son's heirs against the father's heirs for the miras of an Archaka office in a temple, the son having died after the father became insane. The questions in the case thereupon turned upon whether and how far the supervening of insanity acted as a disqualification

This second appeal coming on for hearing on the 8th November 1918, the Court (Seshagiri Aiyar and Phillips, JJ.) delivered the following

JUDGMENT.—The judgment of the District Judge proceeds on the footing that the son predeceased the father; and then he discusses the question of law on the assumption that the father was insane for years and died a mad man. Mr. Srinivasa Aiyangar argues that if the assumption is well founded, the view of the law taken by the District Judge is wrong. Mr. Venkatarama Sastri on the other hand argues that unless the nature of the father's insanity is distinctly found, the question of law would not arise. The plaintiff ought to have asked for an issue on this question, but, however, as the judgment appealed against proceeds on the assumption that the father was insane, we think it desirable that a distinct issue as to the nature of the insanity should be tried, before dealing with the question of law. As it was the fault of the plaintiff that such an issue was not raised earlier, we think he ought to pay all the costs of the defendants in any event in the Court of first instance, as well as the costs of the enquiry we are now directing. We must ask the District Judge to return findings on these questions:—

(a) Was Gangadara insane?

(b) If so, for how long and till when ?

(c) Was the insanity of such a nature as to disqualify him from holding property under the Hindu Law?

(d) Was the son's widow in enjoyment of the office and emoluments after her husband's death as his heir?

Fresh evidence may be taken. Three months will be allowed for submission of the findings and seven days for objections.

In compliance with the order contained in the above judgment, the District Judge of Madura submitted the following

FINDINGS.—The appeal is remanded for 4 findings:—

1. Was Gangadara insane?

It is admitted by both sides that he was insane. The defence case was that he was insane for between 10 or 20 years before death, whilst the plaintiff's case was he was insane only after his son's death. D. Ws Nos. 1 to 6 and P Ws. Nos. 2, 6, 7, 8 all speak to his having been insane.

My finding on issue No. 1 is that Gangadra was insane.

2. Issue 2:—If so, for how long and till when?

All are agreed he was insane till his death but for how long is not so clear. I prefer the defence evidence that he was insane before his son's death and from 10 to 20 years of his own death.

3. Issue 3:—Was the insanity of such a nature as to disqualify him from holding property under the Hindu Law?

The evidence before remand was that he for a long time did the Archaka work himself and then that he became insane and his son did the work and that he was insane at the time of his son's death and continued insane till his death.

He was said in the earlier depositions before remand to have wandered about and talked at random. Even plaintiff's witnesses said no more than this, but, when the suit was remanded, plaintiff let in the evidence of P. Ws. No. 6, 7, 8 that he was dangerously insane, and threw stones at people, tore his clothes, covered himself with ordure and had to be chained up.

I may candidly say I do not believe a word of this. If it had been so, it would have been elicited at the first hearing of witnesses and such valuable witnesses as to insanity as P. Ws. Nos. 6, 7, 8 would have been then produced.

I hold that his insanity was of a mild type of mental collapse and not a virulent form and that he wandered aimlessly about, doing none any harm. Had it been otherwise, I think it is certain that it would have been elicited at the very first.

4. As to whether he could hold property under Hindu Law, I am of opinion that he could, for he was not insane till long after he entered on the Archaka work and it was only his insanity that caused his son to do the duties. I hold that he was really in possession of the office till his death but that owing to his mental defect his son was his deputy.

The law is, I think, clear that if he was not insane when the succession opened he would not be barred. Deo Kishen v. Rudh Prakash (1), Tirbeni Sahai v Muhammad Umar (2), Ram Singh v. Mutammat Bhani (3), Abilakh Bhagat v. Bhekhi Mahto (4), Sanku v. Puttamma (5), all seem to indicate this position.

Of course if he is regarded as having lost the post by his insanity and his son was the successor, then as he was insane at his son's death he could not succeed if it was then that the succession opened, but as I see the case it is rather a question of whether he was divested by his subsequent insanity.

My finding, therefore, is that his insanity was not of such a nature as to disqualify him from holding property under the Hindu Law.

5. Issue 4 :—Was the son's widow in enjoyment of the office and emoluments after her husband's death as his heir ?

The evidence is meagre, P. Ws. Nos. 4 and 3 and D. W. No. 1: but I think the evidence on plaintiff's side is enough to enable me to hold that she did not so hold.

P. W. No. 3 says that Pappammal, the stepmother, was looking after the Morai and the Pujah Morai was allotted to Pappammal as maintenance and she enjoyed it 15 or 20 years. Later he said that she and the son's widow both enjoyed it.

Plaintiff as P. W. No. 4 said that Morai was enjoyed by the daughter in-law and stepmother. In an earlier deposition filed as Exhibit XII in the suit plaintiff had clearly deposed that the widow of the father (i.e., step mother Pappammal) succeeded to the office and did service through an agent.

This, I think, is the most reliable statement of all, as it is prior to this suit.

6. P. W. No. 1 has been re-called, and he produces temple accounts and is very emphatic that the widow enjoyed the office and exercised her right of one day per mensem. He filed Exhibits Y and Z series to show this.

P. W. No 1, however, has such a very unsavoury reputation in this suit, as set out already in my previous judgment, that I cannot credit anything he says or any document he files for he undoubtedly filed forgeries before which he pretended to have got from the temple records. He had every reason to depose against defendants owing to a Sessions case against himself.

I certainly would not believe him in the face of the early admission on this issue made by plaintiff.

7. My finding, therefore, is that the widow did not enjoy the office and emoluments after her husband's death as his heir.

This second appeal came on for final hearing on the 24th, 27th and 28th October 1919, after the return of the findings of the lower Appellate Court upon the issues referred by this Court for trial.

Mr. K. Srinivasa Aiyangar (with him Mr. S. Viswanatha Aiyar and Dr. P. N. Nageswara Aiyar), for the Appellant.—In a Hindu joint family, it cannot be said of any member that he has any specific share in the family properties. At most there is a right to have a partition, which is made with reference to the qualified co-parceners at that time. There can, therefore, be no such thing as the "vesting and divesting" of any share or property of the joint family in any co-parcener, so long as it remains undivided. In the present case, the son died after his father became insane and was, therefore, the sole surviving member of the joint family at his own death. Hence the son's heirs came into possession. The question, therefore, is whether the fact that the insanity was not congenital, but merely supervening, makes any difference. I submit that it need not be congenital. For the Mitakshara in Chapter II, section 10, placita 6 and 10, clearly indicates that the disqualified heir is to be kept away from his share only during the period that he is insane. The arrangement is more like one for the proper care of the share of such person than a case of disinherison. The Courts also take the same view. See Deo Kishen v. Budh Prakash (1), Wooma Pershad Roy v. Grish Chunder Prochundo (6), Ram Sahye Bhukkut v. Lalla Liljee Sahye (7), Ram Soonder Roy v. Ram Sahye Bhugut (8), Abilakh Bhagat v. Bhekhi Mahto (4), Baboo Bodhnarain Singh v. Baboo Omrao Singh (9), Kooer Goolab Sing v. Rao Kurun Sing (10). Raghava Mudaliar v. Narayanasami Mudaliar (11) directly covers the present question. See also Krishna v. Sami (12) Balgobinda v. Lal Bahadur (13), Ram Singh v. Musammat Bhani (3), Kalidas v. Krishan Chandra Das (14), Apoovier v. Rama Subba Aiyan (15), Bapuji v. Pandurang (16), Madana Mohana Ananga Bheema Deo Kesari v. Purushothama Ananga Bheema Deo (17). Mr. K. K. Bhattacharji in his 'Joint Hindu Family' comes to the same conclusion. The case in Tirbeni Sahai v Muhammad Umar (2) is based upon the wrong theory of "vesting and divesting." Murari Gokuldas v. Parvatibai (18) was a case of blindness and not insanity. Shanku v. Puttimma (5) is also based upon the same wrong theory as Tirbeni Sahai v. Muhammad Umar (2). There is no possibility of conflict even with the birth of a son during insanity. The son so born becomes incorporated as one of the joint family with all rights. A difficulty may arise if the properties have been taken by strangers as heirs. That is not, however, the present case.

(There was also a question of right by adverse possession.)

Mr. T. R. Venkatrama Sastri (with him Messrs. T. M. Krishnaswamy Aiyar, K. S. Jayaram Aiyar and K. S. Ganapathy Aiyar), for the Respondent.—The question is not concluded by authority. If on insanity supervening, strangers come in as heirs, the claims of a child who may be born subsequently will be completely denied. And there is no principle on which the inheritance which might have been cast more than once in the interval could be re-called and re-allotted so as to vest the property back again in the issue of a disqualified member.

The son, having predeceased the father, who is the owner according to the Mitakshara—the sons acquiring only a subsidiary right by relation to the owner—became also the last surviving member on whose death his heirs would come in.

[SESHAGIRI AIYAR, J.—Has the father any greater right than the son and in what sense is he an 'owner'?]

The son derives his rights from the father by his relationship to him and it is in this sense that the father is the owner. From the father are traced the three generations who alone can acquire rights, and the fourth generation, though of the family in every sense, do not take because of the remoteness from him. The chapter on exclusion speaks of "an exception to the rights of the son, wife, and other heirs," not of the father. Incurable illness of the father is said to be an occasion for partition, but his exclusion from a share is not even suggested.

Placitum 6 says that one who gets a share on partition is not afterwards to be deprived of such rights. The subsequent birth of a son is not to alter this salutary rule.

The exclusion is not absolute but with a view to provide for proper management of the shares. The disqualified heirs can marry and have children, who come into their fathers' shares. See Viswarupa (Subhodini). Saraswati Vilasa says that such disqualified heirs are 'share-takers' if they are not incapable of marriage.

Texts as to disqualifications ought to be construed strictly, inasmuch as they are made to encroach upon the general 'right by birth' which a co parcener acquires to the family property. Disqualification is to operate only on partition. In the present case there is no question of partition at all and I submit that the texts, whatever their tenour, cannot be applied.

In Ram Sahye Bhukkut v. Lalla Laljee Sahye (7), followed in Ram Soonder Roy v. Ram Sahye Bhugut (8), the right to the property is recognised notwithstanding the disqualifications but the Court considered the suit to be one for partition. See also Abilakh Bhagat v. Bhekhi Mahto (4) (unless there is a question of partition). If the right remained, it would be enforceable. That is the basis of Tirbeni Sahai v. Muhammad Umar (2) and Sanku v. Puttamma (5). The observation in Raghava Mudaliar v. Narayansami Mudaliar (11) is obiter, the only question being whether insanity need be congenital. Nowhere is to be found any justification or reason for bringing the original absolute owner according to the Mitakshara under the rules of disqualification.

My next point is that insanity must in any event be congenital in order to disqualify. Sanku v. Puttamma (5), Strange's Hindu Law, page 153, Sarvadhikari on Inheritance, pages 962 3, Colebrook's Digest, Volume II, pages 425, 432. Further the chapter on disqualified heirs is inapplicable to a Hindu joint family. Hotchand Gulabrai v. Manghanmal Gulabrai (19) is in point. See also Viswarupa.

The question of adverse possession ought not to be allowed to be raised for the 1st time here.

Mr. K. Srinivasa Aiyanger, in reply.—During the period that insanity supervenes, the exclusion is absolute.

JUDGMENT.

SESHAGIRI AIYAR, J.—The facts on which we have to give our decision are now undisputed. Gangadara was entitled to an Archaka service in a temple. He was sane at birth, but subsequently became insane. He had an only son, Subbiah. After the son attained majority, the father became insane and died in 1850 without recovering sanity. Subbiah, during this period, was in sole possession of the Archaka office. He predeceased his father. (It is said that he died in 1874.) Subbiah left a widow Kuppammal, who died in 1911. Gangadara's widow Pappammal died in 1912. Plaintiff sues as reversioner of Subbiah, the son. Defendants are the daughter and grandsons of Gangadara. They are sister and sister's sons of Subbiah. If the property belonged to Subbiah, the defendants, being only the sister and sister's sons of the owner, will be excluded by the plaintiff. If, on the other hand, Gangadara was the owner at the time of his death, the defendants as his daughter and daughter's sons would exclude the plaintiff. The principal question for decision is whether by Gangadara having become insane, Subbiah became the sole owner by survivorship to the exclusion of his father.

A subsidiary question is whether the two widows, mother in law and daughter in-law enjoyed the property in such a manner and with such intention as to have prescribed for a half share each.

The main point for consideration is practically one of first impression. We have to examine the texts of Hindu Law for arriving at a decision. The case was argued with conspicuous ability on both sides, as may be expected of the learned Vakils engaged on either side.

I shall first dispose of the extreme contention put forward by Mr. Venkatrama Sastriar for the respondent. He contended that unless insanity is congenital, there is no exclusion from inheritance. On this question there is direct authority. In Deo Kishen v. Budh Prakash (1) a Bench of five Judges, after examining the texts of Hindu Law, decided that insanity need not be congenital. In Murarji Gokuldas v. Parvatibai (18) the same view was expressed. Before the Judicial Committee in Baboo Bodhnarain Singh v. Baboo Omrao Singh (9) the position was taken for granted that insanity need not be congenital. As against these decisions, we have Sanku v. Puttamma (5). The learned Judges, one of whom was Mr. Justice Muthuswami Ayyar, very summarily dealt with the question. They do not quote the cases I have referred to, nor do they discuss the texts of Hindu Law. Raghava Mudaliar v. Narayanisami Mudaliar (11), a later decision of this Court, is not consistent with Sanku v. Puttamma (5). However, as there is a direct decision of this Court on the point, I shall deal with the texts relating to it. Mr. Venkatrama Sastriar conceded that the word in Manu's text, Chapter IX, Sloka 201, 'Unmatha' (mad) was not qualified by the word 'Jathi' (from birth) which governs (Antha Vadhiran), the blind and the deaf. This is indicative of the view that other defects considered in the text need not be congenital. Mr. Justice Sadasiva Aiyar has held regarding blindness, mentioned in the same text, that the rule is obsolete. I am unfortunately unable to apply that principle to the present case. Courts here and the Judicial Committee have regarded this injunction of law as a living principle. I must perforce give effect to it. The argument of the learned Vakil for the respondent was directed to showing that of the three disqualifications mentioned together under this head, namely idiocy, insanity, and dumbness, the first and the last must necessarily be congenital; and that consequently, the middle one must have been included by the sage as partaking of the same character. In the first place, it is not clear that mukatva (dumbness) would operate as an exclusion, only if it is congenital. It is true that it has been held in some cases that the text under discussion must be restricted to congenital dumbness. From a decided case to impute to the text writer that he regarded that dumbness can never be anything but congenital is not an easy process. The learned Vakil suggested that a dumbness that supervenes was not really what Manu meant; such supervening dumbness may not exclude the person from inheritance, but I am not prepared to say that it cannot be permanent, if it is not congential. I must, therefore, hold that it has not been proved that all the three instances classed together by the author are examples of congenital defects. No doubt idiocy is not a supervening disease. We have, therefore, this situation. Three disqualifications are enumerated. One of them is prima facie congenital: another need not be: the second is more often than not a supervening disease. In these circumstances can it be contended that the author by referring to them as a class intended to indicate that as these disqualifications ex necessitate must relate to what exists from birth, it was superfluous to prefix them with the adjectival clause Jathi, 'from birth,' as he did with regard to another category of disqualification? I am not prepared to take this view. According to Mimansa rules of interpretation, an adjective qualifying one clause should not by implication qualify a different clause. In this view, the word 'Jathi' does not govern Unmatha. The learned Vakil for the respondent quoted the opinion of Sarbhadikari at page 962 of his book in favour of his contention. The author does not express any definite conclusion. Nor Colebrook's Digest, Vol. II, page 432, is a considered opinion. I am not prepared to disagree with the view of the Full Bench of the Allahabad High Court [Deo Kishen v. Budh Prakash (1)] on this question.

I shall now deal with the main question. The portion relating to exclusion from inheritance finds a place in Chapter II, section 10 of Mitakshara. It need hardly be mentioned that chapters, sections and placita owe their existence to Mr. Colebrooke's labours and not to any arrangement by the Commentator himself. Vignaneswara only makes a running commentary on the texts of Yagnavalkya which he quotes as he proceeds. The whole discussion, on this part of the subject, begins with a discussion of the meaning and attributes of Dayi. I shall not attempt its definition here. The preamble to section 10 (which has been described as placitum 1) states: "The author states an exception to what has been said by him respecting the succession of the son, the widow and other heirs, as well as the reunited parcener." Then follows the Yagnavalkya text, Sloka 140. Then definitions of the various expressions in the text are given. Unmatha, 'A madman,' is thus defined—"affected by any of the various sorts of insanity proceeding from air, bile, or phlegm, from delirium or from evil spirits." This is in placitum 2. Placita 3, 4 and 5 further explain the text. Then we come to placitum 6....."They are debarred of their shares, if their disqualification arose before the division of the property. But one already separated from his co-heirs is not deprived of his allotment.' Placitum 7 refers to cases in which the disqualification subsequently disappears. The Commentator says that such cases will be regulated by the same principle by which sons born after a partition are provided with a share Placitum 9 is important. The Commentator begins the examination of the next text of the Smrithi by this preamble. The disinherison of the persons above described seeming to imply disinherison of their sons, the author adds and then quotes the text which is in these terms:—"But their sons, whether legitimate, or the offspring of the wife by a kinsman, are entitled to allotments, if free from similar defects," and comments on it in the 10th placitum onwards. Placitum 10 says, "The sons of these persons, whether they be legitimate offspring or issue of the wife, are entitled to allotments, or are rightful partakers of shares, provided they be faultless or free from defects which should bar their participation, such as impotency, etc." This corresponds to Manu, Chapter IX, Sloka 203. These are the only citations relevant for the purpose. A few general observations may be made here before examining the contention of the learned Vakils.

(a) The rules enunciated in this chapter are exceptions to the general principles of inheritance. Consequently they should be construed strictly. As far as possible, deducing by analogy a class of exceptions not clearly covered by the words should be avoided. The Hindu Law is no exception to the rule that it would lead Courts into a false position to hold that every rule must be given its logical extension. This caution is specially necessary in regard to suggestions to multiply exceptions.

(b) The rules are expositions, partly from usage and partly from an attempt to reconcile conflicting Smrithi texts, of the views of the Commentator. He found a state of society which demanded change. To satisfy this demand, while doing lip service to the inviolability of the written word, he not unfrequently takes liberty with the text. Therefore, care should be taken not to confuse the original injunction with its subsequent emendations. For example, the analogy of the after-born son is not in the particular text of Yagnavalkya relating to this subject. What Vignaneswara did was to find a pretext for obviating an injustice. He found in Sloka 123 of the Smriti a rule relating to after born sons. He introduced that as a good and reasonable solution of the problem relating to the recovery of normal health by the disqualified heir. This analogy in some cases has been pushed too far in some decisions and by some writers on Hindu Law. It is at least doubtful whether Vignaneswara intended that his rule should be subjected to a searching examination by the importation of all the difficulties with which the rule about the share of the after-born son bristles.

(c) Ideas which we find imported into the discussion of this question by speaking of the inheritances 'Vesting,' of 'Being divested,' 'of the succession opening on the death of the father, etc.,' which may have meaning when applied to Jeemutha Vahana's exposition of Hindu Law, are not correctly applied to Vignaneswara's School of Law. The reiteration by the latter that property is by birth should be carefully borne in mind. This last observation is specially applicable to dicta in some of the decided cases. It appears to me that in these decisions instances relating to survivorship have been considered as if they were cases of pure inheritance and of collateral succession.

Now, I shall proceed to consider the two theories advanced. Mr. K. Srinivasa Ayyangar's contention amounts to saying that a son of a Mitakshara father has only the potentiality of taking a share, and that that potentiality is lost by his being subject to any of the disqualifications enumerated. The moment that the disqualification, patent or latent, exhibits itself, he must be put aside subject only to his having the right of maintenance; on his emerging free from the disqualification, the potentiality revives; and if he is alive at the time of partition in this reformed condition, he will take a share.

Mr. Venkatarama Sastriar's contention, on the other hand, is that the son is a sharer or share-taker from the moment of his birth. He ceases to be the share-enjoyer when he is subject to the disqualification. His right is not lost, but is only in abeyance; and the provision for maintenance is not a deprivation of the inherent right but a beneficient provision for management of the property so long as the disqualification lasts.

MUTHUSAMI GURUKKAL v. MEENAMMAL.

A great deal has been said and can be said in favour of either of these contentions. I do not think that an examination of the reasons for the exclusion would help us much in deciding the question. I might briefly refer to it, as it has some bearing on the point. Visvarupa, a commentator of the Yagnavalkya Smriti (and who wrote his dissertation before Vignaneswara) seems to have been very sceptic about the reasonableness of the process of exclusion. He refuses the idea that the exclusion is based on the theory of sin in the previous birth, and cites instances to show that heirs of whom it can safely be predicted that they were sinners are among those to whom unqualified inheritance is given. He also rejects the theory that inability to perform religious rites in this birth might have been the ground for exclusion. Here again he quotes instances. His view seems to be "We find the exclusion there and we must perforce accept it." If the exclusion is not based on original sin or subsequent incapacity to offer oblation and the like, the suggestion that it was due to a belief in the inability of the heir to manage temporal affairs appears more plausible. Very likely the rule is an outcome of a hazy notion that the property should be preserved for the disqualified person by those who are related to him. The law as to guardianship has developed much in later days. Even now it is not perfect. It looks as if the old law-givers by providing for maintenance did not intend to deprive the heir of his inheritance, but only to provide for its management during incapacity.

Mr. Srinivasa Ayyangar in analysing the placita relating to the periods of partition contended that the right to a share is only predicated on the contingency of the heir existing in a normal condition at the time partition is made. It is true that if the sharer dies undivided before the actual partition takes place, the property will be distributed as if he was not born at all. In answer to the suggestion that this theory is inconsistent with giving rights to his son or grandson in the father's share, the learned Vakil argued that these persons are specially mentioned. It seems to me that the rule in placitum 6, section 10, that a person is excluded, if he is disqualified at the time of partition, is not a pronouncement that the right ripens and is capable of enforcement only then, but a principle indicating who all should be allotted shares at the division. The principle of right by birth, which Vignaneswara insistently enunciates, would become nugatory if a bare potentiality is assigned to that right.

The other view receives considerable support from Saraswati Vilasa, a treatise which is a binding authority in this part of India. The author quotes Manu in placitum 148 and then comments: on it in placita 149 to 157. He says: 'From this coupling together it follows that they have shares, but that they should, though having shares, be supported as they could marry." The view is that if any of the excluded persons is capable of marriage and of begetting children, their shares should be managed for their benefit and they should be given maintenance. This seems to follow from Manu, Chapter IX, Sloka 203. The professors of the science of eugenics may rightly protest against this tacit assumption by the ancient sages that an insane person can marry; but so long as the State does not prohibit such marriages the law cannot be abrogated. The ancient law-givers even provided for the begetting of children on the wife of the incapacitated person. They seem to have been as anxious for giving facilities for the procreation of children, as some of the sanest publicists in these days and the heads of states are, after the great war, to recognise and encourage the rearing up of offspring, however begotten. However that may be, the view of the author of Saraswati Vilasa is more in consonance with the view that the right exists, but is only obscured for the time being. Mr. Srinivasa Ayyangar suggested that the parenthetical clause about capacity for marriage suggested by the author of the Saraswati Vilasa does not destroy the root doctrine that the right is enforceable only, if and when there is full mental capacity at the date of partition. But the author distinctly says that the share should be managed because of the possibility of marriage, thereby indicating that it exists and is not lost altogether. My conclusion, therefore, is that the right comes into existence at birth, subsists all through, although it is incapable of enforcement at the time of partition, because of the disqualification then existing.

Mr. Srinivasa Ayyangar drew our attention to the statement in Steel's Law of Custom, in which the author says that the custom is to regard the insane man as entitled to a share, although he is not given the enjoyment of it.

Coming to the decided cases, in Raghava Mudaliar v. Narayanasami Mudaliar (11) there is an obiter dictum to the effect that if a Hindu father dies leaving ancestral property and a son insane at the time of his death, the son is not entitled to take the property. The dictum was not necessary for the case and curiously enough, Sanku v. Puttamma (5), where a contrary view was taken, was not considered in this judgment. In this latter case which relates to the inheritance of an Aliyasantana family in South Kanara it was decided that the surviving member, who was a female and was insane, was the owner of the property. I have dissented from this judgment in so far as it relates to the question that insanity should be congenital. Krishna v. Sami (12) does not affect this case directly. That was a case relating to a right of the sons of a deaf and dumb member. It was held that the fact that the father was disqualified and that the sons were born after the death of their grandfather did not disentitle them to take their father's share. The learned Judges after examining the texts seemed inclined to hold that property vested on the birth of the heir. However, the present question was not considered in that case. These are all the Madras authorities. There are some cases in Calcutta which are not quite reconcilable with each other. The earliest of them is in Balgobinda v. Lal Bahadur (13). The case related to the lunacy of one Ramsahai. He seems to have given his name to a number of cases on this point. It is clear from this case that a committee was appointed to manage his share. This decision impliedly supports the view that insanity does not operate as deprivation of the birthright. The next case, in which also the insanity of the same individual was in question, is Ram Sahye Bhukaut v. Lulla Laljee Sahye (7). There are conflicting dicta in that judgment which render it valueless as authority. The suit was brought to recover property on behalf of the lunatic. The learned Judges, while holding that he had a right to the property, refused to disturb the alienees on the ground that if he was to recover the property, he would not be in a position to have it partitioned. Another decision in that same volume relating to the insanity of the same individual is Ram Soonder Roy v. Ram Sahye Bhugut (8). Both these cases were considered in Abilakh Bhagat v. Bhekhi Mahto (4), which again was a case relating to the insanity of the same individual; it was held that the right to property existed although the right to its enjoyment was unenforceable. Prinsep, J., was of opinion that the earlier decisions in VIII Calcutta were not good law. These are the Calcutta decisions. In Allahabad there is a direct decision in Tirbeni Sahai v. Muhammad Umar (2), but the learned Judges speak of succession opening on the death of the father which would not be right in the case of a Mitakshara son. Ram Singh v. Musammat Bhani (3) was a case of pure inheritance. In Man Singh v. Musammat Gaini (20) the learned Judges took the view enunciated in Abilakh Bhagat v. Bhekhi Mahto (4). There are all the cases on the point.

None of them deals with the exact question we have to decide. The dicta in some of them, however, support the view I have taken.

The next point which Mr. K. Srinivasa Ayyangar pressed upon us is that the lower Appellate Court has not given a correct finding on the question of prescription which we asked him to decide. The question arises in this way. After the death of Subbiah, the son, his widow and the wife of Gangadara were doing the Puja service in the temple. There is evidence on both sides which indicates that they were enjoying the worship in equal turns. The District Judge has not discussed this evidence. For example there is the written statement, paragraph 3, which suggests this; paragraph 4 also may be referred to. There are Exhibit I and Exhibits H, I, T and J. There is the deposition of D. W No. 1. Although there was no issue about prescription in the first Court as the question there was as to who died first, whether Gangadara or Subbiah, the point is one which does require adjudication having regard to the view I took of the case. I must, therefore, reverse the decree of the District Judge and remand this appeal to him for disposal on the question whether the widow of Subbiah had prescribed for a half share in the property after the death of her husband and if so, whether she acquired a right to it at the time of her death. It may be necessary to take fresh evidence in the case, because it is possible that the enjoyment of Subbiah's widow was in lieu of maintenance or it may be that Gangadara's wife out of affection allowed her to enjoy the turn of worship. These matters have not been elucidated because there was originally no issue on this question. With these observations I must remand the case for disposal to the lower Appellate Court. The parties will pay and receive proportionate costs in this Court and the costs in the lower Appellate Court will abide the result.

(20) 43 Ind. Cas. 62; 40 A. 77; 15 A. L. J. 660.

Bombay Village Police Act (VIII of 1867), construction of—Non-vatandar village servants, appointment of, whether contemplated.

The construction of the Bombay Village Police Act is primarily a question of evidence as to whether the organisation to which it relates excludes or includes the appointment of non-vatandar village servants. [p. 526, col. 2.]

Appeal from the decision of the Joint Judge at Ahmedabad, in Appeal No 228 of 1918, reversing the decree passed by the Second Class Subordinate Judge at Viramgam, in Civil Suit No. 591 of 1912.

Mr. G. S. Rao, for the Appellant.

Mr. Setalvad (with him Mr. G. N. Thakor), for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The case we are dealing with relates to one of those Talukdari villages in the Ahmedabad Collectorate which form a part of the estate of the Patri Darbar, and I gather from the judgments that the Patri Darbar is the Talukdar of this particular village, the name of which is Kamijla. It seems that in the year 1907, the Police authorities came to the conclusion that the village establishment of this village of Kamijla was insufficient for Police purposes, and that two Pagis ought to be added to that establishment. After correspondence, which it seems has been destroyed, but of which we have evidence in the Barnishi of the Government Offices, the Patri Darbar did appoint two Pagis for this village and has since paid them at the rate of Rs. 5 a month each. The Patri Darbar is the plaintiff in this case. The defendant is the person who receives an eight annas share of the revenues of the village, but it seems he has never paid any portion of the cost of these two Pagis, and the plaintiff wishes to recover from the defendant half their cost. This claim opens up a very wide field of dispute, and there are a great many matters which seem to me to be matters of great difficulty about which I do not propose to say anything at all in this judgment, because the Court of first appeal, the Joint Judge of Ahmedabad, has wrongly disposed of the matter on a preliminary point. So the appeal will have to go back to be re heard de novo and decided on its merits.

The original Court decided in favour of the plaintiff and the defendant appealed. The Judge in appeal was led to suppose that unless it was shown that the District Magistrate had power to appoint Pagis in villages of this kind, the plaintiff's claim must fail. He found that the District Magistrate had not such power and consequently he allowed the appeal and dismissed the suit.

It may be that the Judge was quite right in his assumption that if it was shown that the District Magistrate had not power to appoint Pagis, then the plaintiff's claim must fail I do not, however, at present quite follow why this is so; and I am unable to agree with the Joint Judge that this is shown. The case was dealt with as if the Village Police Act (Bom. Act VIII of 1867) was the law which governed the matter, and I will take it on that basis; although incidentally I may mention that I am not at all certain that the correct law is not to be found in the Gujarat Talukdars' Act (Bom. Act VI of 1888), particularly sections 5 and 30 of that Act.

However I will now revert to the basis on which the matter is dealt with in the lower Court. The Joint Judge came to the conclusion, on a perusal of Bombay Act VIII of 1867, that it was clear that the District Magistrate had no power to appoint Pagis. The argument very briefly is as follows. The Village Police Act provides for the administration of village Police. It provides specifically for the appointment of Patils. It recognises the existence of a village establishment or village servants, and this village establishment is by section 9 placed under the control of the Police Patil for the performance of Police duties. It is argued that because there is no specific provision for the appointment of what is called the village establishment, that no appointments to the village establishment are provided for by the Act. As regards Vatandar village servants undoubtedly this is correct. The appointment of Vatandar village servants is provided for by the Hereditary Offices Act. Whether the Village Police Act contemplates appointments of non-Vatandars to the village establishment is a matter which could only be determined, it seems to me, by reading the Act itself in the light of a knowledge of the organization with which the Act is intended to deal. It seems to me to be as futile to attempt to construe this Act VIII of 1867 without some knowledge of the organization to which it relates, as it would be to attempt to construe an Act, we will say, relating to electricity, without some knowledge of electricity. It is quite conceivable of course that the organization to which this Bombay Act VIII of 1867 relates is an organization which excludes the appointment to the village establishment of any non-Vatandar village servants. If that were so, if the organization as it existed was an organization of that kind, an organization to which additions in the shape of non-Vatandar village servants were prohibited, then no doubt the Act would be read, and rightly read, as conferring no power, indeed as excluding the power of appointment of village servants of that kind. But if as a fact the organization did contemplate, and did in practice comprise the appointment of non-Vatandar village servants, we will say for the sake of example, by the District Magistrate, then I should unhesitatingly construe the Act as not excluding, but as contemplating, such appointments; for that would come under the head of the administration of the organization. It is, therefore, primarily a question of evidence as to whether the organization did exclude or did include the appointment of village servants of this kind, that is, non Vatandar village servants. The Joint Judge has not dealt with it as a matter of evidence. The only evidence relating to the point which has been brought to our notice is a Resolution of the Government, Exhibit 387. This Resolution contains a letter by one of the Commissioners to Government, from which it appears that appointments of non Vatandar village servants were undoubtedly made. The only point which at that time seems to have excited doubt was whether, when such appointments were made for Police purposes, they should be made by the District Superintendent of Police or by the District Magistrate. Therefore, such evidence as there is does indicate that the organization of the village was an organization which included the appointment of non-Vatandar village servants. Therefore, it seems to me that the decision of the Joint Judge was wrong. I cannot accept his interpretation of the Village Police Act, because it is not shown that the organization to which that Act relates is an organization of the kind which the Joint Judge assumed. Such evidence as there is indicates that it was not an organization of that kind, Therefore, it seems to me inevitable that the decision of the Joint Judge must be set aside as having been arrived at erroneously on a preliminary point, and that the appeal must be remanded to be dealt with anew. The costs of both Courts will be costs in the appeal.

CHANI, MINOR, THROUGH Musammat CHHOTI AND OTHERS—RESPONDENTS.

Guardians and Wards Act (VIII of 1890), ss. 34, 47, 48—Order directing guardian to pay into Court balance due from him—Appeal, whether lies—Revision.

No appeal lies against an order calling upon a guardian to pay into Court the balance due from him on settlement of the accounts of the minor's property.

Orders under section 34 of the Guardians and Wards Act are open to examination by the High Court on the revision side.

Petition for revision of the order of the District Judge, Hissar, dated the 20th May 1919.

Lala Jagan Nath, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—On the 9th of June 1916 Ram Jas was appointed the guardian of the property and person of Chani, son of Sukh Ram, minor. On the 24th June 1918 the minor's mother, Musammat Jiwani, moved the Court asking that Ram Jas be called upon to render an account of the minor's property and, acting apparently under section 34 (c) of Act VIII of 1890, the learned District Judge directed Ram Jas to file his accounts. This Ram Jas did on the 10th March 1919 and in his accounts showed that for two years the income of the minor's property had been Rs. 126 2 and after deducting necessary expenditure for revenue, etc., he showed a balance in hand of Rs. 107-5 3. The learned District Judge, however, appointed a local commissioner to make a report as to what the income of the property for the two years should be. The local commissioner reported that he estimated the total income for that period to be Rs. 1,906 of which one-third should go to the minor. The sum arrived at by the local commissioner was Rs. 635 5-3. To some extent the local commissioner's report was supported by the patwari. The learned District Judge, however, considered that the least income derivable from the minor's property for that period must have been Rs. 300 and deducting Rs. 18 on account of revenue Ram Jas was directed under section 34 (d) to pay in the sum of Rs. 282, and for the future it was ordered that the minor should live with his mother who was to be paid Rs. 5 a month for the minor's maintenance.

Against this order Ram Jas has come up to this Court. Lala Jagan Nath on behalf of Musammat Jiwani contended that no appeal was allowed by section 47 of the Act from the order passed under section 34 and by virtue of section 48 of the Act the order was final. It seems that this contention is correct and that no appeal lies but orders under section 34 would be open to examination by this Court on the revision side.

In the present case it seems to me that Ram Jas had really nothing to complain of. It is not clear exactly how the sum of Rs. 300 was arrived at, but that sum is less than half of the figure given by the local commissioner. I see no occasion to interfere and dismiss this petition.

I draw the attention of the learned District Judge to the necessity for insisting on regular accounts. To call for accounts after a period of two years is obviously unsatisfactory, and in the present case it seems to me that it would be advisable to insist on the guardian filing the accounts after each harvest.

Petition dismissed.

Hindu Law—Guardian of minor widow, alienation by, validity of—Reversioners, representation of—Compromise decree, whether binds reversioners.

Under the Hindu Law, the guardian of a minor widow can exercise all the powers which the minor has and in alienating the minor's properties it is competent to the guardian to convey not only the widow's limited interest but also the absolute interest which, under certain circumstances, she can convey [p. 589, col. .]

Prima facie, any person, whether a limited owner or full owner, suing to recover property on the ground that an alienation thereof is invalid must be deemed to act for the benefit of the estate and not for his personal benefit. [p. 589, col 2]

A compromise decree in a suit by a widow against an alienee stands on no higher footing than a conveyance by her and unless it is shown that it has all the elements of a valid alienation by a limited owner, it is not enforceable against the reversioners [p. 589, col. 1.]

(Authorities reviewed.)

Second appeal against the decree of the Temporary Subordinate Judge, Tanjore, in Appeal Suit No. 173 of 1917, preferred against the decree of the Court of the Principal District Munsif, Tiruvalur, in Original Suit No. 113 of 1915.

FACTS appear from the judgment.

Mr. K. V. Krishnaswamy Aiyar, for the Appellant.—The reversioners claim under the last male holder and so cannot be bound by a widow entering into a compromise. A Hindu widow's powers regarding the estate are restricted, except that she may enter into a family settlement or make an alienation of property for strict necessity. Rajlakshmi Dasee v. Katyayani Dasee (1). She has no power to enter into a compromise with strangers. If she does, the reversioners are not bound as she is not the person from whom they claim.

Viewing the compromise as an alienation, strict necessity ought to have been found. A finding of benefit will not suffice. The law has been enunciated in Rajlakshmi Dasee v. Katyayani Dassee (1), Bhogaraju v. Adapalli Seshayya (2), Kanhai Lal v. Brij Lal (3), Khunni Lal v. Gobind Krishna Narain (4), Amrit Narain Singh v. Gaya Singh (5), Hiran Bibi v. Sohan Bibi (6), which explains Khunni Lal v Gobind Krishna Narain (4). See also Sheo Narain Singh v. Khurgo Koerry (7), Rangarayudu v. Peraiya Sastry (8).

If the alienee derived his title from the limited owner, the transaction would be an alienation; that is not the case in a family settlement where the title is derived direct from the last male holder. Khunni Lal v. Gobind Krishna Narain (4). A decree on the compromise would bind the reversioners only if the contract to compromise would bind them. Bhogaraju v. Adapalli Seshayya (2). It is only an adjudication after a fair contest that would be binding on the estate and so the reversioners also.

Messrs. T. R. Ramachandra Aiyar and T. R. Krishnaswamy Aiyar for the Respondents.—There is no principle underlying the proposition that a widow's powers vary with the persons with whom she has to deal. The mere fact that reversioners join with her in what is called "a family settlement" cannot enlarge the powers of a widow. The powers of the karnavan of a Malabar tarwad, the manager of a Hindu family and an executor under a Will are analogous in this respect. The observation in Bhogaraju v, Adapalli Seshayya (2) is a pure obiter dictum. The rights of a reversioner are only in theory until the death of the widow and so he is on no better footing than a stranger.

interests are presumed to have been properly cared for.]

But the widow's powers cannot be taken to have been enlarged beyond what is allowed by law. The only logical position can be that a widow has no power to enter into either or has power to enter into both. This view has been held in Mohendra Nath Biswas v. Shamsunnessa Khatun (9) after the exposition of the law by the Privy Council in Khunni Lal v. Gobind Krishna Narain (4). This was followed in Ram Sumran Prosad v. Shyam Kumari (10). The point was not decided in Rangarayudu v. Perayya Sastry (8). The case-law on the points is digested in Upendra Nath Bose v. Bindeshri Prosad (11). The only test is whether the act of the widow is bona fide. The finding is that it is and that it is in the best interests of the estate. This test is laid down even in Rajlakshmi Dasee v. Katyayani Dasee (1). And the length of time is a material circumstance. The question of necessity can arise only if the compromise were considered as an alienation. A settlement of a dispute or doubtful claim is not an alienation. Was there a contest or not and was it a proper act of the widow in compromising it? I submit that the question of necessity does not arise at all.

Mr. K. V. Krishnaswamy Aiyar briefly replied.

JUDGMENT.—The short facts of the case are these. One Swaminatha Aiyer, who was the last male owner, died in 1859 leaving a junior widow Annapurni and his mother Kuppachi Ammal. Kuppachi Ammal managed the property as the guardian of her daughter-in law. While doing so, she alienated certain properties in favour of the defendants' predecessor in title. On becoming a major, Annapurni brought a suit to set aside her mother-in-law's alienations. A decree on compromise was passed (Exhibit K), by which the alienees were given certain properties absolutely and the remainder were given to Annapurni. She died in 1909. The present suit is brought to recover the property from the alienees.

There is no evidence, and naturally there can be none at this distance of time, as to the circumstances which led to the compromise. The Courts below have held that the compromise was binding on the reversioners. Mr. K. V. Krishnaswami Iyer addressed to us a very exhaustive argument on that and two other questions. We may very shortly deal with the two subsidiary questions. The learned Vakil contended that a guardian of a minor widow in alienating property can only convey the ordinary limited interest possessed by the widow and not the absolute interest which, under certain circumstances, she can convey, and that consequently by the compromise nothing can pass to the alienees but a widow's interest. We are unable to accept this contention. The guardian of a minor can exercise all the powers which a minor has, and there is no ground for suggesting that the guardian intended to exercise the smaller rights and not the larger rights which her ward possessed. The second point was that the mere production of the compromise decree would not show that Annapurni in challenging the alienation was acting in the interests of the estate. We see no force in this contention. Prima facie, any person, whether a limited owner or full owner, who wishes to recover property on the ground that an alienation is invalid must be taken to have put in issue the rights of the estate to recover the property. The limitation suggested by the learned Vakil that Annapurni might have attempted to contest the alienation on grounds personal to herself seems far fetched. In our opinion her action in questioning the alienation of her mother-in-law must be regarded as having been done for the benefit of the estate and not for her personal benefit.

Now comes the very important question which was fully discussed before us. The decision in Katama Natchier v. Rajah of Shivagunga (12) is the foundation for the rule of law that a decree obtained honestly against the contesting widow will bind the reversioners. The proposition enunciated in that case has been reaffirmed by the Judicial Committee in a number of cases. Amrit Narayan Singh v. Gaya Singh (5), Kanhai Lal v. Brij Lal (3) and lastly Risal Singh v. Balwant Singh (13). In all these cases the decree was passed after a fair contest in Court. In none of them was there a compromise decree. From early times, the Courts in this country have held that a decree to which the widow has only consented and which was not passed after contest cannot be placed on a higher footing than a contract or alienation by her. In Sheo Narain Singh v. Khurgo Koeriy (7) this principle was enunciated, and also in Rajalakshmi Dasee v. Katyayani Dasee (1) by Mr. Justice Mukerjee after an elaborate discussion of the case-law on the point. In Sant Kumar v. Deo Saran (14) Mr. Justice Mahmood reviewed the case-law on the point and came to the same conclusion. In Jeram v. Veerbai (15) the same view was taken in Bombay. In Madras, Justices Benson and Sundaram Aiyar expressed the same opinion, although it was obiter dictum in Bhogaraju v. Adapalli Seshayya (2). In Rangarayudu v. Perayya Sastry (8) the point was not decided though a finding was called for on the assumption that Bhogaraju v. Adapalli Seshayya (2) was right. In Appeals Nos. 40, 88 and 130 of 1914, the learned Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Ayling have expressed the same opinion. On the other hand we have the judgment of Mr. Justice Abdur Rahim which has been concurred in by Mr. Justice Srinivasa Aiyengar in which a different view was indicated. In Calcutta very recently Mr Justice Mukerjee, who had stated the law very elaborately in Rajlakshmi Dasee v. Katyayani Dassee (1), appears to have changed his view. In Mohendra Nath Biswas v. Shamsunnessa Khatun (9) the learned Judge seems to have been influenced by the recent decision of the Judicial Committee in Risal Singh v. Balwant Singh (13) in holding that a compromise decree is on the same footing as a contested decree. But in Risal Singh v. Balwant Singh (13) there was no compromise decree, but a decree after contest. The Patna High Court in Ram Sumran Prosad v. Shyam Kumari (10) apparently agree with the later view of Mr. Justice Mukerjee. In this state of authorities and as there is no direct pronouncement by the Madras High Court we have deemed it expedient to examine the principles on which this question should be decided.

Mr. Ramachendra Iyer contended that, as the Judicial Committee have in more than one case held that a compromise decree which operates as a family settlement is binding upon the reversioners, there is no reason for not giving to a consent decree in favour of alienees the same effect. Khunni Lal v. Gobind Krishna Narain (4) and Upendra Nath Bose Bindeshri Prosad (11) are instances of family settlements based on compromise. In our opinion, there is a vital difference between family settlements based on compromise and decrees on compromise in favour of alienees. As was stated in the well-known case of Stapilton v. Stapilton (16) and restated in Williams v. Williams (17), the reason for looking with favour on family settlements is that they are calculated to bring peace to the family.

There are numerous cases in England in which Courts have treated family arrangements with special favour. In India, the Judicial Committee enunciated the same view long ago. It is not only the necessity of bringing peace into the family that is to be considered in a family arrangement, but considerations which are not germane to the enforcement of legal rights are often taken into account in allocating properties under it. The sanctity of an individual, the prestige and usefulness of one member of the family in augmenting the family property, although it be with the family funds, family traditions, which, though not legally enforceable, are held binding on the conscience of the members and other considerations of a moral rather than of a legal character, which a Judge should not take into account and which the council of the family alone is best fitted to deal with, often weigh in a family settlement. But in a case of alienation to a stranger these considerations have absolutely no place; ordinarily, the widow and the alienee would not be efficient substitutes for a Judge in deciding whether the estate should be burdened with the obligation or not. Certainly the reversioner should not be expected to acquiesce in a decision arrived at by persons who would prima facie not be interested in safeguarding his interests. Therefore, it stands to reason and equity that, when a widow agrees to give up certain rights of the family to alienees, the reversioners should demand that it should be proved that it was necessary or expedient to have given up those rights in the interests of the estate. It is for that reason that it has been held in the decisions to which we have made reference that the consent given by the widow should not be placed upon a higher footing than a conveyance by her. Further, to a judgment given by the Court, the unbiassed mind of the presiding officer is applied, whereas the Court is bound, unless the agreement contravenes public policy or principles of a like nature, to sanction the compromise. The basis of a consent decree is an adjustment out of Court by the parties. The consent decree, therefore, approximates to a second alienation by a widow in the light of additional circumstances, it may be. Nonetheless, in essence, it is the result of her judgment and not that of an impartial tribunal. In our opinion, therefore, the observations to be found in the judgment of the Madras High Court on this question and the opinion expressed by Mr. Justice Mukerjee in the earlier cases as well as the decisions in Sant Kumar v. Deo Saran (14) and Jeram v. Veerbai (15) must be regarded as having taken the sounder view on this question. There is no decision of the Judicial Committee which takes a different view. In our opinion the argument of Mr. K. V. Krishnaawamy Iyer that, unless it is shown that a compromise has the elements of a valid alienation by a limited owner, it is not enforceable against the reversioners, should be accepted.

Having stated the law on the point, we shall examine the findings of the lower Appellate Court with reference to the above conclusion. In paragraph 16 the Subordinate Judge says:—"For the foregoing reasons I am of opinion that the compromise in Original Suit No. 229 of 1870 was entered into by Annapurni bona fide and in the best interests of her husband's estate." No doubt if we were sitting as a first Appellate Court we might have come to the same conclusion. But the Subordinate Judge has drawn attention to circumstances which, in his opinion, justified him in arriving at the conclusion he has stated. One circumstance which has weighed with us also is the conduct of the father of the present plaintiff in failing to impeach the alienation which has been outstanding for over 50 years. He knew that there was an absolute conveyance to the alienee. The law gave him the right of contesting the alienation and of obtaining a declaration that it was not valid. He did not avail himself of that right; it is unreasonable, after such a long time, that the alienees should be compelled to prove affirmatively that the compromise was brought about honestly and without any fraud on their part. We cannot say that there is no evidence on which the opinion of the Subordinate Judge can be based. We must, therefore, assume that the Subordinate Judge has cast the burden upon the alienees and has come to the conclusion he has stated on an examination of the facts proved before him. We are bound to accept that finding. In the result the second appeal fails and is dismissed with costs.

CHHOTUBHAI GOVINDJI DESAI—PLAINTIFF—APPELLANT

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA—DEFENDANT—RESPONDENT.

Limitation Act (IX of 1908), Sch. I, Art. 14—

CHHOTUBHAI GOVINDJI v. SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA.

Bombay Land Revenue Code (Bom. Act V of 1879), s. 37—Land leased by Collector—Collector declining to entertain claim—Suit for possession—Limitation— Terminus a quo.

Article 14 of Schedule I to the Limitation Act operates to bar a suit to recover possession of lands forming a river-bed leased by the Collector, unless brought within one year of the date of the Collector's order under section 37 of the Bombay Land Revenue Code, declining to entertain such claim.

In computing the period of limitation for such a suit in a case where the Collector's order was passed before Bombay Act XI of 1912 came into force, the terminus a quo is the date of that order.

First appeal against the decision of the District Judge, Surat, in Suit No. 9 of 1914.

Mr. P. B. Shingne, for the Appellants.

Mr. S. S. Katkar, Government Pleader, for Respondent No. 1.

JUDGMENT.

MACLEOD, C. J.—The plaintiff in this suit had been in possession of a piece of land measuring one acre and twenty-one gunthas on the bank of the Tapti river in the village of Katargam in the Surat District. He alleges that by reason of such occupancy he has by law and usage the right of access to the river and to the use of the water of the river, and has a right to the accretions by alluvion, and that defendant No. 1 in derogation of his rights has leased out the land in suit for five years to defendant No. 2, and that the 2nd defendant has put up a wire fence on or about the 24th May 1912 which prevented the plaintiff from exercising his rights, and has thus caused him a loss which he assessed at Rs. 100. The Collector's order is dated 16th July 1912, and purported to be made under section 37 of the Bombay Land Revenue Code. It does not appear that the Collector had come to a conclusion that the land leased to the 2nd defendant was alluvial land within the meaning of section 63 of the Bombay Land Revenue Code. Under that section:—

"When it appears to the Collector that the occupancy of any alluvial land which vests, under any law for the time being in force, in Government, may, with due regard to the interests of the public revenue, be disposed of in perpetuity, he shall offer the prior right of occupancy thereof to the occupant, if any, of the bank or shore on which such alluvial land has formed."

That is how the section ran in 1912. It has since been altered by Act IV of 1913. It is evident from the written statement that the Collector considered that the land in question was part of the river-bed and was fit for cultivation when it was not covered by water, and that it had been let out from time to time as such land. It seems obvious, therefore, that any claim that the plaintiff as occupant of land on the river bank had under section 63 to have alluvial land offered to him never arose, and he could have no cause of action against the 1st defendant for letting out the land in the river-bed to another party. But it is also clear that the plaintiff, if he had any cause of action, was bound to set aside the order of the 16th July 1912, and under Article 14 of the Indian Limitation Act, he was bound to file that suit within one year. The order of the 16th July 1912 was passed before Act XI of 1912 came into force, and under section 11 of the Bombay Revenue Jurisdiction Act it is quite clear that time must be held, as was held in another case quite recently, to run from the date of the order by the Collector, and not from the date of the final order which was made by the Governor in Council on the 16th June 1913. I think, therefore, that the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

HEATON, J.—I agree. It is quite plain from the plaint in this case that what the plaintiff complains of is the act or order, whichever it may be, of the Collector of the 16th July 1912. If that act or order was correct, the plaintiff has no cause of action. If it was not correct, yet it was an act or order which requires to be set aside to enable the plaintiff to obtain relief. It was argued that it was ultra vires. But that argument has not been made good, and cannot be made good, on the record before us. Therefore, the plaintiff only had twelve months from the 16th July 1912 within which to bring his suit. Having failed to do that, his suit was rightly dismissed as being beyond time.

Appeal dismissed.

STATION MASTER, RANAGHAT —COMPLAINANT

versus

HABUL SHEIKH—ACCUSED.

Railways Act (IX of 1890), s. 113—Travelling without ticket—Denial by accused—Procedure.

Where a person is charged under section 113 of the Railways Act for travelling without a ticket and he denies that he travelled by train, the proper method of dealing with the case is to hold an inquiry and take evidence as to his liability to pay and how much is payable by him. An order imposing a penalty without any such inquiry is bad in law.

Reference under section 438, Criminal Procedure Code, by the Sessions Judge, Nadia.

FACTS.—One Habul Sheikh had accompanied his master to a Railway Station platform carrying the latter's luggage. While the master was about to get into a train, a Railway ticket collector told him that he was not entitled to carry his unbooked luggage by the train. But the master, inspite of the ticket-collector's protest, got into the train with his luggage leaving his servant on the platform. The ticket-collector then demanded from the servant his fare from Goalando, the Station from which the train originally started. On his declining to pay the fare the servant was charged with an offence under section 113 of the Indian Railways Act. The Sub-Divisional Magistrate of Ranaghat, who took cognisance of the case, imposed a penalty of Rs. 2 10 3 upon the accused and issued distress warrant for the same without holding any enquiry into the charge against the accused. The Sessions Judge of Nadia referred the matter to the High Court under section 438 of the Code of Criminal Procedure and recommended that the order of the Sub Divisional Magistrate of Ranaghat imposing the penalty on the accused may be set aside.

Babu Bir Bushan Dutta, for the Accused.

JUDGMENT.—For the reason given by the learned Sessions Judge, we set aside the order passed by the Sub-Divisional Magistrate on the 1st April 1919, directing the issue of distress warrant for Rs. 2 10 3, and direct that the Magistrate do pass orders in accordance with law after taking evidence on the question whether the accused was liable to pay and how much was payable by him.

Order set aside.

CRIMINAL REVISION NO. 39 OF 1920.

February 13, 1920.

RAMESHWAR DUSADH AND OTHERS—PETITIONERS

versus

EMPEROR—OPPOSITE PARTY.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), ss. 12, 110, 112, 115, 537—Magistrate placed in charge of sub-division, powers of, over remainder of district—Power to entertain Police report under s. 110 respecting persons outside local jurisdiction—Order under s. 112 not accompanying warrant, effect of—Prejudice—General repute—Investigating officer, evidence of, whether admissible—Cross-examination of witnesses—Questions, disallowance of—Reasons to be recorded—Defence evidence, time for producing, grant of.

The mere fact that a Magistrate is placed in charge of a sub-division of a district is, in the absence of anything to the contrary, no ground for holding that his jurisdiction over the area of the district outside his local jurisdiction as a Magistrate of the first class is curtailed, and it is not illegal for such a Magistrate to take proceedings under section 110 of the Criminal Procedure Code upon a Police report in respect of persons residing outside his local jurisdiction, irrespective of how the Police report came before him. [p. 597, col. 2.]

Where a copy of the order made under section 112 of the Criminal Procedure Code does not accompany the warrant as required by section 115, but the order is read over to the person affected thereby, and there is nothing to show that there was any prejudice, the omission to attach a copy of the order to the warrant is a mere irregularity not fatal to the trial. [p. 593, col. 1.]

In order to establish general repute for the purposes of section 110 of the Criminal Procedure Code

the evidence of the investigating Police Officer is inadmissible and irrelevant. [p. 598, col 1.]

Where in cross-examining a witness for the prosecution questions are disallowed by the Court on the ground of irrelevancy or on other grounds, the evidence should show what the questions are and the reason for disallowing them. [p. 598, col. 2.]

Where a large number of witnesses are examined for the prosecution, the accused is entitled to a reasonable interval for considering what evidence he should produce by way of rebuttal. A demand of two days' time for this purpose is not unreasonable. [p. 598, col. 2.]

Criminal revision against the order of the Officiating District Magistrate, Bhagalpur, dated the 13th December 1919, dismissing the appeal of the petitioners against the order of the Sub-Divisional Magistrate, Madhipura, dated the 27th October 1919, ordering the petitioners under sections 110 and 118 to give security by executing bonds.

FACTS of the case appear from the judgment of Mullick, J., and the order of the District Magistrate passed in appeal which was as follows:—

"The first point that I have to deal with in this case is a point of law. It is contended that the Sub-Divisional Magistrate of Madhipura has no power to try cases outside of his own Sub-Division. It is clearly laid down in section 12, Criminal Procedure Code, that every Magistrate's jurisdiction and powers extend throughout the district to which he is posted "except as otherwise provided by such definition," i.e., by the definition of the local area in which he may exercise his powers. The order appointing Babu Manmotha Nath Sen to have charge of the Madhipura Sub-Division confers upon him the powers of a Sub Divisional Officer for that Sub Division only. It does not appear to me to limit his jurisdiction in respect of his ordinary powers. His jurisdiction as in the case of every Magistrate posted to the district extends throughout the district. He has been duly empowered to try cases under section 110, Criminal Procedure Code, vide Quarterly Civil List. If, however, there are any doubts of his jurisdiction outside his Sub-Division, the difficulty is removed by section 192, Criminal Procedure Code, which empowers the District Magistrate to transfer any case to any Magistrate subordinate to him.

There is plenty of evidence of association and of the character of the accused.

The fact that some of them have been acquitted in a dacoity case does not help them much. The acquittal does not mean that the dacoity did not take place and does not help those who were not tried. Moreover, there are many other cases in which each of the appellants was suspected.

The fact that the appellants were suspected in these cases does not depend merely on the lists of cases furnished by the Police. Reasons for the suspicion are given in the depositions, some of which I have detailed above.

It has been argued that the appellants have only recently begun to be suspected in cases. The evidence, however, shows that some of them began to be suspected in 1905, some in 1914. But the real answer to this argument is that the alarming outbreak of dacoities which led to the institution of this and a number of other similar cases began only in 1918. It is doubtless the result of a prolonged period of high prices and hard times which culminated in the famine of 1919. It is probable that this gang was formed in 1918. That a gang has been formed was admitted by Hakru Jolaha and Santi Markande.

It is clear from section 114, Criminal Procedure Code, that it is not necessary to serve a copy of the proceedings on a person who is present in Court. It is sufficient to read it out to him under section 113, Criminal Procedure Code.

As there is evidence that the appellants all formed one gang they were rightly tried jointly.

In short it has been amply proved that the appellants are habitual criminals, that they have formed themselves into a gang of robbers and that they are so desperate and dangerous that it is necessary that they should be ordered to give security for their good behaviour.

I dismiss the appeal."

Mr. Gour Chandra Pal, for the Petitioners. —(1) The whole trial is void, because the Magistrate who drew up proceedings had no jurisdiction over the petitioners, who did not reside with in the local limits of his jurisdiction, Sarat Chunder Roy v. Bepin Chandra Roy (1).

[SULTAN AHMED J.—But this ruling is against you.]

[MULLICK, J.—Have the powers of the Magistrate been curtailed under section 124?]

Their Lordships here sent for the Government notification appointing Babu M. N. Sen which was to the effect that "the Local Government appoints Babu M. N. Sen to be the Sub-Divisional Officer of Madhipura."]

(2) Section 115, Criminal Procedure Code, is imperative. The warrant "shall" be accompanied by a copy of the proceeding. Admittedly it was not done in this case. It is not a mere irregularity. It is an illegality, a violation of the express and clear terms of the Statute as to the mode of trial and, therefore, comes within the Privy Council ruling of Subrahmania Ayyar v. King-Emperor (2).

(3) The joint trial of the petitioners under clauses (a) and (f) of section 110, Criminal Procedure Code, is illegal. Evidence of general repute cannot be used in proceedings under clause (f). Emperor v. Nepal Shikary (3).

(4) The Police Officer was allowed to put in a list of cases in which accused were suspected. This is clearly illegal. Bechai v. Emperor (4), Raham Ali v. Emperor (5), Jharia Das v. Emperor (6).

(5) The accused have been prejudiced because

(a) General questions put by the prosecution to each and every one of the witnesses were to the following effect: "Do you know accused? What character do they bear?" And the general answer was that the accused were thieves, dacoits, etc. In cross-examination such witnesses were asked whether they had seen them commit theft or burglary or had anybody who had seen them commit theft or burglary told them so, or whether it was that they had heard from other persons that the accused were thieves, etc., but these questions were disallowed.

(b) The prosecution examined 110 witnesses in two days and when the defence wanted two days' time to file a list of D. Ws., the Magistrate refused to grant this time. Sheikh Emtaz Ali v. Jagat Chandra Banerjee (7).

(6) The evidence on the record is inadmissible and not sufficient to establish charge under clause (a) of section 110, no facts are mentioned by the P.Ws. to indicate their grounds of suspicion. Alep Pramanik v. Emperor (8).

Lastly invites the attention of the Court to Nagireddy Kondareddy, In re (9), where all these points have been fully and elaborately discussed.

Mr. Manoher Lall (Assistant Government Advocate), for the Crown.—

(1) The Government notification is under section 13, Criminal Procedure Code. The powers of the Magistrate have not been curtailed and, therefore, under section 12, sub-clause (2), his jurisdiction extends over the whole of the District and the proceedings are in order.

Sarat Chandra Roy v. Bepin Chandra Roy (1), cited by the other side, fully supports me. It is a converse case to this.

(2) Non-compliance with the provisions of section 115 is a mere irregularity. Suleman v. Emperor (10).

The object of the section is that the accused must know what is the charge against them. Here the accused knew before the trial what the proceedings against them were. The same learned Mukhtiar appeared on behalf of all the accused. Proceedings were read over to most of the accused in Court under section 113, Criminal Procedure Code, before the trial began, and with regard to this the proceedings were read over to them along with the other accused after the close of the evidence of 70 P.Ws.

(3) Ordinarily joint trial under clause (f) along with clause (a), section 110, Criminal Procedure Code, would be illegal, but in this case no evidence has been led under clause (f): the accused have been bound down under clause (f) on mere inference on the authority of the ruling in Wahid Ali Khan v. Emperor (11) and Parasulla v. Emperor (12).

(4) I concede that the evidence of the Police Officer is inadmissible but the prosecution led other evidence also, e g., the evidence of approvers. This objection, therefore, is practically of no substance.

JUDGMENT.

MULLICK, J.—This is a petition on behalf of 17 persons, who have been bound down under sections 110 and 118 of the Code of Criminal Procedure and have been directed to give security to be of good behaviour by the Sub Divisional Magistrate of Madhipura.

The proceeding, which was drawn up on the 16th of July 1919 against the petitioners and 10 others, states that the petitioners are suspected to be habitual thieves and robbers and of such dangerous character that they cannot be permitted to remain at large. The history of the case appears to be this. In the Sadar Sub Division of the District of Bhagalpur a number of persons were arrested by the Police on charges of dacoity. How many were so arrested in all and when, we cannot on the record before us determine, but it is alleged by the learned Vakil for the petitioners that a batch of 17 persons were arrested about the second week of January 1919 and that they were kept in jail till the 26th of February, when there being no evidence of dacoity against 14, the Magistrate who has taken cognizance of the case recorded an order releasing them on bail pending the submission of a report by the Police under section 110, Criminal Procedure Code. The remaining three were then tried for the substantive offence of dacoity and were acquitted in June 1919 of that offence.

The 14 persons who were directed to give bail could not do so and it is alleged that they remained in custody till the 2nd of April when the Magistrate, being no longer willing to detain them pending further action by the Police, directed that they should be released on their own personal recognizance. Meanwhile, enquiries were being made by the Police and on the 16th of June 1919 a report was submitted by the Police to the District Magistrate asking that the 27 persons should be called upon to give security to be of good behaviour. That report was made over by the District Magistrate to a First Class Magistrate in charge of the Sadar Sub-Division. It was subsequently withdrawn from the file of this officer by the District Magistrate to his own file under section 528, Criminal Procedure Code, and transferred under section 192 of the Code to the file of the Sub-Divisional Magistrate of Madhipura.

The learned Assistant Government Advocate suggests that the reason for this action on the part of the District Magistrate was that the file of the Sadar Sub-Divisional Officer was congested and that it was more convenient for the Sub Divisional Magistrate of Madhipura to dispose of the case.

On the 16th of July 1919 the Sub Divisional Magistrate of Madhipura drew up proceedings under section 112, calling upon the petitioners and the 10 other persons above mentioned to shew cause why they should not be bound down.

On the 19th of August 1919 the Sub Divisional Magistrate of Madhipura held Court at Bihpur, which is about one mile from the village or villages in which the petitioners reside. On that date he read over the proceedings to 20 of the accused who were present before him. The remainder did not appear till the 24th of September, on which date the trial of the whole of the 27 accused commenced. Twenty witnesses were examined on that date at Bihpur, while on the 25th the Sub Divisional Magistrate appears to have sat between 11 and 12 hours and examined 70 witnesses.

It is alleged that after taking the evidence of the prosecution witnesses on that date he gave notice to the accused that they should file lists of defence witnesses before 1 P. M. on the following day. It is also alleged that as regards 4 of the petitioners now before us, namely Nos. 3, 5, 8, and 15, there had been an omission to comply with the provisions of section 113, Criminal Procedure Code, which requires that the proceeding drawn up by the Magistrate shall be read over to the accused, and that the defect was remedied by the Court on the 25th of September.

On the 26th of September the Court examined 20 more prosecution witnesses and 2 of the accused who had filed lists of defence witnesses called two witnesses in their defence. Out of 123 witnesses, who it seems had been brought to the Court in compliance with their request, 121 were given up by the learned Mukhtear conducting the case on their behalf.

With regard to the remaining accused the learned Magistrate was of opinion that their omission to file lists of the defence witnesses before 1 P. M. on the 26th was willful and made for the purpose of causing vexation and delay, and he recorded an order declining to issue processes but giving them permission to produce their defence witnesses, if they so pleased, on the next date of hearing, which was fixed for the 12th of October.

It is to be explained that, in consequence of the Pujah holidays, the Criminal Courts were closed from the 27th of September till the 10th of October. On the 12th of October the learned Magistrate was unable to be present at Bihpur in consequence of illness and he sent an order to the Police to inform the accused that he would hear the case and examine their witnesses, if any, at Madhipura on the 16th. Thereupon the accused made an application to the learned Magistrate at Madhipura, urging that it would be inconvenint for them to bring their Pleader and witnesses to a place which was at some considerable distance from their homes and requesting that the trial might be continued at Bihpur itself. Thereupon the Magistrate fixed the 27th of October for the hearing of the case. The order sheet does not show what was done on the 27th of October, but we find that on the 28th October he heard one prosecution witness at Bihpur and pronounced judgment in the case.

The petitioners thereupon moved the District Magistrate in appeal but without any success. They then came to this Court in revision and obtained an order for bail on the 21st of January 1920.

The first point raised by the learned Vakil for the petitioners is that the Sub-Divisional Officer of Madhipura had no jurisdiction in the case inasmuch as the petitioners do not reside within the local limits of his Sub Division. It is also contended that the learned District Magistrate had no power to withdraw the Police report from the Sub-Divisional Officer at the Sadar and to transfer it to the Sub-Divisional Magistrate at Madhipura.

The second point need not be considered, if the Sub-Divisional Magistrate at Madhipura had jurisdiction to take action upon the Police report. Now this depends upon the Government notification appointing the Magistrate. We have ourselves seen the notification in question and find that the Local Government directed that the Magistrate should have charge of the Madhipura Sub-Division without making any order restricting his general jurisdiction over the whole district of Bhagalpur. Section 12 of the Code of Criminal Procedure makes it competent for the Local Government to define the local limits of the jurisdiction of a particular officer posted to a district, but subject to the limitations so placed the jurisdiction of that officer is not affected over the whole district. Here, although the Magistrate was placed in charge of the Madhipura Sub Division, there is nothing to shew that his jurisdiction over the area outside his jurisdiction as a Magistrate of the first class was curtailed. Therefore, no matter how the Police report came before the Sub-Divisional Magistrate of Madhipura, that Magistrate as a Magistrate of the first class had jurisdiction to take proceedings under section 110 of the Code. We are fortified in this view by the decision in Sarat Chunder Roy v. Bepin Chandra Roy (1), where it was held that an officer in a Sadar Sub-Division could take proceedings under section 110 upon a Police report in respect of persons residing outside his local jurisdiction.

The next objection is that there could not have been a joint trial of the petitioners in respect of that part of the proceeding which relates to clause (f) of section 110. This may be conceded, but if the petitioners have been rightly bound down in respect of that part of the proceeding which relates to clause (a), the order of the Sub-Divisional Magistrate must hold good.

The third objection is that a copy of the proceeding did not accompany the warrant as required by section 115 of the Code. The learned Assistant Government Advocate replies that although there was an omission in this respect, the irregularity has been cured by the reading over of the proceeding to the accused on the 19th of August and the 25th of September. It does not appear that there was any prejudice, for the same learned Mukhtear who appeared for the petitioners to whom the proceedings were read over on the 19th of August, conducted the trial on behalf of those to whom the procesdings were read over on the 25th of September. At most there was an irregularity, but having regard to the provisions of section 537 of the Code, in my opinion the irregularity was not fatal to the trial.

The next objection is that the evidence of the investigating Police Officer reciting the cases in which the petitioners were suspected was inadmissible. This is clearly correct, because in order to establish general repute for the purposes of section 110 the evidence of the Police Officer was worthless and irrelevant.

The two remaining objections are that the petitioners were prejudiced because they were not given sufficient opportunity of cross-examining the prosecution witnesses and of calling their own defence witnesses. Now with regard to cross-examination it appears that there was fairly full cross-examination in respect of some of the prosecution witnesses, but that in respect of others the learned Court disallowed questions which were in the nature of hearsay. What other questions were disallowed does not appear from his order, but it is said that they were material questions and that the petitioners have been grossly prejudiced.

Having regard to the depositions which we have read, there is some justification for the complaint that the record is too summary in the case of many of the prosecution witnesses, and we think that it would be fairer to allow the petitioners to recall such of the prosecution witnesses as they wish for the purpose of cross-examination. If a question is disallowed on the ground of irrelevancy or on other grounds, the deposition should shew what the question is, and the reason for disallowing it.

With regard to the complaint on the score that defence witnesses were not allowed to be called, the fact appears to be that the Magistrate was extremely anxious to finish the case before the Pujah Holidays, and for this reason he wished the petitioners to hand in a list of their witnesses before 1 P. M. on the 26th September, so that the witnesses might be produced forthwith, and examined before the Court rose on that date. The Court was, as a matter of fact, at Bihpur till late on the 26th, and it would certainly have been possible for the petitioners to have produced their witnesses before the Court left the place, but on the other hand it has to be borne in mind that no less than 110 witnesses had been examined for the prosecution and that the petitioners were entitled to a reasonable interval for considering what evidence they should bring for the purpose of rebutting that evidence and a demand for two days' time in the circumstances does not appear to me to have been at all unreasonable. It is also to be remembered that the petitioners had been kept in jail from the 26th of February certainly till the 2nd of April. There is reason for suspecting that some of them had even been kept in jail from the second week of January. Under what authority the order of the 26th of February releasing them on bail so that the Police should have time to work up a case under section 110, Criminal Procedure Code, was made, has not been disclosed to us. The learned Assistant Government Advocate suggests that the petitioners may have been arrested under section 55 of the Code. If that was so, it is not understood why the petitioners were not proceeded against forthwith according to law, and what reason there was for detaining them in custody till the second week of April. The whole procedure in this matter has been illegal, and on grounds of mere fairness it may be urged that if the prosecution took such a long period in working up a case against the petitioners, they surely were entitled to some indulgence in the matter of preparing for their own defence.

It has been strongly urged that the evidence, as it stands, falls short of that standard which is required for action under section 117, Criminal Procedure Code. There is certainly some evidence which shews the grounds upon which the witnesses believed that the petitioners were habitual robbers and theives. On the other hand, there are a great many witnesses whose depositions have been scantily recorded and who contented themselves by the bare statement that in their belief the petitioners were theives and robbers. We do not propose at present to discuss the quantum of evidence which would be sufficient for binding down a person on the ground of general reputation as to his being a habitual thief or robber, because the action which we propose to take makes it unnecessary at the present moment. We think that the case should be remanded to the District Magistrate, or to such other officer as the District Magistrate may choose, so that the petitioners may have an opportunity of cross-examining the prosecution witnesses and of adducing evidence in their own defence. After the evidence has been so taken, the lower Court will certify the same to us and return the record We will then proceed to dispose of this application for revision. But we desire to observe that having regard to the irregularities on the part of the Court and the period for which some of the petitioners have already been detained in custody, the District Magistrate might well consider whether it would not serve the ends of justice or the purposes of the administration if the bonds which the petitioners have been directed to furnish were cancelled in accordance with the provisions of section 125 of the Code, or whether the term of those bonds should not be reduced. Should the learned District Magistrate decide to cancel the bonds, the further enquiry now ordered will be unnecessary and it will suffice to send to this Court intimation of the action which has been taken by him. The petitioners will surrender to the District Magistrate forthwith and he will no doubt consider the desirability of releasing them on bail pending the enquiry, if any. The District Magistrate will return the record to this Court on or before the 6th March.

SULTAN AHMED, J.—I agree.

CRIMINAL REVISION CASE No. 709 OF 1918.

CRIMINAL REVISION PETITION No. 572 OF 1918.

July 24, 1919.

EMPEROR—RESPONDENT.

Madras District Municipalities Act (IV of 1884), ss. 263, 280—Municipal servant authorised to prosecute —Prosecution in excess of authority—Conviction, whether legal.

Where a Municipal servant is specially authorised to prosecute for one offence, he cannot prefer a complaint about a totally different offence, and a conviction for such offence is illegal. [p. 600, col. 1.]

Petition, under sections 435 and 439 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898, and under section 107, Government of India Act, praying the High Court to revise the judgment of the Court of the Sub-Divisional 1st Class Magistrate of Mayavaram, in Criminal Appeal No. 23 of 1918, preferred against the judgment of the Court of the 2nd Class Bench Magistrate, Kumbakonam, in Summary Trial No. 128 of 1918.

Mr. S. Subramania Aiyer, for the Petitioner.

The Public Prosecutor, for the Crown.

ORDER.—The accused was tried and convicted for having made building constructions after the expiry of the two months' time mentioned in the license issued to him by the Vice-Chairman.

Several objections have been raised against the legality of the trial and conviction,

It is only necessary to deal with one of the objections, namely, that preferred under section 280 of the District Municipalities Act (Madras Act IV of 1884), "No person shall be tried for any offence against the provisions of this Act or of any bye-law made under section 255 except upon complaint made by the Police or by the Municipal Council or by the Chairman or by a person expressly authorised in this behalf by the Municipal Council or by the Chairman."

In this case, this complaint, so far as it relates to the charge on which petitioner was tried and convicted, was made by a Municipal servant (the Sanitary Inspector), who was expressly authorised by the Chairman to complain against the petitioner (see Exhibit F) only if the latter had encroached on Municipal ground deviating from the plan attached to his application Exhibit A for license, and (as we understand the Chairman's order) for such deviation.

The Sanitary Inspector was not expressly or even impliedly authorised to prefer a complaint about the petitioner's having exceeded the time limit mentioned in his license.

We, therefore, set aside the proceedings and the conviction as illegal and direct the fine imposed to be refunded to the petitioner (if paid).

Conviction set aside.

PATNA HIGH COURT.
CRIMINAL REVISION No. 40 OF 1920.
February 11, 1920.
Present:—Mr. Justice Jwala Prasad.
Sheikh TINKOURI—PETITIONER
versus
EMPEROR—OPPOSITE PARTY.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), ss. 210, 436, 439—Case triable by Court of Session—Magistrate, jurisdiction of, to discharge accused—Commitment ordered by District Magistrate—High Court, power of, to go into evidence and discharge accused.

A Magistrate holding an inquiry in a case triable by a Court of Session is required, under section 210, Criminal Procedure Code, to commit the accused if he is satisfied that there are grounds for so doing, but if, after weighing the evidence and examining its credibility, he comes to the conclusion that the prosecution case is improbable, and the evidence unreliable, he has jurisdiction to discharge the accused. [p. 605, col. 2.]

Where a District Magistrate, acting under section 436, Criminal Procedure Code, disagrees with an order of discharge by a Magistrate, and directs the commitment of the accused to the Court of Session, the High Court has jurisdiction to go into the evidence in order to ascertain whether the order of the District Magistrate is or is not justified and if it finds no justification for the order, it will direct the discharge of the accused [p. 605, col. 2; p 606, col. 1.]

Criminal revision against the order of the District Magistrate, Purneah, dated the 3rd January 1920, directing the commitment of the petitioner to the Court of Session after setting aside the order of the Sub-Divisional Officer, Araria, dated the 22nd September 1919.

FACTS appear from the judgment of the Deputy Magistrate which was as follows:—

"On the 1st of July last the informant Kichalu Mandal of Pathia appeared at Police Station Palasi, at 9 A. M., with the village Chaukidar Mahanand Hari and lodged information to the following effect:—

He is working for a long time with his cousin Resam Lal Biswas of Pathia and is living with him. The previous night he was sleeping with Asarfi, Gopi, Misri Lal, Nafru, Nakoni, Kochai and Sosti Lal in the Baitak of Resam Lal. Resam Lal with his wife and children were sleeping in the Haveli. After midnight the informant awoke on hearing the Sewat of "Jai Kali". He saw 15 or 16 men coming. Some men entered the room and some remained outside. The outside men snatched straw from the roof and litghted it by means of match and then lit 2 Masals which they had brought with them. By the light he saw that the men had Galpattas and had Lathis. Then he understood that they were dacoits. By the light he recognized Tinkouri and Anji of Shampur. Anji had Lathi and Tinkouri had Lathi and Masal. Then he ran out of the room through fear. He did not recognise any others. He went to the northern Tola and awoke Gopali, Premi, Sifli and others and told them that dacoits had come to Resam Lal's house and told them to go there. They began to go. Afterwards he also returned to Resam Lal's door. He saw Bhikhan, Dukhan, Gouri, Gopali and others and Resam Lal at the door. He found that the lock of the chest which was in the Baitak was open and the lock of the box in the same room broken. The contents of the box and the chest were missing. The dacoits had opened the chest by a key. One key of the dacoits was found lying near the chest. A Masal was also found there. The dacoits had looted whatever was in the chest and box. The dacoits had hit Nafru Goala, a servant of Resam Lal, on the head with Lathi and Nafru had slight bleeding. After a while the Basti men went back to their respective houses. The informant could not say what things had been removed by the dacoits. His master will state about it. This morning Resam Lal had sent him to the Thana with the Chaukidar to lodge information. The other matters will be reported by Resam Lal, who could not come on account of pain on his leg.

After recording this information, the Sub-Inspector it appears questioned the Chaukidar and then went to the spot and took up investigation at the conclusion of which, the two accused before me were sent up under section 395, Indian Penal Code. The 2nd accused Man Mohan Rai has not been named in the first information report.

Thirteen witnesses in all have been examined before me. The witness Mahanand Chaukidar was not sent up as a witness by the Police, so I have examined him as a Court witness.

The prosecution case as presented in Court differs considerably from the first information report. A complete statement of the prosecution case as subsequently developed will be found in the evidence of P. W. No. 2, Resam Lal Biswas. His case is that he was sleeping in the Haveli with his wife and children. In the Baitak were Kachalu, Nakoni, Nafru, Misri Lal, Koshai, Bhikhan and Sosti Lal. After midnight Kachalu raised hue and cry "Dauro Ho Dacait Ghera." Resam got up, he let out his wife and children by the eastern passage and ran to the road on the north and stood some 30 or 40 cubits from his door. He saw 2 torches at his door and 15 or 16 dacoits. The dacoits were shouting "Pakro, Pakro". He began to call out the Basti men. Premlal, Gopali, Ajab Lal and others, some 25 or so, came. More men continued to come. The witness asked the men to come with him and stop the dacoits but nobody ventured. Bansi and Jugti went ahead saying that they will see who the dacoits were. The dacoits chased them from the house. They ran back where the witness and others were standing. They said that they had recognised Anji, Tinkouri, and Manmohan Rai. In the meantime more than 40 men gathered. They began to shout out from the road. Then the dacoits got out and proceeded south. They had 2 Masals with them. The witness could not recognise any dacoit. After the dacoits left, the witness and others went to the Baitak and found the box and chest open, and the contents rifled. Some utensils, &c., had been removed from the Haveli. After the examination of the rooms the witness noticed a Masal near a Kadam tree in the fields south-west, i.e., towards village Shampur. The witness went with 20 or 25 men armed with Lathis towards the light. When they came near the light they shouted out "Pakro Sala Log Ko." The dacoits put out the light and bolted. Then the witness and others returned to the witness's door. All the men sat at the door. There Nikoni said that he had recognised Tinkouri, Anji and Manmohan. Nafru said that he had recognised Tinkouri. Nokai said that he had recognised Tinkouri and Manmohan Rai and Misri Lal said that he had recognised Anji, Tinkouri and Manmohan Rai and Kokbari. Bhikhan said that he was night blind so he could not recognise anybody. In the morning, the witness looked for Kachalu and learnt that he was sleeping in his house. The witness called him. Kachalu said that he had recognised Anji and Tinkouri. The witness told Kachalu to go to the Thana. He himself did not go as he had pain in his leg. Kachalu went with Mahanand Chaukidar. This witness has not said when the Chaukidar came. Some witnesses have said that the Chaukidar came after the party returned from the Bad (vide cross-examination of P. W. No. 3), and some witnesses have said that the Chaukidar came soon after the dacoits left the house (vide cross-examination of P. W. No. 4), and some have said that the Chaukidar came with the villagers (vide cross-examination of P. W. No. 5). The Chaukidar himself says that he came soon after the dacoits had left. All this by way of parenthesis. We will proceed with the evidence of Resam Lal. After Kachalu left for the Thana the witness sent Jugti, Nekoni, Kochai and 4 or 5 others to the place where light had been seen at night to see if anything had been left by the dacoits. These men went and came back with 2 Masal sticks, 2 cloth bags, a bundle of rag wicks and some burnt papers. The witness made this over to the Sub-Inspector when the latter came. Property worth Rs. 979-8-0 was stolen by the dacoits.

Now if this evidence is compared with the second information report, it will be seen at a glance how the case has been developed and improved upon. In the first place the first information report is not free from taint inasmuch as the dacoity having taken place just after midnight and the information was not lodged before some 8 hours had elapsed. The Thana is only 3 miles from the place of occurrence. Resam Lal is a Patwari who has grown grey in litigation; he certainly had no excuse for not sending immediate intimation to the Thana. No reasonable explanation has been offered of the delay. The evidence adduced by the prosecution supports the story as subsequently developed by Resam Lal and in order to reconcile it with the first information report Kachalu is made to say in his evidence that after he left his Baitak on the arrival of the dacoits, he did not return to Resam Lal's door again that night but went and slept in his house. He came to Resam Lal next morning on being called by the latter. I have no hesitation in saying that the evidence given by Kachalu in Court contradicting and improving on the first information is unreliable and unworthy of credit. The first information is a self-contained and complete story of what happened that night. According to the first information report the informant returned to Resam Lal's door after informing the villagers about the dacoity. He found that the dacoits had gone and the Basti men mustered strong. The Basti men after seeing the condition of the Baitak, the rifled chest and box went home. There is not a word in the first information report about the 2nd chapter of the prosecution, the seeing of the light in the Bad towards Shampur as subsequently introduced. Apparently this development was considered necessary to fasten the guilt on Tinkouri who lives in Shampur. The evidence of witnesses who came to support a false story stands self-condemned.

The evidence of Mahanand Chaukidar is the last straw which breaks the back of the prosecution camel. This witness, though a very important one, had been kept back by the prosecution and was examined by me as a Court witness. Resam Lal's house is in the beat of this Chaukidar and the Chaukidar was in Resam Lal's Basti "just after midnight" (vide his evidence P. W. No. 13). I am quoting from his evidence: 'I had been to Resam Lal's Tola just after midnight. After that I went to my own Tola which is a mile from Resam Lal's. After awaking my Tola men I came to my door and sat down at my door. After I sat down there was Halla at Resam Lal's. I awoke my Basti men and ran to Resam Lal's Tola. When I arrived the dacoits had left. I went to Resam Lal's door. Rasam Lal was there. Basti men were coming and going. I did not meet Kachalu, Bansi, Jugti, Nafru, Kochai, Nekoni and Misri Lal Biswas prosecution witnesses that night. When I reached one pahar of night remained. I met Prem Lal, who was returning home from Resam Lal's place as I was going there. I met him one Rasi from Resam Lal's. Prem Lal told me that there was dacoity at Resam Lal's. He did not tell me that any dacoit had been recognised by anybody. I did ask him if any dacoit had been recognised. He said no. Resam Lal told me that there had been a dacoity in his house. He did not tell me that he had recognised any dacoit. He said that he could not say. So far as I could ascertain that night no dacoit had been recognised. I questioned the men coming and going. They said that they had not recognised any dacoit. I know that Kachalu, Nekori, Misri Lal, Nafru and Kochai always sleep in Resam Lal's Baitak. I asked Resam Lal where were those men who used to sleep in his Baitak. He said that they had run away somewhere through fear. Resam Lal did not tell me that after the dacoity a light had been seen in the Bad towards Shampur, i.e., south-west and that he had gone there with the villagers and that the dacoits left after putting out the light after Resam Lal and his men had shouted out. The Thana is 1½ Kosh from Resam Lal's house. Resam Lal did not tell me to go to the Thana immediately. From Resam Lal's place I went on my rounds again. I awoke Premi, Gopali, Ajabi, Fautu Mandal. They all said that there had been dacoity in Resam Lal's place. They said that they did not recognise any dacoit. Nor had anybody told them of having recognised any dacoit. After that I went home. It had become morning then. I immediately returned to Resam Lal and asked him to come to the Thana to lodge information. Resam Lal said that he had pain in the leg as he had fallen down and asked me to take Kachalu. Resam Lal told Kachalu to give what information he can and name those men he had recognised and that he and Resam Lal will make 16 annas statement when the Sub-Inspector came. I went to the Thana straight from Resam Lal's door with Kachalu. Kachalu told me on the way that he had recognised Anji and Tinkouri among the dacoits. I asked him why he did not come and tell me at night. He said that he was frightened and was hiding himself in the house. I asked Kachalu if he had told any Basti men the names of the dacoits recognised by him. He said no. Kachalu's house is one Rasi from Resam Lal's.'

I have quoted from the evidence of this man at length, not only to shew that his evidence cuts the ground from under the feet of the prosecution story but also to show the attitude of the prosecution in withholding an important witness merely because his evidence will not fit in with a story set up by them. The Court Sub-Inspector in cross-examination tried to discredit the witness by suggesting that he has been influenced by the defence, an unworthy and baseless suggestion. The man's evidence fits in with the first information with the exception of the identification portion. Here too his evidence is highly probable. It is admitted by the prosecution that the Chaukidar did come after the dacoity and if any man had really been identified, he would certainly have been named to the Chaukidar and the complainant's party would have rushed off to the Thana, which was only 3 miles off, and given information and got the houses of the men searched. The fact of the matter is that no one was identified that night and all his so-called identifying witnesses were "hiding somewhere through fear." Kachalu's subsequent improvement upon the first information report shows that he is a liar and his identification of Tinkouri in the first information report is unreliable. The other witnesses who speak about indentification are, as I have said above, quite unreliable. If they had actually identified anybody, they could have said so to the Chaukidar that very night. They are all creatures of Resam Lal and could identify any body at his order. It is somewhat curious that after the advent of the Inspector of Police on the spot a witness was fished out of Linga ($\frac{1}{2}$ mile from Pathia) and got to depose that he had seen Manmohan and others early in the morning of the 18th of July in the Bad and Manmohan had a Motri on his shoulder. This witness is Asraf Ali (P. W. No. 10). He was examined at 7 P. M. on the 6th of July. To my mind it looks very much like 'creation' of evidence for the purpose of conviction.

It is not necessary to deal with the various discrepancies in the evidence. The whole prosecution evidence is unreliable and unworthy of credit. It is against probability. It will be sheer waste of time to commit the accused to the Court of Session on such evidence. The accused are discharged under section 209, Criminal Procedure Code. As dacoity has taken place the case will be entered as true under section 395, Criminal Procedure Code."

The order of the District Magistrate was as follows:—

"In the lower Court two accused, namely, Seikh Tinkouri and Manmohan Rai, were charged with dacoity. That Court after examining prosecution witnesses has discharged the accused under section 209, Criminal Procedure Code, and I am now asked by the complainant of the case in the lower Court to set aside that order and to commit the two accused to take their trial in the Court of Session.

2. It is argued that the lower Court has usurped the functions of the Sessions Judge in weighing the evidence of the prosecution as he has done, and apart from this the estimate that the lower Court has made of the value of that evidence is challenged as being incorrect.

TINKOARI v. EMPEROR.

3. The learned lower Court has written a rather long order under section 209, Criminal Procedure Code, and has gone into the details of the evidence very fully. The dacoity was committed about midnight and there is evidence of identification of Tinkouri at the time of occurrence by several neighbours and relations of the complainant (the exact number of persons who are alleged to have identified the dacoits is 6). It follows, however, that unless there are very strong reasons for holding this evidence of identification to be false, we must consider that a prima facie case has been made out and that, therefore, the accused should be committed to the Court of Session for trial. I now proceed to give my reasons for holding that the estimate of the evidence as arrived at by the lower Court is not right and for holding that the accused Tinkouri should be committed to the Court of Session. In the first place, the name of this accused has been mentioned in the first information report which was lodged at the Thana at 8 A. M. on the day following the occurrence. The lower Court has argued that this implies considerable delay as the Thana is only three miles from the place of occurrence, but one must remember that this was a rainy season and it has also been urged by the petitioner that while the distance is three miles as a crow flies, owing to the intervening streams the distance which one travels is considerably greater.

4. Again the lower Court has talked about the development of the prosecution case and of the evidence of the witnesses as against the case given in the first information report. I note, however, that the informant stated definitely in his first information report that the information he gives is only a summary and that his master will give full particulars later on. Unless, therefore, we find glaring inconsistency between the story as told in the Court and in the first information we should not, I think, labour the theory of the development overmuch.

5. The lower Court has also criticised the prosecution in keeping back the village Chaukidar whom the lower Court has called as a Court witness, and argues that the evidence of that Chaukidar is sufficient to ruin the prosecution story inasmuch as the Chaukidar alleges on oath that he did not recognise any of the dacoits, nor did any of the villagers tell him that he recognised any of the dacoits. It is a possible theory, I think, that this witness has been won over by the accused, and this theory is supported by the fact that according to the Police diary that Chaukidar, when examined by the Police, admitted to have identified Tinkouri accused. I cannot, therefore, accept the lower Court's finding in holding the evidence unreliable so far as this Tinkouri is concerned. On the other hand I hold that a prima facie case of dacoity has been made out against Tinkouri accused and that as regards this accused the question of discharge or commitment is one of merely probabilities which are largely in favour of the complainant. It has also been laid down that in such cases the weighing of the evidence of the witnesses with regard to improbabilities and apparent discrepancy is more probably the duty of the Sessions Court than of the committing Court. I consider, therefore, that so far as Tinkouri is concerned, the decision of his guilt or innocence should be made by the Sessions Court. I, therefore, direct that Tinkouri be arrested and committed for trial before the Court of Session on a charge of committing dacoity, of which charge he seems to have been, in my opinion, wrongly discharged in the lower Court. I consider that Manmohan Rai has been rightly discharged."

Mr. S. Athar Husain, for the Petitioner.

The Government Advocate, for the Opposite Party.

JUDGMENT.—This application is directed against the order of the District Magistrate of Purnea, dated the 3rd January 1920, passed under section 435 of the Code of Criminal Procedure directing that the petitioner be committed for trial for an offence under section 395, Indian Penal Code, on the ground that he was improperly discharged by the Magistrate who held the enquiry under Chapter XVIII of the Code of Criminal Procedure, which relates to enquiries into cases triable by a Court of Session. The Magistrate who held the enquiry came to the conclusion that the case for the prosecution was not proved and the witesses examined on behalf of the prosecution were not only discrepant but were also wholly unworthy of discredit.

There was dacoity in the house of one Resam Lal, master of the complainant, on the 1st July last. Resam Lal was sleeping with his children in the Haveli and on the outer side in the Baithak was the complainant with a few other persons, Misri Lal, Gopi, Asarfi, Naira, Nekoni, Kochi and Sosti Lal. At about midnight there was a shout of "Jai Kali". Fifteen or sixteen men were then seen coming. They attacked the Baithak, snatched the straw from the roof and lighted it by means of matches, and then lit two Masals which they are said to have brought with them. The dacoits are said to have covered their faces with Galpattas. Seeing the dacoits the complainant was frightened. He ran to the northen Tola, awoke some of the villagers, Gopali, Premi, Sufli and others, and told them that dacoits had come to Resam Lal's house. Resam Lal himself came out of the house and went to the Basti side. The Basti people came, and the dacoits disappeared having looted whatever they could get in the Baithak and, according to Resam Lal's case, also some of the properties in the inner apartment of the house.

Two persons, the petitioner and one Manmohan Rai, were sent up for trial with a charge under section 3 5, Indian Penal Code. It is immaterial, so far as the application before us is concerned, whether the dacoity actually took place or not. The whole case hinges upon whether the accused were properly identified or not.

The Magistrate was of opinion that the evidence given as regards the identity of both the accused persons was unacceptable and discharged them. The District Magistrate apparently agreed with the Magistrate in holding that the case against Manmohan Rai was not proved and that the discharge by the Magistrate in respect of him was proper. He, however, thought that there was prima facie evidence of identification against the petitioner Tinkouri, and accordingly directed under section 436 of the Code that he be committed to the Court of Session.

The learned Government Advocate contends that the Magistrate was not justified in law in discharging the accused on the ground that the evidence before him was not trustworthy. In the view of the learned Government Advocate that involved the entire trial of the accused and a detailed and minute scrutiny and examination of the witnesses for the prosecution and that was a function reserved by the Code in the Sessions Judge, and not in the Magistrate, whose duty was simply to record the evidence, to find out whether there was a prima facie case made or not against the accused and then to commit him to the Court of Session. This is the view of the District Magistrate also. I am, however, of a contrary opinion. Under section 210 of the Code of Criminal Procedure a Magistrate is required to commit the accused when he is satisfied "that there are sufficient grounds for committing the accused for trial." This confers upon him the power to discharge the accused when the evidence tendered for the prosecution is totally unworthy of credit, as observed in the case of Bai Parvati, In re (1). The view taken in that case has been quoted with approval in the case of Dharam Singh v. Jati Prasad (2). Some of the earlier authorities in that case seem to have given a narrower construction to section 210 of the Code of Criminal Procedure and a restricted power to a Magistrate under that section. The case of Rash Behari Lal Mandal v. Emperor (3) decided in the year 1907 by the Calcutta High Court exactly applies to this case, where it was held that it is well within the province of a Magistrate holding an enquiry under Chapter XVIII to weigh the evidence and examine the credibility thereof, and to discharge the accused when he comes to a conclusion that the prosecution case is improbable and the evidence unreliable. Upon a true construction, meaning and scope of the section itself I may mention that a Magistrate has power to weigh the evidence and discharge the accused if the evidence is found to be unreliable. It was further held that High Court can go into evidence and as a matter of fact the learned Judges in that case went into the evidence in order to find out whether the order passed by the District Magistrate under section 436, disagreeing with the view of the Commitment Magistrate and directing the commitment of the accused, was proper or not.

Coming to the merits of the case, the question for determination is whether the evidence as to the identity of the petitioner is acceptable or not. The District Magistrate has based his decision largely upon the statement of the complainant in the first information report as well as in Court, who stated that the accused was recognized by him. The information was lodged at 8 A. M. of an occurrence having taken place about midnight at a Thana situated only 3 miles away. Some delay may be explained by the circumstance stated by the District Magistrate that there was some stream to cross, but the complainant did not start for the Thana before 7 A. M. or thereabout and hence it is open to criticism that there was time enough to cook up a story and to implicate the accused. It may be conceded that the Chaukidar, who was called as a witness on behalf of the Court, was gained over and the prosecution was, therefore, not bound to examine him on its behalf. He is supposed to have come long after the dacoits left the place and could not, therefore, be a witness as to the identity of the accused. The District Magistrate says that the Chaukidar stated before the Police that he identified the accused. This has not been brought out by the prosecution in his cross-examination. Even if he made that statement before the Police, it will not be any substantive evidence against the accused. It may be possible to explain away some of the contradictions and the embellishments in the case of the prosecution as being due to over-zeal on behalf of the complainant and his witnesses, but it is impossible to discard the inherent improbability in the story told by the witnesses for the prosecution that in spite of their having recognized Tinkouri, the accused in the case, who was not inclined friendly towards Resam Lal as the previous litigation discloses, they did not mention the name of the accused when the villagers assembled after the dacoity was over and the dacoits had gone away, and while they were sitting at ease smoking and enjoying country pipes. The one and the only topic that must have been discussed in that gathering of the Basti people was—Who were the dacoits that so daringly committed the offence upon an important person in the village, the Patwari and the Tahsildar. Not only the complainant but also all the other witnesses who posed themselves to be the identifiers of the accused say unmistakably that they did not on that night tell anybody that they had recognised the accused. The village people gathered long before the arrival of the Chaukidar. The omission of the witnesses to state that they identified the dacoits, to the village people is serious. There is, therefore, no escape from the criticism that the dacoits were not identified by anybody. They had concealed their faces with Galpattas and probably on the shout of "Jai Kali" given by them the witnesses got frightened and ran away.

The Magistrate has discussed the evidence in detail and has given his reasons for not accepting it. The District Magistrate has not discussed the evidence, and it is not known whether he himself would have convicted the accused upon the evidence. I myself have carefully gone through the evidence and I do not think that any Court would upon the evidence as it stands, without any cross-examination, feel hesitation in acquitting the accused. I, therefore, agree with the Magistrate in his estimate of the evidence, allow the application and set aside the order of the District Magistrate directing the commitment of the petitioner. The petitioner is discharged.

Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860*)*, ss. 100, 300—Right of private defence of body—Apprehension of grievous hurt—Death caused in self-defence—Right, whether exceeded.

One night while accused was proceeding in a certain direction with two companions he was hit by the deceased with a stick. The two companions of the accused took to flight and the accused himself ran away. He was pursued by the deceased and two others and when he was rounded up, he struck the deceased with a knife and caused his death. It was notorious that people in that part of the country were in the habit of carrying knives:

Held, that under the circumstances the accused had good reason to suppose that unless he used his knife grievous hurt at least, if not death, would be inflicted upon him, and that, therefore, he could not be said to have exceeded his right of private defence. [p 607, col. 2; p. 608, col. 1.]

Appeal from the order of the Sessions Judge, Attock at Campbellpur, dated the 25th July 1919, convicting the appellant.

Lala Hukam Chand, for the Appellant.

Mr. Dalrymple, Assistant Legal Remembrancer, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The appellant Yusuf Khan, a Pathan aged 20 years of Attock Tahsil, has been sentenced to transportation for life for causing the death of one Shamroz, also a Pathan, by stabbing him in the abdomen. According to first report and the dying declaration of the deceased, he with two friends, Adam and Sher Dil, at about 9 o'clock at night of the 16th March 1919 was proceeding to his well; he left the road and proceeded to a distance of a few yards where he sat down to make water; his companions went on and shortly after heard him call that he had been killed; his companions returned towards him and found him lying wounded on the ground and the appellant close by walking away; he threatened to kill them also if they approached him. That too is the story told by the witnesses Adam and Sher Dil. The prosecution have sent up Bahadur and Kudratullah who with the appellant were proceeding to the same well, and their story is that Shamroz deceased, Adam and Sher Dil left the village before they did; that they followed to go to the well of Kudratullah and that near the well the other party came up to them and Shamroz deceased hit Yusuf with a stick; that Yusuf fled towards the neighbouring well and the deceased, Adam and Sher Dil went in his pursuit and that they rounded him up and then Yusuf struck the deceased with his dagger. The Assessors were of opinion that the story told by Bahadur and Kudratullah was true and that the accused acted as he did through fear, but they did not consider that he was justified in causing death. The learned Sessions Judge has discarded both the stories and has conjectured that some sort of altercation arose between the two parties, that Shamroz first struck the accused a lathi blow whereupon the latter stabbed Shamroz with his dagger. His reasons for holding the story told by Bahadur and Kudratullah to be improbable seem to us inadequate Having considered all the evidence in the case we think the story told by the appellant and his two companions is a true one, and all that remains for us to determine is whether the appellant exceeded his right of private defence.

The motive for the attack by the deceased upon the appellant is clear. Both are Pathans and addicted to sodomy. It appears that they were rivals for the affections of a boy called Sher Khan, who tells us that his first lover was the deceased who was supplanted by the applicant. At the time of the murder the appellant was Sher Khan's beloved and the deceased was actuated by jealousy in making the attack on the appellant.

The position then is this. The Pathans of Attock Tahsil notoriously carry knives and one night the appellant finds himself pursued by the deceased with two of his companions. The appellant's own companions take to flight and leave him single-handed to meet the three assailants. He was not to know that they did not carry knives, and indeed he states that the deceased called upon Sher Dil to use his knife. In any case we hold that he had good reason to suppose that unless he used his dagger grievous hurt at least, if not death, would be inflicted upon him, and in the circumstances we cannot hold that he exceeded his right of private defence

For these reasons we accept the appeal and acquit the appellant.

Appeal accepted.

CRIMINAL REVISION No. 34 OF 1920.

Present :—Mr. Justice Das.
AMRIT MANDER AND ANOTHER—PETITIONERS
versus
EMPEROR—OPPOSITE PARTY.

Criminal trial—Investigating officer, summoned by accused—Accused, right of, to have evidence recorded—Duty of Court.

Where at the instance of an accused person the investigating officer is summoned as a witness, the accused is entitled to have the evidence of that officer recorded, and if he fails to appear, the Court should enforce his attendance.

Criminal revision against the order of the Sub-Divisional Magistrate, Madhipura, dated the 12th December 1919, dismissing the appeal of the petitioners from the order of the Honorary Magistrate of Madhipura, dated the 12th November 1919.

FACTS appear from the following quotation from the judgment of the lower Appellate Court:—

"The main point on which the appellants rely is that in the itlai lodged at the Thana on the date of the occurrence only 2 names were mentioned and no mention was made of the taking away of the respondent's properties. I do not think that this fact in any way detracts from the credibility of the prosecution story. An itlai is only a brief purport of the statements made at the Thana and it would be ridiculous to attach the same importance to it as to a first information on which a case is started. The recording officer would not feel it his duty to record all the facts stated in an itlai, and if he did not want to start investigation, he would naturally omit from the itlai any fact which would tend to bring the matter within the purview of a cognizable section. I believe this is what has happened in this case. So long as the 'itlai' is not directly inconsistent with a detailed statement of the case made later, it would not, in my opinion, be fair to characterise the latter as a subsequent development which is likely to be looked upon with suspicion.

The appellants make a grievance of the fact that the Sub-Inspector who recorded the itlai was not examined to prove the itlai, although he was summoned at the instance of the appellants. The lower Court should have given the defence an opportunity of putting in the itlai in evidence but as stated above, I have referred to the itlai and I do not think the appellants have been prejudiced in any way by the Sub-Inspestor not being examined in this case."

Mr. L. K. Jha, for the Petitioners.

The Assistant-Government Advocate, for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.—A very simple point is raised in this application. It appears that the petitioners summoned the Sub Inspector as a witness on their behalf. The summons was issued. The Sub-Inspector did not come to give evidence and the Court did not enforce the attendance of the Sub-Inspector. The question is, can this judgment be sustained. In my view it cannot be sustained for although the itlai has been accepted in evidence, still what the defence wanted to get from the Sub-Inspector is not in the record, namely, that only two names were mentioned to the Sub Inspector and no mention was made of the taking away of the respondent's properties. In my view the petitioners were entitled to have the evidence of the Sub-Inspector in the record. I would, therefore, set aside the judgment of the lower Appellate Court and direct that he do re-hear the appeal after giving an opportunity to the petitioners to have the evidence of the Sub-Inspector in the record. He may examine the Sub-Inspectrr himself or may ask the Court of first instance to examine him.

Judgment set aside.

Punjab Pre-emption Act (I of 1913), s. 16—Sale of materials of house with right of residence—Owner of site, whether can pre-empt.

The owner of a site cannot exercise the right of pre-emption in respect of a sale by a non-proprietor of the materials and the right of residence in the house. [p. 609, col. 2.]

Second appeal from the decree of the District Judge, Jullundur, dated the 2nd August 1919, reversing that of the Munsif, 1st Class, Jullundur, dated the 27th February 1919.

Lala Jagan Nath, for the Appellant.

Lalas Har Gopal and Fakir Chand, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This is a second appeal in a pre-emption suit. The facts giving rise to the suit are as follows:—

Defendants Nos. 2 and 3 sold the materials of a house together with the right of residence to defendant No. 1 by a sale-deed, dated the 25th June 1917, acknowledging the defendant No. 1 as the owner of the site on which the house stood. The plaintiff is the owner of a house which is contiguous to the house sold and the rafters of plaintiff's house are placed on a wall which is joint and belongs to both the houses. The suit was based on section 16 (fourthly) of the Punjab Pre-emption Act. It was resisted by the defendant No. 1 on the ground that he, being the owner of the site also, had a right of pre-emption and the plaintiff had no preferential right. There were other grounds of defence also set up, but as they are not material for the decision of this appeal they need not be mentioned. The Court of first instance, holding that the plaintiff had a preferential right, decreed the suit. Against this decree the defendant No. 1 appealed. The lower Appellate Court recorded the following finding:—"It seems to me, therefore, that as regards the right of residence, the landlord, who owns the site, must most certainly be regarded as the servient owner, to have a right to pre-empt the building and the right of residence in it as much as a neighbour whose rafters rest on the contiguous wall," and dismissed the suit of the plaintiff. This second appeal has, therefore, been preferred by the plaintiff and it is contended on his behalf that the decision of the lower Appellate Court is opposed to the law of pre-emption prevailing in this Province. The lower Appellate Court does not refer to any authority in support of its view. It appears to be of opinion that if a tenant builds a house on a site belonging to the landlord the position of the latter is that of a servient owner. There is no authority for this proposition and none has been cited on behalf of the respondents. Certain authorities have been cited on the basis of which the learned Counsel for the defendant seeks to support the decree of the Appellate Court on other grounds. He relies upon Akbar Hussain v. Ali Ahmad (1) and contends that the rule applicable to the transfer of tenancy lands by occupancy tenants should apply equally to the transfer of a house by a non-proprietor. This ruling has no bearing upon the particular point raised in this case. A right of pre-emption is given to a landlord in cases of transfer of occupancy land and the ruling is based upon the consideration of principles and rules applicable to such lands. In the second place, the learned Vakil relies upon Fateh Muhammad v. Kariman (2) and argues that according to that case a right of pre-emption is given to the owner of the site of a house. That was a case in which right of pre-emption in favour of owners of sites was recognised by virtue of a special custom prevailing in the particular locality. This case also, therefore, cannot be an authority on the point raised in the present case. According to section 16 (secondly) right of pre-emption exists, where the sale is of the site of the building or other structure, in the owners of such building or structure. No right of pre-emption is given vice versa. Upon the true construction of this clause, therefore, the owner of a site cannot exercise the right of pre-emption if a non-proprietor effect a sale with respect to his house standing on the site. Most of the provisions of section 16 of the Pre-emption

Act appear to be based upon the rules of the Muhammadan Law relating to pre-emption. According to that law no right of pre-emption is given to the owner of a site as such [see the Principles of Muhammadan Law by Tyabji, page 699, see also Pershadi Lal v. Syud Irshad Ali (3).]

Second appeal from the decision of the Assistant Judge at Ahmedabad, in Appeal No. 86 of 1915, amending the decree passed by the Extra Joint Subordinate Judge at Ahmedabad, in Civil Suit No. 549 of 1913.

Mr. I. N. Mehta (with him Mr. H. V. Divatia), for the Appellant.

Mr. G. N Thakor, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This case was rightly decided by the lower Appellate Court. The original defendant, who is now an insolvent, took a lease from the plaintiff in 1894 for seven years, and it was agreed that if on the expiration of the period the lessee again intended to keep the field or Santh from the lessor, the lessee might keep the field on Santh on the same conditions. That meant that in 1901, when the first term expired, the tenant had a right or the option to ask for a renewal for another seven years. The case of Purmanandas Jeevandas, In re (1) is more directly in point than the English authorities we are referred to. Clearly whatever rights the appellant had between 1901 and 1908 to ask for specific performance of the agreement to extend the lease for another seven years, those rights must have come to an end after 1908. Thereafter he continued as an annual tenant. In any event no notice was given that he wanted to set up any such right as is claimed by the Receiver of his estate. The appeal, therefore, must be dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

First appeal from the decree of the District Judge, Delhi, dated the 1st November 915, decreeing the plaintiff's claim.

Mr. Seva Ram Singh, for the Appellant.

Lala Moti Sagar, R. S., for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—This appeal and the companion appeal No. 392 of 1916 arise out of an action brought on the footing of a hundi for the recovery of Rs. 5,000 and interest thereon. It appears that the Diamond Jubilee Flour Mills Company, Delhi, was in need of money in 1913, and the directors of the company at their meeting on the the 30th September 1913 decided to borrow Rs 25,000. In pursuance of a resolution passed at that meeting five hundis were drawn on that day baaring date the 1st of October 1913 by three persons, namely, Sunder Singh, the manager of the company, and Ram Singh and Chajju Ram, two of the directors of the company, in favour of the plaintiff firm Gulab Rai-Mehr Chand, the proprietor of whieb, Rai Sahib Ishri Parshad, was also a director of the company. These hundis were accepted by the drawee on 4th October 1913, and were endorsed by the plaintiff to the Alliance Bank of Simla, Limited, whieh paid the money to the acceptor through the plaintiff on the date of the acceptance. When the due date for payment came, the hundis were dishonoured, with the result that the Bank recovered the money from the plaintiff who has brought two actions on two of the hundis.

The hundi forming the basis of the action which has led to the present appeals, was payable after 63 days; and the plaintiff sought to recover the amount due thereon not only from the acceptor but also from the three drawers The District Judge has decreed the claim against all the defendants except Chajju Ram, whom he has absolved from liability on some legal grounds which will be considered hereafter.

We have before us two appeals, one by the plaintiff seeking to establish the liability of Chajju Ram, and the other by Ram Singh claiming exemption on grounds similar to those accepted by the District Judge with respect to Chajju Ram. Neither the company nor Sunder Singh has preferred any appeal against the decree of the District Judge, and their liability for payment of the money is no longer disputed.

We propose to discuss in the first place the various points which are common to both appeals. Before the District Judge it was urged on behalf of both Chajju Ram and Ram Singh, and that contention has been pressed again before us, that these persons signed the hundis in order to accommodate the plaintiff, Rai Sahib Ishri Parshad, who as a surety for one Prabhu Dial, a relative of his, had at the time of the latter's appointment in June 1900 as treasurer of the company undertaken to advance Rs. 25,000 to the company by way of loan; that he carried out that undertaking by lending money on the five hundis; and that in pursuance of an oral agreement between him and the drawers they were exonerated from personal liability on the hundis. Ex facie the document upon which the present action is based makes them personally liable, and it is for them to establish the special agreement invoked on their behalf. Now it is doubtful whether oral evidence is admissible to prove the agreement, but accepting for the sake of argument that the District Judge was justified in admitting the evidence, we concur with him that the agreement has not been established.

The agreement is alleged to have been arrived at at the meeting of the directors on the 30th of September 1913, and both parties have produced evidence in support of their respective versions. It is clear that the oral evidence adduced by one side is in direct conflict with that relied upon by the other, and we have, therefore, been guided in reaching our conclusion by certain circumstances which, in our opinion, militate against the drawers' version. There is ample proof on the record that the company was in 1913 in a financial difficulty, and the letters which passed between Chajju Ram and Ishri Parshad make it absolutely clear that the directors were most anxious to procure money in order to carry on the business of the company. It is, therefore, beyond doubt that a person advancing a loan to the company, whose financial condition was admittedly shaky, was running a certain amount of risk. Is there any reason why of all the directors Ishri Parshad alone should run the whole risk and should not ask his colleagues to share the burden with him? In the correspondence referred to above it was never suggested at any time that Ishri Parshad was liable to advance money in accordance with the agreement of suretyship entered into by him in 1900, and that he should make good that promise. Further, even if the stipulation contained therein was still operative and binding upon Ishri Parshad, the only penalty for the breach thereof would have been the dismissal of his relative from the office of treasurer—a loss far less in magnitude than the risk involved in advancing a large sum of Rs 25,000 without any adequate security.

It is perfectly futile to contend that the drawers affixed their signatures to the bill in order to accommodate Ishri Parshad. There can be little doubt that these persons had no property at Delhi, nor did they command any credit in the money market. On the other hand Ishri Parshad was not only a Government treasurer, but also a banker of repute and standing and we entirely repel the suggestion that he stood in need of help from these comparatively obscure persons in order to bolster up his credit at Delhi.

But all doubt on the subject is dispelled by a letter (Exhibit P 3) dispatched to the plaintiff by Chajju Ram on 11th May 1914 in reply to a notice calling upon him to pay the money due on the hundis. It is significant that in this letter Chajju Ram makes no reference whatever to any special oral agreement exempting him from personal liability, but relies upon the solitary plea that he signed the bills "in the capacity of a director." This plea obviously means that he signed the instrument, not in his personal capacity, but as an agent acting on behalf of the company. This is inconsistent with the present version that he affixed his signature in order to facilitate the negotiation of the bills in the market by letting the people know that the holder could recover money not only from Ishri Parshad but also from Chajju Ram, which undoubtedly implies personal liability to the holder as the alleged oral agreement could avail only as against Ishri Parshad.

For these reasons we hold that the special agreement relied upon by the drawers, which, it is to be observed, finds no mention in the minute of the proceedings of the directors, dated the 30th September 1913, has not been established, and that the drawers would be liable on the bill in question, if it were not for the legal defects which appear to us to be fatal to the plaintiff's claim.

It is admitted that the hundi in question, as drawn originally, was payable after 93 days, and that the period of payment was then altered to 63 days. The question arises whether this alteration, which is initialled only by Sundar Singh, took place before the drawers signed the bill. It is common ground that the alteration had taken place before the instrument was accepted by the company on 4th October 1913, on which date the Alliance Bank of Simla, Limited, paid the money thereon to the company through Ishri Parshad. Now, there can be no doubt that Chajju Ram, who is a resident of Jullundur, left Delhi on the evening of the 30th September and did not return in the beginning of October; and that he, at any rate, could not be a party to the alteration, unless it was made on the 30th September. Our attention has been invited to some conflicting oral evidence on the subject of the date of the alteration, which, when examined carefully, appears to us to be wholly unsatisfactory; and considering that the onus was on the plaintiff to prove that the alteration was assented to by Chajju Ram and Ram Singh, we must endorse the view of the District Judge that the plaintiff has failed to substantiate his contention.

It appears from the evidence of the plaintiff's own witness, Joti Parshad, who was acting as the treasurer of the company in 1913, that it was on the 4th of October 1913 that he made certain entries in the account book of the company relating to the hundi in question showing the period of payment as 93 days, and that subsequently on that very date he altered it in red ink to 61 days (it is obviously a mistake for 63 days). Now, this man could not have entered on 4th October 93 days as the original period of payment, if the alteration had been made before the bill was sent to the plaintiff on the 1st of October. The learned Vakil for the plaintiff has made an infructuous attempt to explain away this evidence by suggesting that the witness was labouring under some misapprehension, but we see no reason why we should not accept the evidence as it stands.

It seems to us that it was not until the 4th of October that it was considered necessary to reduce the period of payment, and the reason for this appears to be a simple one. On that date the Bank was asked to advance the money, and probably it declined to do so unless the period was reduced by one month. The manager of the company, hard pressed as he was, readily agreed to this suggestion, and made the required alteration and affixed his initials thereto. The matter was not considered of any importance at that time, and no effort was consequently made to obtain the signatures of the remaining two drawers; one of whom Chajju Ram had, as stated above, left Delhi on the evening of the 20th September. There is no reason why Ishri Parshad, if he did not want to negotiate a hundi payable after three months, should not have asked the drawers on 30th September to mention in the bill a shorter period for payment; and it is clear that the hundi should in that case have mentioned 63 days from the very beginning as the period of payment. Upon an examination of the evidence before us and the circumstances adverted to above, we hold that the reason for the alteration of the period was the unwillingness of the Bank to advance money on a hundi payable after a long period, and that the alteration was made probably on the 4th October in order to comply with the demand of the Bank.

The consequence of this alteration upon the liability of the drawers, who did not assent thereto, is the matter which may now be considered. The law on the subject, which finds expression in section 87 of the Negotiable Instruments Act, is to the effect that "any material alteration of a negotiable instrument renders the same void as against any one who is a party thereto at the time of making such alteration and does not consent thereto, unless it was made in order to carry out the common intention of the original parties." There can be no doubt that any alteration in the bill, which changes the identity of the contract contained therein, must be regarded as a material alteration. As laid down by Brett, L. J., in Suffell v. Bank of England (1), any alteration is material which would alter the business effect of the instrument if used for any business purpose. It has been repeatedly held that an alteration in the time when the instrument is due and payable is a material alteration and avoids the instrument.

When the bill is materially altered it is discharged, and the law does not allow the party claiming under it to fall back upon the contract as it existed prior to the alteration. In the language of Swayne, J., in Wood v. Steel (2), "in pursuance of a stern but wise policy the law annuls the instrument as to the party sought to be wronged." Indeed, Mr. Moti Sagar for the plaintiff admits that the alteration is a material one within the purview of the aforesaid section, but the learned Vakil contends that it was made in order to carry out the common intention of the original parties. There is, however, absolutely nothing to substantiate this contention, and we have no doubt that it is a mere afterthought. We must, therefore, hold that the alteration in question discharges the non consenting drawers from liability on the bill.

The question of presentment of the bill for payment need not detain us long. It is clear that neither the plaintiff nor the Bank made any such presentment and that a mere demand of money does not amount to a presentment for payment. In order to comply with the law the holder must exhibit the bill to the person from whom he demands payment and offer to deliver it up on payment. It, however, appears that the bill was payable at the Alliance Bank of Simla, Limited, Delhi, and section 76 of the Act provides that no presentment for payment is necessary, and the instrument is dishonoured at the due date for presentment if the instrument being payable at some specified place other than the place of business of the acceptor, neither he nor any person authorised to pay it attends at such place during the usual business hours. It is not even alleged that the acceptor or any other person on his behalf went to the Alliance Bank of Simla, Delhi, on or before the due date and offered payment. Non presentment does not, in view of the special feature of this bill, have the effect of non-suiting the plaintiff.

Coming now to the question of the notice of dishonour the learned Vakil for the plaintiff frankly admits that no notice of dishonour, as contemplated by law, was given to the drawers, and the law as embodied in section 93 of the Negotiable Instruments Act requires the holder to give notice of dishonour to the person or persons other than the drawee or acceptor whom he seeks to make liable on the bill. The rule rests upon solid ground and does not admit of any departure except in the cases enumerated in section 98. The learned Vakil consequently seeks the protection of clause (c) of that section and contends that the notice of dishonour was not necessary because the party charged could not suffer damage for want of it. It is true that the object of the notice is to enable the party charged to protect his interest by taking necessary steps for obtaining payment from all other persons liable to him, and it is argued that as the acceptor was by reason of financial embarrassment not in a position to make any payment, the plaintiff's failure to give notice did not prevent the drawers from doing anything which could benefit them in this connection. Now, it is apparent that the company was by no means in a flourishing condition, but the accounts show that the manager was receiving in those days a good deal of money from his customers, and we are not prepared to hold that he could not arrange for the payment of the money on the bill, though it is possible, nay probable, that such payment could be made only at the expense of other persons to whom the company owed money on account of the price of wheat or some other liability.

It must be remembered that section 98 contains the exceptions to the general rule requiring notice of dishonour, and it is for the person relying upon any such exception to establish all the requirements thereof. It is to be observed that this is not a case where the drawer draws the bill without having the right to do so or without any reasonable ground to expect that the drawee would honour it. In a case of that kind the drawer at the time of the drawing has no reasonable expectation that the bill would be paid up, and so he can suffer no loss or injury for want of notice of dishonour. In the case before us the bill was drawn in order to supply the drawee with funds, and the latter was, therefore, the principal debtor. The drawers had consequently every right to expect that the payment would be made by the drawee. We are clear that the plaintiff has not succeeded in showing that the drawers could not suffer damage from the failure to give notice, and that the suit against the drawers must fail on the ground of want of notice of dishonour.

The contention that the creditor gave time to the principal debtor and thereby discharged the drawers, who must be regarded as sureties, from their liability does not deserve any serious notice. There is no proof that there was any contract giving time for payment as contemplated by section 135 of the Indian Contract Act. The principle of law is firmly established that a mere forbearance or delay in suing the principal or pressing him for payment does not discharge the surety.

Nor do we think that the company has paid any sum over and above that for which the plaintiff has already given credit. Our attention has been invited to certain entries in the plaintiff's book, showing that he received two other items of Rs. 1,516 and 2,500 respectively, but these entries themselves make it perfectly clear that the payments were made in connection with other accounts in which the plaintiff was a creditor of the company and that they had nothing whatever to do with the transaction in dispute.

The finding on the questions of material alteration and notice of dishonour should lead to the dismissal of the suit not only as against Chajju Ram but also as against Ram Singh, but the District Judge, while accepting this conclusion with regard to the former, holds the latter nevertheless liable. The learned Judge differentiates his case on three grounds:—

(1) that Ram Singh "has been associated with the management of these mills for many years and was for some years the actual manager;"

(2) that the money realised on the 4th October 1913 is entered in his cash book;

(3) that he had executed two hundis in August 1913 for Rs. 5,000, which money was deducted by the plaintiff from Rs. 25,000 advanced in October 1913 on the strength of the five hundis and further that in renewal of one of these latter hundis, Ram Singh and Sunder Singh executed two hundis for Rs. 2,500 each in April 1914.

Now, the second ground mentioned above proceeds upon a misapprehension of facts. The account book (D-3) cannot be regarded as an account book of Ram Singh, because a perusal of the various items recorded therein leaves no doubt that they deal with the transactions of the company. The only thing which can be urged in favour of the District Judge's remark is the fact that the words "Sunder Singh and Ram Singh" are scribbled on the book at one place, but considering that the book is undoubtedly one of the books kept on behalf of the company, this scribbling cannot possibly convert it into an account book of Ram Singh.

It is true that Ram Singh took at one time a prominent part in the management of the company, that the money due on the hundis said to have been drawn by him in August 1913 was deducted as stated above, and that one of the five hundis was renewed by means of two hundis said to have been drawn by Ram Singh and Sunder Singh in April 1914. We still fail to see how these facts can preclude Ram Singh from raising his objection on the ground of the want of notice of dishonour with respect to the hundi upon which this suit is based. It is not alleged that he drew another hundi in lieu of this hundi. There is absolutely no reason to hold that the waiver of notice with respect to one of the hundis debars him from availing himself of a legal objection applying to another bill. We accordingly hold that there is no valid ground for differentiating the case against Ram Singh.

The result is that this appeal preferred by Ram Singh is allowed, and the decree of the District Judge against the appellant is discharged with costs throughout.

Bengal Tenancy Act (VIII B. C. of 885), s. 85—Occupancy raiyat, lease granted by—Intermediate tenure, creation of—Rent, suit for, by holder of intermediate tenure—Estoppel.

Defendant No. 2, an occupancy raiyat, granted a lease of his holding to defendant No. 1 for a term in excess of that authorised by section 85 of the Bengal Tenancy Act. Subsequently the defendant No 2 purported to create an intermediate tenancy in favour of the plaintiffs, which again was unauthorised by the terms of section 85. In a suit by the plaintiffs against defendant No 1 for arrears of rent, the defendant No 2's son and authorised agent came forward and made a statement in Court that the rent in respect of the holding was not payable to the defendant No. 2 but to the plaintiffs:

Held, that the defendant No 2 and the plaintiffs having agreed between them that the rent was payable to the plaintiffs, it was not competent to the defendant No 1 to contest the plaintiffs' claim for rent. [p. 616, col. 2]

JUDGMENT.

FLETCHER, J.—This appeal is preferred by the defendant No. 1 against the judgment of the learned District Judge of Jessore, dated the 9th January 1917, reversing the decision of the Munsif at Narail. The plaintiffs brought the suit to recover rent in arrears, the amount sought to be recovered being Rs. 100. The facts are these: The defendant No. 2 is an occupancy raiyat. He granted a lease to the defendant No. 1, which was in excess of the term as authorized by section 85 of the Bengal Tenancy Act. Of course, there is an estoppel between the defendant No. 1 and the defendant No. 2. Subsequent to the grant of that lease to the defendant No. 1, the defendant No. 2 purported to create an intermediate tenancy in favour of the plaintiffs. Again that lease was apparently unauthorized by the terms of section 85 of the Bengal Tenancy Act. The plaintiffs then sued for rent, making the defendant No. 1 principal defendant and the defendant No. 2 the 2nd defendant. The case went to trial and the first Court dismissed the suit. On appeal to the learned District Judge he reversed that decision. The defendant No. 1 appeals to this Court against the decision of the learned District Judge. What is found by the learned District Judge is this: first of all he has found the genuineness of these two leases by the defendant No. 2. He has found that, although the defendant No. 2, who is a resident of Mymensingh, did not enter appearance in the suit, he was represented by his son and that the son gave evidence admitting the lease that had been granted by the defendant No. 2 in favour of the plaintiffs, that is, as I read it, that the defendant No. 2's son and authorized agent came forward in Court and made a statement in Court that the rent in respect of the holding was not payable to the defendant No. 2 but to the plaintiffs. That being so, it seems to me that the case is covered by the decision of Mr. Justice Mookerjee and Mr. Justice Beachcroft in Sukumari Gupta v. Bharat Mandal (1), the passage referred to being at the bottom of page 151*. In that view of the case, the defendant No. 2 and the plaintiffs having agreed between them that the rent is payable to the plaintiffs, it is not competent to the defendant No. 1 to contest the plaintiffs' claim. In the result I think the conclusion arrived at by the learned District Judge of the Court of Appeal below is correct. The present appeal, therefore, fails and ought to be dismissed with costs.

DUVAL, J.—I agree.

Transfer of Property Act (IV of 1882), s. 59—Attestation of deed—Scribe or writer, whether attesting witness—Evidence Act (I of 1872), s. 68—"Attesting witness," meaning of.

Under section 59 of the Transfer of Property Act for a deed to be regarded as validly executed, it must be signed by two witnesses as attesting witnesses; ordinarily, a scribe or writer of a document is not intended to be, and is not, an attesting witness. [p. 617, col. 2.]

The expression "attesting witness" in section 68 of the Evidence Act means a witness who has seen the deed executed and who signs it as a witness. [p. 617, col. 2.]

Second appeal from the decision of the District Judge, Khandesh, in Appeal No. 9 of 1916, confirming the decree passed by the Subordinate Judge at Dhulia, in Civil Suit No. 270 of 1915.

Mr. W. B. Pradhan, for the Appellant.

Mr. H. B. Gumaste, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.

MACLEOD, C. J.—The plaintiff filed this suit to recover on a mortgage-bond the sum of Rs. 100 for principal and Rs. 100 as interest with costs and future interest. The 1st defendant admitted execution and consideration. But a preliminary issue was raised, whether the mortgage deed sued upon was valid under section 59 of the Transfer of Property Act. The learned Judge in the trial Court said:—

"I examined the plaintiff to-day and he admits, as indeed he is bound to do, that the deed was written and signed at the writer's house where one of the attestants put his attestation on the deed. But the other witness attested the document in the Sub-Registrar's Office. It is evident, therefore, that there is no proper attestation of the document as required by the Transfer of Property Act."

The suit was, therefore, dismissed.

In appeal the same question was raised, and the appeal was dismissed by the learned District Judge. It would seem at first sight that the judgments of both the lower Courts are perfectly correct. But we have been referred to a decision of this Court in Govind Bhikaji v. Bhau Gopal (1), which was decided after the decision of the lower Appellate Court. In that case on the evidence the Court said:—

"The writer of the document signed his own name under the description of the executant's mark. His object in so doing presumably was, and the effect of his so doing, in the opinion of the Court, was, to authenticate the mark, that is to say, to vouch the execution, in other words, this last signature was made not as a scribe, but as an attesting witness."

Now if there had been evidence in this case that two witnesses had signed as attesting witnesses, then no doubt there would have been a valid mortgage under the provisions of section 59 of the Transfer of Property Act. We are asked in second appeal in consequence of that decision, either to hold on the facts in this case that the scribe putting his signature at the end of the document would be sufficient evidence that he signed as an attesting witness, or to send the case back to the trial Court to take further evidence to show that the scribe did sign as an attesting witness. This question was considered in Ranu v. Laxmanrao (2), where it was held that the scribe could not be considered as an attesting witness, because his name occurred before the names of the executing parties and formed part of the body of the document. Reference was made to the case of Burdett v. Spilsbury (3), where Lord Campbell said: "What is the meaning of an attesting witness to a deed? Why it is a witness who has seen the deed executed, and who signs it as a witness." This, we think, is the meaning of "attesting witness" in section 68 of the Indian Evidence Act, and we, therefore, hold that the writer in the circumstances of this case cannot be treated as an attesting witness.

I should myself be very disinclined to hold that in any case a scribe, wherever he wrote his name, could be considered to sign the document as an attesting witness, unless he actually said so in the document. There is a very great difference between an attesting witness and a scribe, and it would seem to me that it would lead to attempts to evade the plain words of section 59, and would also lead to constant difficulties hereafter, if the law was not strictly observed, since parties might think that they were executing a valid mortgage, if only one outside person was brought in to witness the document, and evidence would have to be called to show that the scribe as a matter of fact did sign as an attesting witness. I think the case of Govind Bhikaji v. Bhau Gopal (1) must be taken to stand on its own facts. But I also think we must observe the test laid down by the Privy Council in Shamu Patter v. Abdul Kadir Rowuthan (4) and also in Ranu v. Laxmanrao (2), which, in my opinion, lay down the correct principle to be followed, namely, that an attesting witness must clearly sign as such. Therefore, I think the appeal ought to be dismissed with costs.

HEATON, J.—I agree. Broadly speaking, a scribe or writer of a document is not intended to be, and is not, an attesting witness. But he may be such a witness in certain cases. It was, for example, held in the case of Govind Bhikaji v. Bhau Gopal (1) that the scribe there was an attesting witness. That could only have been held on a consideration of the evidence in that case. No evidence has been taken in this case to enable the Court to ascertain whether the scribe was or was not an attesting witness. It is, therefore, not established that he was. That being so, it is not established that the mortgage deed in this case was a duly executed mortgage-deed. Therefore, I think the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Provincial Small Cause Courts Act (IX of 1887), s. 17—Ex parte decree, application to set aside—Deposit of decretal amount—Discretion of Court to grant time—"Amount due under the decree," meaning of.

The provision in section 17 of the Provincial Small Cause Courts Act requiring the deposit of the decree amount or the giving of security for it at the time of the presentation of an application to set aside an ex parte decree is not mandatory, but only directory, and such deposit may be made or security given at any time the Court fixes for it before the hearing [p 618, col 2]

The expression "the amount due under the decree" in section 17 of the Act does not include costs of execution. [p. 619, col 1.]

Petition, under section 25 of Act IX of 1887, praying the High Court to revise the decree, dated the 28th March 1918, of the Court of the Subordinate Judge, Madura, in Small Cause Suit No. 445 of 1917.

FACTS appear from the judgment.

Mr. S. Panchapakesa Sastri, for the Petitioner.—The lower Court should not have set aside the ex parte decree. The provision in section 17 of the Provincial Small Cause Courts Act is obligatory. The deposit of the decree amount or the furnishing of security therefor must be made within the 30 days allowed for the application to set aside the ex parte decree. The Court has no discretion to allow time beyond that.

The total amount due to plaintiff at the time of the execution application inclusive of the execution costs should have been deposited. The defendant, having failed to pay the execution costs, was not entitled to have the ex parte decree set aside.

Mr. T. V. Gopalasawmy Mudaliar, for the Respondents.—The Court is not limited in its discretion in granting time to any particular period. Its discretion is absolute. The decision in Akula Achiah v. Challapalli Lakshminarasimham (1) does not lay down any such narrow rule. The provisions of section 17 of the Provincial Small Cause Courts Act are not mandatory but only directory.

The expression 'the amount due under the decree" cannot include execution costs which accrued due subsequent to the decree.

JUDGMENT.—Though I was inclined to doubt the correctness of the ruling in Ramasami v. Kurisu (2), I think it must now be taken as settled by the decision of Seshagiri Aiyar and Moore, JJ, in Akula Achiah v. Challapalli Lakshinarasimham (1) that the provision in section 17 of the Provincial Small Cause Courts Act requiring the deposit of the decree amount or the giving of security for it at the time of the prosecution of the application to set aside the ex parte decree is not mandatory but only directory.

The deposit must, in other words, be made or security furnished as and when the Court directs. The Court has, therefore, the power to let the deposit to be made as it thinks fit and to give time for it, provided of course that the deposit is made before the hearing of the petition.

One sentence in the judgment of my learned brothers, where they say we express no opinion whether this deposit after the time allowed for the application is valid or not, has given room to some argument before me that they did not decide that the Court can give time beyond the 30 days fixed for applications to set aside ex parte decrees under the Limitation Act. But reading the judgment as a whole, I think it shows that they recognised that the Court could allow any proper time as it thinks necessary, as the provision was held to be directory only. There is no time fixed for the deposit under the section, if we do not consider the time of the presentation of the application as that time. If that point of time is not to be taken as fixed for the deposit, it can be made at any time the Court fixes for it before the hearing. The objection that the deposit was not made in this case within the time must, therefore, be overruled, as the deposit was made within the time allowed by the Court. The Court was no doubt very indulgent in the matter of fixing time but that is not a question on which I should interfere.

The further objection that the execution costs incurred by the decree-holder were not deposited before the decree was set aside, is also not a valid objection to the order setting aside the decree, as those costs cannot be held to come within the expression "the amount due under the decree" in section 17.

It was next urged that there was no sufficient cause shown for the defendants' absence on the hearing date. The learned Subordinate Judge has accepted the cause shown as sufficient and, though perhaps it is not a very satisfactory cause, I am not prepared to interfere with the discretion of the Subordinate Judge.

The order setting aside the ex parte decree must, therefore, be upheld. On the merits, the finding that Exhibit A, the document sued on, is not proved to be genuine is one of fact and the learned Subordinate Judge has given some reasons for it and I must accept it in revision.

The suit was on that finding rightly dismissed against the 1st defendant. The case, however, stands on a different footing against the 2nd defendant. He, having transferred Exhibit A to the plaintiff and having received consideration for it and having agreed to repay if plaintiff failed to recover from the 1st defendant, is clearly liable for the suit amount. There must be a decree against him for it and costs.

In the result the civil revision petition is dismissed with costs against the 1st defendant but allowed with costs in this Court only against the 2nd defendant.

Bombay Land Revenue Code (Act V of 1879), s. 74—Rajinama and kabuliyat, execution of, whether amounts to transfer.

The execution of a rajinamah and a kabuliyat does not, in the absence of evidence, or indications furnished by lapse of time and possession and so forth of an intention to transfer ownership, completely take the place of a sale-deed. Each case, however, depends upon its own facts. [p. 620, cols. 1 & 2, p. 621, col. 1.]

Second appeal from the decision of the District Judge, Ahmednagar, in Appeal No. 19 of 1917, confirming the decree passed by the Joint Subordinate Judge at Ahmednagar, in Civil Suit No. 230 of 1916.

Mr. D. C. Virkar, for the Appellants.

Mr. A. G. Desai, for Respondent No. 1.

JUDGMENT.

MACLEOD, C. J.—The property in suit in 1884 belonged to one Chinkabai. She mortgaged it to the plaintiff's father in 1884. In 1894, she executed a Rajinama in favour of her son Madhavrao, giving notice under section 74 of the Bombay Land Revenue Code of 1879 that she had relinquished the occupancy of certain survey numbers mentioned therein, and asked for the necessary mutations of names to be made in the records. At the same time Madhavrao executed a Kabuliyat addressed to the Mamlatdar, and the properties were transferred in the Government records to the name of Madhavrao. In 1903 Madhavrao mortgaged to the 1st defendant. The plaintiff brought a suit on his mortgage in 1910 and got a decree for sale in 1911. He purchased in 1915. The 1st defendant got a consent decree against Madhavrao in 1908 and purchased under that decree in 1912. The evidence adduced at the trial convinced the trial Judge that the transfer of the property to the name of Madhavrao in 1894 was merely for the convenience of Chinkabai, and he found it was recognised between Madhavrao and Chinkabai that Madhavrao was merely managing the property for her. He finds on issue No. 3 as follows:—

"I have, therefore, to find that Madhavrao never professed to be in possession and Vahivat as owner and that Chinkabai did not absolutely relinquish her proprietary right in favour of Madhavrao by the change of Khata to his name. The purpose of the change of Khata seems to be to facilitate the management of the property by Madhavrao. Beyond this evidence there is absolutely no evidence for the defendant to prove that Madhavrao was the owner of the lands. My finding, therefore, on the 3rd issue is in the negative."

Now in second appeal it has been argued that the execution of the Rajinama and Kabuliyat in 1894 must necessarily by themselves amount to a transfer of the property by Chinkabai to Madhavrao. But none of the authorities cited is in favour of so unlimited an assertion. The question in issue was whether such documents required registration, and all that the cases cited can show is, that it was decided that these documents did not require registration, but could amount to evidence of transfer of the property to which they related. But the Courts have never gone so far as to hold that the execution of these documents must necessarily amount to a transfer, which could not be rebutted by any evidence regarding the manner in which the parties concerned dealt with the property. Each case must necessarily depend upon its own facts, and in one case the Court might be satisfied that the parties who executed a Rajinama and Kabuliyat intended that the property should be transferred, and in another case, as in this, the Court might find from the evidence that the execution of these documents was merely for the convenience of the parties, especially, as in this case, where the party transferring the Khata was a woman. I think we must be bound by the findings of fact in the trial Court, that it was not intended by these documents executed in 1894 to transfer the property from Chinkabai to Madhavrao. It follows, therefore, that the property stood in the name of Madhavrao merely for the convenience of Chinkabai and Chinkabai was well acquainted with the fact. Therefore, Madhavrao had no title, and the plaintiff's mortgage was the only mortgage of the property, so that the plaintiff who had purchased in execution is entitled to the property as against Madhavrao's mortgagee. Therefore, the appeal, in my opinion, should be dismissed with costs.

HEATON, J.—In this case it is admitted that the appellants must fail, unless it is shown that in the year 1894 there was a transfer of ownership of the land in suit by Chinkabai, the then owner, to her son Madhavrao. It is found as a matter of fact by both the lower Courts that there was no transfer of ownership, and that finding must be accepted by us, unless as a matter of law the existence in the year 1894 of a Rajinama and Kabuliyat under section 74 of the Bombay Land Revenue Code necessarily constitute a transfer of ownership. It is argued by the appellants that they do. The value of Rajinamas and Kabuliyats is a matter which has often engaged my attention, and I see I have delivered several opinions on the point which appear in the Bombay Law Reporter. One of the latest, if not the latest, appears in Narso Ramji Kulkarni v. Nagava Ishvarappa (1). For many years it seems to have been the opinion in this Court that it was difficult to establish a transfer of the kind here asserted, without a sale-deed; although even then there were indications that the existence of a Rajinama and Kabuliyat might possibly be a substitute for a sale-deed as documentary evidence of a transfer. In recent years it has, I think, become established that you can have a transfer of agricultural lands without a sale deed and that a Rajinama and Kabuliyat may in certain cases be, for substantial purposes, as good evidence of a transfer as a sale-deed itself. But of course before you can hold that a Rajinama and Kabuliyat really do evidence a transfer of ownership, there must be either evidence or indications, furnished by lapse of time and possession and so forth, that there was in fact an intention to transfer ownership. A Rajirama and Kabuliyat do not by any means completely take the place of a sale deed. They only serve as documentary evidence of transfer, if that transfer can properly be inferred from the totality of facts proved; and these must usually at any rate comprise a good deal more than the Rajinama and Kabuliyat themselves. In this case there is evidence from which both the lower Courts have drawn a conclusion that there was no intention to transfer ownership. It was quite within their powers to arrive at that conclusion. It seems to me, therefore, that their finding that there was no transfer of ownership in 1894 is conclusive, and that the argument urged by the appellants that a Rajinama and Kabuliyat necessarily compel the inference as a matter of law that there was a transfer of ownership is without good foundation. I, therefore, agree that the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

DARBARA SINGH AND OTHERS—PLAINTIFFS AND ANOTHER—VENDOR—RESPONDENTS.

Punjab Pre-emption Act (I of 1913), s. 22—Extension of time for making deposit—Discretion of Court—Appellate Court, powers of—Procedure.

In a pre-emption suit filed on the last day of limitation the Court ordered the plaintiffs to deposit one-fifth of the sale price in cash on or before a certain date. On this date the plaintiffs asked the Court to accept security instead of a cash deposit; but the Court refused to do so and extended the time for making the deposit. The plaintiffs having failed to make the deposit, the Court rejected the plaint. On appeal the District Judge allowed further time and the plaintiffs having made the deposit, he set aside the order rejecting the plaint. The defendants referred a second appeal to the High Court:

Held, that under the circumstances of the case the lower Appellate Court ought not to have gone out of its way to exercise the discretion of extending time in favour of the plaintiffs. [p. 623, col. 2.]

According to general rules of procedure an Appellate Court has all the powers which the original Court has and can do all that the original Court can do. [p. 622, col. 2.]

Sub-section 2 of section 22 of the Punjab Pre-emption Act was enacted rather to enlarge the powers of an Appellate Court authorising it to make the same orders with respect to an appeal as the original Court can with regard to the original suit. [p. 622, col 2; p. 623, col. 1.]

Second appeal from the order of the District Judge, Ferozepore, dated the 28th August 1919, reversing that of the Subordinate Judge, 2nd Class, Ferozepore, dated the 6th February 1919.

The Hon'ble Pandit Sheo Narain, R. B., for the Appellant.

Mr. B. P. Khosla, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This second appeal has arisen out of a suit for pre-emption under the following circumstances:—

(1) Darbara Singh adult, and (2) Gurbakhsh Singh and (3) Kheta minors, through their next friend Musammat Kishno their mother, brought a suit for pre-emption against Gajjan Singh vendor and Inayat vendee. The suit was instituted on the 3rd of December 1918, the last date of limitation. On the 5th of December 1918, the Court under section 22, clause (1), of the Pre-emption Act ordered the plaintiffs to deposit one-fifth of the sale price in cash on or before the 10th of January 1919. On the date fixed the plaintiffs tried to persuade the Court to accept a security instead of a cash deposit. This the Court refused to do. It, however, extended the time for making the deposit until the 6th of February 1919. The amount to be deposited was fixed at Rs. 500 and in the order it was distinctly mentioned that no further time would be granted. The plaintiffs, however, failed to make the deposit and the Court, acting under sub-section 4 of section 22, rejected the plaint on the 22nd of August 1919. Against this order an appeal was preferred to the lower Appellate Court by the two minor plaintiffs through their mother Musammat Kishno. Their adult brother Darbara Singh, for reasons which have not been explained, did not join them in instituting the appeal, but he was joined as a respondent. In the memorandum of appeal four pleas were raised to the following effect, namely,

(1) That Musammat Kishno was prevented from depositing the money through fraud.

(2) That under the special circumstances the lower Court ought to have allowed further extension for the deposit of the money.

(3) That the lower Court was in error in holding that further extension could not be granted under section 22.

The fourth plea was in the shape of a prayer that in the interest of the minors, the lower Court should be ordered to allow the money to be deposited. The first plea as it stood in the memorandum of appeal was utterly vague, but from the judgment of the lower Appellate Court it appears that it was explained by alleging fraud on the part of one Phuman Khan, who was said to have at the last moment backed out of his promise to lend the required sum for the puposes of the deposit. This plea, whatever its effect might have been, does not appear to have been made out by evidence, for the learned Judge does not appear to attach any importance to it in his judgment. On the contrary the learned Judge appears to have overruled all the pleas raised in the memorandum of appeal, for he records the following decisive finding on the whole case:—

"I hold that the first Court's order is perfectly correct, legal, and just, but nevertheless as the plaintiffs are minors I will give one more opportunity, on condition that Rs. 50 be paid as compensation for the defendants."

He allowed time for the deposit to be made up to the noon on the 28th of August 1919. In accordance with this order the plaintiffs deposited Rs. 500 and also paid Rs. 50 compensation money within time. The learned Judge, therefore, on the 28th of August 1919, accepted the appeal of the plaintiffs and set aside the order rejecting the plaint. Against this appellate order the present second appeal has been preferred.

Two main contentions have been raised before me on behalf of the vendee-appellant. In the first place, it has been contended that under section 22 the Appellate Court had no power to extend the time for the deposit of the one fifth of the sale price in appeal. It is urged that according to the correct interpretation of sub section (1) power is given to the first Court in which the pre emption suit is brought to fix the amount to be deposited and the time within which the deposit is to be made. Sub-section 4 makes the following peremptory provision:

"If the plaintiff fails within the time fixed by the Court, or within such further time as the Court may allow, to make the deposit or furnish the security mentioned in sub section 1, his plaint shall be rejected."

It is contended that it is the first Court which has been given the discretion to extend the time for making the deposit or furnishing the security relating to the suit pending before it. Sub section 2 provides that "in any appeal the Appellate Court may at any time exercise the powers conferred on a Court under sub-section 1," and it is further provided by sub-section 4 that if the plaintiff-appellant fails to make the deposit within the time fixed by the Appellate Court the appeal shall be dismissed. It is argued that according to the correct interpretation of sub-sections 2 and 4 the Appellate Court is to exercise powers of granting further time when it has itself made the original order requiring the plaintiff appellant to make his deposit within a fixed time. It is accordingly argued that the learned Judge of the Court below had no power to extend the time for the deposit which the Court of first instance in its discretion had refused to do. The wording of the section is not very clear and may lend colour to this argument. According to general rules of procedure the Appellate Court has all the powers which the original Court has and can do all that the original Court can do. Sub-section 2 does not in any way take away or cut down the powers of an Appellate Court. In fact it was enacted rather to emphasize and amplify these powers. The decision of the question is not free from difficulty, but applying general principles it may be safely held that the powers of an Appellate Court have been left intact. In my opinion sub section 2 was enacted rather to enlarge those powers, authorising the Appellate Court to make the same orders with respect to an appeal as the original Court has with regard to the original suit. It has not been contended that the right of appeal in pre-emption cases under the circumstances contemplated by section 22 does not exist. If there is a right of appeal from pre-emption decrees, the Appellate Court must be held to possess all the powers of an Appellate Court in dealing with it.

The second point urged is that granting that the District Judge had the power to make the order now in question, whether under the circumstances of this case he ought to have done so. It is admitted that the right of pre-emption in its very essence is a weak right. The Muhammadan Law to which the right of pre emption in this country owes its origin itself recognises the weakness of the right. In fact in almost all the Muhammadan Law text-books a separate chapter is devoted to the consideration of the circumstances under which and the manner in which this right may be defeated. The Muhammadan Law recognises certain devices by which a right of pre-emption may be avoided. (See Fatwai Alamgiri, Baillie's Hanifea Law, pages 512-513, Hamilton's Hidaya, page 563, and M. L. Agarwala's Law of Pre-emption, Chapter IX, page 146, Second Edition, wherein the whole subject is fully discussed and illustrated). There is no dearth of decided cases on this point. As the exercise of the right is opposed to public interest, the Courts do not enforce it beyond the limit of the necessities which have been judicially decided. In Sheikh Koodrut-oollah v. Mohinee Mohun Shaha (1) Mr. Justice Mitter said that the right was not founded on any antecedent defect in the title of the vendor, i.e., on his legal disability to sell his property to a stranger, but was a mere right of re-purchase, not from the vendor but from the vendee.

There will be found numerous cases spread over all the Indian Law Reports in support of this proposition, to which it is not necessary to refer in detail as the matter is so well known and so generally recognised. No reported case dealing with the question relating to the interpretation of section 22 of the Pre-emption Act has been cited by either side before me, but an unreported judgment of Mr. Justice LeRossignol and Mr. Justice Wilberforce, in Civil Appeal No, 3308 of 1917, decided on the 12th of March 1918, has been relied upon, the facts of which were somewhat similar to the facts of the present case. The plaintiff in that case was first ordered to deposit security in cash on the 30th of May. He failed to make the deposit within the time. Time was twice extended with a specific warning that no further opportunity would be given him. He again failed to make the deposit. The plaint was accordingly rejected in accordance with sub-section 4 of section 22. An appeal was preferred to the Chief Court, urging that the Court of first instance exercised its discretion in an arbitrary fashion in dismissing the suit. It is not clear whether the precise question raised before me was raised in that case. Consequently the decision relied upon cannot be useful to the appellant on the question of the construction of section 22 and its sub-sections, but the ground on which the learned Judges refused to interfere with the order of dismissal equally applies to the facts of the present case. At the conclusion of their judgment the learned Judges made the following observation:—"The suit was instituted on the very last day of limitation and there is no good reason why persons who bring suits of a peculiar nature, such as pre-emption suits, should receive great concessions from the Courts. The right to pre empt as it now stands is of a piratical nature and persons who desire to enforce it must comply strictly with the requirements of the law."

In another pre-emption case No. 2753 of 1910, decided by the Hon'ble Mr. F. A. Robertson of the Punjab Chief Court on the 31st of March 1913, somewhat similar remarks were made with regard to the nature of a pre-emptive right. The plaint in that case had also been rejected by the first Court for non-payment of one-fifth of the purchase money within the time fixed and the Appellate Court had dismissed the appeal. The learned Judge in appeal to this Court made the following remark in his judgment:—

"There are no special equities in favour of a person who asserts his rights of pre-emption and as this is particularly a harassing kind of litigation, the plaintiff was properly called upon to deposit the one-fifth of the value of the property and when he fails to do so and is absent on the date of the hearing, I cannot see that there is any special reason to make it easy for him. I notice that the suit was filed on the day before the date of limitation would have expired."

Now in this case also the suit was instituted on the very last day of limitation and this was also a pre-emption suit. The additional facts which tell against the plaintiffs are these:—

(a) That in the first place the adult plaintiff kept out of the appeal, which was filed only by his minor brothers through their mother;

(b) the appeal was allowed to be dismissed for default. Then an application for its restoration was made and these proceedings took several months and the appeal eventually was decided on the 22nd of August by which time for deposit was extended upto the 28th of August. Thus the plaintiffs managed to gain six months' time in this manner, and

(c) a false plea of fraud was invented for the purpose of persuading the Court to extend the time.

Taking these facts into consideration the plaintiffs in this case were not entitled to any consideration. The Court of first instance had granted them extension of time for the deposit with a warning that no further time would be granted; as there appeared to be no prospect of the deposit being made, the first Court was driven to make an order according to law and reject the plaint. In the face of these circumstances the lower Appellate Court ought not to have gone out of its way to exercise the discretion of extending time in favour of the plaintiffs. This ground is sufficient for accepting the appeal and setting aside the decision of the lower Appellate Court. After holding "that the first Court's order is perfectly correct, legal and just" the only legitimate course open to the lower Appellate Court was to have refused to interfere with that order. The only justification given by the learned Judge in his judgment is expressed in these words:—

"But nevertheless as the plaintiffs are minors, I will give one more opportunity, etc., etc."

The learned Judge in making the observation altogether forgot that the minors' adult brother Darbara Singh was also a co-plaintiff in the case and had kept behind the scene. It is easy to perceive that he was as much interested in the appeal as his two minor brothers. In my opinion the learned Judge of the Court below exercised his discretion in an arbitrary manner in accepting the appeal and thereby extending the time for the deposit of the one-fifth of the sale price. The mere fact that the appellants were minors was absolutely no ground for interference in a suit for pre-emption, for while minors have been treated with leniency as regards limitation, with respect to other matters no exception has been made in their favour in the matter of claims for pre-emption.

For the above reasons I allow the appeal, set aside the order of the lower Appellate Court and restore that of the first Court with costs.

Appeal allowed.

A suit for the recovery of damages for breach of a contract of betrothal abates upon the death of the plaintiff [p. 626, col. 1.]

Appeal from the decision of the First Class Subordinate Judge at Surat, in Civil Suit No. 169 of 1914.

Mr. G. N. Thakor, for the Appellants.

Mr. Jayakar (with him Mr. H. V. Divatia), for Respondent No. 1.

Mr. M. B. Dave, for Respondent No. 2.

JUDGMENT.—The original plaintiffs, who were father and son, brought this suit to recover the sum of Rs. 21,000 odd as damages for breach of a contract of betrothal. In 1901, the 1st defendant, the brother of the proposed bride, betrothed his sister to the 2nd plaintiff. The 2nd plaintiff was then nine years old and the proposed bride was four years old. In the ordinary course the marriage would have taken place in eight or nine years, that is to say, about 1910 or 1911. But postponements were made of the marriage ceremony by the defendant, in the belief that these postponements were required by the health of the bridegroom. In December 1913, the betrothal was broken off. In April 1914, the bride Mangalagavri married the 2nd defendant. During the pendency of the suit the 1st plaintiff died, and during the pendency of the appeal the 2nd plaintiff died. The suit was dismissed by the learned Subordinate Judge with costs. He held that the 1st defendant was justified in retracting the engagement, and that, therefore, he could not be liable in damages, nor was he liable for out of pocket expenses. It is quite clear that owing to the death of both the original plaintiffs there can be no claim now for damages. The only question is whether the representatives of the original plaintiffs as members of the family are entitled to recover the out of pocket expenses, which the plaintiffs said they incurred while the betrothal was in existence. The learned Judge at page 8, line 63, says: "As there was sufficient reason for retracting the engagement, the out of pocket expenses cannot be recovered from the defendant No. 1 under Verse 28 of section XI of Chapter II of the Mitakshara." But it appears to us that the learned Judge has misread that particular verse. Verses 26, 27 and 28 deal with the question of betrothal and what are the consequences of a breach. Verse 26 says:

"For detaining a damsel, after affiancing her, the offender should be fined, and should also make good the expenditure together with interest."

By Verse 27:

"If there be good cause, he shall not be fined, since retraction is authorized in such a case. The damsel, though betrothed, may be withheld if a preferable suitor present himself."

Then by Verse 28:

"Whatever has been expended, on account of the espousals, by the [intended] bridegroom (or by his father, or guardian) for the gratification of his own or of the damsel's relations, must be paid in full, with interest, by the affiancer to the bridegroom."

It is quite clear, therefore, that though the offender shall not be fined if there is good cause for the retraction, yet in any event by Verse 28 he must pay the expenses incurred by the bridegroom or his father during the betrothal.

Now in this case the plaintiffs have claimed Rs. 1,089 as out of pocket expenses in connection with the betrothal. They endeavoured to prove payments of various items making up that sum, but the learned Judge was by no means satisfied that such payments had been made. He says:—

"The sum of Rs. 1,089 is made up of a series of small items ranging over a number of years. The items were spent on food and small presents of cloth and cash. They include a sum of Rs. 4-6-6, the railway fare of Haribhai who went to Bombay from Surat on 7th February 1913 to talk to the defendant No. 1. Mangalagowri swears that she did not visit the plaintiff's house on several occasions charged for. She was then in mourning. The accounts produced on behalf of the plaintiffs were not at all regularly kept in the ordinary course of business. There is no evidence to show that any ornaments or any durable clothes of value, clothes that have not been worn out long before suit, have been presented to the girl. The account seems to have been made up from memory."

Therefore, the plaintiffs who had to prove their claim fell very far short of what was required of them, and it is impossible for us in first appeal to take an account, as, in the first place, we have not got the proper materials which the plaintiffs should have produced in the lower Court. Therefore, as Rs. 25 were at least admitted in the written statement as having been paid for clothes, and as it is certainly probable that some small sums were paid from time to time during all these years of the betrothal, I asked the respondents' Counsel whether they were not prepared to make an offer in order to prevent further trouble. Mr. Jayakar offered to pay Rs. 250 and I think the appellants' Pleader was certainly right in accepting that offer, because if the case had gone on, it was probable they would not have gained more than Rs. 25 admitted in the written statement. Therefore, there will be a decree for the plaintiffs for Rs. 250 and proportionate costs throughout. As regards the plaintiffs' claim to two items of Rs. 10,000 the appeal abates. The respondents will get their costs on these two items in the ordinary way as when an appeal abates and has not been decided on the merits.

Decree accordingly.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), ss. 64, 65, 73, O. XXI, rr. 58, 63—Attachment before judgment in two separate suits by different plaintiffs—Decrees in both suits—Sale at instance of one plaintiff, effect of—Subsequent application for sale by other plaintiff, whether maintainable.

Where property is attached before judgment in two separate suits by the respective plaintiffs therein, and both suits are decreed, and the property is sold in execution of the decree of one of the plaintiffs, ownership in the property passes to the purchaser the moment the sale is knocked down to him. An application, therefore, for sale of the property at the instance of the other plaintiff is not maintainable, inasmuch as the defendant has, in consequence of the sale, no interest in the property which can be attached or sold. Appeal against the order of the Court of the Subordinate Judge, Kumbakonam, dated the 30th July 1918, in Appeal Suit No. 38 of 1918, preferred against the order of the Court of the District Munsif, Valangiman, in Execution Application No. 823 of 1917, in Original Suit No. 43 of 1914, on the file of the Court of the District Munsif, Tanjore.

Petition, under section 115 of Act V of 1908 and section 107 of the Government of India Act, praying the High Court to revise the order of the Court of the Subordinate Judge, Kumbakonam, dated the 30th July 1918, in Appeal Suit No. 38 of 1918 (Execution Application No. 823 of 1917 on the file of the Court of the District Munsif, Valangiman.)

FACTS appear from the judgment.

Messrs. K. R. Narainsawmi Aiyar and R. T. Krishnamachariar, for the Appellant.—The lower Court was wrong in allowing the respondent's application for resale of the property. The respondent's first execution application having been dismissed, and appellant having become the purchaser in Court sale, the property vested in him absolutely and until respondent set aside the sale by decree of Court, he has no locus standi to question the sale. Attachment only renders void private alienations but does not invalidate transfers of property under orders of Court. Section 64, Civil Procedure Code. See Sankaralinga Reddi v. Kandasami Tevau (1), Errikullapa Chetty v. Official Assignee of Madras (2) and Raghunath Das v. Sundar Das (3).

Mr. K. S. Jayaram Iyer, for the Respondent—A suit is pending to set aside the sale to the appellant. Order XXI, rules 58 to 63, apply to this case. The Court was bound to investigate the respondent's claim.

JUDGMENT.—Both parties in this case attached the property of the same person before judgment in their respective suits against him and both obtained decrees for money, one in the Court of the District Munsif of Tanjore and the other in that of Valangiman. Both parties applied in the Court of the District Munsif of Valangiman for execution of their respective decrees, but the first application of the respondent was dismissed. The appellant's application resulted in a Court sale in which he purchased the attached property.

The respondent has now again applied for a sale of the same property in execution of his decree and the appellant has applied in those proceedings for an order that the application may be dismissed on the ground that he has become the owner of the property.

It is well established that an attachment confers no interest in the property, which is in custodia legis, and the effect of attachment is to render any private alienation void as against all claims enforceable under the attachment [see Civil Procedure Code, section 64, and Sankaralinga Reddi v. Kandasami Tevan (1)]. The attachment does not prevent a transfer of the property under an order of Court, and, therefore, an order of adjudication in insolvency which vests the property of the debtor in the Official Assignee is good as against an attaching creditor [see Raghunath Das v. Sundar Das (3) and Errikullapa Chetty v. Official Assignee of Madras (2)]. This principle is implied in the provisions of the Civil Procedure Code, section 73, under which persons who have applied for execution of their decrees are entitled merely to share the assets realised, and it is clear that, in the absence of fraud, (see Order XXI, rule 90) such persons cannot object to the sale of the property of their judgment-debtor by the Court.

The ownership of the property passed to the appellant from the moment that the sale was knocked down to him, and the judgment-debtor retained no interest in it which can be attached or sold (see section 65, Civil Procedure Code). It has been stated that proceedings by way of suit are pending to set aside the decree of, and sale thereunder to, the appellant; if those proceedings are successful, the respondent may be able to enforce his decree against any interest which thereby becomes vested again in his debtor, but he cannot now sell a merely speculative interest in these proceedings.

It has been argued that the provisions of Order XXI, rules 58 to 63, apply to this case, and the heading of the appellant's application referred to them; but we do not think that they apply, because the ground of an application under them is that the property in question is not liable to attachment. In the present case the respondent was originally entitled to attach the property of his debtor, but he is not entitled to proceed to sale because the Court has already disposed of the property. It was also objected that the appellant, not being the representative of any of the parties to the suit in which the decree was passed, had no locus standi to make this application under section 47, Civil Procedure Code, but Mr. Jayarama Aiyar withdrew this objection in the course of the arguments, and after the recent Full Bench decision in Veyindramuthu Pillai v. Maya Nadan (4), we do not think it can be denied that the appellant, having purchased the interests of the judgment-debtor, is his representative for the purpose of section 47.

We think that the appeal should be allowed and that the respondent should not be permitted to proceed to the sale of the property in question, unless or until the sale to the appellant has been set aside by an order or decree of Court and we order accordingly. The execution application is dismissed. Appellant will get his costs here and in the lower Courts.

The Civil Revision Petition follows Appeal against Appellate Order No. 108 of 1918. No orders are necessary.

Civil Rule against the order of the Munsif, Malda.

FACTS appear from the judgment.

Babu Jatindra Mohan Chowdhury, for the Petitioners.—This Rule was obtained by defendants Nos. 2 and 3. The suit was for recovery of Rs. 146 as money due on a bond. Defendants Nos. 1, 2 and 3 are three brothers. They denied the execution of the bond and the passing of the consideration. The suit was decreed against defendants Nos. 2 and 3 by the learned Small Cause Court Judge, who held that the signatures of defendants Nos. 2 and 3 were similar to those on the bond. The case was closed in July 1919, after which the expert evidence was taken. The judgment was passed in August. The statements in my petition have been supported by an affidavit sworn by the learned Pleader for the defendants in the Court below. On the 11th July defendant No. 1 being alone present in Court, the suit was postponed The defendants Nos 2 and 3 were always ready to depose. The learned Judge might have forgotten the fact and have erroneously stated in his judgment that they did not care to depose. After the suit has been once dismissed against defendant No. 1, it cannot be decreed as against the others That is a long established principle of law which has been followed uniformly in this country as well as in England. Refers to Gour Chandra Das v. Prasanna Kumar Chandra (1).

Babu Probodh Chandra Chatterji, for the Opposite Party, was not called upon.

JUDGMENT.—This Rule was issued at the instance of defendants Nos. 2 and 3 in a Small Cause Court suit on a bond. There were three defendants, and the learned Judge has found that the defendants Nos. 2 and 3 executed the bond and decreed the suit against them. As regards the first defendant he was not satisfied that the thumb mark which was said to be his on the bond corresponded with his thumb mark which was taken in Court, and, therefore, he was not prepared to hold that he was one of the parties who executed the bond. In the petition presented to this Court it was stated that of the three defendants only defendant No. 1 was examined and that the other two were not examined, because the Court remarked that their examination was unnecessary. The Small Cause Court Judge was asked to report on this allegation, and he states that it was not true that he remarked that the examination of defendants Nos. 2 and 3 was not necessary. With regard to that statement of the learned Small Cause Court Judge an affidavit has been put in by the Pleader who was acting on behalf of the defendants, and he states in that affidavit that his senior after the examination of the first defendant asked whether it was necessary to examine the other two defendants. The Court then enquired if they would corroborate the statement of the first defendant, and on the senior Pleader stating that they would, the Court remarked that it was not necessary to examine them. There is a general rule that the statement of the Judge trying a case as to what happened before him is conclusive on questions of fact. But this affidavit of the learned Pleader seems to suggest that there must have been some misunderstanding. It seems to me to be a rather remarkable state of things that a Pleader should ask the Court how he is to conduct the case, and if the Pleader adopts that line of conducting his case the matter is rather an unfortunate one for his client, because the blame for anything that subsequently happens cannot be thrown on the Court, though it might raise difficulties if the Court were led into expressing an opinion.

Another point that is taken is that the Court, having found that the first defendant was not a party to the bond, ought not to have given a decree against the other two defendants, and I am referred to the case of Gour Chandra Das v. Prasanna

(1) 33 C. 812 at p. 815; 10 C. W. N. 783; 3 C. L. J. 363.

Kumar Chandra (1). That case was cited before the learned Small Cause Court Judge, and with regard to it he remarked that there was no reason for dismissing the suit against all the defendants, because he was unable to find that there had been any fraudulent alteration of the bond after its execution. It is argued that it is not a question whether there is a fraudulent alteration or not, but whether there is an alteration at all. It is quite clear that what the learned Judge means is that he is not prepared to say that there has been any alteration, but that he is not satisfied that the thumb mark which purports to be that of the first defendant was in fact his. I have examined the thumb marks myself and I think the first defendant was distinctly fortunate in getting the judgment of the Court exonerating him from liability.

The Rule is discharged with costs, one gold mohur.

Rule discharged.

Madras Estates Land Act (I of 1908), ss. 3, 6—Ryots in occupation at date of Act under muchilika which expired previously—Negotiations for renewal of tenancy, effect of—Knowledge of ryots as to who is their landholder, whether necessary.

Ryots in actual possession of ryoti land on the date of the coming into force of the Madras Estates Land Act must be deemed to be ryots in possession to enable them to acquire occupancy rights within the meaning of section 6 of the Act, even though they held under a muchilika the term of which expired one month previously but negotiations were going on at the time for a renewal of the tenancy [p. 630, col. 1.]

The statutory status of a ryot conferred on all ryots in possession on st uly 1908 under the Madras Estates Land Act is not dependent on the question whether they knew who was entitled to the position of andholder in respect of their holdings. [p. 630, col 2.]

Appeal against the judgment and decree of the Court of the Temporary Subordinate Judge at Ellore, in Original Suit No. 33 of 1914 (transferred from the Sub-Court, Ellore, for disposal).

FACTS appear from the judgment.

Messrs. T. V. Venkatrama Aiyar and P. Nagabhusanam, for the Appellant.—The defendants cannot be deemed to have been in possession on 1st July 1908, the date of the passing of the Madras Estates Land Act. Their Muchilika lapsed earlier, on 1st June 1908, and they were bound to vacate on that date. They consequently ceased to be ryots on 1st July 1908, when the Act came into force. It is in evidence that the servants of the late Zemindar watched the estate. The Zemindar must be deemed to have resumed possession.

Even if defendants were in possession, they did not hold on condition of paying rent to the landholder, i.e., the plaintiff.

Mr. V. Ramadoss, for the Respondents.—The defendants were in actual possession on 1st July 1908 They did not quit on the expiry of their Muchilika and they were negotiating with the Court of Wards who were in management for a renewal of the tenancy. They had acquired the status of ryots on the day when the Estates Land Act came into force.

The defendants held on condition of paying rent to the late Zemindar and the fact that they were under a mistake as to who was the landholder after his death will not deprive them of their statutory status.

JUDGMENT.—The first question in this appeal is whether the defendants were ryots in possession of the suit land, which must be taken to be ryoti land, on the 1st July 1908 when the Madras Estates Land Act came into force, so that they acquired occupancy rights therein by virtue of section 6. They had held as ryots, that is to say, persons holding for the purpose of agriculture ryoti land in an estate on the condition of paying to the landholder the rent which is legally due [section 3 (15)] under a Muchilika, Exhibit C, which bound them to vacate on the 1st June 1908, and it is contended for the appellant that they had ceased to be ryots on 1st July 1908 when the Act came into force. Evidence was given that the estate was watched during that period by plaintiff's witnesses Nos. 9 and 11 who were servants of the late Zemindar, and it was argued that this showed a resumption of possession on behalf of the estate. The Subordinate Judge, in our opinion, has rightly disbelieved this evidence. At this time the Court of Wards was in management of the whole estate on behalf of the late Zemindar's minor son, including the suit lands which were subsequently handed over to the present plaintiff under the Will of the late Zemindar. From March (see Exhibit VI) negotiations had been going on with the Court of Wards for a renewal of the tenancy. It is not usual for ryots in the position of the defendants to go out of possession of their own accord at the termination of the tenancy even when it is a yearly one, and it is still more unlikely they should have done so when they were negotiating with the Court of Wards for a further term and the Court had no desire to evict them.

It is then argued that, even if they were in possession on July 1st, 1908, they were not in possession as ryots as defined in section 3 (15), because they were not holding "on condition of paying rent to the landholder." The landholder, it is contended, here means the true owner, the present plaintiff, and not the minor Zemindar on whose behalf the Court of Wards was managing the estate. We cannot agree with this contention. The defendants had been holding under Exhibit C on condition of paying rent to the late Zemindar who was the landholder, and they must be deemed to have continued after his death to hold with the same intention, even though they may have laboured under a mistake as to who was entitled to the position of landholder in succession to the late Zemindar. The Legislature cannot have intended to make the statutory status of a ryot which it conferred upon all ryots in possession on July 1st, 1908, dependent on the question whether they knew who was entitled to the position of landholder in respect of their holdings.

The appeal fails and is dismissed with costs, except as regards trees of the kinds reserved to the Zemindar in the previous Muchillika Exhibit C. Under section 12 the plaintiff is entitled to trees of these descriptions standing on the land on 1st July 1908. We remand the case to the lower Court with a direction to ascertain, by further evidence and by issuing a commission if necessary, the number, description and locations of the trees in question and to pass a supplemental decree giving the plaintiff possession of them, and providing for the costs of the further enquiry.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. II, r. 2, O. IX, r. 8—Suit for injunction prohibiting defendant from removing fodder and for value of fodder removed —Application for permission to withdraw suit—Suit dismissed for default—Subsequent suit for recovery of money advanced as well as for damages for breach of contract, whether barred.

Plaintiff sued for an injunction restraining defendant from cutting and removing fodder growing on his land in contravention of the terms of his lease. The defendant having pleaded that the deed of lease could not be sued upon as it was unregistered, the plaintiff applied for permission to withdraw the suit and having failed to appear on the date fixed for hearing of the application, the suit was dismissed under Order IX, rule 8, Civil Procedure Code He then got the deed of lease compulsorily registered and instituted the present suit for recovery of the money originally advanced by him to the defendant as well as damages for breach of contract:

SARBESWAR BEZ MADAK v. SURENDRABALA DASI.

Held, that Order II, rule 2, of the Civil Procedure Code was no bar to the suit.

Petition, under section 44 of Act VI of 1918, for revision of the decree of the Senior Subordinate Judge, 1st Class, Jhang, dated the 28th May 1919, reversing that of the Munsif, 2nd Class, Jhang, dated the 15th April 1919, decreeing the claim.

Lala Jagan Nath, for the Petitioner.

JUDGMENT.—Allah Ditta and Bawa Mani Singh entered into an arrangement whereby the former undertook to cultivate two kanals of his land for the latter and to give all the produce to him. In return Allah Ditta was paid Rs. 25 in advance and was to receive a further sum of Rs. 70 per annum for two years. This agreement was embodied in a deed of lease, dated 26th September 1917.

On 22nd December 1917 Mani Singh instituted a suit against Allah Ditta in which he alleged that he, Allah Ditta, in contravention of this lease, had commenced to cut and remove the fodder growing on this land and asked for an injunction prohibiting him from so doing, and also for a decree for Rs. 10, being the value of the fodder already cut and removed. Allah Ditta denied the claim and pleaded that the deed could not be sued upon as it was unregistered.

Mani Singh, without waiting for a decision, applied for permission to withdraw the suit. This application was made on 15th January 1918; it was fixed for 21st January 1918 on which date Mani Singh failed to appear and the suit was dismissed under Order IX, rule 8, Civil Procedure Code. Mani Singh obtained compulsory registration of the said deed of lease and on the 26th July 1918 instituted the present suit claiming Rs. 100. Of this sum Rs. 25 represented the original advance and Rs. 75 damages for breach of contract. The suit was based on the lease-deed, dated 26th September 1917.

The trial Court granted the plaintiff a decree, but on appeal the lower Appellate Court held that the suit was barred by Order II, rule 2, Civil Procedure Code, and dismissed Mani Singh's claim. He has moved this Court on the revision side through Lala Jagan Nath against this order of dismissal.

It seems to me that the facts are very similar to those in the case reported as Chalodom Tholan v. Kakkath Kunhambu (1).

The former suit was one for an injunction and value of fodder taken away. The present suit is one for a refund of the money advanced and damages for breach of contract. I am unable to see that Order II, rule 2, Civil Procedure Code, is a bar to the second suit, and I accordingly accept this petition and return the case to the lower Appellate Court for decision on the merits and other points raised. Costs in this Court will follow the event.

Case returned.

SARBESWAR BEZ MADAK v. SURENDRABALA DASI.

FACTS appear from the judgment.

Babu Manmatha Nath Roy, for the Appellants.- This appeal arises out of a suit for khas possession of homestead and bastu land. The plaintiffs sued defendants Nos. 3 and 4 for rent. The defendants denied the plaintiffs' title. Thereupon the plaintiffs did not proceed with the suit for rent which was, therefore, dismissed for default. The plaintiffs then brought a suit alleging that defendants Nos. 3 and 4 were their tenants and that they had forfeited their rights to the land by the denial of the landlords' title, and, therefore, the plaintiffs were entitled to khas possession. There is also a question as to whether the present case should be governed by the Bengal Tenancy Act or by the Transfer of Property Act. I submit that the defendants having denied the title of the plaintiffs in the previous rent suit, the plaintiffs are not entitled to khas possession. I refer your Lordship to section 111 (g) of the Transfer of Property Act. One must determine the lease before the suit for ejectment is brought. I refer your Lordship to Anandamoyee v. Lakhi Chandra Mitra (1). The case has been followed in Madras High Court. The case is precisely in point. Then arises the question whether the case should be governed by the Bengal Tenancy Act or by the Transfer of Property Act. The lower Appellate Court ought to have found that. The learned Munsif is of opinion that the case ought to be governed by the Transfer of Property Act. In the Bengal Tenancy Act there is no provision for forfeiture on denial of the landlord's title. If the tenancy is that of an occupancy raiyat, then the Bengal Tenanay Act applies. If the tenant is a non-occupancy raiyat, then section 44 of the Bengal Tenancy Act applies.

No question of estoppel arises here. The mere assertion that the plaintiff is not my landlord does not give rise to the question of estoppel. As regards the question of forfeiture, I refer your Lordship to two cases, one in Debiruddi v. Abdur Rahim (2) and the other in Mallika Dasi v. Makham Lal Chowdhury (3) The mere denial of the landlord's title will not cause forfeiture under the Bengal Tenancy Act. The cases in point are Nilmadhab Bose v. Ananta Ram Bagdi (4) and Fayi Dhali v. Aftabuddin Sirdar (5) The learned Munsif finds that Transfer of Property Act applies. But the lower Appellate Court does not come to a finding on that point, but merely says that there has been a forfeiture on denial of the landlord's title. He ought to have come to a definite finding The Bengal Tenancy Act does not contemplate a forfeiture of that kind. Besides the landlord must show that he wanted to determine the lease before the suit for ejectment was brought.

Babu Rupendra Kumar Mitra, for the Respondent.—So far as the Appeal No. 365 is concerned, I submit that the appeal must be dismissed. The lower Appellate Court conclusively finds that there has been a forfeiture. I submit that it comes under the Transfer of Property Act. The defendants are estopped from raising the question which they now raise under section 111, clause (g), of the Transfer of Property Act. It is very difficult to distinguish the cases cited by my learned friend. The very service of summons shows that the landlord wanted to determine the lease. I submit that the views taken in those cases are not correct. I contend that the filing of the suit is in itself an overt fact, although Anandamoyee v. Lakhi Chandra Mitra (1) does not support If your Lordship is against me on that point then I would ask for a remand. The defendants deny the relationship of landlord and tenant. Even if the Bengal Tenancy Act applies, it would be too late in the day to contend that the denial is not sufficient to cause forfeiture. I refer your Lordship to Foa's Landlord and Tenant, at pages 322 and 636 (4th Edition). Also to the case reported as Sergeant v. Nash Field & Co. (6). Having regard to the nature of the defence I submit that the defendants are estopped from raising that question now. Having taken up that defence they are now estopped from raising that point. In support of this I refer your Lordship to Chief Justice Garth's decision reported as Satyabhama Dassee v. Krishna Chunder Chatterjee 7) My learned friend's contention is that the landlord, not having done any overt act of determining the lease, cannot claim khas possession The point was not taken in the Courts below. It is now raised for the first time With regard to the third point, namely, whether the Bengal Tenancy Act or the Transfer of Property Act applies, my submission is that that is concluded by the findings of fact. The nature of the tenancy disposes of the question. Even if the Bengal Tenancy Act applies, the principles laid down in the case reported as Foyj Dhali v. Aftabuldin Sirdar (5) would apply in the present case.

Babu Manmatha Nath Roy, in reply.—My learned friend's contention that the decision in Anandamoyee v. Lakshi Chandra (1) is wrong cannot be supported. The plaintiff cannot sue for khas possession unless the tenancy is determined. The determination must take place before the suit is filed. No doubt there is denial but the determination of the tenancy is the cause of action. So I submit that the decision in Anandamoyee v. Lakshi Chandra (1) is good law. My learned friend contends that there was the service of summons. I submit that that was after the suit had been instituted. So it is of no assistance to him. As regards the case reported as Satyabhama Dasi v. Krishna Chander Chatterjee (7) I submit that that is not applicable here. That was a case of ejectment on notice to quit. In order to determine the tenancy mere denial is not sufficient.

The denial must be followed by some other act. The plaintiff on his own case is not entitled to khas possession unless the tenancy is determined.

JUDGMENT.

S. A. No. 2096 of 1919,

This appeal, preferred by defendants Nos. 3 and 4, arises out of a suit for declaration of title and for khas possession.

The plaintiffs hold a Jama in Mouza Khasmaram under defendant No. 5 and they sued defendant No. 3 for rent of the two parcels of land in dispute on the footing that they formed part of their Jama in Mouza Khasmaram. The defendant No. 3, Sarbeshwar Bez Madak denied the plaintiffs' title and pleaded that the lands were situated in another Mouza, Mouza Daulpur, and that they were held by his son Sarat under the defendants Nos. 1 and 2. The plaintiffs therenpon did not proceed with their rent suit and it was dismissed. Then they brought the present suit. Sarbeshwar and Sarat again put forward the plea which they had taken in the rent suit. The first Court found against them, holding that the two parcels of land are in Khasmaram and not in Daulpur, and that they do form part of the Jama held by the plaintiffs under defendant No. 5. The suit was accordingly decreed.

Sarbeshwar and Sarat then preferred an appeal, and the points pressed upon the learned Subordinate Judge were that the plaintiffs were only benamidars for their husbands and not entitled to maintain the suit, and that they had no title to the parcels of land. These points were again decided against the defendants, and the appeal was dismissed.

With all the facts found against them, the defendants in second appeal take a new line of argument, and urge that by their denial of the plaintiffs' title in the rent suit they did not incur forfeiture.

There was some discussion as to whether the case was to be regarded as governed by the Tenancy Act or by the Transfer of Property Act. On this point there are two answers. The first is that the Munsif's expression of opinion that the latter Act was applicable does not seem to have been challenged in the lower Court of Appeal. The second is that whichever Act is applicable, the defendants must first accept the position of lessees, before claiming the protection extended to lessees. The defendants chose to fight the case in both the lower Courts on the footing that the plaintiffs had no title whatever, and the findings are not merely that the plaintiffs have title, but further that the defendants, to bolster up a plea which they knew to be false, made use of a collusive kabuliyat, and of spurious collection papers, fabricated for the purpose of the suit. In these circumstances the principle laid down in the case of Satyabhama Dasi v. Krishna Chander Chatterjee (7) should be applied. It is true that that case was decided before the passing of the Transfer of Property Act, but the proviso to section 111 (g) does not affect the principle. Just as in that case, the defendants seek to change the whole nature of their defence at the last moment, and to set up in this Court a plea which they directly and fraudulently repudiated in the lower Courts.

On this ground I affirm the judgment of the learned Subordinate Judge and dismiss the appeal with costs.

This judgment governs Second Appeal No. 365 of 1919 also.

Where in a suit for a declaration that the defendant had by fraud obtained a fictitious sale-deed and had paid no portion of the consideration, it was found that no fraud had been exercised in obtaining the sale deed which was a genuine transaction, but that no portion of the consideration had been paid:

Held, that the form which the decree should take was that the plaintiff was entitled on payment of the necessary Court-fees to a decree for the total amount of the consideration from the defendant. [p. 634, col. 2.]

Appeal against the order of the Sub-Judge, Sultanpore, dated the 16th February 1919, reversing that of the Munsif, Sultanpore, dated the 2nd September 1918.

Mr. S. N. Roy, for the Appellant.

Mr. Har Dhian Chandra, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The plaintiff came into Court alleging that the defendant had by fraud obtained a fictitious sale deed of a house and an Ekka and a mare for a sum of Rs. 5'0, that the defendant had taken away the Ekka and the mare and had paid no portion of the consideration to her. She sued for a declaration that the sale-deed was fictitious and without consideration and did not convey any right to the defendant, and she also asked for possession of the Ekka and the mare or of their price, which she fixed at Rs. 95. She further prayed for any other relief which might be equitably granted to her on the merits of the case.

The learned Munsif found that the sale-deed had been obtained by fraud and that it was without consideration. He gave a declaration to the effect that the sale-deed was void and the defendant had acquired no right thereunder and he directed the defendant to return the Ekka and the mare to the plaintiff.

In appeal the learned Subordinate Judge found that no fraud had been exercised in obtaining the sale-deed, that the sale was a genuine transaction but that no portion of the consideration had been paid to the plaintiff. He found that the defendant had paid, as in the absence of a contract to the contrary he was bound to pay, the costs of execution of the sale-deed. He gave the plaintiff a declaration that the sale-deed was without consideration to the extent of Rs. 405 and he also gave the plaintiff a money decree for Rs. 95 on account of the price of Ekka and the mare.

The defendant comes to this Court in second appeal and the only question is as to what form the decree should take. The findings of the lower Appellate Court of the facts must be accepted. These are that the sale deed was a genuine transaction but that no portion of the consideration has yet been paid to the plaintiff. On these findings it is quite clear that the plaintiff was entitled on payment of the necessary Court-fees to a decree for the total amount of the consideration from the defendant. She asked for any such relief as the Court thought equitable, and this is clearly the suitable relief that should be granted to her. The appellant appears to have filed the appeal under a mistaken belief that the lower Appellate Court had found that a portion of the consideration had actually been paid.

The appeal is dismissed. The decree of the lower Appellate Court will be modified as follows. The plaintiff, on paying in the necessary additional Court-fee on or before the 1st December, will be given a decree against the defendant for the total amount of the consideration, that is

Rs. 500, and she will also get her costs in all Courts from the defendant-appellant. If she fails to pay in the additional Court-fee within the time fixed, her claim for a declaration with regard to a portion of the consideration will stand dismissed with costs in all Courts but the money decree against the defendant-appellant for Rs. 95 granted to her by the lower Appellate Court will stand. In the event of her failure to pay the additional Court-fee costs of the parties in all Courts will be in proportion to their failure and success.

Appeal dismissed.

Appeal against the decree of the Additional District Judge, Akola, in Civil Appeal No. 104 of 1917, decided on the 23rd February 1918.

Dr. H. S. Gour, for the Appellants.

Mr. G. V. Kukday, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The plaintiff gives the following genealogical tree to show how the two principal defendants are related:

The family owned survey Nos. 15, 21, 14 and a 4-annas share in survey No. 3 of Mauza Mhasla Buzrak in 1871 as ancestral property. Muktaji separated taking a third of the lands but continued to cultivate jointly, and his share went to Maruti and Rama. Maruti and Rama owned survey No. 7 of the village.

Plaintiff's story has been changed several times. He alleges there was a partition 3 years ago when defendant No. 5 took the pot Nos. 1 and 3. Dagdoo by a sale-deed dated 24th October 1913, Exhibit P-5, sold the plaintiff his half share in survey Nos. 15, 21, 3, 7 and 14 for Rs. 2,000 and plaintiff claimed a joint half in survey Nos. 15, 21, 7, 14 and pot Nos. 2, 4 and 6 in survey No. 3.

Dagdoo admitted the sale, stating that Rakhmaji defendant No. 2 and himself had always been joint. His father died when he was a minor and Rama and Rakhmaji brought him up. In 1913 he claimed his half share, whereupon defendant No. 2 turned him out and he then sold to the plaintiff his half share.

Rakhmaji admitted the correctness of the genealogy as regards Dagdoo's ancestors up to Parwata and his own ancestors as far as Laxman and Parwata were distant bhaubands and not joint. He denied that Dagdoo was ever joint with himself or his father. Rama and Muktaji were divided. They owned survey Nos. 14, 7, 2-3rds in Nos. 15 and 21 and pot Nos. 2, 4 and 6 in survey No. 3, pot Nos. 1 and 3 in that field belonged to the 5th defendant and pot No. 5 to the 6th defendant. He denies any partition three years ago. As Muktaji died without heirs, Rama his brother got his share in the lands. In survey Nos. 15 and 21 defendant Dagdoo's father owned a joint 1-3rd share and during Dagdoo's minority that was sold to Rama by his mother by a sale-deed of the 15th August 1883, Exhibit D 2 1, for Rs. 49 and since then defendant No. 2 and his father has been in possession of these two full numbers Defendant No. 2 sold survey No. 14 to Ramasa, the 4th defendant, on 27th November 1892 and since then Ramasa has been in possession and now he has sold it to defendant No. 3 on 10th December 1912. He denies the alleged sale to the plaintiff.

Defendants Nos. 3 and 4 support the story of defendant No. 2 as regards the survey No. 14 and plead that if plaintiff vendor had any title in this field, it has been lost by adverse possession for more than 12 years.

Defendants Nos. 5 and 6 have been given up by the plaintiff and the sale to Rama by Dagdoo's mother was denied as was the sale by Rakhmaji to defendant No. 4 Ramasa.

The case went to trial on the following issues:—

(i) Whether the defendant No. 1 has sold half the shares in survey Nos. 15, 21, 3, 7 and 14 of Mauza Mhalsa to plaintiff, for consideration, by sale-deed dated the 24th October 1913?

(ii) How are the defendants Nos. 1 and 2 related to each other?

(iii) Whether they have been joint upto now and

(a) Whether the fields in suit are their ancestral property?

(b) What shares have each of the defendants Nos. 1 and 2 got in the field?

(iv) Whether Musammat Gangabai sold defendant No. 1's shares in survey Nos. 15 and 21 by sale-deed dated 15th August 1883 as alleged by defendant No. 2?

(v) Whether on 27th November 1892 the defendant No. 2 Rakhmaji sold survey No. 14 to Ramasa defendant No. 4 and put him in possession?

(vi) Whether the defendant No. 4 has become entitled to the field by statutory possession for more than 12 years before plaintiff's suit?

(vii) To what relief is plaintiff entitled and against which defendants?

The findings of the first Court may be summarised thus:—

(a) The relationship between defendants Nos. 1 and 2 has not been established.

(b) Defendant No. 2 sold survey No 14 to Ramasa and since then the latter has been in possession for more than 12 years before plaintiff's suit and is entitled to it by adverse possession.

(c) The sale-deed by which the 1-3rd share in survey Nos. 15 and 21 is said to have been conveyed to Rama on 15th August 1883 was held to be a forgery. Defendant No. 2 had foolishly entered therein the assessment of the present revenue survey and settlement in place of that fixed for the year in which the document is alleged to have been executed.

(d) That plaintiff has failed to prove that defendants Nos. 1 and 2 were joint or jointly owned the fields in suit, except 1-3rd in survey Nos. 15 and 21 of which the sale-deed has been found to be forged.

(e) That though the sale-deed to the plaintiff has been executed yet no consideration passed and that plaintiff had purchased a legal speculation.

A decree was passed giving plaintiff possession of a joint 1 3rd share in survey Nos. 21 and 15 and the rest of the claim was dismissed.

On appeal made by the defendant No. 2 in which plaintiff filed cross-objections, the finding that no consideration passed for the plaintiff's sale-deed dated 24th October 1913 was confirmed. It was held that plaintiff had purchased merely a right to sue and the deed was not an assignment of the property. The finding that plaintiff had failed to prove the relationship between defendants Nos. 1 and 2 was confirmed. The claim to survey No. 14 was held long time-barred. The appeal was allowed, and the cross objections dismissed. The result was that the suit was wholly dismissed.

I may mention that the 2nd defendant and the scribe of the alleged sale-deed of 1883 have been criminally prosecuted and sentenced to imprisonment, the document having been found to be a forged document.

It is here contended that the plaintiff's purchase being admitted and supported by the vendor it was not open to the lower Appellate Court to question its bona fides and consideration, or to hold the suit not maintainable on the ground that all that the plaintiff purchased was a mere right to sue. I think there is force in this contention. It is unlawful to purchase an interest in property merely for the purpose of litigation necessary for realising that interest: see Deorao v. Sadasheo (1). It was held in Fischer v. Kamala Naicker (2) that a contract in order to be invalid "must be something against good policy and justice, something tending to promote unnecessary litigation, something that in a legal sense is immoral and to the constitution which a bad motive in the same sense is necessary." There is no law in India similar in its effect to the English La of Champerty and Maintenance, and it seems to me that as the seller in the present case does not repudiate the contract defendant No. 2 could not do so; nor do I think that a mere right to sue was purchased, or that the transaction necessarily led to unnecessary litigation. For defendant No. 1's contentions are that when he claimed the share in the property defendant No. 2 turned him out and it was open for the defendant No. 1 to sue for his rights. By a sale transferring his rights plaintiff sued instead of him.

It seems clear that as the 2nd defendant denied Dagdoo's title the latter sold it to the plaintiff. I agree with the Courts below that the purchase was purely speculative and that the consideration mentioned in the deed of sale has not passed, but this by itself would not invalidate the sale. There is probably some secret understanding between plaintiff and his vendor as to what the latter should get in case the former succeeds in this suit. Having bought with very little idea as to the past history of the land plaintiff has endeavoured not in the cleanest way to prove Dagdoo's ownership. The finding that plaintiff has failed to establish the relationship between Dagdoo and Rukhmaji is one of fact binding on this Court and the whole story of a common ancestor, joint possession on the ground of relationship and an alleged partition, therefore, goes. It is not pleaded nor argued that minority saves limitation. The suit as regards survey No. 14 is clearly time-barred. Rukhmaji has put up a false defence as regards survey Nos. 15 and 21, but that fact does not prove that the claim is within limitation. It is argued that the right of Dagdoo to these fields once being admitted, it lay on Rukhmaji to establish how this land was his, but before that it was incumbent on the appellant to establish his vendor's possession within 12 years of the suit. I have read the evidence and am of opinion that the appellant has failed to prove the subsisting title of his vendor at the time of sale. The lower Appellate Court's finding in this respect is correct. Dagdoo may have had a share in survey Nos. 15 and 21 once, but it is obvious that Rukhmaji has been holding against him for more than 12 years prior to plaintiff's purchase in 1913. Plaintiff bought to fight Dagdoo's battles, and the changes in the pleadings point to a very imperfect conception of facts relating to past ownership and past possession There is nothing to vitiate the findings of fact come to by the lower Appellate Court, findings upon which the decision in the case turns, and they are conclusive. The suit has been rightly decided and this appeal fails and is dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Transfer of Property Act (IV of 1882), s. 74—Mortgages, prior and subsequent—Subsequent mortgagee redeeming prior mortgage—Subrogation—Lease—Lessor, interest of, vesting in lessee, effect of.

A mortgaged his share in a village to X, who took possession of it. A then executed a perpetual lease of certain plots in favour of B. Subsequently A mortgaged the same share to C, who redeemed it from X and obtained possession. B, in execution of a decree which he held against A, attached, brought to sale and himself purchased all the interest of A in the mortgaged property, that is to say, the right to redeem C's mortgages. B then brought a suit for possession of the plots transferred to him by the perpetual lease:

Held, (1) that there was subrogation, that C had acquired all the rights and powers of the prior mortgagee and that the provisions of section 74 of the Transfer of Property Act applied to the case; [p. 638, col. 2.]

(2) that as B had acquired all the rights and interests of his lessor, his lease could not have effect. [p. 639, col. 1.]

Appeal against the decree of the Subordinate Judge, Sultanpur, dated the 19th October 1918, reversing that of the Munsif, Sultanpur, dated the 25th June 1918.

Mr. A. P. Sen, for the Appellants.

Mr. Gopal Sahai holding brief of Mr. Basdeo Lal, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—On 14th October 1889 Gajadhar Bakhsh Singh mortgaged a four annas share in Pura Ram Gulam, a hamlet of village Bisarapurab, in favour of Nageshar Bakhsh Singh. On 13th June 1891 he mortgaged another four annas share in the same hamlet to Nageshar Bakhsh Singh. About 1896 Nageshar Bakhsh Singh obtained possession of the whole of the property mortgaged under the terms of the mortgages.

On 25th August 1908 Gajadhar Baksh Singh made a perpetual lease of certain plots in favour of Raghu Ram. Raghu Ram could not enter into possession of he property leased as Nageshar Bakhsh Singh was in possession under the terms of the mortgage. On the 23rd and 24th September 1909 Gajadhar Bakhsh Singh executed two subsequent mortgages, by the first of which six annas and by the second of which two annas of the eight annas previously mortgaged were mortgaged with possession to Jagmohan Singh and others. In 1911 Jagmohan Singh and others redeemed the mortgages held by Nageshar Bakhsh Singh and obtained possession of the mortgaged property. Raghu Ram had a simple money decree against Gajadhar Bakhsh Singh. In execution of that decree he attached, brought to sale, and himself purchased in 1915 all the interests of Gajadhar Bakhsh Singh in the mortgaged property, that is to say, the right to redeem the mortgages of the 23rd and 24th September 1909, for Gajadhar Bakhsh Singh had no other interest in the property. How does the case then stand? Jagmohan Singh and others are mortgagees in possession of the eight annas. Raghu Ram owns the right of equity of redemption. Raghu Ram has a perpetual lease which was executed in his favour in 1903 by a person who lost all interest in the property leased in 1915 and whose interests Raghu Ram acquired in 1915. Now Raghu Ram has instituted a suit for possession of the plots transferred by the perpetual lease. The trial Judge dismissed the suit. The learned Subordinate Judge has decreed it. Jagmohan and others come here in second appeal.

I would say at the beginning that I greatly appreciate the careful way in which the learned Subordinate Judge has decided this appeal. He took a great deal of trouble over it and his reasoning is quite intelligible and interesting. I wish particularly to mention this, as I regret I do not find myself able to agree with him. He found that there was no subrogation. I cannot see it possible to hold otherwise than that there was subrogation and that the provisions of section 74 of Act IV of 1882 have effect. Jagmohan Singh and others were subsequent mortgagees. They tendered the amount necessary to the prior mortgagee and they acquired all his rights and powers. To hold that they had no desire to obtain his rights and powers is impossible. It would have been palpably against their interests not to obtain those rights and powers. There was no object in their not retaining those rights and powers and legally they must be considered to have had the intention to do so. Apart from that fact since Raghu Ram has acquired all the rights and interests of his lessor, I fail to understand how his lease can have any effect. In these circumstances I accept the view taken by the learned trial Judge and allow this appeal.

The result is that the plaintiff-respondent's suit will be dismissed. Raghu Ram will pay his own costs and those of the appellants in all Courts.

Suit dismissed.

Bengal Land Revenue Sales Act (XI of 1859), s. 31—Assignee of recorded proprietor, whether representative—Title of unrecorded proprietor, suit for declaration of—Limitation, commencement of.

Under section 31 of the Bengal Land Revenue Sales Act an assignee of the recorded proprietors of an estate is not their representative, so that the Collector is justified in refusing to pay to such assignee claiming on his own behalf the money held in deposit on account of the recorded proprietors as the surplus sale-proceeds of their estate under the Bengal Land Revenue Sales Act. But the Legislature did not contemplate that the title of unrecorded proprietors should be lost by the sale to the extent that they should not be entitled to receive the surplus sale-proceeds, even if they could establish in the Civil Court, as against the recorded proprietors, that they were entitled to the estate at the time of the revenue sale. [p. 640, cols. 1 & 2.]

Where after an application by an assignee of an estate sold under the Bengal Land Revenue Sales Act to withdraw the surplus sale-proceeds had been refused by the Collector under section 31 of the Act, the assignee instituted a suit for a declaration of his title to the surplus sale-proceeds:

Held, (1) that in such a suit no question of limitation could arise; [p. 640, col. 2.]

(2) that if Article 120 of Schedule I to the Limitation Act was held applicable to such a suit, time would begin to run against the plaintiff from the date when the right to sue accrued and that the right to sue would not accrue till the right to obtain relief by way of declaration had been denied. Appeal against the decree of the Subordinate Judge, 2nd Court, 24-Pergannas, dated the 13th October 1917.

Babu Paresh Nath Mukherjee, for the Appellants.

Babus Abinash Chandra Ghose, Dwijendra Nath Mukherjee and Kshitish Chandra Chakraburtty, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This is an appeal by the plaintiffs in a suit for declaration of title to the surplus sale-proceeds of a sale held under the Revenue Sale Law, 1859. The case for the plaintiffs is that holding No. 130, Division 1, Sub-Division 17, within the jurisdiction of the Collector of 24-Pergannas, was sold for arrears of revenue on the 16th March 1903 for Rs. 11,100 and that after satisfaction of the dues of the Government, Rs. 11,050 approximately is in deposit in the Collectorate. The exact sum, as appears from the written statement of the Secretary of State who was originally made a respondent, is Rs. 11,085-7-6. At the time of the sale, the registered proprietors were members of the Paikpara Raj family of Singhs, Girish Chandra, Purna Chandra, Kanti Chandra, Indra Chandra and Sarat Chandra. The plaintiffs assert that although the Singhs were registered proprietors, they had no subsisting interest in the holding on the date of default or of sale. The allegation is that the property had vested in the Seals and on a partition amongst the members of the Seal family, effected many years ago, had passed into the hands of Govinlal Seal. The plaintiffs, the representatives-in-interest of Govinalal Seal, applied to the Collector to withdraw the balance of the sale-proceeds, but the application was refused on the 19th October 1909. They accordingly instituted this suit on the 5th September 1916 for declaration of their title to the property at the time of the sale and consequent thereto, their title to the surplus sale-proceeds. The plaintiffs claimed an eight-ninth share in the holding, the remaining 1/9th share, it is said, belongs to the 11th defendant who did not join as plaintiff They also joined as defendants the representatives of the Paikpara Raj family, as also the representatives of the Seal family other than the heirs of Govinlal Seal. The Secretary of State for India was also joined as a defendant. But, subsequently, on the 16th October 1917, the plaintiffs prayed that the name of the Secretary of State for India might be removed from the category of defendants. The suit was tried on the merits and was dismissed as barred by limitation under Article 120 of the First Schedule to the Indian Limitation Act. The present appeal has been preferred by some of the plaintiffs who claim 7-9ths share in the estate and in the money in deposit. The 11th defendant who claims an 1/9th share and the 7th plaintiff who claims an equal share are respondents. The representatives of the Seals and the Singhs have also appeared before us. In our opinion, the suit should not have been dismissed.

There can be no question that the Collector properly refused to pay the surplus sale-proceeds to the plaintiffs and his order of the 19th October 1909 is based upon a correct interpretation of section 31 of Act XI of 1859. It was pointed out by this Court in the case of Secretary of State for India v. Marjum Hosein Khan (1) that under section 31 an assignee of the recorded proprietors is not their representative, so that the Collector is justified in refusing to pay to such assignee, claiming on his own behalf, the money held in deposit on account of the recorded proprietors, Mr. Justice Pigot pointed out that the section does not contemplate payment to an assignee who claims to receive the money on his own behalf. It does not cast on the Collector the duty of giving effect to, and, as a preliminary, of verifying of, such assignments. But although the order of the Collector was right, it does not follow that the plaintiffs are not entitled to the declaration which they seek. The Legislature did not contemplate that the title of unrecorded proprietors should be lost by the sale to the extent that they would not be entitled to receive the surplus sale proceeds, even if they could establish in the Civil Court, as against the recorded proprietors, that they were entitled to the estate at the time of the sale. In the case before us, neither the Singhs who are the representatives of the last recorded proprietors nor the Seals who admitted that on a partition the property passed to one member of the family, put forward any claim to the surplus sale-proceeds. Consequently the surplus sale-proceeds belong to the plaintiffs and the 11th defendant. This is established by the uncontradicted testimony of the witnesses who have been examined in the case. In these circumstances, the proper decree to make is to declare that the plaintiffs were entitled to 8-9ths share and the 11th defendant to 1/9th share in the estate at the time of the sale and are consequently entitled to the surplus sale-proceeds in the same proportion. The plaintiffs and the 11th defendant will be at liberty to apply to the Collector on the basis of this decree. If the Collector refuses to pay the surplus sale-proceeds, the plaintiffs and the 11th defendant may have their remedy, but it is not for us to advise them what course they should pursue if such a contingency should arise. It is sufficient to hold that, in so far as the present litigation is concerned, no question of limitation arises. If Article 120 is held applicable, time should run against the plaintiffs from the date when the right to sue accrued. The right to sue does not accrue till the right to obtain relief by way of declaration has been denied. Events show that there has not been a dispute amongst the parties entitled to the money antecedent to the suit and during the course of the litigation, the parties appear to have agreed that they were entitled to the estate and the money value thereof in the shares already set out.

The result is that this appeal is allowed, the decree of the Subordinate Judge set aside and a decree made in this Court in the terms indicated above. There will be no order for costs in this Court. The order of the Court below as to costs will stand.

Appeal allowed.

Oudh Sub-settlement Act (XXVI of 1866)—Sub-settlement, refusal to grant, effect of, on under-proprietary right—Settlement decree for dasaundh rights as birt-holder, effect of—Possession, continuous, whether confers under-proprietary rights—Adverse possession.

A sub-settlement can be granted under the Oudh Sub-settlement Act only in certain circumstances specified in that Act, and the refusal to grant such a sub-settlement, not accompanied by an adverse finding as to an under-proprietary right, does not necessarily destroy such under-proprietary right as the claimant might otherwise have possessed. [p. 642, col. 2.]

At the first Regular Settlement the claim of the defendant's ancestors for a sub-settlement of a village of which the plaintiff was superior proprietor was dismissed, but they were held to be birt-holders entitled to the dasaundh right and a decree for dasaundh right was passed in their favour on the 30th April 1872. The defendant and his predecessors, however, continued in undisturbed possession after that decree. The plaintiff sought to eject the defendant through the Revenue Courts, but was unsuccessful. He then brought the present suit for a declaration that the defendant was a tenant-at-will and had no proprietary or under-proprietary rights in the lands in dispute:

Held, that the suit must fail, that the defendant was a birtdar or under-proprietor, and that, even if the settlement decree did not confer any under-proprietary rights in the disputed land, the under-proprietary right claimed by the defendant was perfected by adverse possession. [p. 642, col. 1.]

Appeal against the decree of the District Judge, Gonda, dated the 11th January 1918, upholding that of the Sub-Judge, Gonda, dated the 17th November 1917.

Mr. Aditya Prasad, for the Appellant.

Mr. Basudeo Lal, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The dispute in this case relates to 16·42 acres of land situated in the village Khamaria. The plaintiff is the superior proprietor of the village. At the first Regular Settlement Ram Autar and some of his paternal kinsmen claimed a sub-settlement of the said village. On the 30th April 1872, their claim for the sub-settlement was dismissed, but they were held to be birt-holders entitled to the dasaundh right and a decree for the dasaundh right was passed in their favour (Exhibit B 5). The then superior proprietor of the village appealed, but his appeal was dismissed on the 6th July 1872. The Appellate Court in dismissing the appeal observed that from the proceedings and the respondents' papers not only the fact of the birt tenure but also actual possession on the part of the respondents was clearly established and that the appellant ought to congratulate himself that the respondents were satisfied with what the lower Court had given them (Exhibit B·1). In pursuance of the above decree Ram Autar and the other decree-holders were entered in register No 5 as holding dasaundh right in the village as birtdars (dasaundh bahaq birt) (Exhibit B 6). Ram Autar was succeeded by his widow, Musammat Raj Kumari, who died during the pendency of the suit and is now represented by Ram Nath, the brother of Ram Autar. From the time of the first Regular Settlement Ram Autar and after his death his widow have been in continuous possession of the disputed land, and the question for determination in this appeal is whether they held possession as under-proprietors or otherwise. The allegation of the plaintiff is that Ram Autar and his widow held the disputed land as tenants-at-will. The plaintiff sought to eject Musammat Raj Kumari through the Revenue Court by issuing a notice of ejectment under section 55 of the Oudh Rent Act XXII of 1886, but was unsuccessful. He claims in this suit a declaration that Musammat Raj Kumari was a tenant-at-will and had no proprietary or under-proprietary right in the disputed land. The Courts below found against him. They held that she was a birtdar or under-proprietor and that even if the settlement decree did not confer on her any under-proprietary right in the disputed land, the under proprietary right claimed by her was perfected by adverse possession from more than twelve years.

As observed in Mata Prasad v. Raja Muhammad Abul Hasan Khan (1), a sub-settlement can be granted under Act XXVI of 1866 only in certain circumstances specified in that Act and the refusal to grant such a sub settlement, not accompained by an adverse finding as to an under-proprietary right, does not necessarily destroy such under-preprietary right as the claimants might otherwise have possessed. The finding of the Settlement Court in the suit brought by Ram Autar was that he was birtdar. He was not granted a sub-settlement because he had not acquired the status referred to in sections 3 and 8 of Act XXVI of 1866. His birt right, however, remained unaffected, for by virtue of that birt right he was declared entitled to the dasaundh right decreed to him.

Whether that dasaundh right carried a right to possession of the land as birtdar is not clear from the judgment of the Settlement Officer. The birt patra then filed shows that the birt right had been granted to an ancestor of Ram Autar in consideration of his having paid Rs. 784 to the then superior proprietor. The judgment of the Appellate Court declares that the possession of Ram Autar had been established. That possession has remained undisturbed, since and if the settlement decree did not sanction or confirm it, the continuance of that possession so long gave Ram Autar and his successor an adverse title which it is now too late for the plaintiff to challenge. It is not suggested that any lease was granted to Ram Autar after the settlement decree. The finding that he was a birtdar finally adjudged his status. His possession since then can either be attributed to that status or was an act of trespass.

The allegation that Musammat Raj Kumari held as a tenant-at-will has not been established. In fact at the last Settlement an application was made by her for the determination of rent in respect of the land held by her, but the superior proprietor said that he did not want such a determination and the application was struck off (Exhibit B.2). There is no reason, therefore, for interfering with the decision at which the Courts below have arrived.

The appeal fails and is dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

CIVIL REVISION No. 550 OF 1919.

February 13, 1920.

Present:—Mr. Justice Beachcroft.

MANMATHA NATH CHATTERJEE —PRINCIPAL DEFENDANT—PETITIONER

versus

KSHETRA NATH CHATTERJEE —PLAINTIFF AND OTHERS—Pro forma DEFENDANTS—OPPOSITE PARTIES.

Small Cause suit tried under regular procedure—Court invested with Small Cause Court jurisdiction—Appeal, whether lies.

Where a Court invested with Small Cause Court jurisdiction tries, under the regular procedure, a suit which should be tried as a Small Cause Court suit the decree made in the suit is not appealable: [p. 643, col. 1.]

Rule against the order of the Sub-Judge, 1st Court, 24-Pargannas.

FACTS appear from the judgment.

Babu Dwijendranath Mukerjee, for the Petitioner —No appeal can lie to the District Judge. The appeal was clearly without jurisdiction. The learned Munsif says that this suit should not have been registered as a title suit.

Babu Satindra Nath Mookerji, for the Opposite Party.—If it is a money suit liable by Munsif, it will have one appeal.

[Babu Dwijendra Nath Mukerjee —The learned Munsif had powers of a Small Cause Court Judge.]

The suit was instituted as a title suit. A suit was brought by the plaintiff and the defendant against the tenant for ejecting him and taking khas possession—and that suit was compromised in a solenama. The plaintiff's case is that the defendant not having paid his share of the money due to him, he prayed for a declaration of title to the said share. The suit was numbered as a title suit. The written statement does not say a word as to the jurisdiction of that Court.

[BEACHCROFT, J.—That may be a ground for not granting costs. The question of title did not arise. It is a Small Cause Court suit.]

The defendant did not take that objection. My remedy is now past, three years being over. Refers to Dyebukee Nundun Sen v. Mudhoo Mutty Goopta (1). Both the appeals in the lower Appellate Court and in the High Court are competent.

(1) 1 C. 123; 24 W. R. 478.

VARNASI SUBBAYYA v. VARNASI SOMALINGAM.

[BEACHCROFT, J.—See Indra Chandra Mukherjee v. Srish Chandra Banerjee (2).]

I do not dispute the principle therein. I object to the conduct of the petitioner.

[BEACHCROFT, J.—Had the Subordinate Judge jurisdiction to entertain the appeal?]

I submit he had, as no objection was raised. In Indra Chandra Mukherjee v. Srish Chandra Banerjee (2) objection was taken in the lower Appellate Court.

The Vakil for the petitioner was not called upon to reply.

JUDGMENT.—This Rule was issued at the instance of the defendant, calling upon the opposite party to show cause why the judgment and decree made by the Appellate Court should not be set aside as made without jurisdiction.

The suit was one to recover a sum of Rs. 25-1 anna alleged to be due to the plaintiff as his share in money decreed to the plaintiff and defendant jointly, the plaintiff alleging that the defendant had realized the money and not paid him his share. The defence was that the money had been paid. The Munsif tried the suit under the regular procedure and dismissed it with costs.

It is quite clear on the facts that this ought to have been tried as a Small Cause Court suit. The Munsif who tried the case was invested with Small Cause Court powers.

However, the matter went on appeal. Nobody apparently noticed in the Appellate Court that the case ought to have been tried as a Small Cause Court suit and the Subordinate Judge reversed the Munsif's decision. Consequently the defendant has obtained this Rule. That the suit was triable as a Small Cause Court suit is not contested. But what is urged on behalf of the opposite party is that no objection to the form of the suit or to the competency of the appeal was taken in the lower Courts and that by the defendant's negligence the plaintiff has been deprived of any remedy which he might have had. I asked the learned Pleader for the opposite party to put forward before me any facts which would justify interference with the order of the Munsif on the footing that he had dealt with the matter as a Small Cause Court suit and that I am perfectly prepared to consider those facts in dealing with the present application. No such facts, however, have been put before me beyond the negligence of the plaintiff in describing his suit as a title suit and raising no objection in the Appellate Court. The case of Indra Chandra Mukherjee v. Srish Chandra Banerjee (2) is an authority for the proposition that the decree of the Munsif was not appealable to the lower Appellate Court.

That being so, the order made on appeal must be set aside and the Munsif's order will be restored. But as regards costs in the lower Appellate Court and in this Court each party will bear his own.

Order set aside.

VARNASI SUBBAYYA AND OTHERS—DEFENDANTS NOS. 1 TO 5—APPELLANTS

VARNASI SOMALINGAM AND OTHERS—PLAINTIFFS AND DEFENDANTS NOS. 6 TO 8—RESPONDENTS.

Specific Relief Act (I of 1877), s. 55—Co-owners—Common lane, obstruction to, by co-owner—Injunction, mandatory, when to be granted.

Where a lane is the common property of two persons and one of them puts an obstruction on it which has the effect of making it less convenient for the other co-owner, the only remedy open to that other is to sue for a mandatory injunction for restoration of the lane to its original condition. [p. 645, col. 1.]

Second appeal against the decree of the Court of the Temporary Subordinate Judge, Masulipatam, in Appeal Suit No. 107 of 1918 (Appeal Suit No. 17 of 1918 on the file of the District Court), preferred against the decree of the District Munsif, Gudivada, in Original Suit No. 33 of 1914.

FACTS.—Two persons owned a lane in common, 10 feet in width. The defendant built a pial on his side of the lane which abutted about a foot into the lane. The plaintiff sued for a mandatory injunction. The defence was that no injury has been proved and that there was acquiescense as the pial had been in existence for nearly five years when the suit was brought. The lower Court reversed the 1st Court's decree and granted the injunction. The defendant appealed.

VARNASI SUBBAYYA v. VARNASI SOMALINGAM.

Mr. P. Markandeyulu, for the Appellants.—There is no scope for a mandatory injunction as between co owners, unless substantial injury is proved. Ananda Chandra Sen v. Parbati Nath Sen (1), following various English decisions. The principle has been accepted in Kalliani Amma v. Govinda Menon (2), though held inapplicable to a Malabar Tarwad as the members are not co-owners.

Further delay is always a reason why a mandatory injunction ought not to be issued. 13 Ch. D. and 11 Ch. D.

The remedy is one in equity only and can be granted only in the absence of other remedies.

The obstruction has been in existence without question for nearly five years, and hence acquiescence can be implied.

Mr. T. Ramachandra Rao, for the Respondents.—It has been held by the Full Bench that special damages need not be proved in the case of obstruction to ways used by the public. Valan Pakkiri Taragan v. Subbayan Samban (3). The principle applies to the present case. The District Munsif found that the pial was a public nuisance.

Exclusive user of common land by a co-owner has been held to amount to ouster justifying the grant of an injunction. Shadi v. Anup Singh (4).

JUDGMENT.—The facts are not in dispute. The plaintiffs and the defendants are joint owners of a lane. The lane is 10 feet in breadth. The defendants, on that portion of it which adjoins their house, have put up two pials and steps, thereby encroaching upon the common lane to the extent of one foot in breadth. The plaintiffs brought the suit for a mandatory injunction for the removal of these obstructions. The District Munsif dismissed the suit on the ground that the lane was a public one and that the plaintiffs have no right of action. The Subordinate Judge has held that the lane is the common private property of the plaintiffs and defendants and has given a decree for demolishing the steps and pials. The learned Vakil for the appellants argued that on these facts the plaintiffs are not entitled to a mandatory injunction. He strongly relies upon the observation of Mookerjee, J., in Ananda Chandra Sen v. Parbati Nath Sen (1), where the learned Judge points out that, in cases where property is owned by two persons in common, the mere fact that a building is erected by one of the co-owners in violation of the other person's right would not enable the other owner to bring a suit for demolishing the building so erected. This follows a judgment of the Judicial Committee in Robert Watson and Company v. Ramchund Dutt (5) and a number of English decisions upon the point. In this Court it was quoted with approval in Kalliani Amma v. Govinda Menon (2), where the question was whether a building erected on a Tarwad property by one of the members should be demolished at the instance of the other members. The learned Judges of this Court point out that there was a distinction between Ananda Chandra Sen v. Parbati Nath Sen (1) and the case before them, inasmuch as the property in the Madras case would be required for the purpose of extending the Tarwad buildings for the use of the members of the Tarwad. We think that the decision in Kalliani Amma v. Govinda Menon (2) and that in Great Indian Peninsula Railway Company v. Nowroji Pestonji (6) apply to this case and not Ananda Chandra Sen v. Parbati Nath Sen (1). In Great Indian Peninsula Railway Company v. Nowroji Pestonji (6) the suit was for re-opening a gateway over which there was a public right of way, and it was held that the plaintiff was entitled to sue for the removal of the obstruction. The principle, so far as we are able to see, is that, if it is common property and if there are other remedies open to the party who has been affected by the wrongful act of the co-owner, then the Courts should not ordinarily grant a mandatory injunction. But in this case no other remedy is possible. Therefore, the property should be left in its original condition if there is to be convenient enjoyment, as the lane cannot be partitioned. Under these circumstances, when one of the joint owners puts an obstruction on the lane which has the effect of making it less convenient for the other co owner, the only remedy open to him is to sue for a mandatory injunction. In our opinion, therefore, the injunction granted by the lower Appellate Court is right.

One other point has been raised by the learned Vakil for the appellants, and that is that there has been acquiesence on the part of the plaintiffs which debars them from bringing a suit for a mandatory injunction. The District Munsif found that the steps and the pials were recently constructed. In his opinion apparantly it was not more than a year old. The Subordinate Judge has expressed no opinion upon the matter because there has been no issue upon the question of acquiescence. Having regard to the finding of the District Munsif we are not prepared to hold that the conduct of the plaintiffs has been such as to deprive them of their right of action by way of injunction. For these reasons we think the decree of the Subordinate Judge is right and dismiss the second appeal with costs.

Babu Chander Sekhar Sen, for the Appellant.

Babus Kshtish Chandra Chackerburtty and Frobodh Kishore Das, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This appeal arises out of a suit for recovery of khas possession of certain lands appertaining to Taraf No. 38 Alam Khan, which were sold for arrears of revenue and purchased by defendant No. 6 free from all incumbarances. The plaintiff alleges that the defendant No. 6 settled the Taraf with the plaintiff in sadar putni taluka right with the rights of an auction-purchaser and to receive the outstanding rent. The defendants Nos. 2 and 3, who alone contested the suit, amongst other things, contended that the lands in suit along with other lands, making a total of 5 kanis 4 gandas 3 karas, appertained to their mourasi ryoti jama, that they had acquired occupancy ryoti right in these lands, that in the survey of 1200 M. E. the lands in suit were recorded in the name of the predecessors of the defendants and that they appertained to 16 dags of the survey chitta of that year, and that inasmuch as the plaintiffs had not obtained sadar putni taluka right in the entire land of the jama of the defendants, they are not entitled to get khas possession of a portion thereof. The lands of dags 221

242, 1318 and 1699 were not included in suit. The trial Court held that the plaintiff was entitled to the lands in suit and had acquired the right to avoid or annul all incumbrances upon the potta granted to him by defendant No. 6, the purchaser. He relied upon the cadastral survey khatian Exhibit B, which showed that the defendants were recorded as talukdars. He also found from the cess return Exhibit 5 and the survey khatian that some other lands bearing the cadastral survey dags 242, 221, 1318 and 1699 of other mahals came to be added to the previous jama of the defendants, and, therefore, the question of the plaintiff as co-sharer talukdar did not arise. He held that the defendants had no protected interest and that the plaintiff as sadar putnidar was entitled to annul their incumbrances and bring the land in suit into his khas possession.

On appeal the learned Subordinate Judge held that there was no satisfactory evidence whatever to show that the defendants had got a right of occupancy in the lands. There was no potta or kabuliyat for such a right, and he also relied upon the cadastral survey khatian as showing the defendants' predecessor to be a talukdar in respect of the lands in suit. With regard to the road-cess returns he held that they were no evidence against the tenants and could not be taken as rebutting the survey khatian. He found that all the lands mentioned in the khatian formed the taluk of the defendants. He held that the plots 221, 242, 1318 and 1699 not being included in the plaintiff's sadar putni, the plaintiff was not entitled to set aside the defendants' tenure, inasmuch as it had been held in Sooharam Barma v. Doorga Charan Das (1) that a suit for annulment in part did not lie. He held that the plaintiff's claim for khas possession could not be granted. He modified the decree of the first Court accordingly, declaring the plaintiff's title to the lands in suit and directed that the plaintiff was to get possession through the tenants as tenure-holder. In this case both the parties dispute the correctness of the entries in the cadastral survey.

(1) 5 C L. J. 264.

Upon the findings of the learned Subordinate Judge the decision in Sooharm Barma v. Doorga Charan Das (1) clearly governs this case. The earlier authorities support the same view. Section 37 of the Revenue Sales Law must be strictly construed and if the road-cess return, Exhibit 5, is excluded from consideration as against the tenant, as it ought to be, there is nothing which contradicts the cadastral survey khatian, which must be taken to be correct unless there is evidence to the contrary.

The appeal is, therefore, dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Lala Jagan Nath, for the Appellants.

Sheikh Nias Mahammad, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—This was a suit in ejectment. The plaintiff Hakam Ali-Akbar Shah is admittedly the owner of a plot of land shown in red colour on the plan P. I. as alif plus be. One Sayyed Ali constructed a mud wall dividing the plot into two portions, alif and be. In the year 1913 the plaintiff brought a suit for the possession of the plot alif against the defendant Sayyed Ali and others. The suit was resisted upon various pleas, one of them being that the defendants were in possession of the entire plot alif plus be. This necessitated the amendment of the plaint so as to include both the portions of the plot in the claim. The suit was decreed on the 12th of May 1913. In the execution of the decree for possession the plaintiff obtained possession on the 28th of February 1916. From the proceedings relating to the execution of the decree it appears that the decree was executed after a great deal of obstruction and trouble on the part of the judgment-debtors. Eventually when possession was delivered to the decree-holder, the bailiff made a report that possession had been given. This report bears the signature of Bahadur Ali, one of the judgment debtors. The report said that possession had been given and the fact of the delivery of possession had been proclaimed by beat of drum. From the evidence it appears that at the time of the delivery of possession the mud wall was in a dilapidated condition and probably it was for this reason that no claim for the demolition of the wall was made in the plaint. There is evidence on the record to show that on receipt of possession the decree-holder had executed a dākhalnama. The present suit out of which this second appeal has arisen was instituted on the allegation that about $1\frac{1}{4}$ year ago the defendants had again dispossessed the plaintiff and had constructed a brick wall in the place of the old dilapidated mud wall. The defendant Sayyed Ali contested the suit mainly on the following pleas:—

(1) that the plaintiff never obtained possession in execution of his decree in the previous suit;

(2) that the wall now sought to be demolished was in existence at the date of the previous suit also and that no claim having been then made for its demolition, the present claim relating to the wall was barred by section 11 and Order II, rule 2, Civil Procedure Code;

(3) that as a matter of fact no fresh dispossession had taken place, and that, therefore, the plaintiff had no cause of action for the present suit.

During the pendency of the suit Sayyed Ali died and his sons, the present appellants, were substituted in his place as the defendants in the case. The Court of first instance found that possession had been delivered in the execution of the decree in the previous suit and that it was proved by evidence that the plaintiff remained in possession of the site by placing his fifth "arur" there. It, therefore, found that the defendants' interference with the plaintiff's user of the site gave a fresh cause of action to the plaintiff. The plea based on section 11 and Order II, rule 2, Civil Procedure Code, was, therefore, found to be without foundation and the suit was held not to be barred. The plea relating to the wall A B was also repelled on the ground that the relief claimed in the previous suit being for complete possession over the entire plot alif plus be, the claim for the demolition of the wall was necessarily included in it, as such a relief was incidental to the claim for possession. Relying upon Bakshiram Gangaram v. Darku Tukaram (1) the Court held that the plaintiff was entitled to a decree with respect to his entire claim. Against the decree of the first Court an appeal was preferred by the defendants to the lower Appellate Court. On the question of possession the lower Appellate

(1) 10 B. H. C. R. 369.

Court held that symbolical possession had been delivered in the execution of the decree. As regards actual possession the lower Appellate Court agreed with the first Court with respect to the portion be, but it felt doubtful as to the plaintiff's actual possession regarding the portion alif. The Court, however, held that as symbolical possession had been given, that was sufficient in the eye of the law and that the plaintiff's title being again assailed, a fresh cause of action had arisen giving the plaintiff a right to institute a fresh suit. It further held that neither sections 11 and 47 nor Order II, rule 2, barred the suit. The appeal was accordingly dismissed. The defendants have come up in second appeal to this Court, and almost the same contentions which were raised in the Courts below have been more elaborately pressed before me. The following points have been urged :—

(1) That the plaintiff in the previous suit never obtained any sort of possession in the execution of the decree.

(2) That in any case only symbolical possession had been delivered and it was of no avail, as having regard to the nature of the land in dispute, actual possession ought to have been given as contemplated by Order XXI, rule 35. It was contended that as the provision of the law was not strictly followed, it ought to be held that no possession had been delivered. In support of this argument certain cases were relied upon in which the nature of possession to be delivered according to the provisions of Order XXI, rule 35, and Order XXI, rule 95, was considered. The case of Shridhar Madhavrao v. Ganpati Punja Godse (2) was referred to. A decision of this Court in Khub Ram v. Surat (3) was also relied upon.

(3) The third point raised related to the prayer for the demolition of the wall, as to which it was contended that as the relief had not been claimed in the previous suit the present claim relating to it was barred either by section 11 or by Order II, rule 2, of the Code of Civil Procedure.

All these three points are contested on behalf of the respondent. As regards the first point there is clear evidence on the record on which the Court of first instance relied showing that actual delivery of possession had been given to the decree holder. The report of the bailiff, dated the 28th of February 1916, clearly states that possession had been given in execution of the decree and the fact was proclaimed by beat of drum. It has been contended that the beating of drum went to indicate that only formal possession had been given. This does not necessarily follow from the wording of the report. It clearly appears that possession had been delivered and the beating of drum took place in addition to it. Over and above this, as held by the Court of first instance, there is evidence of the actual user of the land by the decree-holder. If the plaintiff is proved to have been in possession of any portion of the land in dispute, it must be held, having regard to the nature of the land, that he had been in possession of the entire land. There appears to be no foundation for the doubt expressed by the learned Judge of the Court below on the point. The defendant Sayyed Ali himself had treated the entire plot as one and had alleged possesion over both the portions alif and be. In fact owing to this defence the plaint had to be amended and the whole of the plot had to be treated as one for the purposes of the claim. The warrant issued by the Court directing delivery of possession itself shows that actual possession had to be delivered in accordance with Order XXI, rule 35. A presumption, therefore, arises that the delivery of possession took place in accordance with law. The decision on this point is sufficient for the disposal of the appeal but as the lower Appellate Court has held that in its opinion only symbolical possession had been given and as the point has been argued by both the sides fully before me, I shall proceed to consider and decide that question also. The ruling in Shridhar Madhavrao v. Ganpati Punja Godse (2) to a certain extent supports the contention of the appellants' Counsel. The precise rule i.e., "rule 35" was not the subject of consideration in the Bombay case. In that case Order XXI, rule 95, was the subject of consideration, though no doubt it is true that the wording of both the rules is the same. The facts of that case as given in the judgment of Scott, C. J., go to show that the plaintiff's father in execution of a decree had purchased the plaint property at an auction sale and a receipt for possession had been given by the plaintiffs to the bailiff. Beyond the mere fact of a receipt nothing more appears to have been shown in that case proving the delivery of possession to the plaintiffs after the sale. Unless delivery of possession is given on the spot in either of the methods provided by Order XXI, rule 95, or Order XXI, rule 96, it is easy to see that possession cannot be said to have been given according to law. In fact in that case the learned Judges clearly held that possession of any kind had not been given at all. The following passage in the judgment at page 562* makes it quite clear :—

"Both Courts have held that the cultivable land and the house, which are the subject of the suit, were, on the 3rd of July 1901, and had for some time previously been, in the possession of the defendants Nos. 1 to 3 and that the defendants Nos. 1 to 3 were not disturbed in their possession on the date of the receipt, but that the statements were made in it both by the plaintiffs and by the bailiff as to possession having been given to the plaintiffs which were entirely false."

Thus it is evident that neither actual nor symbolical possession had been given. This finding was quite sufficient for the disposal of the suit in that case. It was not necessary for the learned Judges to have decided the question whether symbolical possession could entitle the plaintiffs to bring subsequently a suit for possession on the strength of the symbolical possession. Mahadev Sakharam v. Janu Namji Hatley (4) was also relied upon on behalf of the appellants. This no doubt supports the appellants' contention. The view taken by the Bombay High Court appears to be opposed to the decisions of the other High Courts. So far as the Calcutta High Court is concerned, it has always been held that symbolical possession given in execution proceedings to which the judgment-debtors are parties is to be deemed equal to actual possession as against them. This was clearly laid down in the Full Bench case reported as Juggobundhu Mukerjee v. Ram Chunder Bysack (5). This case was relied upon in a case argued before their Lordships of the Privy Council, and their Lordships adopted the rule laid down there and based their judgment upon it. The precise question which has been raised before me was raised in the argument before their Lordships. The case decided by their Lordships is reported as Radha Krishna v. Ram Bahadur (6). The question as to the nature of symbolical possession arose in relation to 150 bighas of land which was capable of delivery of actual possession. The argument in the case reported at page 269 would show that Dr. Abdul Majid for the appellants tried to distinguish the case of Joggobundhu Mitter v. Purnanund Gossami (7), upon the ground that that case related to certain lands which were in the possession of tenants and that, therefore, it did not apply to the case where land was capable of being actually taken possession of. Inspite of this argument their Lordships of the Privy Council applied the rule laid down in Juggobundhu Mukerjee v. Ram Chunder Bysack (5), which was the basis for the decision in Joggobundhu Mitter v. Furnanund Gossami (7). The Bombay decision in Mahadev Sakharam v. Janu Namji Hatley (4) apparently did not find favour with their Lordships. The decision of their Lordships of the Privy Council is, therefore, opposed to the view contended for before me. I may mention that in this case no question of limitation arises. The suit of the plaintiff is admittedly within time. All that has been contended before me is that the suit is barred by section 47 of the Code of Civil Procedure, inasmuch as the only remedy open to the plaintiff is to seek execution of his decree under which up to now no possession according to law has been delivered. A similar contention was raised in the case of Jagan Nath v.

Milap Chand (8) before the High Court of Allahabad. Their Lordships, relying upon various rulings of the Calcutta High Court, held that "where formal possession has been given under a final foreclosure decree but the mortgagor has continued in actual possession, the remedy is by suit and not under section 244 of the Code of Civil Procedure."

In that case the question of limitation was raised, and in the present case as above stated, no question of limitation arises. The only question is whether the plaintiff should seek possession through the execution Court. On the facts found in this case the execution of the decree has taken place ; possession has been delivered under it and after a full execution of the decree proceedings thereunder have come to an end It is not possible to execute the decree which has already been fully executed. In my opinion there is no merit in the defence set up by the defendants. I decide the second point also against the appellant.

There remains only the third question as to the demolition of the wall. I entirely agree in the view taken by the Court of first instance on this point. The decree for possession was a decree for the entire plot. The claim for the demolition of the wall was incidental to the claim for possession. If the defendant Sayyed Ali chose to build a wall on the land belonging to the plaintiff, and allowed the wall to remain on the land after a decree for complete possession had been given to the plaintiff, the wall acceded to the land and became the property of the plaintiff. In my opinion it was unnecessary for the plaintiff in this case to seek a relief for the demolition of the wall. As, however, the Courts below have given a decree for its demolition, I need say nothing further about it. In view of the above finding the appeal must fail. I accordingly dismiss it with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

SACHINANDAN NANDI—DEFENDANT—OPPOSITE PARTY.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. XVII, r. 3—Procedure—Reasonable time to comply with order of Court not allowed, effect of—Dismissal for default, validity of.

A party to a suit is entitled to be afforded a reasonable opportunity of complying with the orders of the Court, and of presenting his case or substantiating it in the proper course. An interval of two days for the payment of process fees directed to be paid by the Court in the absence of a party is not a reasonable time within which to make such payment. [p. 651, col. 2; p 652, col. 1.]

When a certain day is fixed for compliance with an order, the party concerned is entitled to the whole of that day for its compliance. [p. 652, col. 1.]

Rule against the order of the Sub-Judge, 2nd Court, Burdwan.

FACTS appear from the judgment.

Babu Sib Chandra Palit (with him Babu Khirode Narain Bhunia), for the Petitioner.—The decree-holder-plaintiff is the petitioner. The suit was for accounts and recovery of money and was valued at Rs. 3,100. The preliminary decree was passed on 10th May 1918. On the 9th July an ex parte order was passed calling upon the petitioner to deposit a certain amount for costs of the Commissioner. The suit was dismissed under Order XVII, rule 3, Civil Procedure Code, for failure to put in the deposit, on 15th July. An application for restoration was rejected on 15th August on the ground of its not being maintainable under Order IX, rule 9. On appeal the suit was restored and the petitioner was informed by his Pleader that the case would be heard. The date given being wrong the suit was again dismissed. Petition for restoration was again rejected. My submission is that the first order of the Subordinate Judge dismissing the suit was wholly wrong, as I already had obtained a decree of Court. On the 60th day the Court's ex parte order was made and on that very day the suit was dismissed. I had no notice of the order to deposit. I made successive applications for re consideration of the order.

[TEUNON, J.—Can a fresh application for restoration, made after a previous similar application has been dismissed, be held to be maintainable?]

We may call it a review. Every order may be reviewed. A suit cannot be dismissed after it has been decreed. Refers to Tadhin Proshad Singh v. Sardar Coomar Narayan (1), Civil Revision Case No. 220 of 1918, decided by Chatterji and Panton, JJ., on 2nd May 1919.

Babu Hemendra Nath Sen (with him Babu Dhirendra Nath Sen), for the Opposite Party.—This application is against the whole order of 15th July 1918. That order was passed by the learned Subordinate Judge who, under Order XVII, rule 3, was perfectly justified in passing that order. The order was passed on the 60th day.

[TEUNON, J.—The order ought to have been passed on the 61st day. The whole of the 60th day was available to the petitioner.]

The order was that the deposit was to be made "within the 15th July." That I submit does not include 15th itself. It meant that the deposit must be made before the 15th. The order under Order XVII, rule 3, is appealable. Refers to Gaura Bibi v. Ghasitiya (2), Lalta Prasad v. Nand Kishore (3). No application for revision lies. My submission is that the petitioner is entitled to no indulgence at all.

Babu Sib Chandra Palit, in reply.

JUDGMENT.—In this case the petitioner before us instituted a suit for accounts and on the 10th May 1918 obtained a preliminary decree. By the preliminay decree the defendant, who is the opposite party before us, was directed to prepare and complete their Khatas and render accounts to the petitioner within 60 days from that date. On the 9th July 1918, that is on the 60th day from the date of the preliminary decree, it was found that the defendant had not completed the Khatas and had not rendered accounts, and the plaintiff was thereupon directed to deposit Rs. 100 (as the fee of the Commissioner appointed for the purpose of preparing accounts) within the 15th July. That order, we may observe, was premature by one day. It was also made in the absence of the petitioner and his Pleader. On the 15th July it was found that the plaintiff had not deposited the costs for the appointment of the Commissioner, and his Pleader having intimated that he had no instructions, the plaintiff's suit was dismissed, the order being one made either under Order IX, rule 8, or as it purported to be, under Order XVII, rule 3. This order was made in the absence of the petitioner and is again an order premature by one day. On the 13th August 1918 the petitioner applied to the Subordinate Judge for the restoration of his case, on the ground that the order of the 9th July had never in fact come to his knowledge. That petition was rejected on the 16th August. But on appeal to the District Judge the petitioner obtained an order setting aside the Subordinate Judge's order of the 16th August and directing that the application for restoration should be re-heard by the said Subordinate Judge. This order was received in the Court of the Subordinate Judge on the 26th February 1919, and thereupon the Subordinate Judge made an order directing the petitioner to pay in process fees for notice on the other side within two days. The time allowed for the payment of process fees, we may remark, is obviously inadequate. The opposite party defendant, however, appeared in the matter and the case went on until the 7th June, when the petitioner being absent and his Pleader having no instructions, the application for re hearing was rejected. It has been shown by the petitioner, and it has not been disputed by any counter-affidavit, that the absence of the petitioner on the 7th June and the absence of instruction on the part of his Pleader were due to the fact that the petitioner's Pleader had informed him that the case would be heard not on the 7th June but on the 7th July. Upon the rejection of his application on the 7th June there followed another application for re-hearing presented on the 23rd June. The order upon this application was that the petitioner should file processes and pay in process fees on the 25th. Here again time allowed for payment of process fees was inadequate and the further order made on the 25th

June rejecting the petition on the ground of non payment of process fees was again premature by one day. Obviously as the result of the order made on the 23rd, the petitioner had the whole of the 25th within which to pay the process fees and no order of rejection should have been made, if made at all, before the 26th. On the 18th July the learned Subordinate Judge refused to review the preceding orders.

On this review of the successive stages through which this litigation has passed, it must be held that the petitioner before us has had no reasonable opportunity of complying with the orders of the Court and has had no reasonable opportunity of presenting his case or substantiating it in the proper course.

We, therefore, set aside the whole of the orders made by the Subordinate Judge after the order made on the 9th July and we direct that on payment into this Court by the petitioner on or before the 15th March next of the sum of Rs. 100 for the appointment of the Commissioner, the Subordinate Judge do proceed with and re hear the case in accordance with law. As to the costs of the Court below after the 9th July and as to the costs of this Court we make no order.

Orders set aside.

Co-sharers—Jagir, profits of, method of calculation of —Land held as home farm land.

The principle to be adopted in calculating the profits in regard to fields held by the various co-sharers of jagir land as their home farm land, is to ascertain the letting value of the land and charge accordingly. [p. 652, col. 2.]

Appeal against the decree of the Additional District Judge, Akola, in Civil Appeal No. 270 of 1915, decided on the 24th July 1916.

Mr. M. V. Joshi, for the Appellant.

Mr. S. Ramdas, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The defendant-appellant, Laxman Janrao, is the managing Jagirdar of two villages. Two suits were filed in the Court of the Munsif, one by Keshco Trimbak and the other by Narayan Anandrao, for their respective shares in the profits of the Jagir. This appeal is from the suit filed by Narayan Anandrao. Various pleas, some of them of a frivolous character, were raised in the first Court. Two issues of law were decided in favour of the plaintiff and a preliminary decree for accounts was passed. This procedure seems somewhat unnecessary, as the Court might well have proceeded to frame the proper issues and decree the claim justly due to the plaintiff. The defendant in his original statement claimed to be exclusively entitled to certain fields. At a later stage he claimed to be an ante-Jagir tenant of these fields. It is perfectly clear that if the defendant could have proved his plea, he would have been only liable to pay the amount of assessment fixed on these fields. The first Court held that he has failed to prove it. In appeal, before the Additional District Judge, no specific plea was taken that this finding was wrong, nor have I been shown any evidence establishing that the defendant is an ante-Jagir tenant of any of the fields. The question resolves itself now into a determination of the principle on which profits are to be calculated in regard to fields held by the various co-sharers of Jagir land as their home farm land. The contention raised by the defendant-appellant before me is that the Jagirdars should only be charged the previous rent paid by tenants who have surrendered, or whose tenancy has lapsed. I think the principle adopted by the Courts below is correct. They have found out the letting value of the land and charged accordingly. The actual cultivating profits have not been charged and this meets the first ground of appeal raised here. Very good reasons are given by Mr. Bell in Exhibit P-3 in a judgment passed in 1873. This was not a suit apparently between the parties to this litigation, and the judgment, therefore, does not operate as res judicata. The suit, however, related to the villages with which we are now concerned and a principle settled by a judicial officer in 1873 should, I think, be followed certainly as regards this particular village.

Mr. Bell's argument is that if a person is declared entitled to a certain share in the Jagir, he will get very much less than his just share if co-sharers are to be charged only what he calls the nominal rent paid by ryots, for it is obvious that land will not always be in actual cultivation of the co-sharers according to their shares, but would be unequally distributed. If there be a strong managing Jagirdar, the tendency will be that he will be in possession of all land from which tenancy has disappeared. This argument disposes of the contentions raised with regard to Renumadass's share and the share held once by the defendant's grandson. It also disposes of the lands held by the defendant himself. With regard to the claim for mango crops, there is evidence which justifies an award of the plaintiff's share of the profits.

There is a point, however, which has been overlooked by both the Courts below and by Counsel before me. The plaintiff in the plaint, paragraph 2, admits that the defendant is entitled to credit for Rs. 93-12-0, rent of the plaintiff's land at Tumki, at Rs. 31-4-0 per annum. This credit has not been given through an oversight. The same principle, however, must apply to lands held by the plaintiff. The plaintiff does not say that he is an ante-Jagir tenant. The letting value of this land must now be ascertained and deducted from the amount decreed on the plaintiff. In other respects the appeal fails. The appellant must pay the respondent's costs. The case is remanded to the lower Appellate Court for the framing of necessary issues as regards the letting value of the land in the plaintiff's possession. The decree of the lower Appellate Court is set aside and the appeal is remanded to that Court for a decision in accordance with the above order.

Decree set aside; Case remanded.

BARADA KANTA BOSE—PLAINTIFF—RESPONDENT.

Bengal Tenancy Act (VIII of 1885), s. 153 (1) (b) —Decree or order by officer specially empowered—Appeal, whether lies—Revision—Appeal erroneously entertained—High Court, power of, to vacate order of Appellate Court.

A decree or order by an officer specially empowered under section 153 (1) (b) of the Bengal Tenancy Act is not appealable, and the remedy to avoid such decree or order is by way of revision. Where, however, an appeal has been erroneously entertained against such order or decree, the High Court has jurisdiction, under section 115, Civil Procedure Code, to set aside the order of the Appellate Court. [p. 654 col. 2.]

Appeal against the decree of the Subordinate Judge, 3rd Court, Dacca, dated the 10th of June 1918, modifying that of the Munsif, 2nd Court at Munshigunge, dated the 3rd October 1917.

FACTS appear from the judgment.

Babu Trailokya Nath Ghose, for the Appellant.—The appeal arises out of a suit for rent. The rental was at Rs. 10. My complaint is that there was no appeal to the lower Appellate Court. The learned Munsif was authorised under section 153 of the Bengal Tenancy Act to decide cases like the present finally, from which no appeal would be competent. Hence my appeal to this Court against that decision. Refers to Gangadhar Karmakar v. Shekharbasini Dasya (1), Ranjit Mieser v. Ramudar Singh (2), Abdul Hossein v. Kasi Sahu (3), Minakshi Naidu v. Subramanya Sastri (4), Shilabati Debi v. Roderigues (5). The current of authorities is in my favour. If, however, my appeal be held to be incompetent to this Court, I would urge that your Lordship has power to interfere in revision and set aside the judgment and decree of the lower Appellate Court, which had no power under the Act to entertain the appeal.

Babu Jyoti Mohan Bhattacharyya, for the Respondent.—I would object to the hearing of the appeal in this Court. As a matter of fact no appeal lies in this Court under section 153 of the Bengal Tenancy Act, which operates as a bar. I would refer your Lordship in support of my argument to the rulings in Bhagabati Bewa v. Nanda Kumar Chuckerbutty(6)and Kalipada(Gangadhar)Karmakar v. Shekhar Basini Dasya (7). I would ask your Lordship to remand the case, as the lower Appellate Court could try the case in its revisional jurisdiction under section 153 to meet the justice of the case. The trial Court did not consider all the circumstances of the case, which ought to be gone into by some Court.

Babu Trailokya Nath Ghose briefly replied.

JUDGMENT.—In these proceedings the plaintiff, who is the respondent before this Court, sued to recover Rs. 10 as the price of produce rent. The Munsif dismissed the suit, holding that the relationship of landlord and tenant did not exist. The matter was taken on appeal and the Subordinate Judge held that the relationship did exist and gave the plaintiff a decree for the amount admitted by the defendant, namely, a sum of Rs. 3. In the present appeal an objection is raised on behalf of the respondent that under section 153 of the Bengal Tenancy Act the appeal by the tenant is incompetent What is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander, and the learned Vakil for the appellant answers that if the appeal to this Court is incompetent so was the appeal to the lower Appellate Court, because the Munsif was especially empowered under section 153 (1) (b) to exercise final jurisdiction in the suit. This being the state of things, it is obvious that there was no appeal to the lower Appellate Court and that that Court's order ought not to be allowed to stand. When the learned Vakil filed the memorandum of appeal, he also filed an application for revision and the question is, whether an appeal, lies to this Court or whether his client is entitled to relief by way of revision. There are authorities of this Court both ways. In the latest case, to which I have been referred, namely, Gangadhar Karmakar v Shekharbasini Dasya (1), Mookerjee, J., held that in such a case as this an appeal would lie to this Court against the decision of the lower Appellate Court. On the other hand, there are decisions in Bhagabati Bewa v. Nanda Kumar Chuckerbutty (6) and Kalipada (Gungadhar) Karmakar v. Shekhar Baiani Dasya (7) in which the view was taken by some of the learned Judges of this Court that there is no appeal in such cases. I do not think it necessary for me to express my individual opinion in this matter. It is sufficient to say that the balance of authority apparently being on the side that there is not an appeal to this Court, I ought to follow the balance of authority and hold that no appeal lies and that the remedy is by way of revision. In that view, on the application for revision, I set aside the decision of the lower Appellate Court and restore the judgment and decree of the Munsif.

It has been suggested on behalf of the respondent that the proper course to take would be to send the matter back to the learned Subordinate Judge in order that the memorandum of appeal to him may be treated as an application for revision under section 153 of the Bengal Tenancy Act. The ground on which this application is made is that when the matter went before the lower Appellate Court, the objection raised there was that no appeal lay not by reason of section 153 of the Bengal Tenancy Act but because the suit was of the nature of a Small Cause Court case. It seems to me that the respondent here is entirely responsible. The appeal was filed by him and he ought to have taken the remedy by way of revision at once. I do not see why I should accede to his application that because the respondent in that Court pleaded unsound objections to the hearing of the appeal, he should be exonerated for filing an appeal which was itself incompetent and for not taking the line that he could take, namely, filing an application by way of revision. Apart from that the amount in suit is so small that I do not think I should be justified in the circumstances in sending the case back to the lower Court to treat the Trust—Lease of trust property by trustee, whether void or voidable.

A lease of trust property which is in excess of the trustee's powers is not void but only voidable. [p. 656, cols. 1 & 2.]

Second appeal against the decree of the District Court, Madura, in Appeal Suit No. 316 of 1917, preferred against the decree of the Court of the Principal District Munsif, Madura, in Original Suit No. 656 of 1911.

FACTS.—Plaintiff-appellant sued (as assignee of a perpetual lease from a trustee of trust properties) in ejectment against the tenant, who impugned the lease as not being for necessity and, therefore, void.

Mr. W. Kothandaramayya, for the Appellant.—The lease is not ab initio void. It is good at least for the lifetime of the grantor. Abhiram Goswami v. Shyama Charan Nandi (1). In Kadir Ibrahim Rowther v. Arunachellam Chettiar (2) such a lease has been held to be only voidable and not void. The same principle applies as in the case of guardians of minors, managers of Hindu joint families, etc.

Mr. A. Narayanaswamy Aiyar, for the Respondent.—Grant of perpetual leases is ultra vires of the powers of a trustee, Palaniappa Chetty v. Sreemath Deivasikamony Pandara Sannadhi (3). The natural consequence is that such a lease, if granted, is void ab initio. See also Kalyana Venkataramana Aiyangar v. Kasturi Ranga Aiyangar (4). Abdur Rahim, J., says that it is void. The onus is on the plaintiff to prove that he has a valid title which entitles him to sue in ejectment.

JUDGMENT.

SPENCER, J.—This is a suit brought by the assignee of a permanent lease, granted by the trustee of a trust called Lala Dharman, to recover possession of the suit site from the tenant in occupation. The suit was dismissed in the District Munsif's Court on the ground that the trustee had no power to alienate the trust property and that his alienation was void and conveyed no title to the plaintiff, and on appeal the District Judge has confirmed this decision and dismissed the appeal.

It is contended before us that the grant of a permanent lease represented not a void but a voidable transaction and that it has not yet been avoided. In Kalyana Venkataramana Aiyangar v. Kasturi Ranga Aiyangar (4) my learned brother stated: "It is now settled law that ordinarily a permanent alienation of trust properties is ultra vires of the powers of a trustee", and the respondent's Pleader asks us to treat this expression "ultra vires" as meaning void, but it does not necessarily have that signification. There is also an expression by Abdur Rahim, Officiating Chief Justice, in the Full Bench opinion in the same case that the alienation of the right of making collections for the temple "was void and did not bind the temple in any way;" when the learnd Judge used the word "void" in this context he was not using it as opposed to voidable, as no argument was before him on the point of voidability.

In Palaniappa Chetty v. Sreemath Deivasikamony Pandara Sannadhi (3) the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council observed: "the grant of a lease in perpetuity of Debutter lands at a fixed rent required to be justified by unavoidable necessity." Such an expression would not have been used if the lease was itself a void transaction. Their Lordships compared the position of a Shebait or trustee with that of a guardian of an infant as regards the management and control of immoveable property. It is well settled that if a guardian exceeds his powers in dealing with the property of an infant, his acts are voidable and not void. In Abhiram Goswami v. Shyama Charan Nandi (1) the Privy Council were dealing with a Mokurari Pattah, which corresponds to a lease in perpetuity and they held that such a lease of Debutter property given by a Mohant was good for the lifetime of the Mohant who granted it. It would have been impossible for them to come to this conclusion if the grant had been void ab initio. In Kadir Ibrahim Rowther v. Arunachellam Chettiar (2) it was held that a lease by a trustee for a period exceeding 21 years was not void but only voidable at the instance of the cestui que trust. This was no doubt a decision based upon section 36 of the Indian Trusts Act (Act II of 1882) which applies only to private trusts. But in this respect the principle appears to be the same, namely, that a lease of trust property which is in excess of the trustee's powers is not void but only voidable. I am, therefore, of opinion that the lower Courts were wrong in deciding the case upon this point, and the appeal must be allowed and the suit remanded to the Court of first instance for trial upon the other issues in the case. Costs will abide and follow the result.

SESHAGIRI AIYAR, J.—I agree. The position of the defendant must be regarded as that of a trespasser. His title has not been gone into and, therefore, it must be taken that he resisted the suit on the ground that the plaintiff must show a better title than he possessed.

The position taken by the lower Courts, and which was pressed upon us by the learned Vakil for the respondent, amounts to saying that the alienation by a trustee is void ab initio like an alienation which is opposed to public policy or one made illegally. This position, to my mind, is untenable. As my learned brother has just now pointed out, the Judicial Committee have held that a trustee has, in certain circumstances, power to dispose of the trust property; he can sell it and he can lease the property provided a necessity for doing so has been made out. If that is the true position of a trustee in granting a permanent lease, if no necessity is proved, he will only be exceeding the powers he possesses. Consequently the transaction, although it may be avoided by persons who could sue on behalf of the trust, would still give the alienee a right until it is avoided. This is the principle which the Judicial Committee must be taken to have enunciated in Abhiram Goswami v. Shyama Charan Nandi (1), where they say that the alienation was good during the lifetime of the grantor. Mr. Justice Beaman in Mahamadgaus v. Rajabaksha (5) interpreted the decision of the Privy Council in Abhiram Goswami v. Shyama Charan Nandi (1) as holding that an alienation by a trustee is not void altogether but only voidable. The Privy Council have further held that the power of a trustee of a temple is analogous to that of a manager of a Hindu joint family or the guardian of an infant. As regards the manager of a Hindu family it has never been held that an alienation by him is void ab initio, it is only voidable. Similarly in the case of an alienation by a guardian of an infant, section 30 of the Guardians and Wards Act (Act VIII of 1890) declares in express terms that it is only voidable. It is also pointed out in Kadir Ibrahim Rowther v. Arunachellam Chettiar (2) that the transaction of a private trustee granting a lease beyond 21 years which the law permits him to grant is only voidable.

Applying the analogy of these legislative provisions I agree with my learned brother that an alienation by a trustee cannot be held to be void.

The result is that if the defendant can show a better title than the plaintiff, he will be allowed to retain the property; if, on the other hand, he has no title, he is not entitled to resist the suit brought by the plaintiff until the trustee or somebody interested in the trust takes steps to avoid the transaction. He has clearly a title which he can enforce as against a trespasser.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. II, r. 2 —Property wrongly attached—Declaration, suit for —Suit, subsequent, for damages, maintainability of— Costs, payment of, wrongly ordered, whether can be recovered as damages.

Where a person whose property has been wrongly attached sues for a declaration that the property is his and is not liable to attachment, and obtains a decree, a subsequent suit by him to recover damages for wrongful attachment is not barred by rule 2, Order II, of the Civil Procedure Code, as, although he could have joined a claim for damages with his suit for a declaration, he was not bound to do so.

Where in an execution proceeding a person not a party to the suit objects to an attachment of property and under an erroneous decision is ordered to pay the costs of the other side, he is entitled to recover the sum so paid, not as costs but as damages for having been compelled to pay costs without justification.

Appeal against the decree of the 3rd Additional District Judge, Lucknow, dated the 25th April 1919, modifying that of the Probationary Munsif, Lucknow, dated the 11th April 1918.

Mr. Rageshri Prasad, for the Appellant.

Mr. Girja Saran Lal, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—Maiku Lal held a decree against Rasul Bakhsh, father of Nazir Ahmad. In execution of this decree he attached certain bullocks. Nazir Ahmad claimed the bullocks as his. He was allowed to take the bullocks out of attachment on furnishing security. His objection that the bullocks were his was, however, dismissed He then instituted a suit for a declaration that the bullocks were his. That suit was decreed. He subsequently instituted a suit for damages. The Munsif decreed the suit for Rs. 19. The District Judge has decreed it for Rs. 58-12 0. Maiku Lal appeals.

The cause of action of Nazir Ahmad was the illegal attachment of his bullocks. That was his sole cause of action. As he had got the bullocks back, having given security, he could not sue for their possession. He sued for a declaration. Does Order II, rule 2, govern the matter? He could certainly have sued for damages in the first instance. His title to obtain the damages would have depended upon his ability to prove that the bullocks were his. So he could, had he wished, have made the present claim in the first suit. But it is urged that he is protected by the provision of section 42, Act I of 1877, and I consider that he is so protected, for undoubtedly he was entitled to a right. The other side had denied his right, and he could ask for a declaration of that right without asking for further relief. I, therefore, hold that the suit is not barred by Order II, rule 2.

The next point raised is whether Nazir Ahmad was entitled to recover the amount which he had had to pay as costs in contesting his objection in the Small Cause Court. There is no legal bar to his recovering this. This is not a case of his having been refused costs by a Court and subsequently suing to obtain those costs by an action, but a case of his having had to pay under an erroneous decision costs to the other side. The distinction is that he is recovering not costs but damages for having been compelled to pay costs without justification.

The last point is with regard to the order of the learned Additional District Judge in regard to proportionate costs. I cannot uphold this order. I direct that the costs be paid in all Courts in proportion to success or failure.

I modify the decree accordingly.

Mortgage—Subrogation, doctrine of, applicability of—Total and partial subrogation—Intention of parties—Direct payment, whether necessary.

In determining whether the right of subrogation exists, it is not the hand that pays the money that has to be taken into account, but the intention of the parties whether by paying the money the earlier mortgage was intended to be kept alive must be looked to. Mere payment of money would not by itself give rise to the right where the payment is voluntary, but if there is a contract between the mortgagor and the mortgagee that the latter should pay off the earlier mortgage and if in pursuance of that contract money is paid, then the party paying is entitled to subrogation [p. 658, col. 2; p. 659, col. 1.]

Even if there is a partial discharge of the earlier mortgage, to that extent the principle of subrogation would apply. [p. 658, col. 2.]

A mortgagee who pays off an earlier mortgage is not only entitled to the rights of that mortgagee but also to the rights of the mortgagees who were paid off by the mortgage amount. [p. 659, col. 1.]

Second appeal against the decree of the Temporary Subordinate Judge, Palghat, at Calicut, in Appeal Suit No. 107 of 1917, preferred against the decree of the Court of the Principal District Munsif, Tirur, in Original Suit No. 309 of 1916.

The Hon'ble Mr. Richmond, for the Appellants,

Mr. B. Pocker, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The facts are not in dispute. Plaintiff's mortgage, Exhibit A, is dated 18th May 1 [illegible] The 3rd defendant's mortgage, to which priority has been given by the Subordinate Judge, was in the year 1907. Plaintiff paid off an earlier mortgage, Exhibit G of 1909. Exhibit G refers to three earlier mortgages, Exhibits C, D and E, as having been discharged by the money received under Exhibit G. There is no dispute that these three mortgages were earlier in date than the 3rd defendant's mortgage. The question under these circumstances is whether the plaintiff is entitled to stand in the shoes of the mortgagees under Exhibits G, C, D and E or is he to be postponed to the 3rd defendant's mortgage. The lower Appellate Court held that, as the plaintiff did not directly pay off Exhibit G, but as the money was paid by the mortgagor to the mortgagee under Exhibit G, there was no question of subrogation. He is clearly wrong in this view. It is not the hand that pays the money that has to be taken into account but it is the intention of the parties, whether by paying the money the earlier mortgage was intended to be kept alive. That has been distinctly ruled by the Judicial Committee in Dinobundhu Shaw Chowdhry v. Jagmaya Dasi (1). In this Court in Swaminatha Pillai v. Krishna Iyer (2) the learned Judges have held that even if there is a partial discharge of the earlier mortgage, to that extent the principle of subrogation would apply. As to how far this decision is consistent with Hanumanthaiyan v. Meenatchi Naidu (3) it is not necessary in this case to consider, because in the present case the entire mortgage, Exhibit G, was paid off by the execution of Exhibit A.

For the respondent it was contended that the mere payment of money would not by itself give rise to the principle of subrogation. This argument would be correct if the payment were voluntary, but if there is a contract between the mortgagor and the mortgagee that the mortgagee should pay off the earlier mortgage and if in pursuance of that contract money is paid, the case will come under the principle mentioned in Swaminatha Pillai v. Krishna Iyer (2). Dinobhundhu Shaw Chowdhry v. Jagmaya Dasi (1), Narayana Kutti Goundan v. Pechiammal (4) and Yellapaddi Mahalakshammal v. Sriman Madhva Siddhantha Oona- hini Nidhi (5) relied on for the respondent only decided that a volunteer paying money will not be entitled to the privilege of subrogation. That is not the case which we have to consider on the present occasion. So far, therefore, as Exhibit G is concerned, the plaintiff is entitled to stand in the shoes of the mortgagee. Moreover, in this case we have the fact that Exhibit G was delivered to the plaintiff and there is an endorsement on the back of Exhibit G stating that the plaintiff paid the money. All these clearly indicate that the plaintiff intended to keep the earlier mortgage alive for his benefit.

The further question is whether plaintiff is entitled to be subrogated to the position of the mortgagees who were paid off by the execution of Exhibit G. As we have already stated, Exhibits C, D and E were mortgages which were satisfied by means of money borrowed under Exhibit G. There is direct authority in Seetharama v. Venkatakrishna (6) wherein it was held that a mortgagee who pays off an earlier mortgage is not only entitled to the rights of that mortgagee but also to the rights of the mortgagees who were paid off by that mortgage amount. Further, we have in this case the fact deposed to that the mortgagee under Exhibit G got the title-deeds Exhibits C, D and E and saw that the money which he advanced was utilised for the purpose of paying those three mortgages. These are clear indications that the mortgagee under Exhibit G intended to keep alive the earlier mortgages Exhibits C, D and E for his benefit.

We have come to the conclusion that the plaintiff is entitled to priority over the 3rd defendant's mortgage. As it is found that only Rs. 180 was applied towards the payment of the earlier mortgages, priority will be restricted to that amount with interest thereon. The decree will be modified as above indicated. The appellant is entitled to his costs as against 3rd defendant-respondent.

Sale—Conditions in deed regarding passing of ownership—Conditions not fulfilled—Deed, whether can be avoided—Intention of parties.

Where a deed of sale expressly stipulates that on the failure of the vendee to pay the balance of the purchase-money within a particular time, the deed would be treated as null and void, the verdor is entitled to avoid the deed on the vendee failing to make the payment agreed upon. [p. 660, col. 1.]

The mere execution of a sale-deed after the parties had agreed about the price and its payment has not the effect of at once passing ownership in the property sold. It is open to the parties to contract that ownership shall not pass until the fulfilment of certain conditions. [p. 660, col. 1.]

Appeal against the decree of the 2nd Additional District Judge, Lucknow, dated the 27th August 1918, upholding that of the Subordinate Judge, Bara Banki, dated the 5th February 1918.

Mr. P. C. Gupta, for the Appellant.

Mr. M. Wasim, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—After hearing the learned Counsel for the appellant I am satisfied that this appeal must fail. The suit was a suit for possession and the plaintiff based his claim upon a document which was executed on the 8th August 1910. This document purported to be a deed of sale under which a certain property was to be conveyed to the purchaser in lieu of Rs. 3,100.

This sum of Rs. 3,100 was made up of four items, (1) Rs. 250 paid in cash at the time of the registration, (2) Rs. 525 due to the purchaser on account of a promissory note, (3) Rs. 1,275 left with the purchaser to pay off two previous mortgages, and (4) Rs. 1,050, the balance of the purchase money, which was to be paid within two months from the execution of the deed. The document contained an express agreement to the effect that if the purchaser failed to pay the balance of Rs. 1,050 within two months, the document of sale was to be treated as null and void.

The present suit was brought in the year

1917. The purchaser says he is entitled to possession in accordance with the stipulation contained in the sale-deed. It has been found against him that he failed to carry out his agreement to redeem the two previous mortgages and also that he failed to pay the vendors the balance of Rs. 1,050 within two months from the date of the sale. It has also been found that the item of Rs. 525, said to be due to the purchaser on a promissory note, was a fictitious item. There is evidence to show that on the 28th October 1910 the vendors sent a registered notice to the appellant, informing him that they had availed themselves of the clause in the deed by which the latter was to be avoided in case the balance of Rs. 1,050 was not paid within two months from the date of the deed.

The argument before me is that the property passed as soon as the document in suit was executed, in other words, it is contended that as soon as the parties came to an agreement about the price (whether to be paid at once or promised to be paid) and as soon as the document of transfer was executed, the ownership passed at once to the purchaser. In all these transactions the question is one of the contract between the parties and there is nothing in law to prevent the parties contracting that the ownership shall not pass until certain conditions have been fulfilled.

In the present case it seems quite clear to me that it was the intention of the parties to this document that the ownership was not to pass unless the purchaser carried out his promise and paid up the balance of the purchase money within two months from the date of the deed. It was expressly agreed that the failure to perform this agreement was to result in the avoidance of the deed. I agree with the Court below that the deed could not be enforced; and the plaintiff was not entitled to succeed in any suit based upon the document. The decree of the Court below is correct.

The appeal fails and is dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

THE TANJORE LIFE ASSURANCE Co., LTD, BY R. SIVARAMA AIYAR, VAKIL, TANJORE, LIQUIDATOR OF THE SAID COMPANY—DEFENDANT—APPELLANT

S. KUPPANNA ROW—PLAINTIFF—RESPONDENT.

Life insurance company—Rules altered subsequent to completion of assurance, effect of—Liability of company, extent of.

An alteration in the rules of a Life insurance company as to the payment of premia and its liability to policy holders made after an assurance is completed has no effect upon that assurance, the company being bound by the rules as they existed at the time of the completion of the assurance. [p. 664, col. 1; p. 665, col. 2; p. 666, col. 1,]

Second appeal against the decree of the Court of the Additional Temporary Subordinate Judge, Tanjore, in Appeal Suit No. 79 of 1918, preferred against the decree of the Court of the District Munsif, Tanjore, in Original Suit No. 218 of 1917.

FACTS.—The plaintiff's mother obtained a life policy from the defendant insurance company in 1906, the premium being payable monthly, up to May 1911. By a resolution of the company, the rules of the company were alterd in January 1911, whereby premia were payable till death. The premia were paid up to May 1911. The policy-holder died in 1914. The present suit was brought in 1917 to recover the amount due under the policy. Under the new rules, the default in payment of premia entailed a lapse of the policy. The Court below held that lapse or no lapse, the money paid under the policy could be recovered. The defendant appealed.

Mr. T. L. Venkatrama Aiyar, for the Appellant.—The policy has lapsed under the rules of the company to which the policy was subject. In the absence of an express provision for refund, premia paid cannot be recovered. The risk attaches to the policy as soon as it is issued, and so this is not a case of want or failure of consideration. 17 Halsbury's Laws of England, sections 983 and 1113, Bunyon on Life Insurance; Macgillivray on Insurance Law (1912), page 785; Bermon v. Woodbridge (1), Goldstein v. Salvation Army Assurance Society (2), Moses v. Pratt (3), Elizabeth Want v. Blunt (4), Barker v. Walters (5), Pritchard v. Merchant's and Tradesman's Mutual Life Assurance Society (6), Oriental Government Security Life Assurance Company Limited v. Narasimha Chari (7) and 25 American Encycloepædia 759.

Even if the premia paid are recoverable the assured herself alone could have recovered them, the suit being one for money had or received or for failure of consideration. Article 69 or Article 97 of the Limitation Act would apply. But the cause of action for such a suit arose in May 1911 and more than three years have elapsed.

Mr. T. K. Rangaswami, for the Respondent.—There could have been no lapse under the rules in force when the suit policy was taken. The company cannot alter the rules to the prejudice of the assured, as the rights under the contract had become fixed as soon as the policy was issued. See Allen v. Gold Reefs of West Africa Limited (8), Conjeevaram Hodgsonpet v. Kandasawmy (9).

There is no limitation, as the company has acknowledged liability within time.

Mr. T. L. Venkatrama Aiyar, in reply.—No acknowledgment is effective when the policy has already lapsed. In Conjeevaram Hodgsonpet v. Kandasawmy (9) the contract had become complete. In this case, there were five payments yet due under the old rules when the new ones were made. Allen v. Gold Reefs of West Africa Limited (8) does not apply, as there one party to the contract was dead.

Farther the policy was issued subject to rules which empowered the company to alter rules as required.

JUDGMENT.

SESHAGIRI AIYAR, J.—Both the junior members of the Bar who appeared in this case argued it very ably. The facts are not in dispute. A policy was effected on the life of one Nagammal on the 29th of May 1906. The premia were payable monthly. The assured made 61 payments and then discontinued the payment. She died on the 6th of April 1914 and the present suit was instituted on the 11th of April 1917. The District Munsif dismissed the suit. On appeal the Subordinate Judge gave a decree for the amount of the premia paid by the deceased. I agree with the conclusion of the lower Appellate Court, though not for the reasons given by it. When the insurance was effected the rule of the company stood thus [see Exhibit E, clauses (b) and (c)]. "The policy-holders mentioned above who have been making payments duly in that manner, will be paid interest at the rate of Rs. 6 per annum. It is only after the death of the policy holder that the life assurance amount will be determined. (c) If the present policy-holders desire they may pay the entire amount for 60 months and stop (paying) the monthly premium. It was under this last clause that Nagammal paid for 60 months and then stopped payment. That she was justified in discontinuing payment is clear from two exhibits, C and C (1), which were letters written by the Secretary of the Company to the assured. In these letters it is pointed out that as she has discontinued payment she is not entitled to interest. There is no suggestion that the policy had lapsed owing to non-payment of the premium. In or about January 1911 the share holders held an extraordinary meeting at which they passed resolutions to the effect that the premium should be continued to be paid till the death of the assured. Rule 70 is "premiums shall be payable until the death of the policy-holder." It is common ground that no notice was given to the assured about this extraordinary meeting. The contention on behalf of the company is that as under the new rules the premia ought to have been continued till the death of Nagammal, she forfeited her right even for the payment of the amount paid by her as the policy had lapsed by non-payment.

The Subordinate Judge has not discussed the real question for decision, apparently as the arguments in the Court below were not directed to it. He has referred to section 65 of the Contract Act and has held that, as the contract has become void, the promisee is entitled to the refund of the moneys paid under it. There can be no doubt that, if there has been failure to pay the stipulated premia, the assured is not entitled to a refund of the sum actually paid. The principle is stated very succinctly in Crawley's book on insurance as to when and under what circumstances the premium will be re-paid. Roughly speaking, in three classes of cases the assured can claim refund, where there has been fraud on the part of the company in inducing the assured to insure in the company, or where the policy has become void ab initio or where no risk has been incurred by the insurer. Macgillivray quoted by Mr. Venkatarama Aiyar for the appellant states the law thus: "The general rule applicable to claims for the return of premium is that if the insurers have never been on the risk they have not earned the premium and ought to return it. Thus if a contract of insurance is set aside on the ground of misrepresentation or mistake or for some other reason the policy is held to have been void ab initio or to have been avoided before the risk began to run, the assured is, in the absence of any express condition to the contrary, entitled to claim re-payment of any premiums which he may have paid. Bermon v. Woodbridge (1), Anderson v. Fitzgerald (10), Goldstein v. Salvation Army Assurance Society (2), Motes v. Pratt (3), Pritchard v. Marchant's and Tradesman's Mutual Life Assurance Society (6), all bear out this statement of law. The next question is when the risk was run by the company. In Canning v. Farquhar (11) it was stated that, in the absence of a provision to the contrary, the risk commences at the time when a binding contract of insurance is concluded. Applying this principle the risk commenced against the defendant company on the execution of Exhibit A, the policy of insurance, on the 29th of May 1906, and if the assured is bound by the new rules passed by the company at its extraordinary meeting, there can be no doubt, on the principles of the decisions already quoted by me, the heirs of the assured will not be entitled to claim the return of the premium.

Now comes the question which has been raised by the learned Vakil for the respondent, whether the new rules were binding upon Nagammal. The right principle is, that ordinarily a concluded contract cannot be re-opened by one of the parties to it making a change in regard to the terms of the contract. The principle is well illustrated by Allen v. Gold Reefs of West Africa Limited (2). In page 663 Lord Justice Romer put this question to the Counsel. "Can you alter articles so as to affect past transactions?" The answer was: "'We do not propose to alter the relation of debtor or creditor.'" In the same judgment Lindley, M. R., says at page 672: "But then comes the question whether this can be done so as to impose a lien or restriction in respect of a debt contracted before and existing at the time when the articles are altered. Again, speaking generally, I am of opinion that the articles can be so altered, and that, if they are altered bona fide for the benefit of the company, they will be valid and binding as altered on the existing holders of paid-up shares, whether such holders are indebted or not indebted to the company when the alteration is made. But, as will be seen presently, it does not by any means follow that the altered article may not be inapplicable to some particular fully paid-up share holder. He may have special rights against the company, which do not invalidate the resolution to alter the articles, but which may exempt him from the operation of the articles as altered." And then at the end of page 673 the learned Lord Justice says: "A company cannot break its contracts by altering its articles, but, when dealing with contracts referring to revocable articles, and especially with contracts between a member of the company and the company respecting his shares, care must be taken not to assume that the contract involves as one of its terms an article which is not to be altered." Vaughan Williams, L. J., who differed from the majority of the Bench says:—"A resolution may alter the regulations of a company but cannot retrospectively affect existing rights." Lord Justice Romer also said that if there was a concluded contract, the company will not be justified in altering its terms by subsequent resolution. The case before the Court of Appeal was one affecting a share-holder. A share-holder would usually have notice of the proposed change in the articles of association. He would have an opportunity of contesting the proposal to change the rule. His case is, therefore, not in pari materia with that of a stranger who is a policy-holder and who is not given notice of meetings of the company. Therefore, while the observations contained in this decision are certainly in favour of the view that a concluded contract should not be altered to the prejudice of the promisee by anything done behind his back and to which he had not submitted himself, the suggestion of the learned Vakil for the appellant that a policy-holder is as much bound as a share-holder by any change that may be made in the rules is not borne out by this judgment. He, however, relied upon the decision of the House of Lords in British Equitable Assurance Company Ltd. v. Baily (12). That was undoubtedly a case of a policy-holder, and the question there was whether he was affected by a new rule passed at an extraordinary meeting of the company. The reservations contained in the judgment of the noble Lords support the view taken in Allen v. Gold Reefs of West Africa Limited (8). In that case the facts were these: The assured entered into a contract which contained these terms:—"I agree to conform to and abide by the deed of settlement and by laws, rules and regulations of the company in all respects." Another provision to which he submitted was this: "I shall pay all such other sums, if any, as the company by their directors may have ordered to be added to such an amount by way of bonus or otherwise according to their practice for the time being." What was done at the extraordinary meeting was to set apart a certain amount of the profits for a reserve fund. The assured contended that as the prospectus on the faith of which he assured his life did not provide for allocating a portion of the profits to the reserve fund, the action of the company was not binding on him. Lord Macnaghten at the very outset of his judgment quotes these observations of Cozens Hardy, L. J.—"A company cannot, by altering its articles, justify a breach of contract" and then proceeds: "No one, I should think, would be inclined to dispute the proposition thus asserted." The noble Lord then refers to the fact that the assured had bound himself to abide by any changes that may be made by the company and then says: "It will be observed that the prospectus does not purport to give an assurance of any sort that the allocation of profits would never be altered." Finally he concludes: "I am at a loss to understand how the Court of Appeal came to the conclusion that the statements in this prospectus constituted a collateral contract or are to be treated as incorporated in the contract of insurance." Lord Robertson used similar language. Lord Lindley, who took part in the decision in Allen v. Gold Reefs of West Africa Limited (c), says at the bottom of page 42:—"A by-law to the effect that no creditor or policy-holder should be paid what was due to him would, in my opinion, be clearly void as an illegal excess of power." The noble Lord, like Lord Macnaghten, points out that the prospectus on the faith of which the policy-holder entered into the contract was not part of the contract and, therefore, as the assured had bound himself to abide by any changes that may be made regarding the distribution of profits, he should not be heard to say that the company had no power to change its rules. Now applying these principles to the present case, it is clear in the first place that Nagammal did not bind herself to abide by any other alterations that may be made by the company in future. Mr. Venkatarama Aiyar referred to this sentence in Exhibit A: "The company shall be subject and liable to pay...to the assured or her assignee S. Kuppanna Row, son or heirs or to whomsoever she assigns such sums that shall become due and payable by virtue of the rules contained on the back hereof agreeable to the regulations of the company." That only related to the amount that may be found due. The assured did not submit herself to any changes that may be made by the company in its rules. Moreover the contract between Nagammal and the company had become concluded and it was not open to the company to change any of its terms by its one-sided action. It seems to me, therefore, that the action of the company, so far as assurances which were completed before they passed new rules were concerned, was ultra vires and could not bind the policy-holder. In this view, in my opinion, the decision of the Subordinate Judge is right and this appeal should be dismissed with costs.

MOORE, J.—The facts in the case are simple and may be shortly stated. Plaintiff's mother took out a policy in the Tanjore Life Assurance Company on the 29th May 1906. The policy provided that if the assured paid the future premium at one rupee per mensem until 20th May 1921 or till her death, the company would be liable to pay her or her assignee (the plaintiff) "such sum as shall become due and payable by virtue of the rules contained on the back hereof agreeable to the regulations of the company on the completion of 15 years' premiums or on satisfaction of proof of death and title of the assured." It is not disputed that plaintiff's mother paid the premia for 61 months; that is till May 1911, that she made no further payments and that she died on 6th April 1914. The suit was brought to recover the amount which might be found due on taking accounts with interest thereon from 15th April 1914 and the claim was valued at Rs. 143-12-0, viz., twice the amount of the premia paid plus interest.

The District Munsif dismissed the suit, on the ground that the policy had lapsed on account of the non-payment of premiums. In appeal plaintiff gave up a portion of his claim. The Subordinate Judge reversed the decree of the District Munsif and held that plaintiff was entitled to recover Rs. 61, the amount of the premiums paid. The principal question for decision in this appeal is whether the plaintiff is entitled to claim a refund of premiums paid by his mother. Under the rules of the company which were in force when the policy was issued, policy-holders had the option of discontinuing the payment of monthly premiums after they had paid for 60 months. See rule 33 (c), which provided that if the present policy holders so desired they might pay the entire amount for 60 months and stop paying the monthly premium. An extraordinary general meeting of the directors was held on 29th December 1910, and it was resolved to alter the existing rules in view of the unsatisfactory financial position of the company. Another extraordinary general meeting was held on 15th January 1911, and it was resolved that the amended rules be confirmed and adopted agreeably to the special resolution framed on the 29th december 1910, which was confirmed. See Exhibit D. The resolution of the 29th December 1910 was communicated to the Registrar of Joint Stock Societies and recorded by him. Rule 49 of the new rules provided that if premiums be not paid for four successive months on a policy, the policy would lapse without any notice being given by the company to the defaulter. But a lapsed policy might be renewed within six months from the date of the lapse on payment of a fee for renewal and arrears of premia (rule 50). Rule 70 says that premiums shall be payable till the death of a policy-holder. Rule 33 (c) of the old rules was not altered by any express rule in Exhibit D but I doubt whether the Subordinate Judge is right in saying that rule 49 applies only in the case of those policy holders who have not paid premia for 60 months and that rule 70 in Exhibit D must be read with the old rule 33 (c). The Subordinate Judge goes on to say "A lapsed policy means a void policy. The insurance company must be ready to refund the premia paid in the case of a lapsed policy on the date of the death of the policy holder. In the absence of an express stipulation for the forfeiture of the premia on avoidance of the policy it seems that in order to obtain cancellation the insurer must, at least in the absence of fraud, be ready to return the premia."

The Subordinate Judge has, I think, misunderstood the law on the subject, and it appears to be clear from the authorities to which the learned Vakil for the appellant has referred us that, when a policy lapses owing to non-payment of premium, the assured is not ordinarily entitled to claim a return of the premium paid. "When the policy is void ab initio or in any case where a premium has been paid but the risk has not been run, whether this has been owing to the fault, pleasure or will of the assured or to any other cause, the premium shall be returned by the insurers but if the risk has once commenced there shall be no apportionment or return of the premia afterwards." Bunyan on Life Insurance, 5th Edition, page 109; Bermon v. Woodbridge (1). The law as to the right of an assured to claim a return of the premium in the case of the policy being or becoming void is the same in life assurance as in marine insurance. Halsbury's Laws of England, Volume XVII, at page 557. Where a policy which is not illegal is void ab initio and no risk is run, the assured is entitled to a return of the premium he has paid but if the risk has once commenced the premia cannot, in the absence of fraud, be reclaimed. On the other hand if the assured is entitled to have the policy cancelled on the ground of his having been induced to enter into the contract of insurance by the fraud of the insurers, he is entitled to recover the premium he has paid. Halsbury's Laws of England, Volume XVII, page 558. The Subordinate Judge was of opinion that plaintiff was entitled under section 65 of the Contract Act to a refund of the premium paid by his mother, but section 65 applies only to cases where the agreement is discovered to be void or the contract becomes void at law for any of the reasons specified in the Contract Act. Oriental Government Security Life Assurance Company, Limited v. Narasimha Ohari (7).

It remains, however, to consider the question whether the new rules of the society infringed the rights of the policy-holder and are binding on the plaintiff's mother. Rule 70, which required policy, holders to continue making payments until death, undoubtedly introduced an important change in the rules. The contract between the parties is contained in the policy of insurance and plaintiff's mother did not take out the policy subject to the rules then existing as well as to the rules which might be framed or altered afterwards. The words in the policy are "The company shall be liable to pay to the assured such sums as shall become due and payable by virtue of the rules contained on the back hereof agreeably to the regulations of the company on the completion of payment of 15 years' premiums." It is significant that the letters, Exhibits C and C 1, from the Secretary merely say that as plaintiff's mother had discontinued payments, she would be not entitled to interest, thereby implying that she was justified in discontinuing the payments. As regards the extent to which a company can affect the rights of members by an alteration in the articles, I may refer to Lindley on Companies, Volume 1, 6th Edition at page 463: "When considering contracts referring to revocable articles, it must not be assumed that the contract involves as one of its terms that the articles shall not be altered and the terms of the contract thereby varied. If there be such an agreement, these rights cannot be altered by an alteration of the articles. If there is no such agreement, they can be altered provided the alteration does not affect rights which have ripened into claims for something done under the contract in its original form. See Allen v. Gold Reefs of West Africa, Limited (8)."

British Equitable Assurrance Company Ltd. v. Baily (12) was strongly relied on by the learned Vakil for the appellant. The House of Lords decided in the case of a life assurance Company that the company could alter its by-laws and alter its practice in the distribution of profits and thereby vary its contract with a policy-holder, but it appears to be clear from the judgments of the learned Lords that the decision of the case turned on the question whether the prospectus formed part of the contract. Lord Lindley says at page 41: "The prospectuses not being referred to in the policies cannot, in my opinion, be legitimately referred to in order to construe the contracts into which the policy-holders have been induced to enter. These contracts are to be found in the policies themselves." Lord Macnaghten did not dissent from the proposition stated by Cozens Hardy, M. R., that the company cannot, by altering its articles, justify a breach of contract. For the foregoing reasons I agree with my learned brother that the insurance company by altering its rules had no power to affect the rights of policy-holders whose contracts were concluded and that the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

Transfer of Property Act (IV of 1882), ss. 60, 74, 82—Mortgage—Purchase by mortgagee of portion of equity of redemption, effect of—Mortgage-debt, whether discharged, where value of portion purchased covers debt.

When a mortgagee buys at auction the equity of redemption in a part of the mortgaged property, such purchase has not, in the absence of fraud, the effect of discharging and extinguishing the whole mortgage-debt even where the value of the property purchased is equal to the amount due on the mortgage decree. The part of the mortgaged property purchased by the mortgagee is only chargeable with a proportionate part of the mortgage-debt and the purchase has only the effect of extinguishing that portion. Appeal against the decree of the Court of the Subordinate Judge, Kumbakonam, in Original Suit No. 42 of 1915.

This appeal and the memoranda of objections coming on for hearing on the 12th and 13th of December 1918 and the 28th of November 1919, upon perusing the grounds of appeal, the judgment and decree of the lower Court and the material papers in the case and the said memoranda of objections, and upon hearing the arguments of the Hon'ble the Advocate-General for the Appellants, of Mr. K. Balasubramania Aiyar, for the 2nd Respondent and the 4th Respondent (2nd Respondent's legal representative) and of Messrs. T. Rangachariar, K. Bashyam Aiyangar and K. Narasimha Aiyangar, for the 3rd Respondent, the Court (Abdur Rahim and Oldfield, JJ.) made the following

ORDER OF REFERENCE TO A FULL BENCH.

This appeal arises in a suit on a mortgage-bond by which three items of property were mortgaged to the plaintiff. Out of the three items two items were sold in execution of a Small Cause Court decree and bought by a person who was found to be an agent of the plaintiff. The purchase-money paid for both the properties was Rs. 200. The plaintiff now seeks to realise the amount due to him from the third item, and the question of law that arises is whether he ought to give credit to the mortgagor for the full value of the two items purchased by him and proceed against the other property only for the balance.

As regards the value of the properties purchased, it has been argued for the appellants that the learned Subordinate Judge's estimate is not correct, but we are unable to agree with this contention. It is not necessary to go into the details, but it is sufficient to mention the fact that the plaintiff sold the property three years afterwards for Rs. 3,750 except the roofing of the house. We think the Subordinate Judge is right in accepting that figure. As regards the other properties there is no reason to doubt the correctness of the valuation.

Before we deal with the question of law raised by the appellant, it is convenient to dispose of the memoranda of objections. The bond provides for the payment of 15 per cent. simple interest, in default of payment at the specified date, compound interest with one yearly rests at 18 per cent. We think the Subordinate Judge has rightly held this to be penal and we are unable to say that 18 per cent. simple interest allowed by him is not sufficient compensation.

Upon the question of law there is one ruling of this Court reported in Swami Rowappa v. Kuppuswami Iyengar (1). There it has been held by Ayling and Spencer, JJ., that where a mortgagee purchases one out of two properties subject to the mortgage, if the value of the property purchased is equal to or exceeds the mortgage amount, then the mortgage debt must be taken to be satisfied. In coming to this conclusion they followed the ruling of the Allahabad High Court reported in Nand Kishore v. Raja Hari Raj Singh (2). That was a ruling by a Full Bench of that Court of which Blair and Banerji, JJ., were members. There it was held that the purchase of a part of the mortgaged property by the mortgagee subject to his mortgage has not necessarily the effect of fully discharging the mortgage without regard to the value of the property purchased and the price paid for it, whether such purchase be made in execution of a simple decree for money or in execution of a decree obtained by the mortgagee himself upon a subsequent mortgage, although it is possible that under some circumstances such purchase may have the effect of extinguishing the mortgage. The view suggested is that if the value of the property purchased is equal to or exceeds the amount of the mortgage debt, then the mortgage must be held to be satisfied. But in a later Full Bench decision of the same Court in Bisheshur Dial v. Ram Sarup (3) a different proposition was laid down after a full consideration of the authorities, and it should be noted that Blair and Banerji, JJ., the latter of whom delivered the judgment of the Full Bench, were parties to this decision. The head-note is in these words: "When a mortgagee buys at auction the equity of redemption in a part of the mortgaged property, such purchase has, in the absence of fraud, the effect of discharging and extinguishing that portion of the mortgage-debt which was chargeable on the property purchased by him, that is to say, a portion of the debt which bears the same ratio to the whole amount of the debt as the value of the property purchased bears to the value of the whole of the property comprised in the mortgage." In coming to this conclusion they mainly proceeded on the provisions of section 82 of the Transfer of Property Act, which lays down that where several parcels of property are mortgaged to secure one debt, every parcel is liable for the whole amount of the debt; but as between themselves each parcel is liable, in the absence of a contract to the contrary, to contribute to the debt in the proportion which its value bears to the value of the whole property comprised in the mortgage. They point out that if the property had been bought by a stranger, then it could not be contended that that property in his hands would be liable for a larger amount than what would be proportionate to its value. It may be observed that section 82 of the Transfer of Property Act was not brought to the notice of the learned Judges who decided Nand Kishore v. Raja Hari Raj Singh (2) or of Ayling and Spencer, JJ., who decided the Madras case Swami Rowappa v. Kuppusami Iyengar (1). There is also a ruling of the Bombay High Court in Lakhmidas v. Jannadas (4) in support of the view taken in Bisheshur Dial v. Ram Sarup (3). But the learned Advocate-General has referred us to a decision of the Privy Council in Dulichand v. Ramkishen Singh (5). The facts of that case are somewhat complicated. But it would be sufficient to mention that the plaintiffs there were the purchasers of a Mouza called Korina and they also stood in the shoes of the Bank of India which held the first encumbrance on that Mouza. The appellant, the defendant in the suit, held a mortgage both of Korina and the Mouza Nandan, the mortgage on the Mouza Korina being a second mortgage and that on Nandan being the first mortgage. It appears that the appellant bought Mouza Nandan and it was found that the value of that property after deducting the purchase-money of the equity of redemption exceeded the mortgage-debt due to the appellant. Upon these facts the Privy Council held that the appellant's mortgage was satisfied and that, therefore, he could not proceed for any portion of the mortgage amount against the Mouza Korina. At page 651 their Lordships say: "It has been found by the Courts that its value, beyond the purchase-money, exceeded the amount due upon the appellant's mortgage, and was sufficient to cover not only that amount, but the Rs. 19,416 due to Lutf Ali Khan, if that sum was really due to him.

(1) 12 Ind. Cas. 130; (1911) 2 M. W. N. 342; 10 M. L. T. 240.

(2) 20 A. 28 (F. B.); A. W. N. (1897) 163.
(3) 22 A. 284 (F. B.); A. W. N. (1900) 69.
(4) 22 B. 304.
(5) 7 C. 648 (P. C.); 8 I. A. 93; 4 Sar. P. C. J. 245.

Under these circumstances, it must be taken that the mortgage-debt was satisfied by the purchase of Nandan and the value of that estate." At page 653 they say: "It has been shown that at the time that this payment of Rs. 78,393 was made by the respondents to the appellant, the debt had been satisfied by his purchase of Nandan under the circumstances above stated. He has, therefore, received it twice over, and it is obvious that, in such a case, it is inequitable that he should hold the money paid to him, under compulsion, by the respondents. It is to be observed that the appellant had only a second mortgage upon Korina, but in the view their Lordships have taken of the case, it is unnecessary to go into the question of marshalling the securities." If their Lordships had satisfied themselves with saying that the appellant's mortgage on Korina was a second mortgage and, therefore, postponed to the mortgage of the Bank, it could not be contended there would be any conflict between this decision and the ruling in Bisheshur Dial v. Ram Sarup (3). But that is apparently not the ground on which they based their conclusion. They held that upon the facts stated by them in their judgment the appellant's mortgage was satisfied because of the value of the property having exceeded the debt. It must, however, be observed that the question whether the plaintiffs were entitled or not to proceed against the other Mouza for a proportion of the debt was not at all discussed at the Bar and this case, as the head-note itself would show, is regarded as an authority with reference to another question, as to whether payment made by a person to save his property threatened to be sold in execution of a decree is voluntary payment or not and not upon the present question. The matter is one of some importance and the correctness of the ruling in Swami Rowappa v. Kuppusami Iyengar (1) seems to be open to doubt. We, therefore, think that the question ought to be settled by a Full Bench of this Court, whether, when a mortgagee buys at auction the equity of redemption in a part of the mortgaged property, such purchase has, in the absence of fraud, the effect of discharging and extinguishing the mortgage debt if the value of the property purchased be equal to the amount due on the mortgage decree as held in Swami Rowappa v. Kuppusami Iyengar (1), or whether the true rule is as enunciated in Bisheshur Dial v. Ram Sarup (3).

This appeal came on for hearing on the 20th and 21st of January 1920 in pursuance of the order of this Court, dated 28th November 1919.

The Hon'ble Mr. S. Srinivasa Aiyangar (Advocate-General) for the Appellants.—Section 82 of the Transfer of Property Act has no application to this case, which relates to a purchase by the mortgagee. The mortgagee is entitled to account to the mortgagor for the moneys realised by him and where he is himself the purchaser of a part of the equity of redemption, there is a merger of the mortgage right and of the equity of redemption and the mortgagor is entitled to treat his mortgage debt as extinguished when the whole of the amount due has been realised by the mortgagee by purchase. The mortgagee is only entitled to recover the debt and not to any of the properties. Where there was fraud in the purchase, the mortgagee can redeem the whole property. Otherwise he is entitled to the credit of the entire value of the property purchased by the mortgagee. See Dulichand v. Ramkishen Singh (5), Swami Rowappa v. Kuppusami Iyenggar (1). The opposite principle laid down in Bisheshur Dial v. Ram Sarup (3) that the part purchased operates to extinguish a proportionate part of the mortgage-debt has been arrived at by a wrong application of section 82 of the Transfer of Property Act. In Nawab Azimut Ali Khan v. Jowahir Singh (6) there was no evidence that the properties purchased were for more than the amount due on the mortgage and the claim was for a proportionate abatement.

Messrs. K. Bashyam Aiyangar and K. Narasimha Aiyangar, for Respondent No. 3.—There is really no distinction between purchases by mortgagees and purchases by strangers. See Nawab Azimut Ali Khan v. Jowahir Singh (6), Dulichand v. Ramkishen Singh (5) is distinguishable. In any event, after the enactment of sections 60 and 82 of the Transfer of Property Act, it is not good law. In the case of sales by mortgagors to mortgagees there is no fiduciary relation existing. See Knight v. Marjoribanks (7). There is no distinction between a Court sale and a private sale. See Mir Eusuff Ali Haji v. Panchanan Chatterjee (8). Bisheshur Dial v. Ram Sarup (3) lays down the right rule.

OPINION.—We agree with the decision of the Full Bench of the Allahabad High Court in Bisheshur Dial v. Ram Sarup (3), which was in accordance with the earlier Bombay decision in Lakhmidas v. Jamnadas (4) and has been followed in Calcutta in Mir Eusuff Ali Haji v. Panchanan Chatterjee (8). We have not been referred to any English authority in support of the opposite view. On the other hand, as pointed out in the last mentioned case, Lord Cottenham in Knight v. Marjoribanks (7) cited with approval the statement in Sugden's Vendors and Purchasers, Volume 3, page 227, Edition 10th, "that a sale by a mortgagor to a mortgagee stands on the same principle as a sale between parties having no connection with each other, and can only be impeached on the ground of fraud," and added "that inadequacy of price would not be a sufficient ground to impeach such a sale." The decisions that a mortgagee by purchasing a part of the mortgaged property extinguished the mortgage debt, which were overruled in Nand Kishore v. Rajah Hari Raj Singh (2), and the further decisions that such a mortgagee purchaser must credit the difference between the purchase price and the real value of the property purchased in discharge of the mortgage debt, which were overruled in Bisheshur Dial v. Ram Sarup (3), appear to be quite irreconcilable with the above statement. In this Court we have been referred to the decision of the Privy Council in Dulichand v. Ramkishen Singh (5), which is discussed in the order of reference. The judgment no doubt contains passages which may be read as meaning that the mortgage was discharged because the value of the property purchased by the mortgagee after deducting the purchase price exceeded the mortgage debt, but there is no discussion of the principle involved, and in the absence of the judgment of the lower Court and of any report of the argument it is not easy to say what was intended. If it had been a ruling after contest, it would have been dealt with in the head-notes to the reports of the case. On the other hand in the earlier case in Nawab Azimut Ali Khan v. Jowahir Singh (6) the rule that the part of the mortgaged property purchased by the mortgagee was only chargeable with a proportionate part of the mortgage-debt was treated as plainly applicable. That is the rule embodied in section 82 of the Transfer of Property Act, by which we are governed. If the Legislature had intended to make an exception in the case of mortgagee purchasers, it would no doubt have done so in express terms, as in the case of the special restrictions imposed upon them by the now repealed section 99. Not only is there no provision to that effect, but the case of a mortgagee acquiring a share of the equity of redemption is expressly dealt with in the last clause of section 60, which recognises the mortgagor's right to redeem his own share in such a case upon payment of a proportionate amount of the mortgage-debt, leaving the balance to be borne by the mortgagee purchaser, thus applying to this case the general rule provided in section 82. We answer the question in the negative and overrule Sami Rowappa v. Kuppusami Iyengar (1).

PRASANNA KUMAR SHAHA—DECREE-HOLDER—PETITIONER

LAL MIAN—JUDGMENT-DEBTOR—OPPOSITE PARTY.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. XXI, r. 2—Execution of decree—Executing Court, jurisdiction of, to entertain question of payment or adjustment of decree.

A Court executing a decree has no jurisdiction to entertain the question of payment or adjustment of the decree out of Court, when such payment or adjustment has not been certified to the Court in the manner provided by rule 2, Order XXI, of the Civil Procedure Code. [p. 671, col. 1.]

PRASANNA KUMAR v. LAL MIAN.

Rule against the order of the Court of the Sub-Judge, Noakhali, exercising the powers of a Court of Small Causes.

FACTS appear from the judgment.

Babu Jitendra Kumar Sen Gupta, for the Petitioner.—The decree holder is the petitioner. The facts are shortly these. On the 2nd August 1917 the petitioner took out execution of the decree which he had obtained against the judgment debtor, who had satisfied only a part of the decree before the 2nd August. The peon who went to serve the writ of attachment returned it with a note stating that as the decree had been satisfied in part, the decree-holder did not desire to proceed with the execution. On the 22nd December the execution case was struck off. On the 28th May 1918 the decree-holder again applied for execution for the balance of the decretal amount. On the 18th January 1919 the judgment-debtor filed a miscellaneous case, alleging that the whole of the decretal amount had been satisfied on the 6th of December 1917. The learned Subordinate Judge thereupon dismissed my application for execution of the decree, relying on the peon's return in the execution case of 2nd August 1917.

My submission to your Lordship would be that the allegation of the judgment-debtor could not be tenable in law. The alleged payment and satisfaction of the decree is said to have been made according to him on the 6th December 1917, but the payment and adjustment have not been certified by the decree holder under Order XXI, rule 2, of the Code of Civil Procedure. Therefore, the Court could not recognise the alleged adjustment and payment under Order XXI, rule 2 (3). No doubt the judgment-debtor has applied under Order XXI, rule 2 (2), to have the said payment and adjustment recorded by Court. But this application has been made on the 18th of January 1919 long after the statutory period of limitation. Refers to Article 174, Schedule I of the Indian Limitation Act, which allows "ninety days" only from the date of the payment or adjustment "for the issue of a notice under the Civil Procedure Code to show cause why any payment made out of Court of any money payable under a decree or any adjustment of the decree should not be recorded as certified." Moreover, the learned Small Cause Court Judge found that the alleged payment and adjustment had been made by depending solely on the peon's report. I submit the peon's report is not admissible in evidence, inasmuch as the peon had not been examined in the case. The report itself does not show that the entire decretal amount was paid. We admit that Rs. 73 only was paid and as the judgment-debtor agreed to pay the balance within a short time, we did not proceed with the attachment. The peon in his report only stated that the money having been paid the decree-holder did not wish to serve the process. I would on these grounds ask for the setting aside of the order of the learned Small Cause Court Judge which has been passed without jurisdiction.

Babu Satyendra Chandra Mitra (with him Babu Nagendranath Bose), for the Opposite Party.—My submission is that the order of the learned Judge is not without jurisdiction. When the peon filed the report stating that the decree had been satisfied, the matter came to the knowledge of the Court. The peon himself is an officer of the Court and communication to the peon by the decree-holder about the satisfaction should be taken as communication to the Court. Therefore, no further certificate of satisfaction from the decree-holder was necessary. Then as regards the peon's report we are at no fault if the peon has not been examined to prove the report. We were willing to examine him, but the Court thought his report to be sufficient to prove satisfaction. We should be given at least an opportunity to get him examined to have the report proved. I would ask for a remand.

Babu Jitendra Kumar Sen Gupta was not heard in reply.

JUDGMENT.—This Rule was issued at the instance of the decree-holder. Part of the decree had been satisfied and on the 22nd August 1917 he took out execution for the balance of the decree, amounting to Rs. 162 and odd. The writ of attachment was issued, but when the Court peon came to serve it, it appears that he was told that part of the money had been paid and the decree-holder not wishing to proceed with the execution the writ was returned unserved. That was on the 13th December 1917 and on the 22nd of that month the execution case was dismissed for want of prosecution. On the 28th May 1918 the decree-holder applied for execution for the sum of Rs. 95-10 annas, stating that Rs. 73 had been paid on a previous occasion. That execution case was No. 978 of 1918. On the 18th January 1919 the judgment-debtor instituted a miscellanious case No. 23 of 1919, alleging that the whole of the decree had been satisfied by payment of Rs. 85 on the 6th December 1917. His case is that Rs. 70 had been paid in August 1917 and Rs. 85 had been accepted in satisfaction of the balance of the decree. The Subordinate Judge has dismissed the application for execution on the ground that the decree had been fully satisfied. He appears to have acted on the report of the peon, dated 13th December 1917. He says: "From the peon's report in the previous case it would seem that the decree holder's dues had been paid up."

The learned Judge's order is open to criticism on various grounds. In the first place, as a matter of fact the report of the peon, or at any rate the translation that is put before me, does not show that the whole amount due had been paid up. In the second place, it appears that the peon has not been examined. But the most important of all points, for this is a point which touches the question of jurisdiction, is that the learned Judge was not entitled to go into this question of payment at all, because under Order XXI, rule 2 (3), a payment or adjustment which has not been certified or recorded in the manner provided by the rule is not to be recognized by the Court executing the decree. The payment is alleged by the judgment-debtor to have been made in December 1917. The judgment-debtor had three months in which to apply to the Court to record the payment. He did not do so within the time allowed and, therefore, the Court had no jurisdiction to entertain the question as to whether there had been this payment or not.

The order of the learned Judge dated 9th August 1919 is accordingly set aside and the execution case must be returned to him to be proceeded with in accordance with law. The decree holder will get his costs of this hearing, which I assess at one gold mohur.

Let the record be sent down at once.

Case returned.

Principal and agent—Consignment of goods for sale—Consignee, whether can sell goods—Advances made against goods—Agreement to recoup advances from sale-proceeds—Suit for recovery of advances before sale, whether maintainable.

A factor, to whom goods have been consigned for sale and who has made advances against them, has no authority, in the absence of an agreement to the contrary, to sell the goods without the consent of the owners. [p 672, col. 2.]

Jafferbhoy Ludhabhoy Chattoo v. Thomas D. Charlesworth, 17 B. 520 and De Comas v. Prost, (1865) 3 Moore P. C. (N. S.) 158; 11 Jur. (N. S.) 417; 12 L. T. (N. S.) 682; 13 W. R. 595; 146 R. R. 45; 16 E. R. 59, followed.

He can, however, sue for the recovery of the advances before the sale actually takes place even where the agreement is to recoup the advances from the sale-proceeds, if he has waited a reasonable time for the sale to take place in the ordinary course of business. [p. 672, col. 2.]

Appeal from the judgment of the Hon'ble Mr. Justice Coutts Trotter, dated the 9th July 1918, passed in the exercise of the Ordinary Original Civil Jurisdiction of the High Court in Civil Suit No. 331 of 1917.

FACTS.—One Sheik Mahammad Maracayar, the defendant in the suit, shipped four consignments of indigo through the plaintiffs, Oakley Bowden and Company, and got advances for the same from them on the estimated value realizable. The plaintiffs sued for the recovery of the advances, alleging that it was a very low grade indigo being 'mud indigo' and in spite of every effort made, no market could be found for the goods at all, the goods having been held up all this time at the request of the defendants. The defendants pleaded that the plaintiffs ought to have sold the goods, and that until the goods were sold the action was premature. The Hon'ble Mr. Justice Coutts Trotter, in the trial Court found "that in September 1916 and at any date subsequent to that, a reasonable time having elapsed, Messrs. Oakley Bowden and Company were entitled to sell this stuff for what it would fetch, that the defendant requested the plaintiffs not to do so and that this necessarily imported on the defendant's behalf a corresponding undertaking that if the goods were to be held up in the hope of a future market, all reasonable attempts to sell them having failed, to pay to Oakely Bowden and Company the advances that they had received", and gave judgment accordingly—"that the advances be refunded to Oakley Bowden and Company, that the goods will stand to the order of the defendants in the warehouse, London docks, and that Messrs. Oakely Bowden and Company or Tregarthan shall execute documents that will give a good title to the defendants to the goods in the warehouse."

Mr. V. C. Seshachariar, for the Appellants.—The suit was premature. The express agreement between the parties was that the plaintiffs can recoup their advances only from the sale-proceeds. The sale not having taken place, plaintiffs' right of suit did not accrue. The trial Judge was wrong in importing an implied obligation on the defendants to pay to plaintiffs their advances if the goods were held up in the hope of a future market.

Messrs. Grant and Greatorex, for the Respondents.—It is true that the sale did not take place and according to the literal enforcement of the agreement the suit was not maintainable. The consent of the defendants is, in law, necessary for the sale by the plaintiffs, but if defendants do not give their consent for a reasonable period, there is no obligation on the plaintiffs to wait for an indefinite time. If the sale is not allowed to take place in the ordinary course of business, the plaintiffs are not bound to suffer themselves to sustain loss. There is an implied obligation on the defendants to re-pay the advances if they fail to give consent to the sale within a reasonable time.

JUDGMENT.

WALLIS, C. J.—It has been held in Jafferbhoy Ludhabhoy Chattoo v. Thomas D. Charlesworth (1), on the express authority of a decision of the Privy Council in De Comas v. Prost (2), that a factor to whom goods have been consigned for sale and who has made advances against them has no authority to sell without the consent of the owners, whether the advances were made at the time or subsequently, in the absence of an agreement to the contrary, which is not shown in the present case. In these circumstances the plaintiffs could not reasonably be expected to sell contrary to the instructions of the defendants and so expose themselves to a suit for damages. The only question before us is whether in the circumstances of the case the advances made by the plaintiffs to the defendants are recoverable without a sale. It was no doubt a term of the agreement that the advances were to be re-payable out of the sale-proceeds, but this, I think, must be taken to have been subject to the implied condition that the defendants should allow the sale to take place in the ordinary course of business. It cannot have been the contract that the plaintiffs were to wait indefinitely until the defendants gave leave to sell, otherwise in every case of an unprofitable venture it would be open to the consignor who had obtained advances on the goods from his factor to throw the losses arising from the transaction on the factor simply by refusing to consent to the goods being sold. This would be neither sense nor business. In my opinion the learned Judge was right in holding that the suit was not premature. There is uncontradicted evidence to support his finding that the loan was to carry interest, but the only evidence is that the rate was to be 7 per cent. and the respondents do not press for more. The decree will be varied by allowing only 7 per cent. Otherwise the appeal is dismissed wit costs.

SADASIVA AIYAR, J.—I agree.

JANKI PRASAD TEWARI—APPLICANT

versus

EMPEROR—OPPOSITE PARTY.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), s. 107—Lawful possession, protection of, by armed men, whether likely to cause breach of peace.

The protection of lawful possession is in itself lawful, and might properly be done by a body of men able to show that they are prepared not only to resist any unlawful violence to interfere with the possession but to defend themselves if it becomes necessary in the process. [p. 774, col. 1.]

Where, therefore, the lawful possession of the accused had more than once been threatened by a show of armed force, and he had collected a body of men armed with lathis and posted them on the property to resist any violence or interference with his possession:

Held, that as the intention was to maintain an existing right, the accused was justified in adopting measures for the defence of his possession, and that, as there was no likelihood of a breach of the peace from his side, there was no reason either for punishing him or binding him over in security. [p. 674, col. 1.]

Criminal revision from an order of the Sessions Judge, Gorakhpur, dated the 10th November 1919.

Dr. S. M. Sulaiman, for the Applicant.

Mr. R. Malcomson (Assistant Government Advocate), for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.—From the facts found in this case it is clear that there has been an old standing dispute between the two parties with regard to the possession of certain lands. The present applicant was the servant of the successful party. The successful party had obtained a decree for possession from a Civil Court. Both parties had been required to give security under section 107 and the period for such security had expired on the 25th June. "It is clear," says the lower Court, "that by giving possession on the 3rd of August 1919 the other party had ceased legally to have any standing in any of the property." Notwithstanding all this the other party on various dates, namely, the 12th of August, the 14th of August and the 24th of August, threatened the lawful possession which the applicant's master had obtained and threatened it with an armed force. In consequence of this the Sub-Inspector at the instance of the applicant obtained the assistance of two constables and three Chaukidars whom he left on the spot. On one occasion the other party brought a gang of no less than forty men. On the occasion in question, namely, the 24th of August when the Police were also present, the applicant posted ten men armed with lathis at the spot. These men are found to have been the servants of the applicant's master though as the Court says, "it may be that some of them had been engaged for the use of lathis if necessary." No actual breach of the peace, took place. No doubt there was a danger of a breach of the peace but there is nothing either in the circumstances or in the findings arrived at by the Courts below to indicate that the applicant had any desire or intention or any object to gain in himself committing or originating a breach of the peace. The very presence of the Police, as the Courts below have themselves said would indicate that there was a likelihood. I think the inevitable conclusion from these circumstances must be that the object of the collection of these men upon the ground was to defend the possession of the property which had been obtained with so much difficulty and after long delay, and physical ouster from which might give rise to fresh applications or litigation There is nothing to show that any other object was intended. If an unprovoked breach of the peace had been intended, there was ample opportunity for it of which neither the applicant nor any of his party availed himself. One method, as has so often been said and as a large portion of the civilised world has had forced upon its conviction in the last few years of preserving peace, is to show by preparation a determination to resist attack, and the presence of a substantial force prepared to defend the possession of the property and able to render effectual assistance to the Police, if they should by some foolish conduct of the other party be attacked, would undoubtedly do much to discourage the other party from taking any active steps. In other words, I can find nothing in the findings of the Courts inconsistent with what the learned Judge himself says is the real question in the case, namely, the intention to maintain an existing right.

My reason for interference in revision is that I think both the Courts below, who really arrived at this conclusion and started their final consideration of the legal result of the evidence from this point, have got off the rails in attributing to the applicant and his party a superfluous intention to defend themselves as distinct from the property. That the applicant and his party might have been driven to this course is obvious, but they were in the right; they were entitled to protect their possession which more than once had been threatened by a show of armed force and they were provoked into adopting a solid and determined attitude of defence, but it was not, I am satisfied, with a view to provoking the other side to attack them personally, so that the right of self-defence would be called into play, that the applicant collected this force. Therefore, the findings of the lower Court that "in consequence of the presence of the Police the servants of the rightful party were not in any physical danger and that once the armed guard was present it was unlikely that physical violence would be attempted", and "that the accused are debarred by the existence of the Police guard from pleading that the lathials were placed there solely for self-defence" are really immaterial, in other words, having destroyed a defence which was never set up, namely, that of self-defence, the lower Court has held itself bound to hold that the assembly was, therefore, unlawful and has overlooked altogether the view that protection of lawful possession was in itself perfectly lawful and might properly be done by a body of men who were able to show that they were prepared not only to resist any unlawful violence to interfere with the possession but to defend themselves if it became necessary in the process. It seems to me that the conclusion has been arrived at not merely by a sort of misdirection but by applying such hard measures to the applicant as to amount in my opinion to a miscarriage of justice. This view applies equally to the co-accused who, however, were only fined Rs. 5 each and bound over. They appear to be satisfied with the result as far as they were personally concerned. At any rate they have neither appealed nor applied in revision, and I do not encourage either of them to do so at this stage when four months have elapsed since their cases were disposed of, but in the case of the present applicant I am satisfied that there is no reason either for punishing him or for binding him over. If at any future time he should commit a breach of the peace in this matter, which I hope having regard to the order under section 145 is now unlikely, the fact, that a serious warning was given him in this case, will no doubt be taken into consideration, but so far as he is concerned, I allow his application, quash both the convictions, and direct, that the order requiring him to give security be set aside. As he is on bail, he need not surrender and his recognizance will be discharged.

Convictions quashed.

BHUDHAR MAL MARWARI—PETITIONER

versus

RAMCHANDER MARWARI AND ANOTHER —OPPOSITE PARTY.

Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860), ss. 403, 406—Criminal misappropriation and breach of trust—Partner, whether can be prosecuted by co-partner—Complaint, dismissal of—High Court, power of, to interfere —Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), s. 439.

Where the necessary ingredients justifying a prosecution are present, the law imposes no bar to the prosecution by a partner of his co-partner of the offence of criminal misappropriation or of criminal breach of trust. [p. 976, col. 2.]

The fact that a complaint of an offence has been dismissed by two Courts will not of itself prevent the High Court from setting aside the order of dismissal and directing that the complaint be proceed with according to law. [p. 976, col. 1.]

Criminal revision against the order of the Officiating District Magistrate, Bhagalpur, dated the 1st November 1919, confirming in appeal the order of the Sub Divisional Officer, Bhagalpur, dated the 12th September 1919.

Messrs. Hasan Imam, S. K. Banerji and G. C. Pal, for the Petitioner.

Messrs. Manuk, C. C. Das and S. N. Palit, for the Opposite Party.

JUDGMENT.—The petitioner Bhudhar Marwari is a dealer in grains and the accused Ram Chunder Marwari and Meghraj Marwari are said to be his gomastas. The agreement between them was that half the profits in the business would go to the gomastas and half would go to Bhudhar Mull. It is said that Bhudhar Mull entrusted 646 and odd maunds of rice with the opposits party, the alleged gomastas, who could not sell the rice for a number of months and kept it in their possession. The rice not having been sold, a demand was made by Bhudhar Mull to which the opposite party Ram Chander and Meghraj replied that the rice had been washed away by the floods. Therefore, the petitioner Bhudhar Mull filed a complaint on the 12th of September 1919 before the Sub-Divisional Officer of Bhagalpore, who dismissed the complaint on grounds which I shall presently deal with.

An application being preferred against that order to the District Magistrate, he refused to interfere only on the ground that the accused were partners and could not be prosecuted by the complainant in a Criminal Court.

Against that order an application has now been filed in this Court, and the learned Counsel appearing on behalf of the petitioner urges that the order of the Sub-Divisional Officer as well as the order of the District Magistrate must be set aside as they are not sustainable in law.

In order to consider whether the order dated the 12th September 1919 is valid or not, it is necessary to reproduce the order which runs thus: "This is a complaint of a Marwari against his partners. He was not satisfied with 100 per cent. gain and now the partners are said to be cheating him. This is a thing which can be better adjudged in a partnership suit. Dismissed under section 203, Criminal Procedure Code, Enter mistake of law." The last words "enter mistake of law," in my opinion, are very important and clearly indicate what the learned Magistrate thought when he was dealing with the case. He seems to have been under the impression that a criminal action against a co-partner by a partner under section 403 or 406, Indian Penal Code, is not maintainable, because that is the only ground which he has given in his order dismissing the complaint under section 203, and I am confirmed in the view that I take of his order by the very last words which he has used. He implies that the complainant has mistaken the law applicable to the facts of the case and has selected a wrong tribunal for the redress of his wrong.

The Appellate Court upheld this order on the identical ground that a partner could not be criminally prosecuted by the co-partner. That this proposition of law is unmaintainable has been conceded before me and indeed it could not be supported. The authorities on the point are clear and convincing. The earliest case is that reported as Nrigendro Lall Chatterjee v. Okhoy Coomar Shaw (1), where the Full Bench of the Calcutta High Court held, superseding the previous decisions of that Court, that a partner, who dishonestly misappropriated or converted to his own use or dishonestly used or disposed of any of the partnership property which he was entrusted with, or had dominion over, was guilty of criminal misappropriation under section 405 of the Penal Code. No case has laid down a proposition to the contrary. Therefore, it must be held that the ground upon which the petition of complaint was dismissed by the Magistrate was not justified by law. Under these circumstances I have no doubt that the Magistrate's order cannot be upheld. But I have been asked by Mr. Das appearing on behalf of the opposite party to consider other circumstances in the case and he urges that sitting, as I do, in a revision Court I should not interfere with the order of dismissal if he can satisfy me that the order of dismissal is justified on some other grounds. I have acceded to that request and I have now to consider the circumstances which in his submission would be sufficient to uphold the order of dismissal under section 203.

He firstly contends that the petition of complaint distinctly shews that there had been more than 646 maunds of rice with the oppoeite party, his clients, before the 2nd of Baisakh. A portion of that quantity had possibly been disposed of; the balance left on the 2rd was 646 maunds and, therefore, he urges that unless a demand for the account of the whole was made, no action would lie with respect to the appropriation of the balance, that is, 646 maunds of rice which was found in the possession of the opposite party. I would have to wander in the domain of surmises if I were to draw an inference which I have been invited to do. I have got no materials on which, in my opinion, this inference could reasonably be drawn and I, therefore, feel that I must stick to the bare facts which I find in the petition of complaint, that the 646 maunds of rice which had been entrusted with the opposite party was found in their possession on that date.

It was secondly contended that unless there was a demand for account, criminal prosecution would be premature and reliance for this submission has been placed on the cases reported as Debi Prasad v. Nagar Mull (2) and Balthasar v. Emperor (3). In my opinion those cases, important as they are on the question of demand for accounts, are not very helpful so far as the present case is concerned.

I have found in the petition of complaint as well as in the statement on oath of the complainant that a demand was made from the opposite party and the reply was that the floods had washed away the rice. No further question of accounts can arise on this reply and, therefore, in my opinion, these two grounds on which the learned Counsel asked me to uphold the order of dismissal fail.

I have already shown that the grounds upon which the learned Sub-Divisional Officer as well as the District Magistrate stopped the prosecution are not justified under the law. I express no opinion on the merits of the case. It may be that the opposite party may succeed in law and facts, but I do feel that the prosecution itself should not be stifled on the ground on which it was dismissed by the two Courts below.

I would, therefore, set aside the order of the Sub Divisional Officer dated the 12th September 1919 and the order of the District Magistrate dated the 1st November 1919 and direct that the case may be sent back to the Sub Divisional Officer for a judicial consideration of the petition of complaint and the statement on oath of the complainant, bearing in mind that a partner can be criminally prosecuted by a co-partner provided the other ingredients justifying the prosecution are present. If he is satisfied that an offence has been prima facie committed he will issue processes. On the other hand, if he is satisfied that no processes should issue he will then proceed according to the provision laid down in Chapter XVI, Criminal Procedure Code.

Rule made absolute.

JHABBOO AND ANOTHER—APPLICANTS
versus
EMPEROR—OPPOSITE PARTY.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), s. 257—Warrant case—Accused, right of, to summon defence witness.

In a warrant case, the accused is entitled, under section 257, Criminal Procedure Code, to obtain the process of the Court for the attendance of a defence witness. [p. 676, col. 2.]

Criminal revision against the order of the Sessions Judge, Benares, dated the 5th December 1919.

Mr. G. P. Boys, for the Applicants.

The Assistant Government Advocate, for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.—The one and only question raised by this application is whether the applicant Jhabboo was or was not allowed the privilege, which in a warrant case is secured to every accused person by section 257, clause 1 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, of obtaining the process of the Court for the attendance of a defence witness of the name of Saiyid Hamid Husain. As a matter of fact the Magistrate who tried the case issued process on two occasions for the attendance of this witness.

He then refused to issue further process or to adjourn the hearing of the case. He has recorded an order which is apparently intended to express his opinion that the accused in repeating his application for the issue of process for the attendance of the said witness was doing so merely for the purpose of vexation or delay. The matter was represented to the learned Sessions Judge when the case came before him in appeal; he says that the Magistrate had given the accused every facility for securing the attendance of this witness and that the accussd was not prejudiced by the failure of this witness to attend. The plain fact of the matter is that the witness in question is an employee of the Canal Department, whose attendance could only be procured by the issue of process through the head of his office, or such other superior officer as had the power of granting the witness leave to attend the Court at Benares for the purpose of giving evidence. The accused himself was to some extent to blame in not bringing this matter more clearly to the notice of the Court, but in his original application for the issue of process he described the witness as an employee of the Canal Department in a certain sub-division, and this alone should have put the Court on its guard to see that process was issued through the proper channel. The first two processes issued by the Court proved infructuous simply on account of this mistake, for which I hold that the Court was itself most to blame On the third occasion process was ordered to issue through the proper channel. The order was passed on the 10th November and the date fixed was the 24th November. The sammons actually reached the witness on the morning of that date and he was naturally unable to attend. The blame for this cannot in any way attach itself to the accused. Either the Court committed an error of judgment in fixing so near a date as the 24th November for the attendance of the witness, or there was unnecessary delay in the issue of the process from the office of the Court. If it be true, as stated in the affidavit before me, that the summons was not actually issued from the Magistrate's office until the 14th of November, then some one in that office was entirely to blame. The accused was entitled under the law to the assistance of the Court in the matter of securing the attendance of this witness and I can find no ground for holding that his final application made on November the 24th was made for the purpose of vexation or delay, or for defeating the ends of justice. Nor do I see how the learned Sessions Judge can have arrived at the conclusion that the accused Jhabboo was not prejudiced by the non-production of this witness, when he does not know what evidence the witness may be prepared to give. The Magistrate seems to have acted in the matter under pressure, by reason of the fact that his transfer was impending: but the learned Sessions Judge could easily have summoned the witness himself and heard him. I think this ought now to be done, but that in the interest of justice, and for the convenience of the parties, this hearing might well take place in Allahabad rather than in Benares. My order is that I set aside the order of the Sessions Judge, of Benares in so far as this order dismisses the appeals of Jhabboo and Sanwalle, who are the two applicants in the matter now before me. The appeals of these two appellants will be restored to the pending file of and will then be transfered to the Court of the Sessions Judge of Allahabad for disposal. The learned Sessions Judge will issue process for the examination of the witness Saiyid Hamid Husain on some convenient date, by which the attendance of the witness can be secured and of which the appellants should have due notice. He will then dispose of the appeals according to law after hearing what evidence this witness has to give.

Order set aside.

CRIMINAL MISCELLANEOUS CASE No. 12 OF 1920.

February 23, 1920.

Present:—Mr. Justice Coutts.

RAGHUBAR SINGH CHANDER SINGH AND OTHERS—PETITIONERS

versus

EMPEROR—OPPOSITE PARTY.

Criminal proceedings, stay of, pending Civil suit—Discretion of Magistrate—High Court, power of interference of.

The postponement of criminal proceedings until the disposal of a Civil suit, brought in respect of the property which is the subject-matter of the criminal case, is entirely within the discretion of the Magistrate, and where in the right exercise of that discretion a Magistrate refuses to stay a criminal case, the High Court will not interfere. [p. 678, col. 2.]

Criminal revision against the order of the Sub-Divisional Officer, Banka, dated the 5th January 1920, refusing to stay the criminal proceedings against the petitioners pending the disposal of a Civil suit.

FACTS of the case appear from the following petition filed by the petitioners before the Sub-Divisional Officer, Banka:—

"The humble petition of the abovenamed accused most humbly and respectfully sheweth:—

1. That the accused along with Haldhar Singh, since dead, had purchased certain plots of land with crops from Musammat Siba widow of Kali Mian and others by virtue of a registered kobala and was in possession of the same land.

2. That there happened a serious occurrence over the disputed land inasmuch as it resulted in the death of Haldhar Singh in the quarrel.

3. That the accused (now complainant) in that case (Chandara Sinha v. Lootan Mian and others) were committed to the Court of Session under sections 302, 148, 302-149, Indian Penal Code, and the Sessions Judge convicted one of the accused Lootan Mian under section 304, Indian Penal Code.

4. That there was a counter-case to that murder case and that counter case is under trial and fixed for to day.

5. That the accused Chandra Singha along with another (Musammat of Haldhar Singh) has brought a title suit against Akbar Ali and others for confirmation of possession over the land in dispute, which is pending before the Civil Court, Banka.

6. That in this Court also the same subject matter is in issue and this Court shall also have to decide, apart from the findings and conclusions arrived at by the learned Sessions Judge, on fresh evidence the factum of possession of the party over the land in dispute.

7. That under the circumstances stated above the accused prays that, for the ends of justice and on the basis of certain reported cases of the Patna and Calcutta High Court, this Court will be pleased to stop the proceedings of the Criminal Court till the disposal of the Civil suit now pending before the Munsif of Banka between the same parties and having the same subject-matter in issue before both the Courts, Civil and Criminal.

9. And for this act of kindness the accused petitioner shall ever pray."

Mr. S. A. Sami, for the Petitioners.

The Assistant Government Advocate, for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.—This is an application in respect of an order of the Sub-Divisional Officer of Banka, who has refused to stay a criminal case under section 147, Indian Penal Code, until the disposal of a Civil suit which has been brought by the petitioner for a declaration of his title to and confirmation of possession of the land, the possession of which is a matter in controversy in the criminal case. The facts are not very completely stated in the application, but it appears that there were two counter cases, in one of which the petitioner was the complainant. In that case one of the accused was convicted and sentenced under section 304. After the decision of that case, a counter-case, which had been brought by the accused in that case against the present petitioner, was taken up and it appears that in consequence of this case having been taken up the Civil suit was instituted. It was entirely within the discretion of the learned Sub-Divisional Officer to refuse to postpone the criminal case and, in my opinion, he rightly exercised his discretion. I have been referred to the case of Khobhari Rai v. Bhagwat Rai (1) which was decided by a learned Judge of this

(1) 41 Ind Cas. 147; 1 P. L. W. 793; 18 Cr. L. J. 771.

Court, in which a criminal case was postponed until the decision of a Civil suit to settle the matter of possession of land with reference to which a riot was said to have taken place. The circumstances of that case, however, were not the same as the circumstances of this case.

I see no reason in the present case for interfering with the discretion of the Sub-Divisional Officer and I dismiss this application.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), s. 439—Revision—Pending case—High Court, interference by.

The High Court will not interfere in a criminal case during its pendency, unless there is some manifest and patent injustice apparent on the face of the proceedings and calling for prompt redress.

Revision of the order passed by the Magistrate, 1st Class, Amraoti, in Criminal Case No. 53 of 1919, decided on the 16th September 1919, charging the applicant under sections 420 and 511, Indian Penal Code.

Dr. H. S. Gour, for the Applicant.

The Hon'ble Mr. G. K. Dick, for the Non-Applicant.

ORDER.—This is an application for revision in which the petitioner seeks to have the criminal proceedings pending against him set aside on grounds of fact and law.

The case has been elaborately argued before me and Counsel on both sides invite me to decide difficult questions of fact and law. Certain points were argued before the Sub-Divisional Magistate and they were disposed of by an order dated the 5th September 1919. On the 16th September a charge was framed, and a certified copy of the order of the 5th September has been filed with the petition of revision. It has not been made clear to me whether the prosecution case is closed. I have come to the conclusion that I should not interfere at this stage.

In Choa Lal Dass v. Anant Pershad Misser (1) it has been laid down that the High Court will not interfere in a case during its pendency in a subordinate Court unless it is of an exceptional nature; and one test of its being of such a nature is that a bare statement of the facts of the case without any elaborate argument should be sufficient to convince the High Court that the case is a fit one for its interference at an intermediate stage. Similarly it has been laid down in Jagat Chandra Mozumdar v. Queen-Empress (2) that it is inadvisable to interfere in pending, case unless there is some manifest and patent injustice apparent on the face of the proceedings and calling for prompt redress. The case does not fulfil the tests laid down. Without expressing any opinion on any of the points discussed before me, I decline to interfere at this stage and dismiss the application for revision.

Application dismissed.

CRIMINAL REVISION No. 880 OF 1919.

February 26, 1920.

Present:—Mr. Justice Piggott.

HARIHAR PRASAD—APPLICANT

versus

EMPEROR—OPPOSITE PARTY.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), ss. 202, 203—Dismissal of complaint upon Police report of local investigation without hearing evidence—Dismissal, whether justified—Procedure.

In dealing with a complaint against a Police Officer a Magistrate does not exercise a proper discretion in dismissing it under section 203, Criminal Procedure Code, on the mere report of a local investigation by a superior officer of Police: he should himself hear the witnesses on whom the complainant relies to establish the truth of his allegation, and give his best consideration to their statements, along with the report of the local investigation. [p. 681, col. 2.]

Criminal revision against the order of the Sessions Judge, Benares, dated the 5th December 1919.

Mr. Fearey Lal Banerji, for the Applicant.

The Assistant Government Advocate, for the Opposite Party.

JUDGMENT.—One Haribar Prasad, who is the applicant before this Court, brought a formal complaint in the Court of a Magistrate of the first class, alleging that he had been abused and beaten by the officer in charge of a certain Police station. The complaint was taken cognizance of under section 323 of the Indian Penal Code and the Magistrate, after examining the complainant, decided to direct a preliminary enquiry to be made by a Deputy Superintendent of Police. I presume that the enquiry which followed was a "local investigation" within the meaning of that expression in section 202 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. The officer conducting it seems to have recorded statements made by witnesses who came forward on behalf of Haribar Prasad and by another witness, a certain ekka driver, in respect of whom it is a matter of controversy before me whether he was put forward by Haribar Prasad or by the accused Police Officer. It seems also to have been ascertained that there were definite, though not serious, marks of injury on the person of the complainant. The case came before the Magistrate with this report and with the record of the proceedings of the Deputy Superintendent of Police. He thereupon dismissed the complaint under section 203 of the Code of Criminal Procedure and called upon Haribar Prasad to show cause why his prosecution should not be ordered for having committed an offence under section 211 of the Indian Penal Code in the matter of the complaint filed by him against the Police Officer. The proceedings which followed were no doubt in substance under section 476 of the Criminal Procedure Code, though the Magistrate nowhere refers to that section and may not have realised that he was acting in virtue of powers which that section confers.

The final order in these proceedings was that Haribar Prasad be prosecuted for an offence under section 211 of the Indian Penal Code and be sent before another Magistrate for trial. Applications were made in revision to the Sessions Judge against both orders, namely, the order dismissing Haribar Prasad's complaint and the order directing Haribar Prasad's prosecution. I have before me two separate orders by the learned Sessions Judge, but in both of these the attention of the Court seems to be entirely concentrated on the question of the order directing Haribar Prasad's prosecution. With reference to this order the learned Sessions Judge was no doubt right, though I cannot trace the authorities to which he refers in holding that he had no jurisdiction himself to set it aside, though he could have referred it, along with the rest of the record, to this Court. What I do not find is that the learned Sessions Judge, upon either of these applications, fairly set himself to consider the simple question whether or not adequate cause was shown on behalf of Haribar Prasad for making further enquiry into his complaint which had been dismissed under section 203, Criminal Procedure Code. The action of the Magistrate was within his jurisdiction. The order calling for an enquiry by the Deputy Superintendent is covered by the first clause of section 202 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, always assuming that the enquiry intended was the "local investigation" referred to in the aforesaid sub section. The discretion given to a Magistrate by section 203 of the Criminal Procedure Code is a very wide one; he was within his jurisdiction in dismissing Haribar Prasad's complaint after examining the complainant and considering the result of the investigation which he had caused to be made under the section next preceding. It is, however, equally clear that the Sessions Judge would have been within his jurisdiction, under section 437 of the Criminal Procedure Code, if he had insisted upon further enquiry being made into Haribar Prasad's complaint. The fact that the dismissal of this complaint had been followed by action on the part of the Magistrate under the powers conferred upon him by section 476 of the Criminal Procedure Code, over which action the Court of Session had no direct control, is irrelevant to the point now under consideration. The learned Sessions Judge would have acted within his discretion if he had ordered further enquiry to be made into the complaint and proceedings to be stayed in respect of the order passed under section 476 of the Criminal Procedure Code, until the result of that further enquiry was known.

As far as I can judge from the orders now before me, the Sessions Judge did not look at the matter from this point of view at all. A certain responsibility is, therefore, thrown upon me of considering whether the interests of justice do or do not require that Harihar Prasad should be given an opportunity of producing his witnesses in Court. One of the practical inconveniences of the course which has been followed is apparent enough from the record before me. I have mentioned that one of the persons examined by the Deputy Superintendent was a certain ekka driver, and in the report of the "local investigation" it seems to have been assumed that the man so examined was the driver of the ekka on which Harihar Prasad was riding at the time when he alleges himself to have been assaulted by the Police Officer. In the petition before me it is alleged, whether truly or falsely I cannot say, that the man examined by the Deputy Superintendent was not the driver of that ekka, but was a person put forward on behalf of the accused Police Officer. The complaint of Harihar Prasad was one against a Police Officer in charge of a police station. It is a serious matter for a Magistrate in dealing with a complaint of this sort to rest content with the report of a "local investigation" by a Police Officer of superior rank and to dismiss the complaint without himself hearing the witnesses on whom the complainant relies to establish the truth of his allegations. It is not a question of the legality of the Magistrate's order under section 203 of the Criminal Procedure Code, but of the propriety of the discretion exercised in this particular instance. The proper Court to have dealt with this question was the Court of the Sessions Judge, and I am only taking it upon myself to deal with it because it seems to me that the Sessions Judge has omitted to do so. It may be that I am unduly influenced in this matter by the traditions of the school in which I was brought up; but I can assure the presiding officers of both the Courts below that no Sessions Judge under whom I worked as Joint Magistrate would have affirmed an order dismissing the complaint under the circumstances of the present case. If I had passed such an order, I should inevitably have received the case back from my Sessions Judge with an order under section 437 of the Criminal Procedure Code directing me to make further enquiry and at least to hear the complainant's witnesses myself. I can remember its being pointed out to me in a similar case that the burden laid upon me was not a heavy one, because there was nothing in the law which even required me to record the statements of the complainant's witnesses unless I saw fit to do so. What the Sessions Judge required of me in the case to which I am referring was a plain statement that I had myself examined the complainant's witnesses, heard what they had to say and given my best consideration to their statements along with the report of the officer who had conducted the "local investigation." In the present case I may add further that I think the question of the identity of the ekka driver, now that it has been raised, ought to be cleared up. The Magistrate ought to see and examine the ekka driver whose statement was taken at the "local investigation" and offer Harihar Prasad an opportunity of producing the man he alleges to have driven his ekka at the time, if he does not admit him to be identical with the person produced at the "local investigation." He might also have to explain why he did not make this point clear in the statement which was taken down when he appeared to answer the notice issued to him to show cause why his prosecution should not be ordered. In my opinion the present case called for an order under section 437 of the Code of Criminal Procedure on the part of the Sessions Judge and, as the whole matter is now before me and the record of the proceedings under section 476 of the Criminal Procedure Code has also been called for, I am competent to deal with both orders. As I propose to direct further enquiry to be made into Harihar Prasad's complaint, I think it more convenient to set aside .at once the order passed under section 476 aforesaid directing the prosecution of Harihar Prasad. I do so accordingly; but it must be clearly understood that I do this without prejudice to the jurisdiction of the Magistrate to take action again under that section, if he should see adequate cause to do so after the further enquiry which I direct to be made into Harihar Prasad's complaint. I set aside the order dismissing that complaint under section 203 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. I direct the Magistrate to take that complaint back on to his file of pending cases and to make further enquiry into the same on the lines which have been sufficiently indicated by this order.

Order set aside.

CRIMINAL REVISION No. 36 OF 1920.
February 23, 1920.

EMPEROR—OPPOSITE PARTY.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), ss. 4 (h), 190 (c), 200—Complaint—Complainant, whether must have personal knowledge of offence—Cognisance of case.

A complaint which is otherwise a proper complaint is not illegal because the person making it has no personal knowledge of the offence committed. There is nothing in the Criminal Procednre Code to suggest that a complainant must have personal knowledge of the offence. [p. 683, col. 2.]

Criminal revision against the order, dated the 11th August 1919, of the Sub-Divisional Officer, Sadar, Muzaffarpur.

FACTS of the case are that the Government of Behar and Orissa sanctioned the prosecution of the petitioner under section 197, Criminal Procedure Code, and concluded as follows:—

"Now, therefore, the Local Government, being satisfied that there is good ground for placing him on his trial in respect of the said offence, hereby sanction the prosecution of the said Babu Suresh Chandra Deb for the said offences in the Court of the Sadar Sub-Divisional Officer of Muzaffarpur on the complaint of the Court Inspector, Muzaffarpur, and direct that the prosecution be conducted by the Public Prosecutor of Muzaffarpur."

In pursuance of the said order of sanction Kailaspati Sahay, Court Inpector of Police, Muzaffarpur, lodged a complaint in the Court of the Sadar Sub-Divisional Officer, Muzaffarpur, on 11th August 1919. A warrant of arrest had been issued against the accused and ultimately the District Magistrate of Muzaffarpur on 5th November 1919 sent the following letter to the Resident in Nepal:—

"In continuation of my letter No. 2570, dated the 14th October 1919, regarding Babu Suresh Chandra Deb, Sub-Deputy Collector, Muzaffarpur, under suspension, charged with, among others, the offence of embezzlement under section 409, Indian Penal Code, under the order of Government, I have the honour to say that information has since been received that the Sub Deputy Collector has been seen in village Bhagawatipur Birta, within the jurisdiction of the Karanbara Cutchery, about 8 miles north of Majorganj Police Station in British territory. It has also transpired that Babu Suresh Chandra Deb has taken a farm in that village in the name of his son, the late Sadha Babu.

2. I have the honour, therefore, to request that you will be so good as to take necessary steps for the extradition of the Sub Deputy Collector. Evidence of criminality and nationality as required under the Treaties with the Nepal Government is enclosed.

3. A warrant of arrest has been issued for the apprehension of the Sub-Deputy Collector and endorsed in the name of the officer in charge of the Majorganj Police Station, to whom the offender may be delivered on apprehension by the officers of the Darbar. A copy of the warrant and a descriptive roll of the accused are also enclosed.

1. Copy of complaint of Court-Inspector, Kailas Pati Sahay.

2. Copy of order of Government sanctioning prosecution.

3. Copy of evidence recorded by Mr. Owen, late Sub-Divisional Officer, Sitamarhi.

4. Copy of statement of Court Inspector, Kailas Pati Sahay, regarding the nationality of Babu Suresh Chandra Deb.

5. Copy of warrant endorsed in the name of officer in charge of Majorganj Police Station.

6. Descriptive roll of Babu Suresh Chandra Deb.

Age ... about 55
Complexion ... dark
Other details... grey hair, stout built protruding eyes, prominent nose.
Height.....about 5 feet 8 inches."

The petitioner was, thereupon, surrendered by the Nepal authorities to the British authorities.

Mr. G. C. Pal, for the Petitioner.

The Government Advocate, for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.—This is an application by one Suresh Chandra Deb for quashing proceedings under section 409 and other sections of the Penal Code which have been instituted against him.

Suresh Chandra Deb was a Land Acquisition Deputy Collector, and the case against him is that he has failed to pay over certain monies which were due to be paid under the Land Acquisition Act. As Suresh Chandra Deb was a Government servant, sanction for his prosecution had to be obtained. This sanction was obtained and Government ordered his prosecution. The Court Sub-Inspector of Mozaffarpur made a complaint and as Suresh Chandra Deb had gone to Nepal, extradition had to be applied for. This was done and he was sent to Sitamarhi by the Nepal authorities.

Two points are argued in support of this application. The first is that the Court Sub-Inspector of Mozaffarpur had no personal knowledge of any offence committed by Suresh Chandra Deb and consequently the complaint made by him was illegal; and the second is that the extradition proceedings are illegal inasmuch as before he was extradited there was no evidence of his criminality. Statements of witnesses had not been recorded by the Magistrate before the warrant was issued and no depositions were sent to the Nepal authorities along with the warrant.

With regard to the first of these points there is nothing in the Criminal Procedure Code to suggest that a complainant must have personal knowledge of the offence, but I am referred to a certain decision in Chamroo Sahu v. Emperor (1). In that case a complaint had been made by the Government Pleader who had no personal knowledge, and the learned Judge certainly remarked that there was no proper complaint under section 200 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, but we do not know what the facts of that case were and I am unable to accept the contention that they have laid down the general proposition suggested. If, however, the learned Judges did intend to decide that a complaint which was otherwise a proper complaint was illegal because the person making the complaint had no personal knowledge of the offence committed, I am unable to accept their decision. "Complaint" is defined in section 4 (h) of the Criminal Procedure Code as an allegation made orally or in writing to a Magistrate, with a view to his taking action under the Code, that some person, whether known or unknown, has committed an offence, excluding only the report of a Police Officer. Section 190 (a) empowers a District Magistrate or a Sub-Divisional Magistrate or any other Magistrate, specially empowered, to take cognizance of any offence on receiving a complaint of facts which constitute such offence, and nowhere in the Code of Criminal Procedure can I find any authority for the proposition that the person making a complaint must have personal knowledge of the facts.

The second contention is based on a misapprehension. All papers which could possibly be necessary were submitted to the Nepal authorities with the warrant. This appears from a copy of the letter dated the 5th November 1919 to the Resident in Nepal, the last paragraph of which runs as follows:

(1) 11 C. W. N. 170; 5 Cr. L. J. 13.

SUNDARESAN, In re.

"A warrant of arrest has been issued for the apprehension of the Sub-Deputy Collector and endorsed in the name of the officer in charge of the Majorganj Police Station, to whom the offender may be delivered on apprehension by the officers of the Darbar. A copy of the warrant and a descriptive roll of the accused are also enclosed," and amongst the papers, which it appears were sent along with this letter, is a copy of the evidence recorded by Mr. Owen, the late Sub-Divisional Officer of Sitamarhi. The District Magistrate also says in his explanation that the extradition rules were complied with.

Under the circumstances I see no ground for interfering with the orders which have been passed in this case and the application is dismissed

CRIMINAL REVISION CASE No. 540 OF 1919.

CRIMINAL REVISION PETITION No. 459 OF 1919.

December 19, 1919.

Present:—Sir Abdur Rahim, KT., Offg. Chief Justice, and Mr. Justice Spencer.

In re SUNDARESAN—ACCUSED—PETITIONER.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), s. 190 (1) (c)—Cognisance of offence—District Magistrate, competency of, to take cognisance of offence on information received as President, District Board.

A District Magistrate, who is also President of the District Board, is competent, under section 190 (1) (c) of the Criminal Procedure Code, to take cognizance of an offence upon information received by him in his capacity of President of the District Board. [p. 685, cols. 1 & 2.]

Petition, under sections 435 and 439 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898, and section 107 of the Government of India Act, 1915, praying the High Court to revise the order of the District Magistrate, Coimbatore, dated the 16th July 1919, and direct the stay of further proceedings in R. C. No. 5 of 1919, on the file of the Court of the Taluk Magistrate, Avanashi, pending disposal of the revision petition.

FACTS appear from the judgment.

Mr. S. Subramania Aiyar, for the Petitioner:—A Magistrate cannot take cognizance of an offence under section 190 (i) (c), Criminal Procedure Code, except when there are legal materials before him which would be admissible as evidence in the case. See Mohesh Chunder Banerjee, In the matter of (1), followed in Jhuna Lal Sahu v. Emperor (2). See also Thakur Prasad Singh v. Emperor (3). In other words, the Magistrate is acting judicially.

[ABDUR RAHIM, OFFG. C. J.—There is no such restriction. The sub clause refers to suspicion, and there is no such thing as suspicion of a Court.]

Next, the information was received by the Magistrate, while acting as President of the District Board. Hence, he cannot himself arrest and prosecute the accused. Thakur Pershad Singh v Emperor (4) is an exact case. See also Lakhai Narayan Ghosh v. Emperor (5) where there is, however, a difference of opinion.

The Public Prosecutor, for the Crown, was not called upon.

ORDER.

ABDUR RAHIM, OFFG. C. J.—The District Magistrate of Coimbatore, who is also the President of the District Board, had information that a certain cheque had been forged and he has taken cognizance of the offence against the accused under section 190 (1) (c), Criminal Procedure Code. It is argued that he had no such power. But I must admit it is difficult to find any basis for such an argument in face of the language of section 190 (1) (c), which is to the effect that the District Magistrate may take cognisance of any offence "upon information received from any person other than a Police Officer, or upon his own knowledge or suspicion that such offence has been committed." There can be no doubt, upon the order recorded by the Magistrate, that he suspected that the accused had committed an offence of forgery and he has set out the facts which led him to that suspicion. Reliance has been placed in support of the petition upon several decisions of the Calcutta High Court: one of which is reported as Thakur Pershad Singh v. Emperor (4). There it is laid down, following two older decisions of the same Court [Queen v. Surendra Nath Roy (6), Mohesh Chunder Banerjee, In the matter of (1)], that a Magistrate taking cognizance of an offence is bound to disclose the information, private or otherwise, upon which he issues a warrant for the arrest of the accused. So far as that goes, the information is set out in the order of the Magistrate in this case. But it is further observed: "There is nothing on the record to show that the information, whatever it may have been, which he received was not lodged to him as Collector, and if that were so, it was not open to him as Magistrate to act on that information and proceed to issue warrants against the petitioners. Practically by such action he is making himself a judge in his own case, for the case seems to be that he with the other co-proprietors granted a lease on certain terms to Chamroo Sahow and that Chamroo has tampered with that lease."

It is argued that here the information which Mr. Macqueen had was derived from his position as the President of the District Board and that, therefore, he could not use that information in order to act under section 190 (1) (c). With all respect to the learned Judges who decided the case in Thakur Pershad Singh v. Emperor (4), it is difficult to see wherefrom they obtained the limitation which they imposed upon section 190 (1) (c) and I find that in a later ruling of the same Court [Lakhai Narayan Ghosh v. Emperor (5)] one of the learned Judges, Mr. Justice Carnduff, doubted the correctness of that ruling. It seems to me that when a District Magistrate is given such a wide power as to take cognizance of an offence on suspicion, it would be disregarding the express language of the Legislature to lay down that he cannot act if his suspicion or knowledge is based on facts which came within his cognizance in another capacity. It may be, that in some cases the exercise of such a power by Magistrates may cause considerable hardship and such a power may be liable to be harshly exercised. But we have nothing to do with that Where certain powers are conferred on the Magistrate by the Legislature, it is no business of the Court to lay down limitations which are unwarranted by the language of the Code.

The petition, therefore, must be rejected, but the accused will remain on the same bail pending trial.

SPENCER, J.—I concur. I only wish to add that I agree with the opinion of Mr. Justice Carnduff in Lakhai Narayan Ghosh v. Emperor (5) that the decision in Thakur Pershad Singh v. Emperor (4) goes beyond the provisions of the Code and is not a decision which can be followed without question.

Another case in Jhuna Lal Sahu v. Emperor (2) was quoted to us. But as I understand that case, there was a complaint in writing of which the Magistrate might have taken cognizance under section 190, sub-section 1 (a), and the learned Judges were of opinion that, having such a complaint before him, the Magistrate was not justified in taking cognizance of the same under section 190 (1) (c), as if it was a matter that had come to his knowledge from a source other than a complaint of facts constituting an offence, as "complaint" is defined in the Code.

EMPEROR—APPELLANT

TUREZI—RESPONDENT.

Evidence Act (I of 1872), s. 27—Statement by accused that he had buried dead body, admissibility of—Accused, knowledge of, of place where dead body is, whether sufficient for conviction—Evidence of eye-witness of murder, value of—Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), s. 417—Appeal against acquittal—Interference, when justified.

In a prosecution for murder a witness stated that the accused offered to point out the place where the dead body was and that on being questioned as to who had buried the body he said that he had done so:

Held, that the accused's statement that he had buried the body was not admissible in evidence. [p. 687, col. 2.]

The mere fact that a person knows where the body of a murdered man is buried is not in itself sufficient evidence to convict him of the murder. [p. 687, col. 2.]

A person who witnesses a murder and gives no assistance to the victim and after the murder keeps quiet and gives no information to the authorities is little better than an accomplice and his evidence should be received with caution. [p. 687, col. 1.]

Sound principles of criminal jurisprudence require that the indication of error in a judgment of acquittal ought to be clearer and more palpable and the evidence more cogent and convincing in order to justify its being set aside than would be necessary in the case of a conviction. [p. 687, col. 2.]

Appeal from the order of the Sessions Judge, Lyallpur, dated the 21st June 1919, acquitting the respondent.

The Assistant Legal Remembrancer, for the Appellant.

Mr. Cooper, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—This is an appeal by the Local Government under section 417, Criminal Procedure Code, from the order of the Sessions Judge of Lyallpur acquitting Turezi of the murder of Haveli, a canal mate, which is said to have taken place on the 7th April 1919 on the left side of Borala Branch near a canal bungalow. The judgment of the learned Sessions Judge shows clearly the evidence upon which it is sought to base the conviction of Turezi. There is the evidence of Nura and Hasan Ali, P. W. Nos. 2 and 3, to the effect that Turezi was the last person in whose company Haveli was seen alive on the 7th April. Nura has gone even further and has stated that he actually saw Turezi murdering Haveli and burying his body. The learned Sessions Judge has disbelieved Nura's evidence for reasons fully set forth by him in his judgment (page 17 of the paper-book). In addition to this we have the evidence of several persons that during the investigation Nura pointed out the place where the dead body of Haveli had first been buried and that when this spot was dug up, some hair was found and that an offensive smell was noticed but the body was not found. There is also the evidence that at a later time Turezi produced the dead body from another place near a water course some 400 karams from the alleged first place of burial. Round the neck was found a safa tied tight, and the medical evidence is to the effect that death was due to strangulation. The hair found at the first place of burial was not sent to the Chemical Examiner and there is, therefore, no positive evidence that it was human hair, much less is there any evidence that it was the deceased's hair. In regard to this the learned Sessions Judge says that there is absolutely nothing to show why this bunch of hair was left by the culprit at this particular spot. With reference to Turezi pointing out the place where the dead body was found, the Sessions Judge says that it is quite possible that he might have come to know of the presence of the body at that place accidentally while he was grazing his flock of sheep on the canal bank or in that neighbourhood and that, therefore, the fact that he indicated the place from where the body was recovered is not by itself sufficient to connect him with the crime. Mr. Jai Lal in arguing the case for the Crown has urged that Nura's evidence should be believed and that the discrepancies pointed out by the Sessions Judge between his statement before the Police and that made at the trial are immaterial. Apart from the discrepancies between Nura's statements at different times, we agree with the learned Sessions Judge that it is very difficult to believe his version of what occurred. He says that Haveli had collected some of Turezi's sheep which were grazing on the canal bank and had demanded some money from him in return for releasing the sheep, but that Turezi had no money with him at the time and entreated Haveli to let his sheep go. He says that while Turezi and Haveli were sitting on the canal bank discussing this and smoking, Haveli got up and Turezi caught hold of the two ends of his pagri which were round his neck and dragged him away from the canal bank, that after walking 40 karams Turezi gave him a blow in the abdomen and knocked him down, that the appellant twisted his pagri round his neck and killed him and then buried him in the ground. The Sessions Judge thinks it extremely unlikely that the appellant would have been able to drag Haveli so long a distance and that Haveli could certainly have struggled and release himself. Now, though Nura says that the appellant dragged Haveli some 40 karams, we find from the plan on the record that the distance is really 200 karams. This fact makes Nura's statement still more improbable. Haveli's hands were free and we do not think that he would have allowed himself to be dragged along such a distance. It has been held that a person who witnesses a murder and gives no assistance to the victim and after the murder keeps quiet and gives no information to the authorities, is little better than an accomplice and his evidence should be received with caution. If Nura's statement be true, he is little better than an accomplice. It is also clear that when he was questioned during the Police investigation, he denied all knowledge of the murder and that it was only after he had been questioned by the village notables that he consented to make a statement. Under these circumstances we think the learned Sessions Judge was fully Justified in rejecting his evidence.

We think it quite probable that he and Hasan Ali saw the appellant and the deceased together on the day in question, but we do not believe that Nura saw the murder committed.

Bakhtawar, P. W. No. 7, stated that during the Police investigation certain village notables had a talk with Turezi apart from the Police and that Turezi offered to point out the place where the dead body was. The witness says that on Turezi saying this we questioned him as to who had buried the body and he said that he had buried the body. Under this the learned Sessions Judge (page 11 of the paper-book) has made a note: "This is irrelevant." In other words, he has rejected as inadmissible this part of the witness's evidence. Mr. Jai Lal has contended that the appellant's statement that he had buried the body is admissible in evidence and refers to Queen-Empress v. Nana (1) and Isher Singh v. Emperor (2). In the Bombay case the accused, who was charged under section 411, Indian Penal Code, with dishonestly receiving stolen property, made a statement that "he had kept it and would show it and that he had buried it in the fields." He also made a statement, when pointing out the spot, to the effect that he had buried the property there. These statements were held to be admissible in evidence under section 27 of the Indian Evidence Act. In our opinion the present case is distinguishable. Here the accused did not make a statement of this sort, "come along, I will show you the dead body which I have buried." What he said was that he would point out where the dead body was, and in answer to a further question as to who had buried the dead body, he admitted that he had done so. In Isher Singh v. Emperor (2) the statement made by the accused while in Police custody in consequence of which arms were found buried in a field was held to be admissible in evidence against him. There the facts were similar to those in the case reported as Queen-Empress v. Nana (1), which was cited with approval. In our opinion the subsequent statement alleged to have been made by the accused that he himself had buried the body is not admissible in evidence. The fact that he actually showed where the body was buried is certainly a fact against him. But the mere fact that a person knows where the body of a murdered man is buried is not in itself sufficient evidence to convict him of the murder.

In King-Emperor v. Chattar Singh (3) it was held that in order to justify interference with a judgment of acquittal on a question of fact it is sufficient if the finding is clearly wrong on the evidence and unreasonable in the opinion of the Appellate Court. It was laid down that sound principles of criminal jurisprudence require that the indication of error in a judgment of acquittal ought to be clearer and more palpable and the evidence more cogent and convincing in order to justify its being set aside than would be necessary in the case of a conviction. Now applying these principles to the present case, we are quite unable to say that the judgment of the learned Sessions Judge is clearly wrong on the evidence or that the Court has obstinately blundered in coming to its decision. The decision was in accordance with the unanimous opinion of the three assessors, which was certainly entitled to weight. We have shown that the story of the alleged eye-witness is unworthy of credit. We do not think he saw the murder being committed. In our opinion he has probably given his evidence at the instigation of the village notables or the Police, and this fact throws grave suspicion on the case for the prosecution. We, therefore, are clearly of opinion that this is not a case where we should interfere with the judgment of acquittal and we accordingly dismiss the appeal. We have already directed that the accused be set at liberty.

Appeal dismissed.

CRIMINAL REVISION No. 270 OF 1919.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), s. 110, (e), (f)—Accused bound down under cl. (f)—Appeal—Finding altered to cl. (e), effect of.

Accused was bound down in security under clause (f) of section 110 of the Criminal Procedure Code. On appeal the District Magistrate found that clause (e) of the section was more appropriate, and, applying that clause, reduced the period and amount of the security. In revision it was contended that the procedure of the District Magistrate was ultra vires:

Held, that, inasmuch as clause (f) of the section describes the offence in clause (e) in an aggravated form and the accused was not prejudiced, there was no ground for interference.

Revision of the order of the District Magistrate, Seoni, dated the 2nd September 1919, in Criminal Appeal No. 40 of 1919.

Mr. W. R. Puranik, for the Applicant.

ORDER.—The applicant was called for under section 110 (f), Criminal Procedure Code, to explain why he should not be ordered to execute a bond for his good behaviour. The Sub-Divisional Magistrate eventually bound him over. On appeal the District Magistrate has found that the case falls under section 110 (e) and has reduced the period and the amount of security. In this application for revision it is contended that the procedure adopted by the lower Appellate Court was ultra vires and in support of this Arun Samanta v. Emperor (1) is cited. What was held in that case was that a person behaving indecently and immodestly towards women is not guilty of an offence involving a breach of the peace. In the present case the finding is that the applicant habitually assaults people without any provocation. In my opinion section 110 (f) describes the offence mentioned in section 110 (e) in an aggravated form. The applicant has, therefore, not been prejudiced by the alteration in the finding of the District Magistrate. Beating a person in a public place is an offence involving a breach of the peace within the meaning of section 110 (e). I know of no authority for the suggestion that only rioting amounts to breach of the peace, as argued before me for the applicant. As regards the merits of the case, sitting in revision I see no reason for supposing that the finding of the Courts below is not a correct one. The application is, therefore, dismissed.

Application dismissed.

APPEAL FROM ORIGINAL DECREE No. 147 OF 1917.

A purchaser at a revenue sale cannot successfully defend his title where the sale was brought about by fraud wherein the purchaser participated. [p. 695, col. 1.]

The rule that a Court of Appeal should be slow to differ from the primary Court on a question of estimate of oral testimony cannot apply to a case where some important witnesses never appeared before the trial Judge and were examined on commission, while some others were for the first time examined by the Appellate Court at the request of both the parties to the appeal [p. 694, col. 1.]

The determination in a cause should be founded upon a case either to be found in the pleadings or involved in or consistent with the case thereby made and a charge of fraud must be substantially proved as laid, so that when one kind of fraud is charged, another kind of fraud cannot, upon failure of proof, be substituted for it. But every variance between pleading and proof is not fatal. The Court must carefully consider whether the objection is one of form or of substance The rule that the allegations and the proof must correspond is intended to serve a double purpose, namely, first, to apprise the defendant distinctly and specifically of the case he is called upon to answer so that he may properly make his defence and may not be taken by surprise, and secondly, to preserve an accurate record of the cause of action as a protection against a second proceeding formed upon the same allegations. [p. 695, col. 1.]

The fact that a revenue sale is brought about by deliberate default on the part of the agents of one of the co-sharers who is charged with the duty to deposit regularly the Government dues proportionate to his share, does not render inapplicable the principle that due regard must be had to the relative position of co-sharers in respect of the payment of revenue and to the need of demanding from each such measure of candid dealing and good faith as will ensure that a co-sharer is not tempted to make a deliberate default with a view to ousting his co-sharers and appropriating to himself their common property. [p. 695, cols. 1 & 2.]

Fraud is an extrinsic collateral act which vitiates the most solemn proceedings of Courts of Justice and avoids all judicial acts. [p. 696, col. 1.]

No party to a fraudulent transaction can be allowed to derive any benefit from it and the Court is always reluctant to condone the fraud and to permit the participants therein to retain the advantage [p. 696, col. 1.]

A genuine mortgage cannot be extinguished by a fraudulent revenue sale. [p. 696, cols. 1 & 2.]

JUDGMENT.—The subject-matter of the litigation, which has culminated in this appeal, is a revenue paying estate bearing Touzi No. 2402 on the revenue-roll of the Collector of the 24-Perganahs. The annual revenue of the estate, which comprises the villages Atpur and Panditnagar, is Rs. 398-9-0. Default was made by one of the joint proprietors in the payment of revenue due on his share for the September instalment of 1914. At that time, a two-thirds share in the proprietary interest was vested in the plaintiffs and the remaining one-third in the father of the 4th defendant who, it is alleged, had granted a mortgage of that share to the plaintiffs. The entire estate was exposed for sale by the Collector for the recovery of the arrears due (Rs. 26-4-8) and was purchased by the 1st defendant on the 8th January 1915 for Rs 9,200. The father of the 4th defendant, Hemadakantha Ray, in whose share the default had taken place, died a day or two later. The plaintiffs appealed to the Commissioner, but their appeal was dismissed on the 1st June 1915. On the 18th August 1915 the plaintiffs instituted the present suit for declaration that the sale was illegal and had been brought about by fraud on the part of the first three defendants; they prayed accordingly that the sale might be cancelled or a conveyance executed in their favour by the ostensible purchaser on receipt of the purchase money. The 1st defendant was Satischandra Chatterjee, the auction purchaser on record. The 2nd defendant was Akshaykumar Chatterjee, alleged by the plaintiffs to have been an old enemy of theirs with whom they were at that time involved in litigation. The 3rd defendant was Sitanath Das, manager of Hemadakantha Ray, who was charged with the duty to pay Government revenue on behalf of his master. The plaint asserts that these three defendants entered into a conspiracy and decided to purchase the property at the auction sale in the name of the 1st defendant. The plaint further charges that the default was wilful and deliberate, made with a view to bring about the sale to the injury of the plaintiffs. The suit was defended by the 1st defendant alone, who filed his written statement on the 10th January 1916. He repudiated all the material allegations contained in the plaint, denied the charge of conspiracy, professed complete ignorance of the alleged deliberate default and fraud, and claimed to be the sole purchaser of the property, entirely on his own account, at the revenue sale. Upon these pleadings, the issues were framed on the 15th January 1916; the fifth issue raised the fundamental question in the suit: "Was the revenue sale brought about by collusion and fraud on the part of the defendants and was it legal and valid?" The Subordinate Judge answered this question against the plaintiffs and dismissed the suit. On the present appeal, which has been preferred by the plaintiffs, the only defendant who has entered appearance is the auction-purchaser Satischandra Chatterjee; the 2nd and 3rd defendants have been absent as they were throughout the proceedings in the Court below. After the appeal had been heard for some days, it became clear that the evidence of the 2nd defendant was necessary for the determination of the matters in controversy. Both the parties requested that he as well as his sons who had, according to the other evidence on the record, taken part in the transactions under investigation might be examined. The Court accordingly directed summonses to issue upon Akshaykumar Chatterjee and his three sons Taradas Chatterjee, Syamadas Chatterjee and Kalidas Chatterjee, and liberty was given to both sides to cross-examine these persons. Akshay, Taradas and Syamadas were examined but no questions were put to Kalidas. We have now to determine the points in dispute on the evidence taken by the Subordinate Judge and the Additional evidence taken in this Court upon the joint request of both parties. As we shall presently see, there is direct conflict of oral testimony upon the fundamental question in issue; it is consequently necessary to ascertain the points which are either admitted or proved beyond the possibility of controversy and then to test the allegations of the witnesses by reference thereto.

It is indisputable that default was deliberately made by the 3rd defendant in the payment of Government revenue due on the share of his master Hemadakantha Ray, the predecessor-in-interest of the fourth defendant. As the Subordinate Judge finds, the object was to injure the plaintiffs and the step was taken in collusion with the 2nd defendant, who, it was arranged, would purchase the entire estate, free from incumbrances, at the revenue sale. There is some discrepancy in the evidence as to the exact proportion in which the spoil was to be divided; the details of the proposed distribution are, however, not very material for our present purpose, and we need only observe that the story seems plausible that the 3rd defendant looked forward to a share for himself and another share for his master. The complicity of the 2nd defendant in what the Subordinate Judge calls a "nefarious plan," is proved beyond challenge. The oral evidence shows that he was approached long before the default was made, and there is unimpeachable contemporary documentary evidence as to what followed. On the day before the sale Taradas, the son of the 2nd defendant Akshay, sent the following telegram to his father who at the time was at Puri:

"Kumars Satis, Kshiroda, Hemada are joint proprietors of Touzi No. 2402, Mahal Atpur, 24-Perganahs, on Ganges near Kidderpur. Hemada did not pay revenue and will cause the sixteen annas Mahal to be sold to morrow. Hemada represents total income as Rs. 1,200 and requests us to buy the same in auction within ten thousand rupees and sell half to him. Going out to ascertain facts. Wire permission."

This telegram was sent at 12-45 P. M. and reached Puri at 1-30 P. M. We do not know the exact time when it reached the addressee, but at 3·30 P. M. Akshay despatched the following reply:

"May bid ten or twelve thousand if the income is as you represent."

This message reached Calcutta at 4 40 P. M. and would in due course be delivered to Taradas the same afternoon. What followed is a matter of controversy. The plaintiffs allege that the 3rd defendant Sitanath and Syamdas, another son of Akshay, visited the 1st defendant Satis (who it is asserted is distantly related to Akshay), apprised him of the impending sale and made arrangements for purchase in his name at the auction. The evidence on the side of the plaintiffs mentions another conference on the next morning. These conferences are, as might be anticipated, denied by Satis, and we shall presently return to the question. The fact remains that at the sale which was held by the Collector on that date (the 8th January 1915) bids were offered by two persons only, namely, by the 1st defendnat, Satis Chandra Chatterjee who was present, and by Akshay Kumar Chatterjee, the bids on whose behalf were offered by his son Syamadas The property was knocked down to Satis Chandra Chatterjee for Rs. 9,200.

Some weeks later, when it became known that the estate had been sold for arrears of revenue, endeavours were made by the proprietors of adjoining estates, namely, Maharaja Sir Prodyot Kumar Tagore and Raja Kisorilal Goswami to purchase the property from the auction purchaser on payment of a substantial profit to him. That such negotiations were made we feel no doubt whatever, and we shall at this stage examine the evidence as to what transpired at the time. Maharaja Tagore has been examined on commission and definitely asserts that he attempted to purchase the property from the auction-purchaser Satis Chandra Chatterjee, to whom he sent message to this effect through his officer Rajendra Nath Banerjee. The Maharaja is clear that Satis Chandra Chatterjee came to see him in this connection and said that he was unable to state anything without consulting Akshay, and his other partners. The wild suggestion was made in cross-examination that the Maharaja might have been imposed upon by false personation, but there is no indication that the plaintiffs were in any way connected with the intended purchase bythe Maharaja. On the other hand, the description which the Maharaja gives of Satis as a stoutish man who "stood rather uncomfortably" fits with the personal appearance of Satis, who had to be examined on commission on account of his malady (hydrocele) We see no reason to doubt the accuracy of the testimony of the Maharaja. He is supported by Rajendra Nath Banerjee, who appears to be a perfectly truthful witness. He adds that when he pressed Satis, the latter said that he would have to consult with one or two persons who had also interest in the property purchased, and when pressed much took him to the house of another person (some Chatterjee) on that very day. Rajendra waited in the carriage for sometime while Satis went inside the house; Satis returned with the news that Chatterjee was unwilling to part with the property. This evidence, if believed, unquestionably strengthens the case for the plaintiffs in a considerable measure. The probability of the truth of these allegations is enhanced by the evidence of the negotiations for a sale to Raja Kisorilal Goswami. His chief superintendent Asutosh Bhattacharyya has been examined on behalf of the plaintiffs. He testifies that attempts were made on behalf of his master to purchase the property from Satis Chandra Chatterjee. At first he sent his Muktear Tarapada Datta, but as the negotiations did not progess satisfactorily, he himself went to Satis in the middle of May. Satis stated that he would have to consult Akshay Chatterjee, whereupon the witness went to Akshay on three or four occasions. At first Akshay said that he would give his opinion after the termination of the proceedings before the Commissioner for cancellation of the sale: later, Akshay said that he could sell the property for Rs. 50,000. The witness was prepared to offer Rs. 25,000 only. Asutosh approached Akshay once or twice later on, but as the present suit had been instituted, he was asked to wait till its disposal. We have thus the combined testimony of Maharaja Tagore, his officer Rajendra Nath Banerjee, and Asutosh Bhattacharyya, the chief superintendent of Raja Kisorilai Goswami, that shortly after the sale, Satis Chandra Chatterjee was approached with a request to sell the property, that Satis Chandra stated that he could not act alone and had to obtain the consent of Akshay Kumar Chatterjee, and that the latter when approached demanded a price which the intending purchaser was not prepared to pay. No intelligible theory has ever been suggested why men of the status which these witnesses occupy should conspire to invent a falsehood of this description. On the other hand, their story seems exceedingly probable. There is not much room for doubt that the property had been sold at a price very much lower than its real value. Jute mills had been established in the neighbouring localities and demand for the land was insistent; both Maharaja Tagore and Raja Goswami were willing to pay down Rs. 25,000 to Rs. 30,000 for property which a few weeks earlier had been sold free of all encumbances for Rs. 9,200 only. It is equally significant that in this Court the defendant promptly rejected an offer by the plaintiffs to pay double the purchase-money. In these circumstances, it is very likely that adjoining land-owners like Tagore and Goswami should negotiate for a purchase of the property and that the negotiations should have taken the shape described by these witnesses. On the other hand, what is the position taken up by Satis and Akshay? They completely repudiate the alleged negotiations and interviews and suggest that the story is absolutely mythical. We are not prepared to accept their bare denial in view of circumstances presently to be narrated.

It is indisputable that Akshay was anxious to purchase the property and was in league with the 3rd defendant. His son Syamadas was present at the sale under the instructions of his brother Taradas and offered bids on behalf of his father. It is said that this was a real contest and that by some mistake Syamadas got the impression that he had offered a higher bid than his rival Satis and consequently he stopped at Rs. 9,100, although his father was prepared to offer as much as Rs.12,000. It is said, on the other hand, that this apparent contest was in substance fictitious, that Satis really had not sufficent money at his disposal to enable him to purchase the property and that the purchase was made in the name of Satis under a prearranged scheme for the benefit of Akshay, Satis and the 3rd defendant Sitanath. For the solution of the question in controversy, it is necessary to examine the position and conduct of Satis.

Satish Chandra Chatterjee is described as a habitual speculator who frequented the Collectorate and used to bid at almost all the revenue sales. His father left him a considerable sum of money and landed property. He managed to relieve himself of both cash and land, and, at the time when these proceedings took place, was heavily involved in debt. He was further addicted to drinking and irregular habits and is spoken of by the Subordinate Judge as rather a dangerous character. It is clear from the evidence that, on the date of the revenue sale, he had no money in hand. His story is that on his way to the Collectorate, he borrowed a sum of Rs. 1,000 from his cousin Tarak Nath Banerjee. There is some discrepancy in the evidence as to the form which the loan actually took; the promissory note recites that the sum was paid to him by his aunt in six currency notes, one for Rs. 500, the other five for Rs. 100 each; on the other hand, the Chalan with which the money was deposited in the Collectorate mentions a currency note for Rs. 1,000, an entry which is penned through. The explanation offered by Satis for this entry is not quite satisfactory, but it may be assumed for the present that he took from his aunt the currency note for Rs. 1,000 when he went to the Collectorate. The Chalan was undoubtedly drawn up at first for Rs. 1,000 and was subsequently changed into one for Rs. 2,300. Satis, who was examined first on commission, did not make an attempt to explain these discrepancies which are no doubt calculated to excite some suspicion. But his witnesses who were examined later, after the original Chalan had been produced, developed the story that while the bids were in progress he realised that the money he had brought was insufficient to cover the amount of the preliminary deposit of one-fourth of the purchase-money, so he went with the permission of the Collector to fetch more money. He returned with Rs. 1,500 which he borrowed from his aunt. No promissory note, however, is produced for this amount, though one is said to have been executed,

SATISH KANTHA ROY v. SATIS CHANDRA.

The existence of two entries in the Chalan, namely, an entry of Rs. 1,000 re-placed by an entry of Rs. 2,300, has not, in our opinion, been satisfactorily explained, and the story narrated by the witnesses as to the second loan of Rs. 1,500 is not convincing. On the other hand, the plaintiffs have made the very plausible suggestion that there was some secret arrangement between Satis and Akshay as to the proportion in which the purchase-money was to be contributed and that although the details of this scheme have not been successfully unravelled, the alterations in the Chalan point to that conclusion. We may here refer to an incident which is said to have happened at the close of the sale. It is said that there was a dispute between Syamadas and Satis as to whose bid was the highest. Syamadas maintained that no bid had been offered higher than his, but the Collector decided against his contention. That the incident did take place need not be questioned, and the estimate we formed of Syamadas when he was examined in this Court fits in with the theory that he may probably have been under an erroneous impression as to whose bid was the higher; but even if this be assumed, it does not necessarily militate against the view that whatever appearances might have been preserved, there was no real competition at the sale. In this connection we must not overlook the statement made in cross-examination by Asutosh Bose, one of the Collectorate Poddars, that the impression left on his mind was that the three men (Sitanath, Satis and Syamadas) formed the same party and were conversing with one another at the time of bidding. But the difficulties which surround this part of the case are, if not actually enhanced, by no means diminished when we come to examine the question of the payment of the balance of the purchase-money. Satis had clearly no money at his disposal, though the balance, Rs. 6,900, had to be deposited within the date peremptorily prescribed by the Statute. The story here is that Satis again raised the money by a loan, this time from the Adhikaris who were related to him by marriage. This transaction is hedged round by suspicious circumstances; Satis executed a deed of agreement to sell his ancestral garden to the Adhikaris: the agreement was not registered and the garden itself was under acquisition by the Calcutta Improvement Trust; in other words, the agreement was to convey property which Satis was in reality incompetent to transfer. The result was that the property was not sold to his relations and they are alleged to have been re-paid out of the compensation awarded by the Trust. If all these circumstances are calculated to throw doubt on the genuineness of the successive transactions, that doubt is certainly not removed when Satis solemnly tells us that neither before nor after his alleged purchase, has he made any enquiry as to the estate, the lands comprised therein, the quantities of the rent paying and the rent free lands, and the names of holders of lands of the latter class. The impression left on our mind, upon a careful scrutiny of the circumstances of the case as disclosed in the evidence, is that Satis is not the only person interested in the purchase. In our opinion, there is good ground for the theory, advanced by the plaintiffs almost immediately after the sale in their petition of appeal to the Commissioner, that Akshay Kumar Chatterjee has a substantial interest in the property, which was brought to sale in concert with him by the 3rd defendant and which he was manifestly anxious to capture. The story told by Priya Nath and Panchanan as to the interviews with Satis on the day previous to the sale and on the morning of that day cannot be summarily rejected as mythical. There was weighty reason why Sitanath should enlist the co-operation of a man in the position of Satis. The impending sale was to be effectuated by deliberate fraud. If Akshay purchased the property in his own name, the fraud would be easy to unravel; his well-known enmity with the plaintiffs would forthwith furnish a clue to the whole scheme. To make the situation safe, an apparent stranger had to be secured; Satis was specially suitable for the purpose, as he was a frequenter at these sales, although the number of occasions when he successfully offered bids is not confirmed by independent evidence and has probably been exaggerated. No doubt, Satis and Akshay have resolutely denied that they have ever known each other previously, but little reliance can be placed on their tesimony. Akshay and his son Taradas, who were both examined before us, produced a very unfavourable impression on our minds. The denial of all knowledge of this litigation by Akshay was an obvious pretence and there can be no question that at least one of the notices from the Court, namely, that concerned with the injunction proceedings, was personally served upon him. The attitude of Taradas in the witness-box did not, we regret to say, inspire greater confidence, and he felt very uncomfortable when faced with the telegram which he had admittedly sent to his father on the 7th January 1915.

We have minutely scrutinised the evidence and considered all the circumstances of the case. We have not also lost sight of the wholesome rule that a Court of Appeal should be slow to differ from the primary Court on a question of estimate of oral testimony. See Lalljee Mahomed v. Dadabhai Jiranji Guzdar (1), where the cases on the point are reviewed. Here, however, two important witnesses never appeared before the trial Judge and were examined on commission (Maharaja Tagore and the defendant Satis Chandra Chatterjee), while three other witnesses were for the first time examined in our presence at the request of both the parties. [See the observations of Lord Collins in Imdad Ahmad v. Pateshri Partab Narain Singh (2).] But we find ourselves wholly unable to accept the view taken by the Subordinate Judge. There is, in our opinion, no reliable evidence in support of the theory adopted by him that the 2nd and 3rd defendants have in this litigation helped the plaintiffs against the 1st defendant. On the other hand it is plain that the first three defendants are jointly interested in the purchase at the revenue sale, although the evidence does not enable us to determine the exact measure of the advantage reaped by each of them. Our conclusions may be summarised as follows:—

(i) That default was deliberately made in the payment of revenue proportionate to the one third share of Hemada by Sitanath acting in concert with Akshay.

(ii) That such default was made for a fraudulent purpose, namely, to deprive the plaintiffs of their interest in the property.

(iii) That Satis was taken into confidence and was apprised of this scheme; the arrangement made was that his name should be used at the sale and the purchase made for the benefit of Akshay, Satis and Sitanath.

(iv) That though the exact extent of the advantage intended to accrue to each of the persons concerned in this fraudulent scheme cannot be determined, it is highly probable that Sitanath intended that the property should not be entirely lost to his master.

(v) That Satis has not paid the whole of the purchase-money and is not the only person interested in the property.

(vi) That after the completion of the sale, negotiations took place between Satis on the one hand and neighbouring landlords like Tagore and Goswami on the other, but the transfer could not be accomplished without the consent of Akshay who demanded a higher price than what the intending purchasers were prepared to offer.

The question next arises, what is the relief to which the plaintiffs are entitled on these findings. But before we discuss the point, we must refer briefly to an objection urged by the defendant. It has been contended that the plantiffs who allege fraud can succeed only on proof of the fraud as specified in the plaint and that no variation between pleading and proof can be allowed. Our attention has been drawn to the circumstances that while in the plaint it is asserted that the 3rd defendant committed the fraud, it is stated by some of the witnesses (Priyanath and Panchanan) that Hemada himself was also a party to the fraud. On a comparison of the allegations in the plaint with the stories as narrated by the witnesses, it transpires, however, that there is no variation upon one fundamental point, namely, that the fraud was effectuated by Sitanath; it is not very material whether Sitanath intended to benefit or injure his master and whether he acted as he did with the knowledge and concurrence of Hemada. Whatever divergence there may be upon this latter point, the fact remains that, as narrated by Priyanath, as early as June or July 1914 Sitanath with Priyanath approached Akshay and it was arranged that the property should be brought to sale and purchased in the name of Akshay. It cannot thus be seriously maintained that there has been an infringement of the rule formulated by Lord Westbury in Eshenchunder Singh v. Shamachurn Bhutto (3) and by Sir Barnes Peacock in Mylapore v. Yeo Kay (4) that the determination in a cause should be founded upon a case either to be found in the pleadings or involved in or consistent with the case thereby made; nor can it be suggested that there has been any violation of the elementary rule of procedure laid down by Sir Barnes Peacock in Abdool Hossein v. Charles Agnew Turner (5) that a charge of fraud must be substantially proved as laid, so that when one kind of fraud is charged, another kind of fraud cannot, upon failure of proof, be substituted for it. We must further bear in mind that every variance between pleading and proof is not fatal: the Court must carefully consider whether, in the words of the Judicial Committee in Radha Mohun v. Jadoomonee Dossee (6), the objection is one of form or of substance. The rule that the allegations and the proof must correspond is intended to serve a double purpose, namely, first, to apprise the defendant distinctly and specifically of the case he is called upon to answer, so that he may properly make his defence and may not be taken by surprise, and, secondly, to preserve an accurate record of the cause of action as a protection against a second proceeding founded upon the same allegations. Tested from these points of view, the objection urged by the defendant proves to be groundless.

The question now requires consideration, can the purchaser, in view of the fraud whereby the sale has been brought about and wherein he has participated successfully, defend his title. We are of opinion that the answer must be in the negative. No doubt, the sale now impeached was brought about by deliberate default on the part of the agent of one of the co-sharers who was charged with the duty to deposit regularly the Government dues proportionate to his share. This circumstance does not, in our judgment, render inapplicable the principle enunciated by the Judicial Committee in the case of Deonandan Prasad v. Janki Singh (7), where their Lordships formulated the valuable doctrine that due regard must be had to the relative position of co-sharers in respect of the payment of revenue and to the need of demanding from each such measure of candid dealing and good faith as will ensure that a co-sharer is not tempted to make a deliberate default with a view to ousting his co-sharers and appropriating to himself their common property. This overruled the contrary opinion expressed in Doorga Singh v. Sheo Pershad Singh (8) and affirmed the principle recognised in a series of later decisions [Faizur Rahaman v. Naimuna Khatun (9), Ram Prosad Singh v. Pawan Singh (10), Janki Singh v. Debi Nandan Prasad (11), Harendra Lal Roy v. Purna Chandra Chatterjee (12)]. This view coincides with that adopted in the Courts of the United States regarding the mutual relation of joint tenants and the acquisition by one of them of an interest in joint property by purchase at a public sale for recovery of State dues deliberately withheld (Blackwell on Tax Titles, section 571, Black on Tax Titles, section 252, Freeman on Co-tenancy, section 158). In the case before us, the position of the purchaser is open to successful attack from another quarter. The sale here is collusive in the sense that the purchaser was pre arranged. The parties decided to utilize the stringent provisions of the revenue laws (framed for the speedy realisation of Government dues) for the accomplishment of their private fraudulent object. They put the machinery of the State in operation to cause injury to the plaintiffs and selected in advance the purchaser who was to hold the property for the benefit of himself and of his participators in the fraud. In such circumstances, as the Judicial Committee observed in Nawab Sidhee Nuzur Ally Khan v. Rajah Ooioodhyaram Khan (13) the Court will strip off all disguises from a case of fraud and look at the transaction as it really is, because "fraud is an extrinsic collateral act which vitiates the most solemn proceedings of Courts of Justice, and, in the words of Lord Coke, avoids all judicial acts, ecclesiastical or temporal." In cases of this character, the Court holds that the sale has no higher effect than a private alienation, and the purchaser who has taken with notice of or is implicated in the fraud is compelled to re-convey the property to the rightful owners. This is plainly a rule of honesty and fair dealing; no party to a fraudulent transaction can be allowed to derive any benefit from it, and the Court is always reluctant to condone the fraud and to permit the participants therein to retain the advantage. Numerous instances of the application of this doctrine are to be found in our reports [Chunder Nath Chowdhry v. Tirthanund Thakoor (14), Sreenath Ghose v. Huronath Dutt Chowdhury (15), Kishore Chunder Sein v. Kally Kinkur Paul Chowdhry (16), Harendra Lal Roy v. Solimullah (17), Uma Charan Mandal v. Midnapore Zemindary Co. (18)]. Consequently, in the case before us, the 1st defendant must be directed to execute a reconveyance in favour of the plaintiffs. This direction, however, can take effect only in respect of the two-thirds share owned by the plaintiffs, and cannot be legitimately extended to the one-third share owned by the 4th defendant. The representative of Hemada did not join as a plaintiff in this suit; she did not get herself transferred to the category of plaintiffs: nor did she, when the suit was dismissed by the Subordinate Judge, join in this appeal. The 1st defendant will consequently hold that one-third share, subject, however, to the claim, if any, of the plaintiffs under the alleged mortgage of the 24th July 1908. That mortgage, assuming it represents a real transaction, cannot be deemed to have been extinguished by the fraudulent sale, but the mortgage decree of the 4th December 1915 cannot be treated as conclusive against the 1st defendant, as he was not made a party to the mortgage suit, which was instituted on the 18th August 1915, after the revenue sale certificate had been granted to him on the 10th July 1915.

The result is that this appeal is allowed and the decree of the Subordinate Judge set aside. The suit is decreed in respect of a two-thirds share of the estate sold on the 8th January 1915. The 1st defendant is directed to execute a conveyance with regard to this share in favour of the plaintiffs on payment of a proportionate share of the purchase-money, i.e., Rs. 6,133-5-4. The plaintiffs, we understand, have not yet withdrawn from the Collectorate their share of the surplus sale proceeds. The entire sum in deposit in the Collectorate will accordingly be transferred to the Court of the Subordinate Judge to be dealt with by him under this judgment. The plaintiffs undertake to bring into Court any additional sum which, taken together with their share of the surplus sale-proceeds so brought in, may be required to make up the sum of Rs. 6,133-5-4. The time within which the additional sum is to be deposited will be fixed by the Subordinate Judge.

The decree will further declare that the 1st defendant will hold the remaining one-third share in the estate, subject to the dues, if any, of the plaintiffs under the mortgage of 24th July 1908. The plaintiffs are entitled to recover their costs both here and in the Court below from the first three defendants. The amount of Court-fees and hearing fees will be calculated only on two-thirds of the value of the suit and appeal.

Appeal allowed.

KANDREGULA ANANTHA RAO v. KANDIKONDA SURAYYA.

MADRAS HIGH COURT.

SECOND CIVIL APPEAL No. 210 OF 1919.

December 9, 1919.

Present :—Mr. Justice Spencer and Mr. Justice Krishnan.

KANDREGULA ANANTHA RAO PANTULU—PLAINTIFF—APPELLANT

KANDIKONDA SURAYYA AND ANOTHER—DEFENDANTS NOS. 1 AND 2—RESPONDENTS.

Contract Act (IX of 1872), ss. 64, 65—Contract, breach of—Receipt for money advanced written on same piece of paper as contract—Material alterations in contract—Damages, suit for, not maintainable—Advance, right to recover.

The fact that a receipt acknowledging an advance in respect of a contract is written on the same piece of paper as the contract and the latter is not enforceable owing to material alterations made in it by one party without the knowledge and consent of the other, does not disentitle the person making the advance from recovering it by means of a suit, although a suit for damages for non-performance of the contract is not maintainable.

Second appeal against the decree of the Court of the Additional Temporary Subordinate Judge, Rajahmundry, in Appeal Suit No. 27 of 1918 (Appeal Suit No. 63 of 1918 of the District Court, Godaveri, at Rajahmundry), preferred against the decree of the Court of the Additional District Munsif, Rajahmundry, in Original Suit No. 477 of 1916.

FACTS appear from the judgment.

Mr. P. Narayanamurthy, for the Appellant.—Whatever may be said as to the appellant's right to recover damages, he is certainly entitled to a refund of the amount advanced, viz., Rs. 1,200. The right cannot be negatived by the mere fact that it was mentioned in the same document which contained the other terms of the contract. The re payment of the advance is not claimed by way of enforcement of the contract. The plaintiff is entitled to treat the contract as void under section 65 of the Contract Act.

Mr. N. Rama Rao, for the Respondents.—If the document containing the terms of the contract between the parties is invalid and incapable of enforcement, it is invalid in its entirety. The advance is mentioned in the document and if it is a receipt, the receipt is also invalid on the same grounds which renders the document invalid. The plaintiff cannot rely on the document to get back the advance.

JUDGMENT.

SPENCER, J.—I cannot agree with the learned Subordinate Judge in his view that the plaintiff is debarred from recovering the advance made by him for the mere reason that Exhibit A (the contract deed) and Exhibit A (1), in which the receipt of the advance was acknowledged, were written on the same piece of paper and that a material alteration of one would affect the other with the taint of fraud.

In my opinion the defendant is bound to refund any advance taken by him, whether the contract is void or voidable and rescinded. In one case section 65 of the Contract Act applies, in the other section 64.

There is no question now of performing the contract. First defendant does not want to perform it and he may be treated as having rescinded it, as he set up in his written statement another arrangement by which the original contract had been superseded. In fact the 1st defendant in his written statement, paragraph 10, did not deny his liability to refund the advance of Rs. 1,200, but he alleged that satisfaction had been given as regards Rs. 500 and that only Rs. 700 remained to be paid.

As for the claim for damages for non-performance of the contract on the point of law, which is whether a plaintiff who has made a material alteration in an instrument containing a contract can recover any amount under it, I think we should follow Chitturi Surayya v. Boddu Ramayya (1), Gour Chandra Das v. Prasanna Kumar Chandra (2) and the case of Powell v. Divett (3).

In fact Mr. Narayanamurthi conceded after some argument that as the terms of the contract were embodied in Exhibit A, he was not entitled to recover damages independently of this document.

The only question then left was as to the appellant's (plaintiff's) right to recover the advance of Rs. 1,200, and this must be found for the appellant on the strength of 1st defendant's admission and the reasons given above.

The result will be that the appeal will be allowed with proportionate costs in this and the lower Appellate Court on this part of the plaintiff's claim and the decree of the District Munsif will be restored against 1st respondent and the second appeal dismissed with costs against 2nd respondent, who, it is conceded, has been unnecessarily made a party to this appeal.

KRISHNAN, J.—I accept the finding of the lower Court that the written contract Exhibit A has been materially altered by the plaintiff without the knowledge and consent of the 1st defendant, the other party to it. On that finding we must hold that plaintiff is not entitled to enforce that contract: see Powell v. Divett (3), and that his suit, so far as it is for damages, was rightly dismissed as it would be enforcing the contract to give him such damages.

It is, however, argued that plaintiff is nevertheless entitled to repayment of the Rs. 1,200 paid by him as an advance to the 1st defendant and the claim is made under section 64 or 65 of the Contract Act. The view of the lower Appellate Court that Exhibit A (1), the receipt given for the money, is also rendered invalid by the alteration in Exhibit A does not seem to me to be supportable. It is only a receipt for the money paid. If the repayment of that money is claimed by way of enforcement of the contract, no doubt plaintiff will be met by the objection based on its material alteration. But it is not so claimed. The lower Courts have found that the 1st defendant did not perform the contract but on the other hand he committed breach of it. Though plaintiff cannot take advantage of the breach to claim damages, he is not precluded from relying upon it and treating the contract as having become void under section 65 and requiring the defendant to repay the money advanced to him. Illustration (c) of section 65 seems to indicate that the section is meant to apply also to cases where one party breaks a contract and the other party, in consequence of it, rescinds it. The material alteration, though it prevents plaintiff from enforcing the contract, does not seem to prevent him from rescinding it. No authority has been cited to show that it does. On the other hand the ruling in Chitturi Surayya v. Boddu Ramayya (1) would seem to support the view that the money advanced could be claimed back. Plaintiff would, therefore, be entitled to be paid back the Rs. 1,200 that he paid.

The second appeal, so far as it stands against the 2nd respondent, is not pressed. I would, therefore, allow the second appeal against the 1st respondent and reversing the decree of the Subordinate Judge restore that of the District Munsif. Plaintiff will pay and receive proportionate costs so far as the 1st respondent is concerned in this and the lower Appellate Court.

The second appeal is dismissed with costs against the 2nd respondent.

Transfer of Property Act (IV of 1882), ss 6, 43, scope of—Transfer by expectant heir of chance of succession—Mortgage of reversionary rights—Mortgagor's subsequent succession to property, effect of—Pardanashin lady, document executed by, when can be enforced.

An expectant heir, who transfers a portion of the property included in the succession which he expects, does transfer his chance of succession so far as that portion of the property is concerned. [p. 701, col. 2]

Section 6 of the Transfer of Property Act does not prohibit the transfer of a spes successionis. All that it provides is that such a transfer cannot be made for the reason that a spes successionis is not property and, therefore, the execution of a document purporting to transfer the spes successionis purports to transfer property which does not exist. [p. 701, col. 2; p. 702, col 1.]

In order to bring a transaction within the scope of section 43 of the Transfer of Property Act it is not necessary that the representation made by the transferor should be false: it is sufficient that his representation should be erroneous. [p. 702, col. 2.]

B. sued C the mother of her deceased husband H., for recovery of a certain amount with interest secured by a mortgage executed by C. in favour of H, hypothecating her reversionary rights in her father's property and undertaking to repay the mortgage-debt as soon as she should obtain possession of the property. In addition to other pleas about consideration, etc., it was urged on behalf of the defendant that the mortgage was void inasmuch as at the time of its execution, C. was not in possession of the property but had with regard to it merely a spes successionis. It appeared that subsequent to the execution of the deed of mortgage C. succeeded to the property and obtained possession:

First appeal from the decree of the Senior Subordinate Judge, Delhi, dated the 15th March 1916, dismissing the plaintiff's suit with costs.

The Hon'ble Pandit Sheo Narain, Mr. Gullu Ram and Lala Moti Sagar, R. S., for the Appellant.

Bakhshi Tek Chand and Lala Jagan Nath, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This appeal arises out of a suit brought by Musammat Bhagwati against Musammat Chaoli, the mother of the plaintiff's deceased husband, Har Parshad. The suit was for the recovery of Rs. 4,500 principal and Rs. 5,250 interest secured by a mortgage executed by Musammat Chaoli in favour of her son Har Prashad on the 20th October 1905. The mortgage or rather deed of hypothecation recites that the executant had been forced into litigation with her step-mother over the administration of the property left by the executant's father, that her son Har Parshad had conducted the litigation on her behalf and had met expenses thereof, so that after adjustment of the account between them Rs. 4,000 principal and Rs. 500 interest were found due to him and the executant accordingly hypothecated her rights, i. e., her reversionary rights, in her father's property, and undertook to re-pay the mortgage debt as soon as she should obtain possession of the property, i. e., on the death of her step-mother. The defence pleas were that the deed was fictitious and without consideration and had not been consciously executed by the defendant. Further that as the defendant was not at the time in possession of the property but had with regard to it merely a spes successionis, the mortgage was void.

The Court below has dismissed the suit, on the grounds that the deed of mortgage is in any case void as at the time of its execution the defendant was merely a reversioner with an expectation of succession and that such a transfer is prohibited by section 6 of the Transfer of Property Act, and it further finds that the defendant was a pardanashin lady and that it has not been established that the nature of the document had been explained to her, or that she had any independent advice in the matter.

The first argument before this Court is that though admittedly the transfer of his right by an expectant does not confer on the transferee any right in præsenti, yet if the expectant subsequently acquires that right, the defect in the transfer is cured, and reference is made to section 43 of the Transfer of Property Act. The second argument employed is that the transaction under consideration is not such as is contemplated by section 6 (a) of the Transfer of Property Act inasmuch as what was transferred was not the chance of succession to the estate, for the transaction was a mere mortgage and not a transfer of the right of succession, as the right of succession remained with the defendant and she has in fact subsequently succeeded to the property left by her father.

With regard to the contentions that consideration for the mortgage had not been established, that it had not been shown that the provisions of the mortgage-deed were not thoroughly explained to Musammat Chaoli and that she had no independent advice in the matter, it is retorted that the document is of a simple nature, that it is an admitted fact that Musammat Chaoli did prosecute litigation against her step-mother Musammat Bhoi, that there is evidence on the record that approximately Rs. 4,000 were expended in that litigation and that that sum, having regard to the duration of that litigation, was quite a moderate sum to expend. Further it is pointed out from copies of letters on the record that after the execution of this mortgage the defendant Musammat Chaoli recognized that a burden of debt lay upon her property and that interest on that debt was accruing.

We shall first deal with the question of execution of and consideration for the mortgage-deed, and on this point we think the appeal must succeed. Much has been said of what it is necessary for the plaintiff to establish when he seeks to enforce a document which has been executed by a pardanashin lady; but no rule of general applicability can be laid down, each case must be decided with reference to its own facts and all that is necessary is to convince the Court that the transaction was a fair one and that the lady understood the act to which she was subscribing. Now the suit against Musammat Bhoi was instituted in August 1900. It was dismissed in July 1901 by the first Court but was appealed to this Court in 1904 and was finally decided in 1907. Throughout that litigation in all the Courts Counsel of high standing were engaged on behalf of Musammat Chaoli and the following fees appear to us to have been paid, Rs. 500 to Piare Lal, Rs. 500 to Kirkpatrick, Rs. 250 to Madan Gopal in the Delhi Courts and Rs. 350 to Shadi Lal. All these four items aggregate Rs. 1,600. In addition Rs. 220 were expended on printing the appeal in this Court, Rs. 20 per mensem were paid to an agent Piare Lal and in addition there were subsistence and travelling expenses for witnesses, so that it appears to us that Rs. 4,000 is a very fair estimate of what the litigation really did cost, and therefore, if Har Parshad, the son of Musammat Chaoli, bore the costs of the litigation out of his own funds, there appears to us to be no cause for cavil regarding the amount charged upon the property.

The next point is whether Har Parshad expended this amount out of his own funds or whether they were provided by Musammat Chaoli. Now Musammat Chaoli's husband appears to have been an employee on small pay and to have died many years before the inception of this litigation. There are some vague assertions that Musammat Chaoli sold her ornaments and so provided funds, but with the exception of one witness Gattu Mal, who stated that in 1901 Har Parshad sold a necklace, there is no definite evidence that funds were obtained for this litigation by the sale of jewellery and even Gattu Mal is unable to say to whom the necklace really belonged. On the other hand, there is no evidence to show from what source Har Parshad obtained the money, but admittedly at the time he held a fairly lucrative post in Indore State. He is now dead and his widow, the plaintiff, is probably not conversant with the manner in which her husband conducted his affairs. It is noteworthy that the defendant Musammat Chaoli has not gone into the witness box. She has not explained whence she obtained the large sum that must have been expended upon the litigation, and the letters (printed at pages 13-16 of the paper book) which we are satisfied were written on her behalf to her son Har Parshad, indicate that she and Har Parshad were on the best of terms and that she recognised that her estate was encumbered with debt on which interest was accruing.

This failure of the defendant to place herself in the witness-box is a serious weakness in her case. It is true that she is an old woman, but it was her duty to show not only that she provided the sinews of war for the litigation against Musammat Bhoi, but also to detail the manner in which she was induced by misrepresentation to execute the mortgage-deed. In her pleas she suggests that Har Parshad secured the execution of this document by giving her to understand that it was some document required for the conduct of the litigation, but this is a very improbable story, inasmuch as at the time of the execution of the document the litigation had come to a term. Further the document was registered at the very house of Musammat Chaoli. It was attested by several witnesses, of whom two have been produced. Of these one is Chunna Mal, the grandson of Musammat Chaoli, who at that time appears to have been regarded by all parties as an heir of Musammat Chaoli. It is true that according to the strict Hindu Law, inasmuch as his father predeceased Musammat Bhoi and the right of representation does not exist under Hindu Law, Chunna Mal is not an heir, but it is hard to avoid the conclusion, from certain remarks appearing in the letters above referred to, that all the members of the family at that time regarded Chunna Mal as an heir. It must be presumed further that the Sub-Registrar carried out his duties in accordance with law and satisfied himself that Musammat Chaoli understood the contents of the document that she admitted, so that although the evidence is not very clear that the contents of the document were explained to the executant, all the surrounding circumstances indicate that she was thoroughly aware of the nature and of the provisions of the document in suit. Stress has been laid upon the fact that although Har Parshad lived in 1913, he did not sue upon the document in suit during his lifetime. In this delay of his we can see nothing sinister. He was aware that his mother did not possess any ready money. His debt was secure and his funds were earning interest, so that there was no particular reason why he should demand repayment of the debt so long as his mother lived and until it became necessary for him to partition the heritage with his co-heirs. For the foregoing reasons we hold it as established that Musammat Chaoli was able to take sufficient interest in her affairs in spite of the fact that she was a pardanashin lady and that Har Parshad expended some Rs. 4,000 over the litigation against Musammat Bhoi. Further that Musammat Chaoli fully understood the nature of the document upon which this suit is based.

Turning now to the legal question in the case we have to consider whether section 6 of the Transfer of Property Act is fatal to the suit and whether the plaintiff is not entitled to a relief on equitable grounds. The Court below has held that inasmuch as Musammat Bhoi was alive in 1905, the date of the execution of the hypothecation deed, all that Musammat Chaoli had to convey was a mere spes successionis or chance of succession in the hypothecated property and that the transfer was a nullity and has no effect in law. It referred to Achhan Kuar v. Thakur Das (1), Nund Kishore Lal v. Kanee Ram Tewary (2), Hargawan Magan v. Baij Nath Das (3), Sumsuddin v. Abdul Husein (4) and Bhagan v. Munnu (5).

The learned Counsel for the appellant has conceded that the transfer of a right in expectancy does not convey any right in præsenti, but has contended that if the executant of such a transfer subsequently acquires title, the defect in the transfer is made good; that in any case if the transfer of a chance of succession is invalid, it is still tantamount to a contract of transfer as soon as the expectancy develops into actual title and should be treated as such; that as a matter of fact the transfer by Musammat Chaoli was not the transfer of a chance of succession, inasmuch as the transaction purported to be a mere mortgage which did not transfer the title and that as a matter of fact Musammat Chaoli, in spite of the execution of the document, had obtained the succession. Counsel elaborated this latter argument by adding that a succession connoted a whole bundle of rights and that if the property comprised in the succession was transfered piecemeal, that transfer could not be regarded as one of succession. This argument was lukewarmly advanced and we have no hesitation in holding that an expectant heir, who transfers a portion of the property included in the succession which he expects, does transfer his chance of succession so far as that portion of the property is concerned.

Section 6 of the Transfer of Property Act does not, however, in our opinion, prohibit the transfer of a spes successionis. All that it provides is that such a transfer cannot be made, for the reason that a spes successionis is not property and, therefore, the execution of a document purporting to transfer the spes successionis purports to transfer property which does not exist. Furthermore, it must be remembered that though the principles of the Transfer of Property Act are binding upon the Courts of the Punjab, the Act itself with its technicalities has no force as such in the Province; and the learned Counsel for the appellant has urged that the principles of section 43 of that Act apply to this case. That section provides that where a person erroneously represents that he is authorised to transfer certain immoveable property and professes to transfer such property for consideration, such transfer shall operate on any interest which the transferor may acquire in such property at any time during which the contract of transfer still subsists. A similar provision is to be found in section 18 of the Specific Relief Act, but that section considers only the cases of sales and leases and not that of mortgages, and that omission is no doubt due to the circumstance that no one can be forced to borrow money.

It remains now to consider whether in the cases cited by the lower Court or in the decisions cited at the Bar of this Court, there is anything fatal to the contentions of the appellant. Achhan Kuar v. Thakur Das (1) does include a finding that interest in expectancy cannot be transferred, but the case was decided on other grounds which affected the merits of the case. In Nund Kishore Lal v. Kanee Ram Tewary (2) the same proposition of law was accepted, but the dispute in that suit was not between the mortgagor and the mortgagee, but between the mortgagee and a subsequent bona fide purchaser for value of the mortgagor's rights, so that the case offered no scope for equitable treatment of the mortgagor's claims. In Hargawan Magan v. Baij Nath Das (3) at the time of the suit the transferee of the right of expectancy had died and the transferor had recovered his rights as the heir of the transferee, so that this decision is of no help in this matter. Bhagan v. Munnu (5) is a decision in which it was held that an agreement with a contract purporting to transfer property which is incapable of transfer was not enforcible and the question whether the plaintiff in that case was entitled to any equitable relief was not raised. In Gajadhar Singh v. Kandhaya Bukhsh (6) it was held that a deed of agreement by which a reversioner agreed to give a share in the property on the estate falling into his possession was not one falling within the purview of section 6 of the Transfer of Property Act, inasmuch as the deed did not purport to be a transfer in præsenti of the reversionary right, but was merely an agreement to convey the property in future. The facts of that case so far resemble the facts of the case now before us that although Musammat Chaoli did purport to transfer her interest by way of hypothecation in præsenti, she stipulated that she should not be liable to pay the mortgage debt until the property fell into her possession. Surendranath Dey v. Rajindra Chandra (7) is a decision which is completely in favour of the appellant's contentions, for it was held therein that a mortgage of non-existent property, though inoperative as a conveyance, is operative as an executory agreement which attaches to the property the moment it is acquired by the mortgagor and in equity transfers the beneficial interest to the mortgagee without any fresh act done by the mortgagor in confirmation of the mortgage; and reference is therein made to Holroyd v. Marshall (8) and Collyer v. Isaacs (9). In King, Ex parte; King, In re (10) it was held that if an assignor with a defective title purports and intends to assign property for value, any interest subsequently acquired by him in that property is available in equity to make the assignment effectual, even though the defect in the title is apparent on the face of the assignment.

Now in order to comply with the conditions of section 43 of the Transfer of Property Act it is not necessary that a representation made by the transferor should be false; it is sufficient that his representation should be erroneous; it is highly probable that neither Har Parshad nor Musammat Chaoli was familiar with the legal doctrine which is embodied in section 6 of the Transfer of Property Act, and there can be no doubt that Musammat Chaoli believed that in executing the hypothecation deed she was making, and that Har Parshad in accepting it believed that he was taking, a valid conveyance of her right and if the matter be judged by the standards of conscience and ordinary honesty, there can be no doubt that Musammat Chaoli, now that her title in the property has become concrete, has to satisfy the claim preferred by the widow of Har Parshad.

For these reasons we accept the appeal and set aside the decree of the Court below, to which we remit the case for decision of the remaining issues. Costs shall follow the final event.

Madras Land Revenue Assessment Act (I Mad. of 1876), preamble, ss. 1, 2, 6—'By sale or otherwise,' in preamble, whether includes acquisitions by prescription—Application for separate registration—Concurrence of alienor and alienee, absence of, effect of—Suit under s. 6, maintainability of.

The expression 'by sale or otherwise' in the preamble to the Madras Land Revenue Assessment Act includes acquisitions by prescription.

Notwithstanding the absence of concurrence of both alienor and alienee to an application under section 1 of the Madras Land Revenue Assessment Act, the remedy of the party aggrieved by the Collector's order under section 2 is to institute a uit under section 6 of the Act.

Second appeals against the decrees of the Court of the Temporary Subordinate Judge, Vizagapatam, in Appeal Suits Nos. 125 and 126 of 1916 respectively, preferred against the decrees of the Court of the District Munsif, Chodavaram, in Original Suits Nos. 933 and 770 of 1913 respectively.

Mr. P. Narayanamurthy, for the Appellants.

The Hon'ble Mr. S. Srinivasa Aiyangar (Advocate-General), for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—It is argued that the orders of the Special Deputy Collector were ultra vires and outside the scope of his authority under Act I of 1876, because (1) plaintiffs claimed by prescription and that is not a case of alienation; (2) they and the Zemindar, to whom the land originally belonged, did not concur in applying for separate registration.

As regards (1) we have been shown no reason for excluding acquisitions by prescription from the description "Sale or otherwise."

As regards (2) Fischer v. Secretary of State for India in Council (1) shows that notwithstanding the absence of both parties' concurrence in the application, the aggrieved party's remedy is by a suit under section 6 of the Act.

In any case, however, it does not seem to us that plaintiffs have any grievance, on which they can sue. They admit before us that the suit land was originally the property of the Zemindar and that they have acquired it. In these circumstances they are, whatever errors there were in the procedure of the Deputy Collector under the Act, bound to pay their proportion of the peshkush and to submit to separate registration in token of that liability.

The second appeals are dismissed with costs, one set.

Srimati RADHASUNDARI DEBI, MINOR, BY HER FATHER AND GUARDIAN HARI NATH NATH—PRINCIPAL DEFENDANT AND Srimati GYANADA SUNDARI DEBI—Pro forma DEFENDANT —RESPONDENTS.

Hindu Law—Dayabhaga School—Succession of females—Unchastity, effect of.

Under the Dayabhaga School of Hindu Law, chastity is a condition precedent before the right of inheritance can accrue to women generally. An unchaste mother, therefore, is not entitled to succeed to the estate of her son.

Appeal against the decree of the Subordinate Judge, 2nd Court, Burdwan, dated the 5th August 1915, affirming the decree of the Additional Munsif, Kalna, dated the 4th August 1914.

Babu Baranasibasi Mukherjee, for the Appellant.

Babu Brojolal Chakravartty and Sailendra Nath Mukherjee, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This is an appeal by the plaintiff in a suit for recovery of possession of land on establishment of title by purchase. The property belonged to one Babu Lal Nath, and, upon his death, was inherited by his three sons, all of whom were dead at the date of the institution of this suit. The first defendant is the widow of the eldest son and has admittedly inherited one-third share of the property. The dispute relates to the remaining two-thirds share. The second defendant is the widow of the original owner and claims to have inherited this two-thirds share on the death of her second and third sons, both of whom were unmarried. The case for the plaintiff is that he has purchased their two-thirds share from the second defendant. The case for the first defendant, on the other hand, is that the second defendant, her mother-in-law, became unchaste, shortly after the death of her husband Babu Lal, and, consequently, never ceeded to the estate left by her two sons, which accordingly passed to their brother, her husband. The Courts below have concurrently found the facts in favour of the first defendant and have held that the plaintiff has derived no title under his conveyance from the second defendant who was in his keeping. On the present appeal, the findings of fact could not be and have not been challenged, but it has been contended that under the Bengal School of Hindu Law an unchaste mother is entitled to succeed to the estate of her son. It has not been disputed that in the case of Ramnath Tolapattro v. Durga Sundari Debi (1) which was decided in 1878, Mr. Justice Romesh Chandra Mitter held that, under the Dayabhaga School of Hindu Law, a mother guilty of unchastity before the death of her son is precluded from inheriting his property. This decision has hitherto been accepted as good law, but we have been invited by the appellant to dissent from it and to refer the matter to a Full Bench for consideration. After examination of the authorities on the subject, we have arrived at the conclusion that the view taken by Mr. Justice Mitter is correct.

The determination of the matter in dispute ultimately depends upon the true construction of paragraphs 30 and 31 of section 2 of Chapter XI of the Dayabhaga. In Chapter XI, section 1, paragraphs 7, 43 and 56, Jimutavahana refers to the following texts of Brihatmanu, Vyasa and Katyayana, respectively:

"(i) The widow of a childless man, keeping unsullied her husband's bed, and persevering in religious observances, shall present his funeral oblation and obtain his entire share" (Brihatmanu).

"(ii) After the death of her husband, let a virtuous (chaste) woman observe strictly the duty of continence and let her daily, after the purification of the bath, present water from the joined palms of her hands to the manes of her husband, etc.," (Vyasa).

"(iii) Let the childless widow, preserving unsullied the bed of her lord and abiding with her venerable protectors, enjoy with moderation the property until her death; after her, let the heirs take it" (Katyayana).

(1) 4 C. 550.

These texts form the foundation of the following rules:

(i) An unchaste wife does not inherit her husband's property.

(ii) When the widow inherits, she can only enjoy the estate with moderation, in other words, she possesses a qualified power of alienation.

(iii) On the death of the widow, the estate of her husband passes not to her but to his heirs.

The question in controversy is whether these special rules are restricted in their operation to a widow who inherits the estate of her husband, or are applicable to all females who take by inheritance the estate of their male relations. The answer depends upon the interpretation of paragraphs 30 and 31 of section 2 of Chapter XI of the Dayabhaga. In the second of these paragraphs, Jimutavahana observes that the word "wife" in paragraph 56 of section 1 of Chapter XI (where the text of Katayana is quoted) is employed with a general import and implies that the rule must be understood as applicable generally to the case of a woman's succession by inheritance. The matter thus narrows down to the point, whether Jimutavahana intended that the generalised interpretation of the expression "wife" is limited to the rule that "the wife must only enjoy her husband's estate after his demise," or covers the entire text of Katayana which enunciated a more comprehensive proposition. Upon this subject, we have the interpretation of Raghunandan, who flourished in the fifteenth century and has since then been universally respected in Bengal as a jurist whose authority is surpassed only by Jimutavahana. Raghunandan in his commentary on paragraph 31 of section 2 of Chapter XI of the Dayabhaga writes as follows(Text A*): "The word 'wife' implies females generally. In the text of Katayana— Let the childless widow preserving unsullied the bed of her lord and abiding with her venerable protectors enjoy with moderation the property until her death; after her let the heirs take it'—and in the first half of the next text of the same sage—'the wife who is chaste takes the wealth of her husband'—the word 'wife' is illustrative. According to the rule of construction, deducible from reason, that a text used in one part of the Sastra has the same import in another, both 'wife' and 'daughter' are impliedly meant by the use of the word 'wife' in these texts." There is consequently no room for doubt that more than three centuries ago Raghunandan understood the passage of the Dayabhaga in question to lay down a rule, applicable to all female heirs, that chastity is a condition precedent to entitle them to succeed by right of inheritance to the estate of their male relations. In the absence of evidence to the contrary, the assumption may fairly be made that the interpretation adopted by Raghunandan represented the view then current among orthodox lawyers of the Bengal School: otherwise, a jurist of his learning and ability would, according to the prevalent practice, have stated and controverted the opinion held by his opponents. This is confirmed by passages from his Dayatatwa (Text B*). In these circumstances, our duty is to follow the rule enunciated by the Judicial Committee in Collector of Madura v. Mootoo Ramalinga Sathupathy(2): "the duty of an European Judge who is under the obligation to administer Hindu Law, is not so much to enquire whether a disputed doctrine is fairly deducible from the earliest authorities, as to ascertain whether it has been received by the particular school which governs the district with which he has to deal and has there been sanctioned by usage; for, under the Hindu system of law, clear proof of usage will outweigh the written text of the law." We are not unmindful of the dictum of Sir Barnes Peacock in Moniram Kolita v. Keri Kolitani (3) that paragraph 31 of section 2 of Chapter XI of the Dayabhaga only extends to other women the rule applicable to a wife that a gift, sale or mortgage of the estate is not to be made and that after her death the heirs of the deceased owner are to take, and not that part of the rule which is included in the words "keeping unsullied the bed of her lord." But we must not overlook the fact that Sir Barnes Peacock had no access to the commentary of Raghunandan and that, notwithstanding the restricted interpretation adopted by him, he favoured the view [Moniram Kolita v. Keri Kolitani (3)] that an unchaste daughter is excluded from inheriting her father's estate and an unchaste mother that of her son.

We may further point out that the view adopted by Mr. Justice Romesh Chandra Mitter in Ramnath Tulapattro v. Durga Sundari Debi (1) is in accordance with the opinion expressed Mr. Justice Dwarka Nath Mitter in the case of Kerry Kolitanee v. Monee Ram Kolita (4). It was there held that the daughter's estate was precisely of the same character as that of the widow and was governed by the same text of Katyana in which the word "wife" is employed with a general import, so as to make the rule applicable generally to the case of a woman's succession by inheritance. The question was expressly raised in Ramananda v. Raikishori Barmani (5), where Mr. Justice Banerjee, upon an exhaustive review of the authorities, overruled the contention advanced by Sastri Golap Chandra Sarkar that, according to the Bengal School of Hindu Law, a daughter, though unchaste, is still entitled to take by inheritance the property of her father. We are in full agreement with the line of reasoning adopted by Mr. Justice Banerji which was, without challenge, accepted as correct in the case of Sundari Letani v. Tilambari Letani (6).

But the appellant has strenuously contended that a contrary view has been adopted in respect of other schools of Hindu Law by the other Indian High Courts. Our attention has been invited to the decisions of the Madras High Court in Kojiyadu v. Lakshmi (7) and Vedammal v. Velunayoga (8), which are authorities in favour of the proposition that unchastity is no ground of exclusion in any female heir except the widow. There are also decisions which support the right of the unchaste daughter [Kojiyadu v. Lakshmi (7), Argammal v. Venkata Reddy (9), Veammal v. Veluvayoga (8), Lechhee v. Lokhdeo (10), Ganga Jati v. Ghasita (11), Adyapa v. Rudrava (12) and Tara v. Krishna (13)] as also of the unchaste mother [Kojiyadu v. Lakshmi (7), Dal Singh v. Dini (14) and Baldeo Singh v. Mathura Kuari (15)]. But we need make only two observations in respect of these cases. In the first place they are all under schools of Hindu Law other than the Bengal School and were decided with reference to authorities different from those that are specially recognised and followed in this Province; and it would be indeed a novel mode of interpretation of Hindu Law to import the authorities of one school for the determination of controverted questions which require decision in another school. In the second place, even if we were competent to invoke the aid of the authorities prevalent in other schools, a wide divergence of opinion would, as might be anticipated, be discovered, among recognised text writers. The Mitakshara and the Mayukha, no doubt, omit to mention, in the case of female heirs other than the widow, that chastity is a condition precedent before the right of inheritance can accrue. On the other hand, the Smriti Chandrika (Chapter XI, section 2, paragraph 26) and the Viramitradaya (Chapter III, part 2, section 3) appear to impose chastity as a condition precedent to the vesting of inheritance in women generally (Texts C & D).* Reference may also be made to the elucidation of Vijananeswara on the text of Yajnavalkya, verses 137–139 (Text C). In these circumstances, it would be wrong, in our opinion, to depart from what has been recognised as the settled rule in the Bengal School of Hindu Law.

Our attention has finally been invited to the decision of the Full Bench in Hari Lal Singh v. Tripura Charan Roy (16), where it was ruled that the fact that a Hindu woman had adopted the life of a prostitute did not sever the tie which connected her to her kindred by blood and that consequently upon her death her Stridhan property passed, in the absence of nearer heirs, to her brother's son as an heir under the Bengal School of Hindu Law. That doctrine clearly is of no assistance in the solution of the question raised before us. Nor need we consider the effect of the decision in Nogendra Nandini v. Binoy Krishna Deb (17) where Stephen, J., held that unchastity does not disqualify a woman from inheriting the Stridhan property of her female relations.

We hold accordingly that the vendor of the plaintiff, as an unchaste mother, never inherited the property of her sons, and that his claim is consequently unfounded. The appeal thus fails and is dismissed with costs.

MA U THA—RESPONDENT.

Execution of decree, application for—Fraud of judgment-creditor, effect of—Subsequent application, whether continuation of previous application.

An order setting aside a sale in execution of a decree on the ground of the fraud of the judgment-creditor unconnected with the application has not the effect of destroying the application in consequence of which the sale was ordered, and a subsequent application for execution may be considered as a continuation of that application [p. 709, col. 1.]

Mr. M. O Naidu, for the Appellant.

Mr. J. F. B. Sutherland, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—On the 27th April 1908 S. A. Anachallam Chetty obtained a mortgage decree against Ma U Tha and her husband.

On the 28th November 1903 the decree was made absolute.

On the 13th August 1909 the Chetty applied for attachment and sale of the mortgaged properties

On the 3rd November 1909 all parties were either present or represented by Pleaders and by consent the decretal amount was fixed at Rs. 827 1-6.

On the 10th January 1910 execution was granted as prayed for in the presence of the Pleaders of both parties.

ANAGHALLAM CHETTY v. MA U THA.

On the 21st January 1910 an order was made for the sale of the property on the 3rd March 1910. This order was made in the presence of Ma U Tha or her Pleader. No notice was issued by the Court to her as to the date of the sale. The decree-holder contended that the proclamation of sale was posted on Ma U Tha's house in the presence of certain witnesses. The woman denied the truth of this and on her objection the sale was set aside by the executing Court. An appeal was made to the Divisional Court, which dismissed it. The finding of both those Courts was that Ma U Tha did not know of the sale until she learnt it from her Pleader subsequently. An appeal was then filed in this Court and this Court held that the Chetty was guilty of fraud, intentionally keeping the knowledge of the sale from Ma U Tha. Subsequently on the 12th May 1917 the Chetty made a fresh application for the execution of the decree.

The question for decision is whether this application can be considered a continuation of the application filed on 13th August 1909. It has been contended on behalf of Ma U Tha that the fraud committed by the Chetty destroyed not only the sale but also the application of the 13th August 1909 in consequence of which the sale was ordered.

At the hearing I was informed by Mr. Sutherland that Ma U Tha did not receive even the notice of the attachment and that that was one of the grounds upon which the charge of fraud was held to be established. His contention was that, therefore, the case of Chandi Prasad Misra v. Gobind Sahay (1) of the Patna High Court applied, where it was held that when a suit is brought successfully to set aside a decree obtained by fraud, the whole proceedings including the plaint are destroyed, and no further proceedings can be maintained upon the plaint. In that case the summonses were never served on the defendants and Roe, J., held that they must have been deliberately suppressed and that a deliberate suppression of summonses is undoubtedly fraud. The learned Judge made the following significant remarks: "It is impossible indeed, in such instances of conspiracy to defeat justice, to say when the fraud was commenced and to what extent the proceedings shall be operated upon to rectify the effect of the fraud. The inference is that if immediately after filing his plaint, the plaintiff elects to suppress the summonses, he filed his plaint with the intention of suppressing the summonses. In any case I am strongly of opinion that when a suit is brought successfully to set aside the decree obtained by fraud the whole proceedings including the plaint are destroyed." The case of Sarbesh Chandra Basu v. Hari Dayal Singh (2) was cited from the Bar with a view to show that where a decree is set aside on the ground of fraud only the decree is destroyed, the root of the suit in the plaint remaining intact and must be dealt with as intact. In that case a suit had been brought in good faith and finally decreed upon a compromise. It was afterwards ascertained that the compromise was liable to be set aside through a fraud or mistake, and it was held that the original suit remained standing and should be disposed of on the merits. In the case before me it is not true that Ma U Tha did not receive notice of the attachment. Even if she did not, it would not matter for either she or her Pleader was present at the subsequent proceedings up to 10th January 1910, when in the presence of the Pleaders of both sides execution was granted as prayed for.

In my judgment the facts of this case are such that it is not possible to hold that the Chetty had the intention of keeping the knowledge of the execution proceedings up to the 10th January from Ma U Tha. It appears to me that it will not be just to hold he had such an intention, but he might and ought to be held to have intended to keep the knowledge of the sale from Ma U Tha by fraud. In this view of the facts I am unable to hold that the fraud committed by the Chetty would taint the application for execution of the 13th August 1909. Intent to commit fraud upon Ma U Tha could not be inferred from the facts to have existed at a date prior to the 10th January 1910. The facts of this case are analogous to those of the case of Sarbesh Chandra Basu v. Hari Dayal Singh (2) above cited. If Ma U Tha had been prevented from knowing of the proceedings which had been taken before the 10th January 1910, then the Patna case of Chandi Prasad Misra v. Gobind Sahay (1) would apply.

As the application of the 13th August 1909 is not destroyed by the order setting aside the sale, I would hold that the subsequent application of the 12th May 1917 should be considered a continuation of the former application on the authority of the following rulings :—Issurree Dassee v. Abdool Khalak (3), Chalavadi Kotiah v. Poloori Alimelammah (4) and Bihari Lal Misr v. Jagarnath Prasad (5).

Bengal Tenancy Act (VIII B. C. of 1885), ss. 50, 158—Scope of s. 158—Denial of tenancy, effect of—Presumption under s. 50, applicability of.

The principle underlying section 158 of the Bengal Tenancy Act is that there should be an admitted tenancy. Where there is a denial of tenancy, the inquiry contemplated by that section cannot be made. [p. 710, col. 2.]

In dealing with an application under section 158 of the Bengal Tenancy Act it is not necessary to find whether the tenant is entitled to the benefit of the presumption under section 50, as that section is ordinarily applicable when the landlord seeks an enhancement of rent. [p. 710, col. 2.]

Appeal against the decree of the Subordinate Judge, 2nd Court, Hooghly, dated the 26th March 1919, affirming that of the Munsif, 1st Court at that place, dated the 28th of June 1918.

FACTS appear from the judgment.

Babu Mohini Mohan Chakraburty (with him Babu Dinesh Chandra Roy for Babu Bansari Lal Sarkar), for the Appellant.—The petitioner is the appellant. This appeal arises out of an application under section 158 of the Bengal Tenancy Act. The main contention is that the Courts below have not decided the matters which they ought to have decided under section 158 of the Bengal Tenancy Act. There ought to have been a proper enquiry in this case. I incurred considerable expenses in having a Sub Deputy Magistrate appointed as a Commissioner. I refer your Lordship to section 158, Bengal Tenancy Act. First, there ought to have been a proper enquiry with reference to the other lands admitted by the defendant to be in his possession. Secondly, the question whether the tenant was entitled to the benefit of section 50 of the Bengal Tenancy Act ought not to have been left open. The Courts ought to have come to a definite finding. With regard to the first point my submission is that as there was an order of the Court, it lay upon the defendant to show which lands were in his possession. The Courts ought to have pushed the enquiry further. The Courts below appreciated my difficulty. I did not know the boundaries of the Mouzah. If I could do that, then there would have been no necessity for this application.

Dr. Jadunath Kanjilal, for the Respondents—As regards the first point I submit that this was not a case for preparing a Record of Rights. I refer your Lordships to Rajeshwar Pershad Singh v. Burta Koer (1). There is no real grievance for the other side. The landlord is not entitled to have further enquiry because he was not present at the time when the Commissioner was present. Besides section 158 of the Bengal Tenancy Act has a very limited application.

Babu Mohini Mohan Chakraburty briefly replied.

JUDGMENT.—This appeal arises out of an application made by the appellant as landlord under section 158, Bengal Tenancy Act. The facts are all stated in the judgments of the lower Courts.

Two points are raised in this appeal. The first is that there ought to have been an enquiry regarding the other parcels of land which the defendant admitted that he possessed, although he said that he held them under a debutter title. The second point is that the Courts below should have come to a finding as to whether the tenant was entitled or not to the benefit of the presumption under section 50, Bengal Tenancy Act,

As regards the first point, the Courts below held that the landlord was so negligent that he was not entitled to have any more land measured. It appears that a commission was issued to the Revenue Officer in September 1917. That officer went to the village on the 5th December. The Amin visited the village in January and the Revenue Officer went again in February to check the Amin's measurement. On the occasion of the Deputy Collector's first visit, no one appeared at all on behalf of the landlord. When the Amin went, some land was shown by the landlord and the Amin measured all that was shown to him. Then after the completion of the measurement, the Deputy Collector ordered the parties to appear before him with their evidence on the 3rd April. On that date the petitioner produced no document; and it was then that the respondent said that he had other lands in his possession situate within the villages, but that he held them under an independent title. After that the landlord made his application that those other lands should be measured. On the facts which I have stated I think it must be held that the landlord was so negligent that he was not entitled to have the enquiry re opened on that day. Another objection is that the scope of section 158, Bengal Tenancy Act, is very limited. The section says that the landlord of the land may apply for the determination of the following matters; viz., the situation of the land and so forth. The underlying principle of the section is that there should be an admitted tenancy; but when the landlord wanted to have these additional lands measured, he was making an application regarding lands about which the tenant respondent said that the petitioner landlord was not the landlord. I think, therefore, that the enquiry could not be made within the scope of section 158, Bengal Tenancy Act.

Then to turn to the second point, the lower Court has recorded the interest of the respondent as being that of an occupancy raiyat. The prayer made by the landlord was that there should be a further enquiry whether the tenant was entitled to the benefit of the rule contained in section 50. It appears to me that the Courts below were right in rejecting it. Section 50 lays down a rule of evidence which is ordinarily applied when the landlord seeks enhancement of rent. In the present case the judgments of the Courts below left the question open whether or not the tenant is entitled to the benefit of that rule. Reading clause (c) of section 158, Bengal Tenancy Act, I have no doubt that they were right in doing so.

On these grounds I dismiss the appeal with costs I assess the hearing fee at two gold mohurs.

Appeal dismissed.

In granting relief to the holder of an easement, the Courts ought not to place galling restrictions on the opposite side, provided the holder gets what he wants [p. 711, col 2.]

Appeal against the decree of the Sub-Judge, Kheri, dated the 9th April 1919, upholding that of the Munsif, Kheri, dated the 14th February 1918.

Mr. Ishwari Prasad, for the Appellant.

Mr. A. P. Sen, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—Makhan Lal is the owner of a shop in Gola Bazar. The rain water from the roof of one apartment of the shop has been flowing out of a hole in a certain direction ever since the shop was built, that is to say between 40 and 50 years ago. Formerly, the water fell on the soil underneath. There were no constructions to stop it. Then the defendant, a Kolwar, began to build up against this gutter and he finally built his house above it and roofed it in, thereby leaving the rain water from the plaintiff's house to run into his rooms. It naturally must have caused him considerable inconvenience having rain water running into his residential premises, but he does not deserve much sympathy on this point, as he deliberately constructed his residential premises so that rain water would run into them. So long as he made not attempt to stop the flow of the rain water, the plaintiff took no objection. But in a short time he blocked the drain Then the plaintiff sued for an injunction to compel him to re open the drain. The plaintiff has obtained this injunction and the defendant comes here in second appeal.

There can be absolutely no doubt as to the fact that the plaintiff has a right to the injunction. The water from his roof has been flowing through this channel for 40 consecutive years. The interference was very recent. He has proved beyond the possibility of doubt a right of easement to let the water from the roof run in this particular way, and the other side has failed to show that anything has happened to deprive him of this right or to diminish the right. The appeal has been mainly argued before me on the ground that the grant of such an injunction as that prayed for is discretionary and that if relief can be given in some other way at less inconvenience to the offender, it should be given in a way which would cause the offender the least inconvenience. I agree that provided the holder of an easement gets what he wants, there is no reason to place any galling restrictions upon the other side. But here the holder of the easement cannot possibly get what he wants except by being allowed to let the water run off his roof. It cannot be suggested that he would be compensated by damages. An award of damages will not remove the water from his roof. The learned Counsel for the appellant suggests that in order to carry out the order he will have to pull down very valuable permanent buildings. I see no reason why he should have to do anything of the sort If he likes to connect the gutter with a pipe and stop the pipe so that the rain water will run right through his house and out again on the other side, he will be able to comply with the terms of the decree at a comparatively small cost and very little inconvenience to himself. I see no reason to interfere with the decree of the lower Courts and dismissed this appeal with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Hindu Law—Joint family—Debts contracted for family purposes—Pro-note executed by father or managing member—Liability of members of family.

In the case of a Hindu joint family carrying od agricultural business, where money is borrowed any spent on proper family purposes and promissorn notes are executed as security for the loans by the father or a member of the family in managing charge of the business, the other members of the family are liable for such loans, but their liability is restricted to the extent of their shares in the joint family property. [p. 715, col. 2.]

S. T. S. V. CHETTY v. V. N. VADANVETTY.

Mr. P. N. Chari, for the Plaintiffs.

ORDER OF REFERENCE TO A FULL BENCH.

ROBINSON, J.—(May 15th, 1919.)—These are two suits of a similar character between the same parties. Defendants are V. N. Vadanvetty and his two sons who form a joint Hindu family of cultivators. Rs. 16,000 were borrowed from plaintiffs and spent in the purchase of lands for the purposes of the family. They also cultivated lands in Burma and whichever member of the family was for the time being in Burma managed the business for the family here.

In order to pay off the loan of Rs. 16,000 N. N. Vadanvetty and the 2nd defendant V. N. V. Nagappan executed a mortgage for Rs. 12,000 on the lands bought and also a promissory note for Rs. 4,000—Civil Regular No. 117 of 1918 is brought on this promissory note.

Then 3rd defendant executed a promissory note for Rs. 800 for the purposes of the family and defendant No. 2 executed four other promissory notes for sums borrowed for the purposes of the family. These five promissory notes form the subject of Civil Regular No. 116 of 1918.

The question to be decided is whether plaintiffs, who have proved the promissory notes which are admitted by defendant No. 2, and further proved that they were executed by the persons for the time being managing the business and that the money was taken for the purposes of the joint family, are entitled to a decree against any person other than those who executed the various promissory notes.

There may be a slight difference in the two cases from the fact that in the one the father and one son executed and in the other one son only executed each note. It is also to be noted that when the sons executed, they did so by signing their individual names with the family mark V. N. V. prefixed. The notes do not show they were executed for the family needs or by a manager except for the mark, but only by the individual.

In a somewhat similar case my brother Young held that in the case of a suit on a promissory note it is the actual signatory only who can be held liable except perhaps when it is the manager of a joint family who signs. There are varying authorities on the question and not all perhaps very clear.

In Ramasami Muduliar v. Sellattammal (1) there is an obiter dictum by Innes, J., agreed in by Kindersley, J., to the following effect :—

"A promissory note is evidence of a debt, and I conceive a suit on a promissory note made by a Hindu father would well lie against sons joined in the suit with the father as defendants on the allegation that the debt was incurred for proper family purposes."

In Krishna Ayyar v. Krishnasami Ayyar (2) the learned Judges differed and the question was heard by three Judges. Two held that all the members of the undivided family were liable. This ruling has been criticised and dissented from by my brother Young. It has been referred to and followed by later decisions of the Madras High Court.

It was distinguished by a Full Bench in Govindan Nair v. Nanu Menon (3), on the ground that the suit was based on the original debt and not on the promissory note, which seems to be wrong, but this decision was later explained in Nachiappa Chetty v. Dakshinamurthy (4). In this last case the promissiory note was executed by the father and a decree was given against him and his sons.

Reference may also be made to Nataraja Naicken v. Ayyasami Pillai (5).

In Raghunathji Tarachand v. Bank of Bombay (6) the Court dealt with a joint Hindu family trading firm. There the promissory note was signed by the only adult male member, and it was held that the share of a minor co-parcener was liable and that although the firm obtained no advantage. S. T. S. V. CHETTY v. V. N. VADANVETTY.

In Nagendra Chandra Dey v. Amar Chandra Kundu (8) it was held obiter that sons in a Mitakshara family would under such circumstances be held liable on a promissory note executed by their father.

This was also held in Baisnab Chandra De v. Ramdhon Dhor (9), where the promissory note was executed by the karta.

It is said that in Shiam Lal v. Ganeshi Lal (10) the Allahabad High Court has differed from the Madras High Court and the decisions above cited. Plaintiff's father borrowed Rs. 300 giving a promissory note. The lender sued on the note and impleaded plaintiff, who was a minor son. The Court dismissed the suit against the minor, but in execution of the decree passed against his father the lender caused a portion of the joint family property to be sold. Plaintiff then brought a suit for a declaration that his share in the joint family property could not be made liable, the suit as against him having been dismissed. The High Court in an appeal in plaintiff's suit held, it is true, that the Munsif had properly dismissed the suit on the promissory note as against plaintiff, but the matter was not before the Court and was not considered except by the way. It was held that plaintiff's share was liable.

The matter involves the question whether sections 26, 27 and 28 of the Negotiable Instruments Act, 1881, enact the rule in section 23 of the Bills of Exchange Act where it is plainly stated that only the signatories to the promissory note can be made liable. The wording of our Act is very different. The question of agency also arises and whether the provisions apply to joint Hindu families where liability arises under the Hindu Law. In the Madras case which forms the basis of the subsequent decisions, the Judges differed and the authorities are not very clear and deal only with the case of execution by fathers and managing members. The matter is important and not easy. I incline to the view that the English rule was not enacted and that the payee is entitled to a decree against all the members of the family impleaded both when the promissory note is signed by the father and also when executed by sons who are at the time managing the joint business. In view, however, of the state of the authorities and of the fact that my brother Young has taken a different view, I think I should refer the question to a Bench or Full Bench as may be decided.

I accordingly refer the following question:—

In the case of a joint Hindu family carrying on an agricultural business, where money is borrowed and spent on proper family purposes and promissory notes are executed as security for the loans, is the lender, suing on the promissory note, entitled to a decree against the signatory only or against all the members of the joint family impleaded, when—

(a) the promissory note is executed by the father only, and,

(b) when it is executed by one of the sons in temporary managing charge of the business.

OPINION.

The question referred to the Bench in this case is as follows:—

In the case of a joint Hindu family carrying on an agricultural business, where money is borrowed and spent on proper family purposes and promissory notes are executed as security for the loans, is the lender, suing on the promissory notes, entitled to a decree against the signatory only or against all the members of the family impleaded, when—

(a) the promissory note is executed by the father only, and,

(b) when it is executed by one of the sons in temporary managing charge of the business,

In Madras the question has been definitely decided by the decision of the Full Bench in the case of Krishna Ayyar v. Krishnasami Ayyar (2). In that case the plaintiff, who was a member of an undivided Hindu family, had executed a promissory note for money, which was spent in the purchase of land for the benefit of the family. His uncle and his uncle's two sons members of the family, were held liable for the debt by a majority of two out of the three Judges composing the Bench, Shephard, J., and Subramania Aiyar, J. The dissenting Judge, Davies, J., considered that as the name of only the maker appeared on the promissory note and he did not purport to make the promissory note on behalf of anybody but himself, he alone could be held liable on it. The learned Judge considered that sections 26 and 27 of the Negotiable Instruments Act, 1881, should be construed by implication as embodying the strict rule of law enacted in section 23 of the (English) Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, and he could not see how the matter was affected by the fact that the case before the Court was one of a Hindu family. The judgment of Shephard, J., in that case drew an analogy between the case of a Hindu father whose son was joined in an action for debt brought against them and the case of a husband's liability for his wife's debts under the English Law before the Married Woman's Property Act, 1882, was enacted. That analogy has been criticised as being far fetched. But whatever may be said on that point it is clear that both Shephard, J., and Subramania Ayyar, J., based their decision on the liability under Hindu Law of a co-parcener for the debts contracted for family purposes by the father or manager of the family. In the case out of which the present reference arose the individual members of the undivided family who executed the promissory notes signed their names thereon with the family mark, V. N. V., prefixed. It would appear, therefore, that the other members of the family were rendered liable under section 27 of the Negotiable Instruments Act even without importing the rule of Hindu Law, because it can apparently be held that the makers of the promissory note were duly authorized agents acting in the name of the family. But according to the Madras ruling cited above, the co-parceners are liable whether the family name is used or not That ruling has been consistently followed by the Madras High Court. In the recent case, Chinniah Chetty v. Tikkani Ramaswami Chetty (11), Srinivasa Aaiyangar, J., pointed out that in cases of this nature it is only the managing member actually executing the promissory note who is made liable on the contract itself. The liability of the other co parceners is imposed on them by the Hindu Law apart from the contract entered into by the managing member or members.

In the Bombay case Raghunathji Tarachand v. Bank of Bombay 6) the Madras decision is not referred to, but Chandavarkar, J, in his judgment states the Hindu Law on the subject as follows:—

"Where a minor is a co parcener in a joint family, his share in the family property is liable for debts contracted by his managing co parcener for any family purpose or any purpose incidental to it."

In that case a minor co-parcener was held liable on certain promissory notes executed by the only adult male member of a joint Hindu trading firm. It was held that where a Hindu family carries on a business or profession, and maintains itself by means of it, the member who manages it for the family has an implied authority to contract debt for its purposes, and the creditor is not bound to enquire into the purpose of the debt in order to bind the whole family thereby, because that power is necessary for the very existence of the family.

In the case of Nagendra Chandra Dey v. Amar Chandra Kundu (2) a Bench of the Calcutta High Court considered the question of the liability of the sons in an undivided Hindu family for debts contracted on a promissary note by their father, who was the managing member of the family. The judgment of the Court was delivered by Mitra, J. The view that the karta of a joint family has presumably authority from the other members of the family to contract a debt and that the debt contracted by him is presumably for the benefit of the other members of the family was not accepted. But the case in question was one of a family governed by the Dayabhaga Law, and the learned Judge expressly stated that the above proposition may be true as regards the sons in a Mitakshara family as to debts contracted by the father, but not as regards the members of a family other than the sons. The Madras ruling was not considered in that case, but in a later decision of the Calcutta High Court, Baisnab Chandra De v. Ramdeon Dhor (9), the ruling in Krishna Ayyar v. Krishnasami Ayyar (2) was expressly referred to and followed, and it was held that where the karta of a joint undivided Hindu family borrows money on promissory notes for the purpose of a joint family business or to meet a joint family necessity, the creditor can recover the money from all the members of the joint family although they were not all parties to the notes. Incidentally the Bench dealt with the argument on which Davies, J., based his dissenting judgment in the case of Krishna Ayyar v. Krishnasami Ayyar (2). They declined to accept the view that sections 26, 27 and 28 of the Negotiable Instruments Act have the effect of embodying in the Act substantially the same provisions as are to be found in section 23 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, in England. One of the Judges in the Calcutta case last cited was Ghose, J., a Hindu Judge.

Reports of the Allahabad High Court throw little or no light on the question referred. The judgment in Shiam Lal v. Ganeshi Lal (10) contains an obiter dictum approving of the action of the lower Court in dismissing the suit against the plaintiff, who had been joined in a suit with his father on a promissory note executed by the father alone, and had set up the defence that no decree could be passed againt him as he was not a party to the note. The question of his liability on his father's promissory note was not argued before the High Court. On the other hand, his suit for a declaration exempting his interest in the joint family property from liability on his father's note was disallowed according to the rule under which a Hindu son is liable to pay any debts of his father not shown to be tainted with immorality.

In the question referred it is assumed that the lender sues on the promissory note and not on the original loan, and our findings on the reference should be confined to the case of a suit on the promissory note alone. The points for decision then are (1) whether in such a suit having regard to the provisions of section 27, Negotiable Instruments Act, the lender could obtain a decree against the non-signatory members of the Hindu family in question (it being assumed that he has set out in his plaint all the requisite allegations of fact concerning the family), and (2) whether the liability of the non-signatory members of the family is affected by the circumstance that the family carries on an agricultural as distinct from a trading business.

With regard to the first point, a comparison of the English Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, with the Indian Negotiable Instruments Act, 1881, suggests that the Indian Legislature advisedly refrained from adopting the strict rule of law embodied in section 23 of the English Statute. Section 27 of the Negotiable Instruments Act lays down that a duly authorized agent acting in his principal's name may make a promissory note binding the principal, and this provision corresponds with the 2nd proviso to section 23 of the English Statute, under which the agent of a firm signing a note in the firm's name renders the members of the firm liable on it. But the Indian Act has nothing corresponding to the main provision of section 23, by which non-signatories generally are exempted from liability. And it seems reasonable to infer that this provision of English Law was intentionally omitted having regard to the Hindu joint family, an institution peculiar to India. We are justified in holding that section 27 of the Negotiable Instruments Act is not intended to be exhaustive and does not serve to exempt from liability non-signatory members of an undivided Hindu joint family.

It is true that the making of promissory notes is not an ordinary incident of an agricultural business and it has been held in England that a partner in a farming company has no implied authority to execute promissory notes so as to bind the company. But the Madras and Calcutta cases already cited are, in our opinion, sufficient to show that the manager of an undivided Hindu family regulated by the Mitakshara Law is entitled to borrow money for the purposes of the family business, whatever that business may be, and that debts so contracted will bind the other members of the family. No definite authority to the contrary effect has been cited. The manager's authority to bind the family by his borrowings necessarily involves authority to execute promissory notes binding the family.

We, therefore, answer both parts of the question referred in the affirmative. But a proviso should be added that the members of the joint family other than the signatory of the promissory note are liable only to the extent of their shares in the joint family property.

The case does not fall within the scope of sub section (1) of section 13 of the Burma Laws Act, 1898, for the question for decision is not a question of succession, inheritance, marriage or caste or of any religious usage or institution. But as the parties are Hindus, they are bound by the customary law regulating the incidents of the Hindu joint family and this is the law we have to apply to the case.

Answer in the affirmative.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. XXIII, r. 3—Arbitration without intervention of Court—Award, whether may be filed and enforced as compromise—"Lawful," meaning of—Parties not getting legal shares—Compromise, whether unlawful.

An award made upon a reference to arbitration without the intervention of the Court can be recorded and enforced as a compromise under Order XXIII, rule 3, of the Civil Procedure Code. [p. 717, col. 2.]

A compromise is not unlawful merely because the parties do not get the shares to which they would be entitled under their personal law. [p. 717, col. 2.]

Appeal against the order of the Additional Subordinate Judge, Howrah in Hooghly, dated the 7th of September 1918.

FACTS appear from the judgment.

Babu Mohendranath Roy (with him Babu Sitaram Banerjee), for the Appellant:—The suit was one for partition. Uday and Gagan were two brothers. Plaintiffs Nos. 1, 2, 3 and defendant No. 4 were daughters of Uday and defendants Nos. 5, 6, 7, 8 were his daughters' sons whose mother was dead at the time of the institution of the suit. Defendant No. 4 was a childless widow at the time of her father's death. Defendant No. 9 is the widow of Gagan and defendants Nos. 1, 2 and 3 were his sons. The suit was instituted on the 11th March 1916. On the 29th May 1916 the plaintiffs and defendants Nos. 1 to 5 executed an agreement to refer the matter in dispute between them to arbitration. On the 20th February 1917 five of the seven arbitrators made their award; one was dead at the time and the other refused to act as arbitrator. On the 3rd September 1918 the defendants Nos. 1 to 3 applied to the Court to record the award as a compromise under Order XXIII, rule 3, of the Code of Civil Procedure. The Court recorded the award under Order XXIII, rule 3. The appeal to your Lordships is directed against the order of the Court recording the award.

I submit that the award having given to certain persons shares, which they would not ordinarily be entitled to under the Hindu Law, the compromise arrived at between these person, who are parties to the suit, cannot be regarded as lawful within the meaning of rule 3 of Order XXIII of the Code of Civil Procedure. Defendant No. 4, being a childless widow at the time of her father's death, had no share in the property. Neither the daughters' sons, defendants Nos. 5 to 8, had any share so long as the daughters of Uday were living. The award is unlawful because the arbitrators by their award have given shares to persons who had no shares in the co-parcenary property. The reference to arbitration was made without the intervention of the Court. There can be no such reference to arbitration in a pending suit—See Ghulam Khan v. Muhammad Hassan (1), Tincowry Dey v. Fakir Chand Dey (2). Refers also to Iraglas v. Girdhardas (3), Harakhbai v. Jamnabai (4). The decision in Muhammad Newaz Khan v. Alam Khan (5) does not apply to the present case. That was a case in which their Lordships of the Judicial Committee had to decide whether the arbitrators were guilty of misconduct. The present case has been decided not on the footing of an award but on the footing of a compromise. The compromise being unlawful, it cannot be recorded by the Court under Order XXIII, rule 3.

JUDGMENT.

BEACHCROFT, J.—This is an appeal against an order of the Additional Subordinate Judge of Howrah, directing that an award made by arbitrators should be enforced as a compromise under Order XXIII, rule 3, Code of Civil Procedure.

The suit was one for partition. It was instituted on the 11th March 1916. The plaintiffs, three in number, are the daughters of one Uday Chand Dutta. Another daughter of Uday Chand, a childless widow at the time of her father's death, is defendant No. 4. Defendants Nos. 5 to 8 are sons of another daughter of Uday Chand. The defendants Nos. 1 to 3 are sons of one Gagan Chandra Dutta, who was the brother of Uday Chand, and defendant No. 9 is the widow of Gagan Chandra. On the 29th May 1916 the three plaintiffs and defendants Nos. 1 to 5 executed an agreement to refer the matter in dispute between them to arbitration and the Court allowed time for the purpose. The reference to arbitration was made without the intervention of the Court. On the 20th February an award was made by five out of the seven arbitrators, who were nominated by the parties. Of the other two one had died and one had taken no part in the arbitration proceedings. The Court was not informed that the arbitration had been completed and on the 24th February 1917 the plaintiffs applied for further time. This application was rejected, and a preliminary decree was then made ex parte but this was subsequently set aside. On the 3rd September 1918 the defendants Nos. 1 to 3 applied to the Court to record the award as a compromise under Order XXIII, rule 3, Code of Civil Procedure, and the Judge made the order which is now complained of.

The effect of the award has been to give, to certain persons who would not ordinarily be entitled to shares under the Hindu Law, certain shares in the property; for instance, shares have been given to defendant No. 4, who as I have already remarked was a childless widow at the time of her father's death, and defendant No. 5, a daughter's son, who in the presence of plaintiffs Nos. 1 to 3 would not be entitled to any share.

The only point taken in this appeal, and that even has not been pressed very seriously, is that the award having given to certain persons shares, which they would not ordinarily be entitled to under the Hindu Law, the compromise so arrived at between these persons, who are parties to the suit, cannot be regarded as lawful within the meaning of rule 3 of Order XXIII, Code of Civil Procedure. That contention, it appears to me, cannot be upheld. The parties came to an agreement, which it is impossible to say was not a lawful agreement, and having come to this agreement between themselves some of them cannot now be allowed to back out of it because the arbitrators' award is not to their liking. The argument in effect comes to this that the word "lawful" in Order XXIII, rule 3, has the same meaning as the word legal, but the agreement cannot be said to be unlawful merely because the parties do not get the shares to which they would be legally entitled.

In my opinion the appeal ought to be dismissed with costs. The hearing fee is assessed at three gold mohurs.

TELNON, J.—I agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

Application against insolvent under s. 43—Appeal against order passed, whether lies.

To entitle a creditor to appeal against an order passed in proceedings started on his application against an insolvent under section 3 of the Provincial Insolvency Act, he must show that he is a "person aggrieved" by the order within the meaning of section 43 of the Act. He is not so aggrieved if the order merely holds that there is no prima facie case against the insolvent.

The Hon'ble Mr. M. R. Dixit, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—A preliminary objection has been taken that no appeal lay at the instance of the appellant, who is a creditor, who applied to the lower Court that the respondent insolvent should be dealt with under section 43, sub clause 2, Provincial Insolvency Act. The Additional District Judge after an inquiry has come to the conclusion that there is no prima facie case against the insolvent. To entitle a creditor to appeal from the order he must show that he is "a person aggrieved" by the order within the meaning of section 46 of the Provincial Insolvency Act. In my opinion he is not, as has been held in Iyappa Nainar v. Manikka Asari (1) and Ladu Ram v. Mahabir Prasad (2). This appears to be the opinion of Teunon, J., in Digendra Chandra Basak v. Ramani Mohan Goswami (3). The appeal is dismissed with costs. I fix Rs. 50 (fifty) as Pleader's fee in this Court.

INSOLVENCY CASE No. 58 OF 1917.

Negotiable Instruments Act (XXVI of 1881), ss. 13, 46—Transfer of Property Act (IV of 1882), ss. 130, 137 - Promissory note, transfer of, how to be effected—Verbal transfer, validity of—Endorsement and delivery.

A promissory note payable to a specified person or order is a negotiable instrument and is negotiable by endorsement and delivery, but a verbal assignment of such a note is not recognised by law. [p. 719, col 2.]

Mr. A. B. Banurji, for the Petitioner.

JUDGMENT.— One Mahomed Hashim Ariff executed the promissory note in question in favour of T. A. R. A. R. M. Chetty firm for Rs. 2,500 and made it payable to that firm or order. T. A. R. A. R. M. firm borrowed money from S. R. M. C. T. Chetty firm and delivered the promissory note as security for the loan. There was no endorsement of the promissory note. S. R. M. C. T. firm in their turn transferred the debt and the promissory note to E. Solomon. The transfer was verbal and the pro-note was not endorsed. T. A. R. A. R M. firm became insolvent and the Official Assignee as their representative sued the maker, Mahomed Hashim Ariff, and obtained a decree. Solomon handed the promissory note over to the Official Assignee for this purpose. The judgment-debtor has paid into Court and the Official Assignee has received Rs. 2,269-15-6 and the judgment-debtor has also paid Rs. 1,500 to Solomon out of Court. Solomon now asks for an order to the Official Assignee to pay to him the amount in the hands of that officer less his usual commission.

It is clear that the pro-note is a chose in action or actionable claim, as the expression is as used in the Transfer of Property Act. Section 130 of that Act requires transfer of actionable claims to be in writing accompanied by certain other formalities. Therefore, as a transfer of an actionable claim, the delivery of the promissory note to Solomon would not be valid. But it is claimed that section 137 of the same Act excepts, inter alia, from the operation of section 130 instruments which are for the time being, by law or custom, negotiable. The instrument in question is a negotiable instrument as it is payable to a specified person or order. See section 13 of the Negotiable Instruments Act. But it is contended that it is an actionable claim all the same. This proposition is quite correct. Upon this assumption it is contended that, treated as an actionable claim, it may be transferred otherwise than by writing as required by section 130 of the Transfer of Property Act, for instance, verbally, as it has been in this case, inasmuch as this sort of actionable claim is excepted out of the operation of that section. It is, however, admitted that, as a negotiable instrument made payable to a specified person or order, it is negotiable by endorsement and delivery only. See section 46 of the Negotiable Instruments Act.

The point raised is, can it be transferred otherwise than by endorsement and delivery or by assignment in writing? In Ramachandra Roo v. Abeeb Rowthan (1) Shephard and Moore, JJ., held that there was nothing in the Negotiable Instruments Act to restrict the transfer of negotiable instruments to transfers by endorsement only, and that such choses in action may be otherwise assigned, and that an assignee under an assignment of the latter class may sue in his own name. This was followed in Muhammad Khumarali v. Ranga Rao(2). In Muthar Sahib Marakar v. Kadir Sahib Marakar (3) the learned Judges accepted the above rulings and after quoting a passage from Story on "Promissory Notes," 7th Edition, section 120, page 153, held that endorsement is not the only mode by which negotiable instruments may be transferred; they may be otherwise assigned, and the assignee may sue in his own name; he will, however, have only the right, title, and interest of the assignor, while the endorsee of a negotiable instrument will have all the rights of a holder in due course. Later in 1907 the exact point before me arose in the Madras High Court in Arunachella Reddi v. Subba Reddi (4). There the suit was on a promissory note which had not been endorsed to the plaintiff and the plaintiff was not entitled to sue on it, qua promissory note, as had been held in Subba Narayana Vathiyar v. Ramaswami Aiyar (5). It was, however, contended on the authority of Muhammad Khumarali's case (2) above cited that the note had been verbally assigned to the plaintiff and that he could sue on it under the assignment, as section 130 of the Transfer of Property Act did not apply and the Negotiable Instruments Act did not prohibit the assignment of a negotiable instrument. Benson and Wallis, JJ., observed:—"Assuming that the plaintiff would be entitled to sue on the chose in action if the note were assigned to him otherwise than by endorsement, he could not, in our opinion, when so suing, be regarded as suing on a negotiable instrument and, therefore, would not come within the exceptions in section 137 of the Transfer of Property Act. Consequently the assignment of the chose in action on which he relies is bad for want of writing under section 130 of the Transfer of Property Act." The meaning of these observations appears to me to be as follows:—"If you treat a negotiable promissory note as a chose in action, the transfer must be in compliance with section 130 of the Negotiable Instruments Act. If you treat it as a negotiable instrument, the transfer must be by endorsement and delivery as required by section 46 of the Negotiable Instruments Act." Upon the ruling of Benson and Wallis, JJ., the verbal assignment in the present case will be of no effect. Apart from this ruling it seems to be clear that, in enacting section 137 of the Transfer of Property Act, the intention of the Legislature was to make a distinct differentiation between the instruments mentioned in section 137 of the Transfer of Property Act, which are also actionable claims as defined by that Act, and other actionable claims, inasmuch as the former are regulated by special Acts of the Legislature as to their transfers. Thus the law is plain that in the case of those instruments section 130 will not apply and the question of the legality or otherwise of their transfers must be tested by the provisions of the law relating to them. The fact that a negotiable instrument is also a chose in action is immaterial and does not indicate that a third method of transfer, for instance, a verbal assignment, is recognized by the law. For these reasons I would hold that the transfer of the promissory note to Solomon was not valid and the property in it was not thereby transferred to him. The result is that Solomon is not entitled to any portion of the amount of the decree obtained by the Official Assignee. Solomon's application is, therefore, dismissed.

Plaintiffs, occupancy tenants, sued for an injunction restraining defendants, members of the proprietary body, from preventing them from using a certain site which they alleged they and their ancestors had been using for a long time:

Held, that the plaintiffs were claiming to use the land not by reason of their being occupancy tenants but by reason of their having been enjoying the use of it for many years, and that, therefore, the suit did not fall under section 77 (3) (i) of the Punjab Tenancy Act and was cognizable by a Civil Court.

Miscellaneous second appeal from the order of the District Judge, Jullundur, dated the 9th May 1919, reversing that of the Munsif, 1st Class, Jullundur, dated the 29th July 1918.

Lala Jagan Nath, for the Appellants.

Mr. Badri Nath Kapur, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The plaintiffs, who are occupancy tenants in the village Sarai Khas, sue for an injunction to restrain defendants Nos. 1 to 3, who are members of the proprietary body, from preventing them from using a certain site, which they say that they and their ancestors have for many years been using for preparing dung cakes, storing bhusa, and other purposes. The first Court passed a decree in the plaintiffs' favour, but the District Judge on appeal has held, following Bir Singh v. Kahan Singh (1), that the case is cognizable by a Revenue Court and has ordered that the plaint be returned.

The ruling relied upon by the learned District Judge is distinguishable in two ways from the present case. The defendants in that case were the plaintiffs' landlords, but in the present case the three defendants against whom an injunction is asked for are only some out of a number of persons owning the land in dispute, which is said to be shamilat patti. In the second place, the plaintiffs in the case mentioned above claimed to be entitled to use certain land as a threshing floor in consequence of their holding occupancy rights, so that the suit was one arising out of the conditions on which the tenancy was held and fell under section 77 (3) (i) of the Tenancy Act. But the claim in the present case is in no way connected with the conditions of the plaintiffs' tenancy. The plaintiffs are claiming a right to use the land in dispute, not by reason of their being occupancy tenants in the village, but by reason of their having been enjoying the use of it for many years. The present case is not one falling under section 77 (3) (i) of the Tenancy Act, and it is cognizable by a Civil Court.

I accordingly accept the appeal, set aside the order of the District Judge, and remand the case to him under Order XLI, rule 23, Civil Procedure Code, for disposal of the appeal before him on the merits. The Court-fee paid on the appeal in this Court will be refunded. Other costs will be costs in the case.

Appeal accepted.

LOWER BURMA CHIEF COURT.
CRIMINAL REVISION No. 234 B OF 1919.
August 11, 1919.
Present:—Mr. Justice Robinson.
C. SOORAYA alias THEIN MAUNG—COMPLAINANT
versus
SHWE BWIN—ACCUSED

Criminal proceedings, stay of, pending civil suit—Discretion of Magistrate—High Court, interference by.

The question whether criminal proceedings should be stayed pending the disposal of a civil suit is primarily a matter for the discretion of the Magistrate before whom they are pending, and the High Court will not lightly interfere with the exercise of this discretion.

Where the matter is purely a civil matter and can more fully and adequately be dealt with in a civil proceeding, criminal proceedings ought to be stayed pending the decision of the civil suit.

JUDGMENT.—Complainant and accused were partners in paddy transactions and disputes arose between them as to the settlement of their accounts. Accused had sold fifty baskets of paddy, which he claimed were his separate property but which complainant alleged belonged to the partnership and had been entrusted to accused to keep. He accordingly laid a complaint of cheating or theft or criminal misappropriation against the accused. The latter has filed a civil suit for dissolution of partnership and accounts and complainant is filing a cross-suit.

Accused moved the Magistrate to stay proceedings in the criminal charge, but this has been refused, and the District Magistrate has referred the matter with the opinion that the criminal proceedings should have been stayed.

The question whether criminal proceedings should be stayed is primarily a matter for the discretion of the Magistrate before whom they are pending, and this Court is not prone to interfere lightly with the exercise of this discretion.

The grounds on which the Magistrate refused to stay are that the criminal charge had been pending for some months; that the issues involved in the two cases were not substantially the same and that the decisions of neither Court would affect the decision of the other. Now the question whether the fifty baskets were the private property of the accused or belonged to the partnership is one of the questions in both proceedings and this must be decided in the civil suit. What the Magistrate has not also realized is that the matter is purely a civil matter and more likely to be fully and adequately dealt with in civil proceedings. He has not taken into consideration that the prosecution is a private prosecution initiated possibly not so much from a desire to bring an offender to justice as to satisfy private spite or to bring pressure to bear.

Had the prosecution been ordered by a Court, the position would have been different. The dealings between the parties amounted to nearly Rs. 30,000, while the prosecution is only in respect of fifty baskets. All these are matters which should have been weighed and were not apparently and, therefore, there need be no hesitation in interfering with the exercise of the Magistrate's discretion.

The matter is purely a civil dispute which could and should form the basis of civil and not of criminal proceedings and the Magistrate might well have referred the complainant to the Civil Courts.

I agree with the views set out in Dwarka Nath Rai Chowdhry v. Emperor (1) and the cases cited therein.

I, therefore, direct the proceeding be stayed until the decision of the civil suit pending between the parties.

Proceeding stayed.

belonging to a District Board, the collection of the tolls leviable on which is leased to another, is not an offence under section 447 of the Penal Code.

Criminal reference made by the Sessions Judge, Benares.

Mr. N. Upadhia, for the Applicant.

ORDER OF REFERENCE.—This is an application for the revision of an order of an Assistant Magistrate of the First Class, convicting the applicant with two others in a summary trial under section 447 of the Indian Penal Code. The facts of the case as found by the trial Court are that the complainant has taken from the District Board a lease of the tolls leviable from persons entering upon a certain road for the purpose of selling their wares and that the applicant has used the road for the purpose of exposing goods for sale. On this finding the conviction under section 447 of the Indian Penal Code appears to be untenable, since that section refers to immoveable property whereas a right to collect is incorporeal property, which cannot be the subject of the offence of criminal trespass.

I, therefore, submit the record to the Hon'ble High Court with the recommendation that the sentence be reversed.

JUDGMENT.—I fail to find evidence of an offence under section 447 of the Indian Penal Code and find the accused not guilty of any such offence. Any fine paid by him will be refunded.

CRIMINAL REVISION CASE No. 360 OF 1919.
CRIMINAL REVISION PETITION No. 304 OF 1919.
October 29, 1919.

Present:—Mr. Justice Sebagiri Aiyar and Mr. Justice Moore.

In re KOTTAMIDDU RANGA REDDI—ACCUSED—PETITIONER.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), ss. 110, 112, 114, 117—Preliminary order under s. 112, contents of—Accused not informed of substance of accusation, effect of—Dangerous and desperate character—General repute, evidence of, admissibility of—Evidence of Police witnesses, value of—Opinions, hearsay and rumours, admissibility of.

It is not open to a Magistrate to look into evidence of general repute for finding that a person is a desperate and dangerous character within the meaning of section 110(f), Criminal Procedure Code. There should be proof of specific acts to show that he is of such a character. [p. 724, col. 2; p. 729, col. 1.]

In proceedings under section 110 of the Criminal Procedure Code the evidence of official and Police witnesses should, as far as possible, be eschewed. Though there is no rule of law which prohibits a Magistrate from admitting Police evidence, it should, if not wholly discarded, influence his judgment little as possible. [p. 725, col. 1.]

Where the evidence of the Police witnesses consists only of opinions, rumours and hearsay which they have recorded in their note books and diaries, it is wholly inadmissible. [p. 725, col. 2.]

The evidence on which a Magistrate ought to base a conviction under section 110, clauses (a) to (c), Criminal Procedure Code, must relate to particular instances which have come to the knowledge of the deponent and must be specific. Evidence relating to mere beliefs and opinions, without reference to acts or instances which have induced the witnesses to form an opinion, cannot be regarded as evidence of repute within the meaning of section 117 (3) of the Code. Habitual criminality cannot be regarded as established by the repetition of beliefs and opinions. At any rate, Courts ought to discard such evidence as much as possible. [p. 726, cols. 1 & 2.]

Per Seshagiri Aiyar, J.—Under section 112, Criminal Procedure Code, the substance of the report made to the Magistrate should be clearly disclosed to the accused and if the accused is not informed of the charges or of the nature of the evidence which he is to rebut, the proceedings are illegal. [p. 724, col. 1.]

Kripasindhu Maiko v. Emperor, 47 Ind. Cas. 277 19 Cr. L. J. 905; 3 L. W. 461; (1918) M. W. N. 751 followed.

Per Moore, J.—The preliminary order under section 112 should not merely be a reproduction of the language of clauses (a) and (f) of section 110, Criminal Procedure Code. A notice under the section should be a sufficient indication of the time and place of the acts charged with sufficient details to enable the accused to know what facts he has to meet. [p. 727, col. 1.]

The defect, however, is not a sufficient ground for the High Court quashing the proceedings of the Magistrate, if it is not shown that the accused was prejudiced thereby. [p. 727, col. 1.]

The test of the admissibility of the evidence of general opinion is whether it shows the general reputation of the accused and it should at least be the opinion of a considerable number of persons. It must not be the repetition of what certain persons have said to the witnesses. It should be the evidence of respectable persons acquainted with the accused who live in his neighbourhood and are aware of his reputation. [p. 728, col. 1.]

Petition, under sections 435 and 439 of the Code of Criminal Procedure 1898, praying the High Court to revise the order of the Court of the District Magistrate, Anantapur, dated the 23th December 1918, in Criminal Appeal No. 6 of 1918, preferred against the order of the Court of the Deputy Magistrate, Gooty, dated the 11th July 1918, in Miscellaneous Case No. 13 of 1917.

FACTS appear from the judgment.

The Hon'ble Mr. T. Richmond, for the Petitioner.—Section 110, Criminal Procedure Code, is preventive and not punitive. There must be satisfactory evidence that the person in question is one of the category of persons within the section. Even a likelihood of a breach of the peace is not a reason for action under this action.

Mere evidence of general reputation is not sufficient. Hearsay cannot be the basis for action. Kalai Haldar v. Emperor (1), Abdul Khaliq v. Emperor (2), Bechai v. Emperor (3).

[MOORE, J., referred to Nga Hein v. Emperor (4).]

The same view has been recently laid down in this Court by Kumaraswami Sastri, J., in Kripasindhu Maiko v. Emperor (5). There is no evidence except that the accused is said to be connected with a gang of dacoits and that five or six years ago he was said to have committed a dacoity. The witnesses speak only from hearsay.

[SESHAGIRI AIYAR, J., referred to Emperor v. Sheik Abdul (6) and Prathipati Venkatasami v. Emperor (7).]

Yes. Emperor v. Sheik Abdul (6) clearly says what kind of evidence is required.

Mr. V. L. Ethiraj, for the Public Prosecutor, for the Crown.—The only question being as to the repute of the accused, it is not necessary that there should be evidence sufficient to connect him with the actual commission of crime. Pedla Sivi Reddi, In the matter of the petition of (8). In such cases, evidence of association with bad characters at various times and places is sufficient for an order under section 110, Criminal Procedure Code. Chintamon Singh v. Emperor (9). It is not necessary to prove specific acts or crimes committed by the suspected person.

ORDER.

SESHAGIRI AIYAR, J.—This is an application to revise the order of the District Magistrate of Anantapur, confirming the proceedings taken by the Deputy Magistrate of Gooty calling upon the petitioner to enter into a bond for Rs. 5,000 with two sureties in a like sum. The first Magistrate was moved to take action under section 110 (a) and (f) of the Code of Criminal Procedure. He examined a large number of witnesses, 33 for the prosecution and 41 for the defence. He came to the conclusion that the petitioner should be bound over. In confirming that order the District Magistrate refers to a defect in the prosedure of the Trial Magistrate, namely, that, in recording and reading out the preliminary order under section 112, there was no attempt made to inform the accused of the substance of the information received which led to the taking of action against him. The District Magistrate says that the accused had ample opportunities in the course of the hearing to know what evidence was being given against him and as he did not object to the legality of the preliminary order in the lower Court, the objection should be overruled. Although I do not propose to set aside the order on the sole ground that the information communicated to the accused under section 112 was not sufficient to comply with the requirements of the Code, I must point out that it is of the utmost importance in cases of this description that the first information should be clear and specific. The accused is to be put on his trial on information received behind his back. In the case of a complaint, the accused may be entitled to a copy, if he applies for it, but in the case of an information of this kind which ex necessitate is a confidential one, the accused is entitled to be told the nature and the extent of the information on which the Magistrate intends to base the action against him. It is that communication that is expected to enable the accused to summon witnesses on his side. Therefore, if the substance of the report made to the Magistrate is not clearly disclosed and the accused is not informed of the charges, of the nature of the evidence that he is to rebute, the proceedings cannot be regarded as legal. I entirely agree with the observations of my learned brother Kumaraswami Sastri, J., on this question.

I now proceed to deal with the merits of the case. Objection was taken in this Court by the learned Counsel for the petitioner on the ground that most, if not the whole of the evidence let in on the side of the prosecution was irrelevant and inadmissible in evidence. The District Magistrate classifies in paragraph 4 of his judgment the evidence that has been given. He refers, first of all, to what he considers to be reputation evidence. As regards that he says that, if the order rested solely on it, he would have set it aside. What I understand him to mean is that the evidence of repute against and for the accused is so evenly balanced that, in the opinion of the Appellate Magistrate, it would be unsafe to base the proceedings solely upon it. There was a large volume of evidence adduced by the petitioner which showed that in the opinion of a considerable number of the people in and round the place the accused is a man of good character. If that is the view taken by the District Magistrate, there is nothing to be said against it. But I am not sure whether he does not, to some extent, confuse the issue by holding that evidence of repute is altogether inadmissible.

It is desirable to point out here in what case evidence of repute may be permitted in proceedings of this character and in what cases it should be avoided altogether. Under section 110, there are six categories of offences: the first five relate to habitual misconduct, and the sixth to the accused being desperate and dangerous. Section 117, clause (3), provides "that a person is a habitual offender may be proved by evidence of general repute or otherwise." This language is not very happy and Courts have been often at pains to understand the idea which led the Legislature to enact this clause. The expression 'habitual offender', I believe, covers all the first five categories of offences mentioned in section 110. One thing at least is clear, that to bring home the charge under section 110, clause (f), evidence of general repute is not admissible. According to the ordinary rules of evidence, evidence is not admissible to prove that a man is of a bad character. Therefore, clause 3 of section 117 must be taken to have been introduced by way of exception to the general law. If that is so, the exception must be limited to the particular offences referred to in it. That I understand to have been the view taken by Justice Sankaran Nair in Muthu Pillai v. Emperor (10). In that case it was contended for the Crown that, by admitting evidence of general repute for proving the first five categories of offences in section 110, Courts can subsequently utilise it for showing that the accused is of a desperate character. The learned Judge rightly overruled this suggestion, because it would be enabling the Crown to let in evidence indirectly which it cannot directly do. I am clear that it is not open to the Magistrate to look into evidence of general repute for finding that a man is dangerous and is of a desperate character within section 110 (f) of the Code of Criminal Procedure. Mr. Justice Bannerjee in Emperor v. Bidyapati (11) pointed out that it is only for the purpose of establishing charges under section 110, clauses (a) to (e), that repute evidence is admissible. I am in entire agreement with the pronouncement of Sankaran Nair, J., and Bannerjee, J., on this matter.

The evidence let in in this case would have, therefore, to be excluded to a considerable extent. The District Magistrate divides the rest of the evidence into two classes, the evidence of official witnesses of sufficient standing and the evidence of witnesses who speak of particular acts of criminality on the part of the accused. Under the first heading he relies mainly upon the evidence of a Deputy Superintendent of Police, two Inspectors of Police and some Sub-Inspectors of Police. One caution which the learned Magistrate has not kept in view is that in proceedings of this kind as far as possible the evidence of official witnesses like Superintendents of Police and Inspectors of Police should be eschewed. Their minds are naturally biased by the reports that they receive from their subordinates regarding the movements and antecedents of the accused, when they report to the Magistrate that the accused should be bound over. Therefore, their evidence would in the nature of things ordinarily exhibit bias against the accused. This was pointed out in Abdul Khaliq v. Emperor (2). It is a very salutary principle and although there is no rule of law which prohibits a Magistrate from admitting Police evidence, it should, if not wholly discarded, influence his judgment as little as possible. Bearing this in mind, I shall now examine the evidence given by the Superintendent of Police. He says that he knew the accused's reputation and straightway speaks of having heard of the accused being concerned in getting up of dacoities. Then he says as regards one of the cases the accused is said to have engineered: "I sent the Head Constable to Tadpatri and found the allegations to be true" This is both opinion and hearsay evidence. Then he refers to the entries in his diary of his having been convinced that one of the articles found on a search in the house of the accused being stolen property. If that was the conviction of this witness, why did he not charge the accused before a Criminal Court? The whole of this evidence, however much it may express the honest opinion of the officer, is either hearsay or rumour of a priori conclusions of the witness on one sided representations made to him. There is not a single fact spoken to excepting that relating to the ear-ring. As regards the identity of the ear-ring the owner has not been examined to prove that it was his property and was stolen from him. The whole of this evidence, namely, that of P. W. No. 1, must be rejected. Then I turn to another witness, P. W. No. 31. He is the Circle Inspector. He first refers to the accused having been entered in the surveillance register, then to a letter from the Superintendent of Anantapur to another Superintendent which the witness was permitted to look into, in which it was mentioned that the accused organised a gang of dacoits. Then he refers to his having heard that some Juttur men were members of a gang. Then he refers to an entry in his diary that the accused paid an advance of Rs. 50 for purchasing a ticket and so on. In cross-examination he said: "I made no enquiries regarding the purchasing of tickets." The whole of this evidence must be set aside. The same remark applies to the evidence of the 7th witness. He says that he once went to the house of the accused to check his presence. The accused refused to give him information. "I wrote in my note book what took place." Why this evidence was recorded and how the trial Magistrate considered it relevant, I cannot understand. The evidence of the other Police witnesses is of the same description as that to which I have referred. It seems to me that this evidence should be regarded as inadmissible even if it was given by a private party. They are further vitiated by the fact that it is a record of opinions, rumours and hearsay, which as Police Officers they entered in their note books.

Then I turn to the evidence of the second class of witnesses. The District Magistrate specially refers to the evidence of P. W. No. 15 and P. W. No. 17. As regards P. W. No. 16, in my opinion, it is very irrelevant, to say the least. The Vakil says that he heard from somebody that a dacoity was about to be committed in the house of a client of his and that he warned that client. How is this evidence against the accused? The learned Public Prosecutor said that this evidence must be read with that of P. W. No. 17. P. W No. 17 says: "I knew the accused. He has a bad reputation and he is given to commit burglary, dacoity and has bad associates." Such a general statement can be of no assistance to a Court. It is against all principles to record such vague statements without calling the witness to give specific instances which could be scrutinised and which the accused will be in a position to rebut. He says later on, "the dacoits were expected to proceed from Juttur and from the house of the accused." He admits as a matter of fact that owing to his vigilance and the vigilance of his friend, no dacoity took place. This very unsatisfactory evidence should not have been allowed to influence the mind of the Magistrate against the accused. P. W. No. 12 only says that the accused and his men returned on a particular occasion to their houses, saying thatSubba Reddy escaped. The 13th witness deposed that, about 4 months back, the accused was talking of murdering Subba Reddy. He said he went to the house where he heard the conversation as a cooly to do work for the owner, but he did not inform anybody about the intended murder and that nothing afterwards happened. This kind of evidence can be manufactured against any individual, respectable or otherwise, and no man's reputation can be safe if evidence like this were to influence the proceedings of a Magistrate. I felt considerable doubts whether evidence as regards clauses (a) to (e) of section 110 should not relate to something in the nature of previous convictions. The learned Public Prosecutor drew our attention to Pedda Siva Reddi, In the matter of the petition of (8), wherein the learned Judges say: "Although witnesses are examined as to general character, their testimony is not of much value as to the habits of a suspected person unless they can, in support of their opinion, adduce instances of...misconduct...when the question is only as to his repute. The evidence of witnesses, if reliable, is not without value, though they may not be able to connect ...suspected persons with the actual commission of crime." I am not sure that I understand this judgment. Section 110, clauses (a) to (c), speak of a man being a habitual robber, a habitual receiver of stolen property and a habitual harbourer of thieves, a habitual extortioner or a habitual committer of the breach of the peace. In my opinion the evidence on which the Magistrate has to base his conclusion must relate to particular instances which have come to the knowledge of the deponent and must be specific. Evidence relating to mere beliefs and opinions without reference to acts or instances which have induced the witnesses to form the opinion can hardly be regarded as evidence of repute within section 117, clause (3). Habitual criminality cannot be regarded as established by the repetition of beliefs and opinions. At any rate Courts ought to discard such evidence as much as possible. Emperor v. Sheik Abdul (6), Chintamon Singh v. Emperor (9) and Kalai Haldar v. Emperor (1) seem to lay down this view and I respectfully follow these decisions. Therefore, the evidence of P. W. No. 13, which speaks generally of the reputation of the accused without reference to specific acts, is not, in my opinion, sufficient to bring the charge home to the accused.

The petitioner is a young man of 30 years of age and is in fairly well-to-do circumstances. It is said that he has property worth a lakh of rupees and debts to the extent of thirty thousand rupees. These debts have all been purchased by P. W. No. 22, a distant relation of the accused. It is he that moved the Police to take action in the matter. He has put pressure to bear upon the accused by purchasing litigation. There has not been a single instance in which the accused has been convicted of any offence. Under these circumstances, having regard to the nature of the offence charged and to the character of the evidence let in, I feel no doubt that the proceedings should be set aside altogether. The bond executed by the petitioner and by his sureties must be cancelled and given up.

MOORE, J.—The petitioner has been ordered under section 118 of the Code of Criminal Procedure to enter into a bond for Rs. 5,000 with two sureties for a like amount to be of good behaviour for a period of three years.

The facts of the case are unusual. The petitioner is a Reddi, owning landed property and paying an assessment of Rs. 1,000. The Police moved the Sub-Divisional Magistrate of Gooty for security being taken from the petitioner under section 110, clauses (a) and (f), of the Code of Criminal Procedure on the grounds (1) that he was, by habit, a robber, house breaker and thief, and (2) that he was so desperate and dangerous as to render his being at large hazardous to the community. The Sub-Divisional Magistrate in the preliminary order which he issued under section 112 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, did not set out the substance of the information contained in the Police charge sheet.

KOTTAMIDDU RANGA REDDI, In re.

The order merely reproduces the language of clauses (a) and (f) of section 110 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. This was clearly irregular: "A notice under section 110 of the Code of Criminal Procedure must contain something more than a reproduction of the clauses of the section. There should be sufficient indication of the time and place of the acts charged and sufficient details to enable the accused to know what facts he has to meet." [Per Kumaraswami Sastri, J., in Kripasindhu Maiko v. Emperor (5).] However, I agree with the District Magistrate that this defect is not a sufficient ground for quashing the proceedings, as it is not shown that the petitioner was prejudiced by the defect. After a protracted enquiry the Sub-Divisional Magistrate passed an order requiring the petitioner to give security and, on appeal, the order was confirmed by the District Magistrate. The first objection taken by Mr. Richmond for the petitioner is that a charge under clause (f) of section 110 of the Code of Criminal Procedure cannot be proved by evidence of repute but must be proved by definite evidence, and reliance is placed on Muthu Pillai v. Emperor (10). In that case Mr. Justice Sankaran Nair held, following Kalai Haldar v. Emperor (1), that, when a person is solely charged under section 110 (f) of the Code of Criminal Procedure, evidence of general repute is not admissible to prove that he is of a desperate and dangerous character. That is clear from the wording of section 117 (3) of the Code of Criminal Procedure, which says that for the purposes of this section the fact that a person is an habitual offender may be proved by evidence of repute or otherwise. The learned Judge did not, however, express any opinion on the question whether when a person is tried jointly for charges under clause (f) and any other clause of section 110 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, a finding that he is an habitual offender can be taken into consideration in deciding the charge under clause (f). The lower Courts have not, in my opinion, kept in view the distinction between evidence as to general repute which was undoubtedly admissible to prove that the petitioner was an habitual offender and the evidence requisite to prove a charge under clause (f) which must be of a definite character. The Sub-Divisional Magistrate, for instance, says that the witnesses speak of "specific acts of misconduct attributed to the accused which in fact form the basis of their information and impression. The evidence against the accused is so general and overwhelming that there is not the slightest doubt that he associates and intrigues with criminals and bad characters and has been in the habit of committing dacoities, house-breakings and thefts or other offences of the kind specified."

Finally, the Sub-Divisional Magistrate says: "I am perfectly satisfied from all the foregoing that the accused is, by habit, a robber, house-breaker, thief and that his being at large without security is hazardous to the community." The District Magistrate has fallen into the same error. He states that "most of the evidence on either side concerns the reputation of the appellant...while many of the witnesses for the prosecution say that the appellant has a reputation for habitually engineering dacoities, robberies and thefts and that he is dangerous to society."

The next objection taken by Mr. Richmond is that the Magistrate erred in admitting a large body of irrelevant hearsay evidence in the belief that it was admissible as evidence of repute. This objection is, I think, well-founded. Hearsay evidence amounts to evidence of repute and is admissible for the purpose of section 110 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, this provision of the law being an exception to the general rule of evidence, and in such cases evidence of repute, though hearsay, is admissible. Emperor v. Raoji Fulchand (12) and Pedda Siva Reddi, In the matter of the petition of (8). But as was pointed out in Rai Isri Pershad v. Queen-Empress (13), a case which is frequently quoted: "It is hardly necessary to say that evidence of rumour is mere hearsay evidence and hearsay evidence of a particular fact. Evidence of repute is a totally different thing. A man's general reputation is the reputation which he bears in the place in which he lives amongst all the townsmen, and if it is proved that a man who lives in a particular place is looked upon by his fellow-townsmen, whether they happen to know him or not, as a man of good repute, that is strong evidence that he is of that character. On the other hand, if the state of things is that the body of his fellow-townsmen who know him look upon him as a dangerous man and a man of bad habits, that is strong evidence that he is a man of bad character, but to say that because there are rumours in a particular place among a certain class of people that a man has done a particular act or has characteristics of a certain kind, those rumours are in themselves evidence under this section is to say what the law does not justify us in saying." When it is sought to prove the reputation of a person, the evidence which is required is that of respectable persons who are acquainted with the accused and live in the neighbourhood and are aware of his reputation. The test of the admissibility of the evidence of general opinion is whether it shows the general reputation of the accused, and it should at the least be the opinion of a considerable number of persons. It must not be merely the repetition of what certain persons have said to the witnesses. Coming now to the facts of the present case, the evidence of the accused's general repute and bad livelihood, when examined, is very weak and largely hearsay. For instance P. W. No. 8, who acted for a short time as Village Munsif of Juttur, the petitioner's village, says: "the accused is reputed to be a thief. He never had thefts committed in my village." The witness gives the names of three persons who consider the accused to be a thief and says: "I consider the accused as a man of bad character on the strength of what these persons told me. My individual opinion is that the accused is a bad man having some people to commit thefts." Such evidence, which is based on rumours, should not have been admitted. P. W. No. 10, a resident of Juttur, begins his deposition by saying "I know the accused who is a man of bad character. He is a murderer and dacoit. His reputation is such." In cross-examination P. W. No. 10 states: "I cannot say who said that the accused was a dacoit and a murderer. The whole village said so." The witness is not a man of any position has been convicted of gambling and is admittedly an enemy of the petitioner. P. W. No. 21, who belongs to another village states: "I know the accused for 6 or 7 years. He bears the reputation for committing dacoity and murder." When asked to justify the statement the witness had to admit in cross-examination that he could not say who told him of the accused's bad reputation. I am surprised that the Sub Divisional Magistrate should have allowed such evidence, which was calculated to seriously prejudice the accused, to go in. P. W. No. 17 is a Vakil practising in Gooty. In examination in-chief he stated that he knew the accused and that he bore a bad reputation and was given to commit burglary, dacoity and that he had bad associates. It was elicited, however, in cross-examination that the witness was a friend of P. W. No. 22 (a wealthy and influential man and a bitter enemy of the petitioner), that during the past five years he had very rarely gone to Juttur and had never seen the petitioner there and that P. W. No. 22 and others told him about the reputation of the petitioner. The statement of the District Magistrate that the witness has known the accused "long and well" does not appear to be correct. There is undoubtedly a good deal of evidence that the petitioner is suspected of planning dacoities, but it is not clear why a man in the position of the petitioner should have earned this unenviable reputation. P. W. No. 24, for instance, says: "The accused is a man of large property. I do not know why such a man attempted to commit dacoity." After reading the voluminous evidence of the prosecution witnesses, I am inclined to think that there is a good deal behind the case and that the charge is the outcome of family feuds among the Reddis. For instance P. W. No. 32, who was Village Munsif of Juttur and is a Dayadi of the accused, states that the accused is a man of bad character committing thefts and dacoities and that he has sent several reports regarding the bad character of the accused and his absence from the village. In cross examination, however, he admitted that he had been at enmity with the accused from the time of his father, that he was on friendly terms with P. W. No. 22, his father's cousin, that there had been long standing ill-feeling between P. W. No. 22 and the accused and that there are two parties, one headed by P. W. No. 22

and the other by the accused. Finally he admitted that his opinion that the accused was a dacoit and robber was solely based on what his Gumastah told him and that he did not know personally that accused associated with bad characters. The only other non official witness to whose evidence it is necessary to refer is P. W. No. 34. He pays an assessment of Rs. 300. He deposed that he had heard of dacoities said to have been committed by the gangs of the accused and his brother-in law Chinna Reddi. He made an extraordinary statement that "one Muni Reddy owed the accused Rs. 8,000 and a suit was filed and compromised after payment of booty in dacoity." The whole of this evidence is hearsay. The witness had to admit that he could not say from what source he got his information or give the name of his informants and also that there had been civil suits between accused's brother-in-law and himself. There is also the evidence of a number of Police Officers, P. Ws. Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, 7, 18, 19, 20, and 31, that the petitioner is a registered suspect, that he and his brother-in law are reputed to organise dacoities and that his house has been more than once searched. I have read the evidence of these witnesses and I do not think that much weight can be attached to it. The witnesses admit that the accused has never been charged in any case. The evidence of the Police witnesses amounts to this, that rumours are current in the Police circle that the petitioner organises dacoities and is an associate of bad characters and that his movements have been watched. For the foregoing reasons I consider that there is not sufficient evidence to support the charge under section 110 (a) of the Code of Criminal Procedure that the petitioner is by habit a thief or a dacoit.

As regards the charge under section 110 (f) it has been held in Kalai Haldar v. Emperor (1) that to prove a charge that an accused person is so desperate and dangerous as to render his being at large without security hazardous to the community, there should be proof of specific acts showing that he is a desperate and dangerous character. I respectfully agree with this decision. Practically the only evidence on this part of the case is that of P. Ws. Nos. 16, 17, 12, 13 and 22.

P. W. No. 16, a High Court Vakil practising in Cuddappah, says that 5 years ago he sent a telegram to P. W. No. 22 warning him that a dacoity was likely to be committed in his house. The witness cannot even remember the names of the persons who were planning the dacoity. P. W. No. 17 says that he was with P. W. No. 16 when he sent the telegram and that the information he got was the dacoits were expected to come from the accused's house in Juttur.

The District Magistrate says that P. Ws. Nos. 12 and 13 refer to "definite attempts made by the accused to bring about the murder of P. W. No. 22," but this is hardly correct. P. W. No. 12 states that he met the accused and 4 or 5 others, that they asked him whether P. W. No. 22 had gone that way, that they returned saying that P. W. No. 22 had escaped and that he informed P. W. No. 22 two or three days afterwards. The accused gave evidence against this witness' son in a murder case. P. W. No. 13 tells a ridiculous story of his having overheard a conversation between the accused and 2 other persons in one Narasimha Reddi's house and that they talked about murdering Pedda Subba Reddi. The evidence of these witnesses is worthless and the District Magistrate was not inclined to attach much weight to it. P. W. No. 22 is a wealthy man and a District Board Member. He is a cousin of the petitioner and they are admitted enemies. He says that he had been warned by P. W. No. 12 and 13 that the accused was threatening to murder him and that he sent a petition to the Police. It appears to be clear that it was at the instance of the witness that the security proceedings were instituted.

I am unable to agree with the District Magistrate that there is a large body of evidence "regarding the petitioner's bad life, his habit of engineering crimes and his general desperate character." The evidence on record does not warrant any such conclusion. The District Magistrate also says that there is evidence of witnesses who speak to "definite acts of criminality on the part of the petitioner," but I cannot find any definite evidence of any specific acts of violence committed by the petitioner. In my opinion the order requiring the petitioner to furnish security to be of good behaviour cannot be supported and should be set aside.

ALLAHABAD HIGH COURT.
CRIMINAL REVISION No. 87 OF 1920.
March 3, 1920.
Present:—Justice Sir George Knox, KT.
MATA PRASAD—APPLICANT
versus
EMPEROR—OPPOSITE PARTY.

Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860), s. 420—Cheating, proof of—Prosecution, duty of—Constituents of offence.

To constitute the offence of cheating under section 420, Penal Code, the prosecution must prove that there was an act of cheating on the part of the accused, that by that act the person cheated was induced to deliver property, and that by that act there was dishonesty which induced the person cheated to deliver property. [p. 730, col. 2.]

Criminal revision from an order of the Sessions Judge, Agra, dated the 16th January 1920.

Messrs. J. M. Banerji, Gulzari Lal, N. P. Asthana and Baleshwari Prasad, for the Applicant.

Mr. R. Malconson, Assistant Government Advocate, for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.—Mata Prasad has been convicted of an offence under section 420 of the Indian Penal Code and sentenced to imprisonment and fine. From this order which was passed by a Magistrate of the First Class, he appealed to the Court of Session. That Court held that the conviction was a right and proper one. He has come to this Court in revision and contends through his learned Counsel that the order of the Court below is wholly wrong inasmuch as it has put the defence to prove the negative, that the petitioner did not act dishonestly. It appears that one Debi Dayal accompanied by the petitioner went to one Hira Lal. (The judgment of the learned Sessions Judge was so defective in important parts that I departed from my usual rule in revision and looked into the evidence). Upon reading the evidence of Hira Lal it would appear that in the transaction which took place between Mata Prasad and Hira Lal, Debi Dayal played a very important part. He was really the person who transacted the business between Hira Lal and Mata Prasad. Mata Prasad asked that money might be advanced upon the security of a ring. Hira Lal at first was somewhat suspicious of the transaction and when money was eventually advanced, it was on Debi Dayal's assuring Hira Lal that Mata Prasad was an honest man to whom money may be advanced. If the evidence be carefully scrutinised it is evident what turned the scale in favour of Hira Lal advancing the money was the assurance he received from Debi Dayal. The ring which was said in a loose way to be a gold ring, eventually turned out to be silver covered with gilt. Hira Lal meanwhile had got Mata Prasad to execute a promissory note promising to pay the money advanced to him.

The learned Judge in his judgment, taking into consideration that Mata Prasad, so it is said, got money upon other similar rings, held that it was for Mata Prasad to show that he did not know that the rings were not of gold; in other words, he threw the burden of proving his innocence on the accused. In this the learned Judge erred. Before an offence can be established under section 420 of the Indian Penal Code it is for the prosecution to prove that there had been not only an act of cheating on the part of the accused but also by that very act of cheating the person cheated was induced to deliver property, and beyond this the prosecution has also to prove that by that act of cheating there was dishonesty which induced the person cheated to deliver property. All these three elements are to be proved by the prosecution. In the present case, as I have already pointed out, the inducement which acted upon the mind of Hira Lal proceeded from the assurance given by Debi Dayal that Mata Prasad was an honest man who could be trusted. I need not go further into the fact whether the dishonesty of the accused was or was not proved, as it was not the showing of the gold ring but the assurance by Debi Dayal which induced Hira Lal to do what he did.

I allow the application, set aside the conviction and sentence, and direct that Mata Prasad be at once released from custody and that the fine or any part of it, if paid, be returned to Mata Prasad. Let the ring be returned to the custody from which it was got.

Application allowed;
Sentence set aside.

CALCUTTA HIGH COURT.
CRIMINAL REVISION No. 17 OF 1919.
January 30, 1919.
Present:—Mr. Justice Richardson and Justice Sir Syed Shamsul Huda, KT.
THE CHAIRMAN OF THE HOWRAH MUNICIPALITY—COMPLAINANT—PETITIONER
versus
BARADA PRASANNA PAIN—ACCUSED—OPPOSITE PARTY.

Calcutta Municipal Act (III B. C. of 1899), ss. 578, 631—Pleader's profession carried on without license—Offence—Limitation for prosecution—Pleader's profession, carrying on of, what constitutes.

Per Curiam.—With regard to an offence under section 578 of the Calcutta Municipal Act for carrying on a Pleader's profession without taking the prescribed Municipal license, if the profession is exercised for one day only, the prosecution must be commenced within the following three months. If it is exercised on a number of days, whether the offence is a continuing one or not, the prosecution must be commenced within three months of the last of such days. [p. 733, col. 1.]

Per Richardson, J.—Under clause (2) of section 578 of the Calcutta Municipal Act, when an offender has once been convicted and has paid the fine imposed upon him, the offence is purged and the payment of the fine is to be taken in full satisfaction of the demand on account of such license. An offender who has paid his fine is thereafter in the same position as a person who has taken out his license in proper time. [p. 733, col. 1.]

Per Huda, J.—Clause (2) of section 631 of the Calcutta Municipal Act has the effect of extending and not of shortening the period of limitation provided by clause (1) of the section. [p. 732, col. 1.]

For the purpose of carrying on a Pleader's profession within the meaning of section 578 of the Calcutta Municipal Act it is not necessary that a person should every day conduct a case or attend or address the Court. If he keeps an office for the purpose of receiving his clients or gives them advice or is generally open to engagement as a Pleader, that will constitute the carrying on of a Pleader's profession. [p. 732, col. 2.]

Application for revision of the order of the Deputy Magistrate, Howrah.

FACTS.—Proceedings were instituted by the Chairman of the Howrah Municipality against a Pleader for not taking a license under section 578 of the Calcutta Municipal Act, which has been extended to the Howrah Municipality. The trying Magistrate acquitted the accused on the ground of limitation under section 631, clause (1), as the proceeding was not instituted within three months of the date of default as required by the Act.

The Municipality applied to the High Court in revision.

Babu Bepin Chandra Mullik (with him Babu Profulla Chandra Ghosh), for the Opposite Party.—The pericd of offence lay between the 1st of April 1917 and 31st March 1918. The offence of non-payment was first committed on the 1st of July. The letter of demand was despatched on the 22nd Apil 1917, but the Pleader refused to acknowledge that under section 578, Calcutta Municipal Act. The proceeding ought to have been brought by 1st of October, i. e., within three months from the date of default, viz., 1st of July. The date must be counted from the first day of offence. This will be the true meaning of section 631, clause (2). The offence will be a continuing offence, but the limitation must be counted from the first date of default. There is no evidence to show on what exact dates the Pleader was found practising in the Court. The High Court does not interfere and convict one who has been acquitted in a revision case, as it is against the provision of section 439, clause (4), Criminal Procedure Code.

Babu Manmatha Nath Mookerjee (with him Babu Satindra Nath Mookerjee), for the Petitioner.—The Magistrate in acquitting the accused chiefly relied on the point that no formal charge was made and that it was altered later on. I submit he was wrong there, as it is not necessary to frame a formal charge in a summons case under sections 231 and 242 of the Criminal Procedure Code.

it was not necessary that the Pleader should attend Court every day for the profession. He may give instructions to his clients from home or any other place, and that would amount to his doing his professional work. The date of limitation must be counted from every day of the continuing offence and hence there is no bar to instituting the case within three months from any day of default.

Babu Bepin Chandra Mallick, in reply, referred to the provision of section 578, clause (2), of the Calcutta Municipal Act in support of the decision of the Magistrate.

JUDGMENT.

SHAMSUL HUDA, J.—This is an application against an order of acquittal. As a rule this Court is reluctant to interfere in such cases. But as this is not a criminal case in the strict sense of the term, as it concerns the interests of a publicb ody, and as it is, we understand, one of several cases of the same nature which are now pending in the Court below, we have thought it necessary to examine the case on its merits.

The prosecution was against a Pleader of the Howrah Court, for practising as a Pleader without taking a license, under section 578 of the Calcutta Municipal Act, which has been extended to the Howrah Municipality. The Magistrate acquitted the accused on the ground that under section 631, clause (1), of the Act which is also extended to Howrah, the complaint should have been made within three months of the date of the commission of the offence. The learned Magistrate says that the Pleader practically admitted that he had exercised his profession in 1917-18. If that be so, he was guilty of an offence against the provisions of section 578 on the last date of that year, i. e., on the 31st March 1918, and the complaint lodged within three months of that date was clearly not barred under clause (1) of section 631, and to save limitation it was not necessary to invoke the aid of clause (2) which was not in force in Howrah when the prosecution was commenced. But clause (2) has the effect of extending and not shortening the period of limitation provided by clause (1).

The statement that the accused made before the Magistrate was that he carried on his profession in the year 1917-18, but not on every day of the year. I do not think that this is quite a straightforward statement. If he had carried on his profession in 1917 18, it is not intelligible to me how he could have exercised his profession on particular days of that year only. He perhaps meant that he was not actullay conducting a case every day in that year. But for the purpose of carrying on a Pleader's profession it is not necessary that he should every day conduct a case or attend or address the Court. For instance, the facts of keeping an office for the purpose of receiving his clients, giving them advice or being generally open to engagement as a Pleader, will all constitute the carrying on of a Pleader's profession. Giving the statement of the accused its proper effect, it seems to me to amount to an unqualified admission that he carried on his profession throughout the year 1917-18. In this view of the case, I am of opinion that the prosecution is not barred.

We accordingly convict the accused of an offence under section 578 of the Calcutta Municipal Act and impose upon him a fine of Rs. 25 (Rupees twenty-five only), being twice the amount which he was liable to pay for his license.

RICHARDSON, J.—I agree. I have only one word to add. As to the ground on which the Magistrate acquitted the petitioner, if we read section 578 apart from the provisions of section 631, the offence thereby created lies in the person exercising a profession after the 1st of July in any year without having the prescribed license. The offence, therefore, is committed and the law is broken on the first day on which the profession is so exercised. If the profession is so exercised on subsequent days, there may be a doubt whether a separate offence is committed on each day or whether it is all one continuing offence. But it is not necessary to decide that on the assumption that it is one offence, the offence begun on the first day continues to be committed and the law continues to be broken on each subsequent day.

Then if we turn to the first clause of section 631, that clause limits the time within which a prosecution for such an offence may be commenced. Complaint must be made before a Magistrate within three months next after the commission of the offence. If the profession is exercised on one day only, the prosecution must be commenced within the following three months. If it is exercised on a number of days, whether the offence is a continuing one or not, the prosecution must be commenced within three months of the last of such days.

It is perfectly true that under clause (2) of section 578, when an offender has once been convicted and paid the fine imposed upon him, the offence is purged and the payment of the fine is to be taken in full satisfaction of the demand on account of such license. The offender who has paid his fine is thereafter in the same position as a person who has taken out his license in proper time. But it by no means follows from that provision that the prosecution must be commenced within three months of the first of a number of days on which the offender practises without a license. The offence, as I have said, is committed afresh or continues to be committed on every day on which he practises without a license and the prosecution may be commenced within three months of the last of such days. The contention of the learned Pleader that there was only one offence, an offence complete on the first day, is wide of the mark.

The other question which arises is a pure question of fact, whether the petitioner did or did not practise up to the end of the Municipal year, that is, up to the 31st March 1918. I entirely agree in what my learned brother has said on this part of the case. The Magistrate has, in effect, come to the same conclusion when he says the petitioner admitted or practically admitted that he exercised his profession during 1917 and 1918. That being so and the prosecution having been started within three months of the 31st March 1918, it was not barred by the rule of limitation prescribed by the first clause of section 631.

We understand that clause (2) of section 631 has now been extended to the Howrah Municipal area and consequently there will be no difficulty such as has arisen in this case in future.

Rule made absolute.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), s. 122—Surety, when can be rejected—Reliability, test of.

When an accused person is called upon to produce a surety, such surety must be accepted, or, if rejected, he must be rejected upon tangible evidence recorded and considered by the Magistrate who ordered the accused to find security The mere fact that a person has once been challaned for a theft, is no ground for holding that he is not a reliable person.

Criminal reference by the Officiating Sessions Judge, Badaun, dated the 4th February 1920.

JUDGMENT.—This case has been properly reported to this Court. It appears that a person who had been ordered to produce a surety for good behaviour tendered one Durga Singh as surety. The Police were ordered to furnish a report in regard to Durga Singh's good or bad character and the Tahsildar of the locality to furnish a report as regards his status and position. Upon receiving these reports the Magistrate passed the following order:—"From the Police report it appears that this surety, Durga Singh, was challaned in a theft case. He is not a reliable man, under the circumstances his offer as surety cannot be accepted. The accused should produce surety of good character to the satisfaction of the Court." This order cannot be accepted. It does not by any means follow that a person, who has once been challaned for a theft, is not a reliable person. It must be within the learned Magistrate's experience that it is not every person, who is challaned by the Police, who is not a reliable man. Further when an accused person is called upon to produce a surety, such surety must be accepted or if rejected, he must be rejected upon tangible evidence recorded and considered by the Magistrate who ordered him to find security. See Emperor v. Balwant (1).

The order passed by the Deputy Magistrate is set aside. Should the person ordered to find security produce a surety about whom there is doubt, the Magistrate must decide upon evidence of some kind that he is not of good character before rejecting him. It is reversing the whole practice in calling upon the surety to prove that he is of good character.

Let the record be returned.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), s 109—Security for good behaviour—Accused giving satisfactory account of themselves, what amounts to.

Accused were called upon, under section 109, Criminal Procedure Code, to show cause why they should not furnish security for good behaviour on the ground that they had no ostensible means of subsistence and that they could not give a satisfactory account of themselves. It was proved that the accused were residents of another district where they had their houses, that they were dealers in cattle and that they had money of their own. The Magistrate held the first part of the charge not proved, but directed them to furnish security because they had not been able to give a satisfactory account of themselves:

Held, that the accused had given a reasonable account of themselves and that as their case did not come within the purview of section 109 (b) of the Criminal Procedure Code, the order directing them to furnish security should not have been passed. [p. 735, col. 1.]

Criminal revision against the order of the District Magistrate, Meerut, dated the 22nd August 1919.

JUDGMENT.—This is an application for revision of an order directing the applicant under section 109 of the Criminal Procedure Code to furnish security for good behaviour, on the ground that the applicant was unable to give a satisfactory account of himself. It appears that in the city of Meerut a number of persons, consisting of adults, women, boys and girls, were encamped at the camping ground. They had some ponies with them. The suspicion of the Police was roused against the men belonging to the party and a case was instituted against them calling upon them under section 109 of the Criminal Procedure Code to show cause why they should not furnish security for good behaviour, on the ground that they had no ostensible means of subsistence and that they could not give a satisfactory account of themselves. The learned Magistrate who tried the case was of opinion that the first part of the charge was not established, but he came to the conclusion that the persons who had been placed before him had not been able to give a satisfactory account of themselves and accordingly directed them to furnish security for a small amount. It has been found that the applicant and his companions were residents of Bindki in the District of Fatehpur, where they have their usual place of residence. They go about selling cattle for about eight months in the year and return to their homes in the rainy season. In the present case it was proved that these men were in the habit of selling cattle, that they had money in deposit with a banker and that at the time when the proceedings against them were instituted, they had a fairly large sum of money in their possession. It is true that they stated that they had come to Garhmukhtesar in the Meerut District some months prior to the month of February 1919, when they were found by the Police at the place where they had encamped, that after selling off their cattle they were going back to their homes and had stayed there because the Police were interfering with them. This last statement was undoubtedly not established. It may be that they had not sufficient reasons for making a long stay at the place where they were encamped but as has been stated above, they gave a good account of themselves which has not been disbelieved, namely, that they were residents of Bindki where they had their own houses; that they were dealers in cattle and that they had money of their own. It cannot be said in these circumstances that they were unable to give a satisfactory account of themselves. They had clearly ostensible means of livelihood and their statement in this respect was accepted by the Court. They had given a reasonable account of themselves and it would be stretching language to hold that they had failed to give a satisfactory account of themselves. This is a much stronger case in favour of the applicant and his companions than the case of Ghulam Jilani v. Emperor (1). In my opinion the case of the applicant and of his companions did not come within the purview of clause (b) of section 109, Criminal Procedure Code, and the order directing them to furnish security for good behaviour ought not to have been passed. I accordingly set aside that order and direct that the security furnished, if any, be discharged. This order will apply to the cases of the other persons concerned in this matter who have not filed any application for revision. As to them I make the order in exercise of the powers of revision vested in this Court under section 439, Criminal Procedure Code.

Order set aside.

Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860), s. 304A—Poison, administration of, by medical man in mistake for quinine—Criminal negligence.

Accused was in charge of a dispensary which, it was found, was very carelessly and badly managed, poisonous medicines being mixed up with non-poisonous medicines and the poison cupboard being kept unlocked. He had to prepare a large quantity of quinine mixture and had to use a certain amount of quinine hydrochloride. He removed a bottle from the non-poisonous medicines cupboard, and, without looking at the wrapper on the outside of which was printed the word "poison," tore open the wrapper and, without reading the label on the bottle on which was printed "strychnine hydrochloride," mixed the contents of the bottle into a mixture and administered the mixture to several persons, all but one of whom died within a very short time. He was convicted under section 304A of the Penal Code. In revision it was contended that the act done by him, though negligent, was not so grossly negligent as to fall within the criminal law:

Held, that the act of the accused amounted to gross and criminal negligence and that he had been rightly convicted under section 304A of the Penal Code. [p. 736, col. 1.]

Criminal revision from an order of the Sessions Judge, Agra, dated the 11th November 1919.

Mr. C. Ross Alston, for the Applicant.

Mr. R. Malcomson, Assistant Government Advocate, for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.—The applicant in this case has been convicted of causing death by a rash and negligent act under section 304A, Indian Penal Code, and has been sentenced to three months' simple imprisonment and to pay a fine of Rs. 150. There are three counts and the sentences were ordered to run concurrently. The plea taken on revision is that the act done by the applicant, though it may have been negligent, was not so grossly negligent as to fall within the criminal law. The facts may be briefly stated.

Messrs. A. Jhon & Co., at Agra, employed the appellant as a doctor in the dispensary in connection with their mills for the purposes of their employees. The appellant is not a qualified man. He apparently has served for a large number of years in the drug department of Messrs. Treacher & Co. in Bombay and for 8 years has been employed in Agra in charge of the dispensary in question. The Courts below have both held that the dispensary at the mills of Messrs. A. Jhon & Co. was very carelessly and badly managed. When visited by the joint Magistrate, poisonous medicines were found here and there mixed up with non-poisonous medicines and though a poison cupboard was supplied it was kept unlocked. On the date on which the present occurrence took place, the applicant had to prepare a large amount of quinine mixture to be given to certain patients who were suffering from fever. To assist him he had a compounder who like himself was also without any qualifications. The compounder apparently was absent on this day. The accused, in order to prepare 24 ounces of quinine mixture, had to put in a certain amount of quinine hydrochloride. He went to the cupboard in which non-poisonous medicines were usually kept and took from it a bottle still inside its original wrapper as it came from the manufacturer. On the outside of that wrapper was printed the word "poison." Apparently he did not look at that. He tore open the wrapper and threw it on the floor. The bottle was similar in shape and colour to that in which quinine hydrochloride was supplied. The label was of the same size. There was no distinctive poison label on the bottle itself, but on the label was printed strychnine hydrochloride. Apparently the appellant's eye did not catch this, for he mixed the whole bottlefull into a mixture, gave it to 8 persons to take, all of whom took it. Seven died within a very short time, one fortunately vomited and ejected it. It is unnecessary to set out the accused's subsequent conduct. The question for decision is whether in acting as he did the applicant was guilty of such gross negligence as to bring him within the purview of section 304A. Both the Courts below have held that he was and after a long and patient hearing and considerable consideration, I am of the same opinion. Apparently the dispensary, which was in the charge of the accused, was very carelessly managed It must have been within his knowledge that the medicines were not properly arranged. This would throw upon him a still greater burden, and it was his duty to be very careful indeed to see that the medicines that he was administering were proper ones. It is true that in a well kept dispensary a compounder would not expect to find poisonous medicines in a cupboard which ordinarily contained non-poisonous medicines, but in the present case there was good reason for the present applicant to take extra care, Instead of that he took a bottle, which on the outside wrapper bore the word "poison" in distinctive words, without glancing at it and without even reading the label on the bottle he administered poison, which resulted in the death of seven person. In my opinion this is gross and criminal negligence and the conviction was a proper one. There remains the question of sentence. Keeping in view the result of the applicant's carelessness it is impossible to say that the sentence of three months' simple imprisonment is too heavy. The result is that I disallow the application. The applicant must surrender to his bail and serve his sentence. The fine is maintained.

Application dismissed.

Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860), s. 498—Enticing away married woman—Marriage, proof of.

To sustain a conviction under section 498, Penal Code, the mere statement of the complainant and the woman that they are married is not sufficient evidence of the marriage.

Criminal revision against the order of the Sessions Judge, Sabaranpur, dated the 15th December 1919.

Mr. Nihal Chand, for the Applicants.

The Assistant Government Advocate, for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.—Buddhu and Jaggan, who have been convicted of an offence under section 498 of the Indian Penal Code, have put in an application praying for revision of their sentences. In their application they have called particular attention to the fact that the conviction under section 498 of the Indian Penal Code cannot be sustained, inasmuch as it has not been strictly proved that marriage and all necessary rites were duly celebrated between the complainant and the woman in question. They have also pointed out that the mere statement of the husband that he is married to the woman is not sufficient to sustain conviction. This Court in Queen-Empress v. Dal Singh (1) has laid down that Courts trying a case under section 498 of the Indian Penal Code should require some better evidence of the marriage than the mere statement of the complainant and the woman. There appears to be no evidence of a better kind in this case. I set aside the conviction and sentence and direct that Buddhu and Jaggan, if in custody be released, if on bail, their bail bonds be discharged.

Where a sum of money is due for work done, the fact that there has been unlawful detention of that sum would not justify an order awarding interest thereon, either under the Contract Act or under the Interest Act. [p. 738, col. 2]

Appeal against the decree of the District Judge, Murshidabad, dated the 27th March 1917, modifying that of the Munsif, Additional Court at Kandi, dated the 31st July 1916.

FACTS appear from the judgment.

Babu Sajani Kanta Sinha (with him Babu Gopendranath Das), for the Appellant.—Defendant No. 4 is the appellant here This appeal arises out of a suit for the recovery of the costs of constructing a house for the defendant. The claim amounts to Rs. 605-7 for labour and materials and Rs. 188 for the interest. The first Court decreed the suit for the recovery of Rs. 308 with interest at 6 per cent. Both the parties preferred an appeal before the learned District Judge of Murshidabad and the lower Appellate Court modified the decree in favour of the plaintiff but dismissed the appeal of the defendant.

My first submission is that the finding about the number of bricks supplied to my client is against the pleadings. In the plaint the numbers of bricks alleged to have been supplied to my client is less than that found by the District Judge and as such this finding can be set aside in second appeal.

My second point is that in the absence of any written contract the District Judge ought not to have allowed interest on the unliquidated sum: see Surendra Kumar Basu v. Kunja Behary Singh (1); see also Interest Act XXXII of 1839.

Babu Siva Prosanna Bhattacharjee, for the Respondent.—My submission is that I am entitled to costs with interest.

I rely upon section 73, Indian Contract Act, and illustration (n) of the same section is just to the point. Refers to Chajmal Das v. Brij Bhukhan Lal (2).

At any rate interest by way of damages ought to be allowed. Mathura Prosad v. Rukmini Koer (3).

Babu Sajani Kanta Sinha, in reply.—All the grounds advanced by my learned friend are untenable.

All the cases in which a contrary view has been taken are distinguishable.

In Chajmal Das v. Brij Bhukhan Lal (2) a time was fixed for payment. In Ghanshiam Singh v. Daulat Singh (4) no reference was made to the Interest Act. Chajmal Das v. Brij Bhukhan Lal (2). Gunesh Bakhsh v. Harihar Bakhsh (5), Surendra Kumar Basu v. Kunja Behary Singh (1) in which interest was not allowed. In Juggomohun Ghose v. Manickchand (6) the principle is stated.

In Juggomohun Ghose v. Kaisreechund (7) interest was not held to be recoverable unless inserted in the contract

Jugeshur Bhagat v. Ghanasham Dass (8) merely followed Chajmal Das v. Brij Bhukhan Lal (2). Mohamaya Prosad Singh v. Ram Khelawan Singh Thakur (9) merely followed Jogeshur Bhagat v. Ghanasham Dass (8) and Chajmal Das v. Brij Bhukhan Lal (2). Mathura Prosad v. Rukmini Koer (3) is a suit for maintenance which is a fixed sum.

Interest by way of damages was neither claimed in the plaint nor raised in the issue.

JUDGMENT.

WALMSLEY, J.—This appeal arises out of a dispute about the cost of erecting a house. The plaintiff built a house for the defendant, and he sued to recover Rs. 606-7-0 for labour and materials and Rs. 188 for interest. The first Court gave him a decree for Rs. 308-14 with interest at 6 per centum. Both sides appealed, and the learned District Judge made a slight modification in favour of the plaintiff, but dismissed the defendant's appeal.

The defendant has preferred this second appeal. Two arguments are put forward on her behalf, one relates to the amount to be deducted from the plaintiff's bill in consideration of the bricks provided by the defendant, and the other is as to the defendant's liability for interest.

So far as the bricks are concerned, the learned Judge's finding as to the number supplied is one which cannot be challenged in this Court.

The argument that the defendant is not liable for interest raises a more substantial question. The learned Munsif allowed interest as the sum was withheld from the plaintiff for a long time. The learned Judge takes the same view; he says that the sum due to the plaintiff was due for work done, and that for the unlawful detention of that money the plaintiff is entitled to interest by way of damages, and in support of this view he quoted the case of Mathura Prosad v. Rukmini Koer (3).

It is to be observed that no attempt is made to justify the order awarding interest by reference to Act XXXII of 1839. It would, in fact, be impossible to do so, for there is no written statement and no demand in writing.

Again neither of the Courts below professes to rely on section 73 of the Contract Act. The learned Vakil who appears for the respondent, however, argues that that section, especially in the light of illustration (n), warrants the order. That argument was answered by the learned Judges who decided the case of Kamalammal v. Peeru Meera Levvai Rowthen (10). I may also refer to the judgment of Banerjee, J., in the case of Surju Narain Mukhopadhya v. Pratap Narain Mukhopadhya (12), where he pointed out that section 73 of the Contract Act requires the creditor to prove actual loss. In the present case it is not alleged that the plaintiff sustained actual loss; e. g., that he had to borrow money to carry on his business while he waited for the defendant to pay him. In my view, therefore, the order making defendant liable for interest cannot be sustained under the Contract Act.

We are thrown back on a third ground, a so-called equitable principle that when a debtor withholds payment of money due, the creditor is entited to interest. The learned Judge does not use the words equitable principle, but they have been used in addresses to the Court in cases where the same argument has been advanced. The principle sounds reasonable, but it runs counter to the general rule of English law that interest by way of damages is not recoverable for the mere wrongful detention of an ordinary debt. It was examined in the Madras case already quoted, and it was rejected and the Calcutta case, which the learned District Judge says is distinguishable, seems to me very important. In that case the trial Judge said: "There is no express contract to pay interest; however, I would allow the plaintiff to recover interest as he has been so long deprived of his use of the money." This Court set aside the order awarding interest, and Maclean, C. J., after holding that the case could not come under Act XXXII and remarking that the order was not supported by reference to the Contract Act, said that it was difficult to see upon what ground interest had been allowed.

It is true that there are several reported cases in which a contrary view appears to have been taken. Among them is the decision of the Privy Council in the case of Chajmal Das v. Brij Bhukhan Lal (2), but that was a case that came within the provisions of Act XXXII of 1839. Some of the other cases can be distinguished; others, (11) 31 M. 250; 3 M. L. T. 278; 18 M. L. J. 245.

(12) 26 C. 955 at p. 965.

I must admit, it would be difficult to distinguish.

I think we ought to follow the decision in Surendra Kumar Basu's case (1) and allow the appeal so far as the claim in respect of interest is concerned. As success is divided, I would order each party to bear his own costs.

SHAMSUL HUDA, J.—The plaintiff in this case is clearly not entitled to any interest under the Interest Act. But that, in my opinion, does not debar him from claiming interest by way of damages under section 73 of the Contract Act. In this case, however, the plaintiff did not claim interest by way of damages in the plaint, nor does it appear that the question regarding the measure of damages was raised in the issues.

Under these circumstances I agree with my learned brother in holding that the plaintiff is not entitled to any interest before the date of suit.

Appeal allowed in part.

The Court having decided in favour of the plaintiffs, the defendants applied to the High Court for revision under section 44 of the Punjab Courts Act of 1919:

Petition, under section 44 of Act VI of 1919, for revision of the order of the Munsif, 1st Class, Hissar, dated the 3rd December 1919.

Lala Jagan Nath, for the Petitioners.

Mr. Badr-ud Din Kureshi, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—Rahman and others instituted a suit against Sondi Mal and others in the Court of the Munsif, first class, Hissar, claiming a declaration to the effect that the plaintiffs were only liable to give to the defendants a one-third share of grain as rent in respect of their occupancy lands despite an entry in the revenue records showing a liability to pay a larger share. The defendants, proprietors of the land in question, pleaded that the suit was barred by limitation and that the Revenue Courts alone had jurisdiction to try it. These pleas were taken as preliminary ones and have been disposed of by the learned Munsif in favour of the plaintiffs, it having been held that the suit was within limitation and that having regard to the decision in Ram Singh v. Bakhshi (1) the suit was cognizable by the Civil Courts. Sondi Mal and others, defendants proprietors, have come up to this Court under section 44 of Act VI of 1919 through Lala Jagan Nath, who has asked me to interfere with this interlocutory order in revision. Mr. Badr ul-Din Kureshi for the plaintiffs-respondents raised a preliminary point to the effect that the High Court had no revisional jurisdiction to interfere with an interlocutory order.

It has been repeatedly held that a High Court has power under its revisional jurisdiction to deal with and to set aside, if necessary, an interlocutory order. When sitting alone I myself, following other decisions, have held that this Court had this power, vide Imdad Ali Shah v. Sayed Ali (2), and nothing Mr. Kureshi advanced has caused me to change my view. Interference on the revision side, however, is only permissible when an interlocutory order is so unjust and is likely to put things into so inconvenient a position that irreparable harm would be done to the applicant for revision. In other words, it is only in exceptional cases that this Court will exercise that power. Lala Jagan Nath has cited many authorities to show that the view taken by the learned Munsif as to his jurisdiction in this matter is erroneous. The learned Munsif purported to follow Ram Singh v. Bakhshi (1). There, however, the facts were quite different. The plaintiffs in that case alleged that the entries in the revenue papers relating to the ownership of certain khasra numbers were incorrect, and the relief prayed for was that proceedings relating to a certain mutation be held null and void, the entries in the Record of Rights being corrected. In the present suit the plaintiffs pray for a declaration that they are not liable to pay rent as entered in the revenue records, and it seems to me that such a case clearly falls within the purview of section 77 (3) (i), being a suit between a landlord and a tenant arising out of the conditions on which a tenancy is held. In Gamu v. Karim Khan (3) it was held by a Full Bench of the Chief Court that a suit for a declaration that occupancy tenants are not liable to pay haq hua dues was cognizable by the Revenue Courts only. In Jiwan Das v. Piran Datta (4) the plaintiff sued for a declaration that he as jagirdar was entitled to receive the revenue in kind out of the landlord's share of the produce which had to be paid by the tenants to the proprietors, and it was held that the suit involved the question as to whether in the village concerned the land revenue should be paid to the jagirdar in cash or in kind and that the suit was, therefore, cognizable by the Revenue Courts. It was also held that the mere fact that the suit was one for a declaration did not give the Civil Courts jurisdiction to entertain it.

It seems to me that the present case is one that is exclusively triable by the Revenue Courts. Mr. Kureshi referred me to Rahmun v. Hasham (5), and that ruling certainly supports his contention. There the plaintiffs sued for a declaration that they, as occupancy tenants, were not bound to pay the enhanced rent laid down by a fresh entry in the Record of Rights, and that such entry was erroneous, and it was held that the suit was exclusively cognizable by a Civil Court. This decision was, however, specifically dissented from by a Full Bench of the Chief Court in a case reported as Ibrahim v. Akbar (6), where it was held that a suit falling within the purview of section 77 (3), Punjab Tenancy Act, must be heard by a Revenue Court, whether or not, so far as the form of the suit or the particular remedy prayed for is concerned, the suit also falls within the purview of the Specific Relief Act. Rahman v. Hasham (5), therefore, no longer supports the view contended for by Mr. Kureshi.

In Sitaramayya v. Ramappa (7) the Madras High Court held that it could interfere with an interlocutory order passed by a Subordinate Court, if the question involved was not one of the exercise of discretion but of want of jurisdiction and manifest injustice might otherwise be done.

HLA MAUNG v. MA TOKE.

In Bhargava & Co. v. Jagan Nath-Bhagwan Dass (8) it was held that the decision of the question of jurisdiction of the Court of first instance as a preliminary to the hearing of the suit before it was open to revision. Bala Krishna Udayar v. Vasudeva Aiyar (9) was followed in that case. Mr. Kureshi urged that no irreparable harm would be caused to the petitioners inasmuch as in the event of a decree being passed against them, they could appeal and attack the decree on the ground of jurisdiction. This no doubt is the case, and it is also true that under section 100 of the Punjab Tenancy Act a decree passed by a Civil Court can be registered as a decree of a Revenue Court; but it seems to me that when a Court comes to an erroneous decision that it has jurisdiction to entertain a suit, it would certainly tend to the convenience and advantage of all parties if that decision is set aside and matters put right at the earliest possible stage. In these circumstances I think I am justified in exercising my powers of revision in this case and I accordingly accept this petition with costs and set aside the order of the learned Munsif dated the 3rd of December 1919, and direct him to return the plaint to the plaintiffs for presentation in a Revenue Court having jurisdiction

MA TOKE—DEFENDANT—RESPONDENT.

Contract Act (IX of 1872), s. 15—Coercion, what amounts to—Unlawful detention of property—Claim of right, effect of.

One of the claimants to the estate of a deceased person detained some of the property belonging to the estate of the deceased, and thereby induced the widow of the deceased to execute a bond in his favour for a sum equal to his alleged share in the estate:

Held, that the detention was unlawful, though the claimant had a right to some share in the estate, and the bond was, therefore, void for coercion [p. 743, col. 1.]

Mr. N. N. Burjorji, for the Appellants.

Mr. N. M. Cowasji, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.

MAUNG KIN, J.—Plaintiffs-appellants are the adopted children of the defendant-respondent, and her deceased husband, Ko Me. They sue the defendant for Rs. 30,000 with interest due on a bond executed by her on the following allegations:—the defendant had married, or was about to marry, one Ali Nabi. Plaintiffs, therefore, demanded partition of the estate of their deceased adoptive father. By way of a compromise, the bond was executed whereby defendant agreed to pay Rs. 30,000 to plaintiffs in full settlement of their claims and plaintiffs agreed to give time to defendant for payment till the 21st July 1915, the date of the bond being 17th November 1914.

Defendant admits having executed the bond, but pleads coercion. Her case is that two days prior to the execution of the bond, the plaintiffs' natural father, Po Hmyin, who is her own brother, came with the 1st plaintiff, Hla Maung, and asked to be allowed to take the 2nd and 3rd plaintiffs (Ma Hla Nyun and Ma E Myin) out to be photographed with their jewels on. Defendant allowed the girls to wear jewels and they went away with Po Hmyin and Hla Maung in her carriage, but they never returned to her. The girls were searched for, but could not be found. Nor could she get any information about her jewels except that she was told that Po Hmyin would not let her have them back, unless she paid Rs. 30,000 to plaintiffs. She was in great distress at the time, and executed the bond only in order to get the jewels back. And immediately after the execution of the bond, the jewels were returned to her by her mother Daw Pu, through Maung Chan Tha, a friend of the family. Plaintiff denies that there was any demand for inheritance either before or after the girls disappeared, and says that the bond was not the result of any disputes regarding plaintiffs' right of inheritance.

The learned Judge on the original side of the Court has held that the bond was executed by defendant on account of coercion practised by Po Hmyin as alleged.

In this appeal Counsel for plaintiffs has urged (1) that on the evidence there was no threat to withhold the jewels from defendant, but only a demand for inheritance, (2) that, even if there was such a threat, it did not, under the circumstances of the case, induce the execution of the bond, and (3) that the threat does not amount to coercion within the meaning of section 15 of the Indian Contract Act.

On the first point I have no doubt, upon a careful consideration of the evidence, that Ba Hmyin did through his mother Daw Pu, his sister Ma Mya, and his elder brother Maung Ba E. threaten to withhold the jewels from defendant if she did not pay Rs. 30,000 or sign a bond for that sum.

As to the question whether or not this threat induced the execution of the bond, the learned Counsel for the plaintiffs has pointed out the following facts as negativing the suggestion:—Before signing the bond, defendant insisted upon the word "amuebyat" (in full settlement of all claims for inheritance) being inserted in the document, and that was accordingly done. The time for payment was put in at defendant's request. She did not repudiate the bond till 19th April 1915. She did not complain to Maung Chan Tha, who was an elder brought in to witness the transaction, that she had been coerced into signing the bond, as she now alleges.

The question is, what was the dominating factor in defendant's mind, which induced her to sign To Ma Mya she had said that she had no money, and could not comply with the demand for Rs. 30,000, and that she was in a perturbed state of mind. On the night after the disappearance of the girls she twice visited her mother's house, where Po Hmyin was staying, the second time being at midnight, in order to get information about the girls. This conduct on her part betokened great anxiety, and her anxiety must have had reference to the jewels more than to the girls, for subsequent events show that she did not care whether the girls returned to her or not. From the second day she bothered no more about the girls, and the talk was only about the jewels, and she went to Daw Pu's house to sign a bond for Rs. 30,000 in order to get back the jewels. There she sat down to sign the bond, but when the draft was read out to her, she said "put in "amuebyat." The dominant factor in her mind up to that moment was the threat to withhold the jewels from her. Can it be said that that was converted into a desire to give the children their share of the inheritance? In my opinion it cannot be. As for her request for time,—that is more in her favour than in that of plaintiffs. As regards the absence of any complaint at or immediately after the execution, that might have been due to the state of her mind which was anything but calm. The belated repudiation seems at first sight to be a strong point against defendant. But considering that, if the first plaintiff as the eldest son could have claimed a quarter share in the estate, his share would come nearly to the sum due under the bond, and considering also the usual vicissitudes of litigation, it may well be that she did not at once form the decision to repudiate the bond which she had been forced to sign. Again it is said that defendant could have got the jewels from her mother, but she denies that she knew that her mother had the jewels, and there is no evidence to show that she knew it. In my opinion the evidence points irresistibly to the conclusion that the threat induced defendant to execute the bond.

I do not think it necessary to take more than passing notice of the contention that a part of the jewelry belonged to the girls. Defendant says that some of it had been made for their use, though none of it belonged to them, and they themselves cannot say which portion was theirs. The fact that they as well as defendant sometimes referred to it as theirs is not sufficient to throw doubt on defendant's claim.

Counsel for plaintiffs has contended that the threat does not amount to coercion within the meaning of section 15 of the Contract Act, as the 1st plaintiff in withholding the jewels did so under colour of right, on the ground that he had a claim to a quarter share of the estate. But it is admitted that in doing so he took the law into his own hands. Assuming—without deciding the point—that the 1st plaintiff had a claim to a quarter share in the estate, the lawful thing for him to do was to demand his share, and failing to get it, to file a suit for his share, but not to seize a portion of the estate. The detention of, or the threat to detain the jewels would, therefore, be "unlawful" in the sense that it was not authorized by law. In that view of the law Po Hmyin's threat was coercion within the meaning of section 15 of the Contract Act. For these reasons the appeal is dismissed with costs.

Hindu Law—Alienation by widow—Necessity, absence of, effect of—Right to avoid alienation.

A conveyance by a Hindu widow, when it is not for legal necessity, is not void but voidable, that is, capable of being avoided, but such a conveyance cannot be avoided at the instance of a person having no interest in the matter: it can only be avoided at the time of the widow's death by her reversionary heirs, her daughter or those persons who claim through them. [p. 744, cols. 1 & 2.]

Appeal against the decree of the District Judge, Dacca, dated the 21st January 1918, affirming that of the Subordinate Judge, 5th Court of that district, dated the 30th April 19 7.

FACTS appear from the judgment.

Babu Atul Chandra Gupta (with him Babu Upendra Lal Roy), for the Appellants.—The plaintiffs are appellants. The appeal arises out of a litigation between two sets of purchasers of the estate of two widows. The last male owner Ananda died in 1856, leaving a widow Rajmoyi and a daughter Janaki by a predeceased wife. After his death Rajmoyi succeeded to the properties and sold them to defendant No. 3 in 1903. She died in 1909. After that Janaki sold the same properties to plaintiffs in December 1909. She died in 1910. The plaintiffs purchased with the consent of the reversioners, the three sons of Janaki, defendants Nos. 17 to 19. The learned Judge finds that my kobala was for no legal necessity. He ought to have considered whether Rajmoyi's was for legal necessity or not. That is the vital question in this case but the learned Judge thought it unnecessary to go into that question. My submission is that Rajmoyi's sale is voidable. It can be avoided only by the reversioner or a person claiming through him. See Bijoy Gopal Mukerjee v. Krishna Mohishi Debi (1) Kishori Pal v. Seikh Bhushai Bhuiya (2). I would, therefore, ask for a remand.

Babu Sarat Chandra Dutt (with him Babu Surendranath Das Gupta), for the Respondents.—Assuming that I am a trespasser, it has been found by both the Courts that there was no legal necessity. The plaintiff must show that Janaki had a subsisting title at the time of the suit which, I submit, she had not.

Babu Atul Chandra Gupta replied in brief.

JUDGMENT.

FLETCHER, J.—In this case, the plaintiffs appeal against the decision of the learned District Judge of Dacca, dated the 21st January 1918, affirming the decision of the fifth Subordinate Judge of the same place. The plaintiffs brought the suit to recover possession of certain land. What happened is this. In 1856, the property belonged to one Ananda Mohan. He died leaving him surviving his widow Raj Mohi and a daughter by a predeceased wife, the name of such daughter being Janaki Dasi. On the 18th January 1908 Raj Mohi sold to the defendants Nos. 2 and 3 the property by a kobala of that date. Raj Mohi died in April 1909. On the 9th December 1909, Janaki Dasi, that is, the daughter of Ananda, Mohan, by a conveyance sold and conveyed the same property to the plaintiffs. To that conveyance, the then reversionary heirs, namely, the defendants Nos. 17, 18 and 19, who are the sons of Janaki Dasi, assented and they also joined in the conveyance. Janaki Dasi died in 1910. The plaintiffs brought the suit, as I have already stated, to recover possession. They have failed in that. In the Court of first instance, they failed and rightly failed because the findings of fact made by the learned fifth Subordinate Judge clearly established the right of the contesting defendants to possess the land. But when the case went on appeal to the Court of the learned District Judge, the learned District Judge thought it unnecessary to consider one question which is obviously a question of importance in the case, and that was whether the sale made by Raj Mohi on the 18th January 1908 was a sale by a Hindu widow for legal necessity and would, therefore, operate to pass the fee simple in the property to the purchasers, the defendants Nos. 2 and 3. The learned District Judge thought that that issue was unnecessary, because in his view he considered that the conveyance by Janaki Dasi with the assent of her sons to the plaintiffs was inoperative. That view cannot be supported. The decision of the Judicial Committee in the case of Bijoy Gopal Mukerjee v. Krishna Mohishi Debi (1) shows quite clearly that a conveyance by a Hindu widow, when it is not for legal necessity, is not void but voidable, that is, capable of being avoided; and from the decision of this Court in the case of Kishori Pal v. Seikh Bhushai Bhuiya (2) it is obvious if any decision is required for that purpose that such a voidable conveyance cannot be avoided at the instance of a person having no interest in the matter. The persons who could avoid the conveyance of a widow would be either the reversionary heirs at the time that the Hindu widow died or the Hindu woman in this case or the persons who claimed through them. The case, therefore, turns on this. Did Raj Mohi transfer the whole of this property for legal necessity? If she did, then on her death nothing went to Janaki Dasi; and if nothing went to Janaki Dasi, the plaintiffs got nothing. But if the conveyance of Raj Mohi was not for legal necessity, then the conveyance by Janaki Dasi in favour of the plaintiffs, though voidable, is sufficient to support an action in ejectment and it can only be avoided at the instance of the reversionary heirs, who are the defendants Nos. 17, 18 and 19 in this suit, namely, the sons of Janaki Dasi. They have not come forward, nor could they come forward to say that this document was not binding upon them. In my view, the case ought to be sent back to the Court of the learned District Judge to have the appeal reheard; and the first point to be decided in this case is, what is the effect of the conveyance by Raj Mohi? If it is held that that operated to pass the whole property, being executed for legal necessity, then the matter comes to an end. But if it is held that it was not for legal necessity, then the learned Judge, if he adopts the finding that he has adopted in his judgment, should come to the conclusion that this conveyance by Janaki Dasi, which was with the assent of the reversioner, is sufficient to maintain the present action in ejectment. I would set aside the judgment and decree of the learned Judge of the lower Appellate Court and remit the case to him to have the appeal re-heard. Costs will abide the result of the re-hearing by the learned Judge.

The cross-objection, not being pressed, is dismissed without costs.

Bakhshi Tek Chand, for the Appellant.

Lala Durga Das, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The house in question belonged to the late Abdul Rahim, whose widow, Musammat Bashiran, sold it to the plaintiffs for Rs. 800 by registered deed dated 27th October 1913. In the sale-deed she undertook to refund the money if for any cause the plaintiffs were unable to obtain possession. The plaintiffs sued her for return of the money, alleging that she had failed to carry out her part of the contract, but their suit was dismissed on the ground that she had actually delivered possession, and that the vendees had subsequently been dispossessed by the collaterals of her husband. Now the plaintiffs sue both Musammat Bashiran and the collaterals for possession. The suit was decreed by the first Court, but thrown out by the District Judge on appeal, the learned District Judge holding that the suit was barred by Order II, rule 2. This decision was set aside by this Court, see Civil Appeal No. 445 of 1918, and the case remanded. The District Judge has now affirmed the decree of the first Court, holding that the matter in dispute is res judicata and further that it is proved by admissions that Musammat Bashiran is owner of $\frac{1}{4}$th of her husband's immoveable property.

The collaterals appeal to this Court. I certainly do not find that the matter is res judicata. The facts relating to the previous litigation are as follows: Musammat Bashiran made a certain house waqf, and appointed her brother as mutwalli. The collaterals sued for a declaration that the transaction was null and void. The first Court decreed the suit on 4th December 1908. On appeal Mr. Rose, Divisional Judge dismissed the suit, holding that plaintiffs could sue for possession and so could not obtain a merely declaratory decree. Mr. Rose held that Musammat Bashiran was entitled to $\frac{1}{4}$th, and so the then plaintiffs could sue for $\frac{3}{4}$ths. It was really quite unnecessary to decide whether the widow was entitled to $\frac{1}{4}$th; it was quite enough to say that her share, as a childless widow, could not in any case exceed $\frac{1}{4}$th, and so the plaintiffs could sue for at least $\frac{3}{4}$ths. So I regard the decision that Musammat Bashiran was entitled to $\frac{1}{4}$th as merely an obiter dictum.

Next as to the admissions, which it may be noted were admissions by only one of the collaterals, viz., Nazar Abbas. In a suit brought by one Ali Muhammad against one Musammat Azizan, Nazar Abbas appeared as a witness for the plaintiff, and stated as follows:—

"Ambala Syads follow shara in matters of inheritance. My aunt is Musammat Bashiran. She got a share according to shara. She will get it after division. She sold a house to Abdul Aziz, but the house is still in possession of the collaterals." In cross examination he said: "In the suit relating to waqf the Appellate Court declared her entitled to only $\frac{1}{4}$th share. The suit was dismissed. According to our shara Musammat Bashiran is owner of the malba. In the former suit we never objected that she was owner of only the malba."

Now I am unable to see anything in these admissions. I do not imagine that by the word shara the witness meant anything more than the Muhammadan Law as applicable to the parties, which would presumably be the Imamia Code as the parties are Shias. The widow does of course get a certain share; it is admitted that she gets ¼th of household effects, and ¼th of the value of buildings, though it is denied that she gets any share of the buildings themselves. The statement that the Appellate Court held in the waqf suit that she was entitled to ¼th was merely a correct statement of fact. The statement that she was an owner of the malba is vague in my opinion. I certainly do not suppose that the witness meant to admit that she owned more than a share or interest in the malba; it is extremely unlikely that he would admit her right to more than ¼th in any case. I cannot find, therefore, anything in these admissions which acts as an estoppel.

Coming now to the question of what the widow is entitled to, I have no doubt in holding that the Imamia Code applies to the case. I have been referred to Akbar Ali v. Musammat Allah Dei (1), a case in which a Shia widow of Ambala City succeeded to the whole of her husband's estate, but this was a case in which the widow's exclusive right to succeed had been recognized and acted upon, and, therefore, it was held that that particular family did not in regard to inheritance follow the strict Muhammadan Law. But this cannot be said of all Ambala Shias. In Muhammad Husain v. Sultan Ali (2) it was held that the parties, Shia Syads of Ambala City were governed by the Imamia Code, and this no doubt is the general rule for Shias.

The widow in the present case admittedly never had a child. Under the Imamia Code I find that a childless widow takes no share in her husband's lands, but is entitled to her Quranic share in the value of the buildings erected thereon as well as in the moveable property. This is the rule as stated in Wilson's Muhammadan Law, 4th Edition, page 461, in Mulla's Muhammadan Law, 5th Edition, page 98, and in Tyabji's Muhammadan Law, page 630. Amir Ali's Muhammadan Law (4th edition), Volume II, page 152, says a childless widow takes one-fourth in the personal estate including household effects, trees and buildings, but not in landed property. So apparently the only difference so far is that according to the first three authorities a childless widow gets ¼th of the value of the buildings, according to the last, she apparently gets ¼th of the actual buildings. There is a different opinion expressed by Sheikh Syed Murtaza, referred to in Amir Ali's and Tyabji's works. Sheikh Syed Murtaza would give the childless widow a share even in the value of the land; but nobody seems to agree with him. On the contrary in Mir Alli Hussain v. Sajuda Begum (3) a childless was allowed no share in the land.

In Aga Mahomed Joffer Bindanim v. Koolsom Beebee (4), a Privy Council ruling, the childless widow was held entitled to ¼th of the value of the buildings but not to any share of the sites under the buildings, as the sites were regarded as land. Now in this case there was no dispute as to whether the widow should get ¼th of the buildings themselves, or only ¼th of the value of the buildings, for the whole estate had to be sold under the direction in her husband's Will. But this ruling gives me, I think, the key to the question. This ownership of the site is no good if some one else has the ownership of the building on the site and can occupy that building permanently without paying any rent. This seems to me a good reason for allowing the childless widow, who has a right only to a share in the building but not to a share in the site under the building, merely ¼th of the value of the building. And this is what the bulk of the authorities assign to her. I hold then that the widow was entitled not to ¼th of the building but to ¼th of the value of the building. It may probably be correct to say that she would have a lien on the building until she was paid her share of the value, but I certainly do not see how she could sell to anyone else the ownership of the building.

I accept the appeal and reversing the decision of the lower Courts I dismiss the suit but as the result seems very hard on the plaintiffs, I leave the parties to bear their own costs in all Courts.

NANDALAL KARURI AND OTHERS—PLAINTIFFS—RESPONDENTS.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), Sch. II, para. 1—Arbitration, reference to—Consent of all parties interested not obtained, effect of—Award, validity of.

Unless all the parties interested in a dispute consent, a Court has no jurisdiction to make an order of reference to arbitration. An order of reference made without the consent of a party who has not appeared is illegal, and an award made in consequence of such an order is equally illegal. [p. 750, col. 2; p. 751, col. 1.]

Appeals against the following orders of Mr. Justice Rankin, dated the 9th June 1919.

"In Suit No. 430 of 1918 I came to the conclusion that it was not possible under rule 1 of the 2nd Schedule to the Code to order a reference of "all matters in difference in this suit including the question of costs of this suit," as the order of 17th March 1918 purported to do, save by and with the consent of all existing parties to the suit, regardless of whether any of them had or had not entered an appearance. If an improper or unnecessary party has been impleaded and it is desired to proceed without his consent, he must either be dismissed from the action or the order of reference must be more guarded in its terms.

The award which has resulted under the order must be set aside if the order was without jurisdiction, and it is irrelevant to consider whether the arbitrator has or has not purported to affect the party who did not consent.

If in the present case I could be satisfied that the learned Judge who made the order of 17th March 1918 had considered and intended to decide the point of law arising from the absence of consent by the insolvent, I should think it my duty to follow that decision. But though the fact that this consent was absent was placed before him, I feel sure that the point of law was not; if only for the reason that, had it been present to anybody's mind, the difficulty would have been surmounted by the simple process of dismissing the insolvent from the action. It does not seem to have been present to the mind of any one until it was taken by Mr. Sircar and adopted by other Counsel in the same interest at the hearing of these motions. The point having been taken, my duty is, I think, laid down for me and I must make the same order as was made by Fletcher, J., and held to be right by the Court of Appeal in Dooly Chand v. Mamuji Musaji (1). That case prevents me from holding that the parties have agreed to treat the insolvent as having no interest and that they cannot go back upon this agreement as between themselves. The question is one of jurisdiction and the conditions of jurisdiction. If these are not satisfied, I cannot refuse to notice the defect nor will I accept something less as sufficient. These conditions are simple and clear and should be kept so. Technicality will in the end be less troublesome if they are exacted firmly and in all cases, than if they are tempered or modified in the hope of avoiding technicality. Rule 1 of the 2nd Schedule is to be obeyed, not merely to be placated.

As regards Suit No. 739 a motion has, since I gave judgment on the main points, been launched by the Official Assignee and Karuri asking me to set aside the order of reference dated 17th March 1918, which was made at the same time as the order which I am setting aside in suit No. 430. The affidavits in opposition to that motion stoutly deny that there was any mistake and emphasise the fact that these orders were made on separate petitions in the two suits. They also contend that the mistake, if any, was one of law and not of fact. I still think it perfectly clear that the only intention in the mind of any of the consenting parties was to dispose, by reference to one and the same arbitrator and once and for all, of the entire subject-matter which was being litigated in the two actions. This intention fails altogether—not in part only but entirely—if the order in Suit No. 430 be set aside. This failure is because the parties thought that Suit No. 430 was being referred when it was not being referred. The distinction between mistake of law and mistake of fact is of no service to the parties who desire to uphold the award. The agreement in question was about legal proceedings, and the present position is not that the parties have done what they intended to do as regards these proceedings—to send them all to arbitration—and have discovered that this has a different legal consequence from what they thought. The position is that they have not sent them all to arbitration: as regards one suit the gentelman named was not arbitrator at all: thinking that he was, the parties referred to him the other.

It is further objected that as I cannot now make an order of review, I cannot in any proceeding in this suit (No. 739) set aside the order of reference, and that a separate suit must be brought for the purpose.

It is contended in reply to this objection, first, that apart from an order of review I can discharge the order of reference; and secondly that in any case I can refuse to confirm the award. In my opinion the Court can, in the same action in which an interlocutory order has been made by consent, set aside that order on the ground of mistake vitiating the agreement upon which the order was based, Mullins v. Howell (2), Ainsworth v. Wilding (3). This doctrine was affirmed by the Lord Chief Justice in Neale v. Gordon Lennox (4) in the case of an order of reference. The Court of Appeal which reversed that decision expressly agreed with the principle of the cases above cited. In the House of Lords, Neale v. Gordon Lennox (5), where the judgment of the Lord Chief Justice was upheld, Lord Lindley expressed himself in terms which certainly cover the same principle if they do not go further.

The Indian cases satisfy me that independently of the statutory right to apply for a review the Court has jurisdiction to set aside a consent order upon any ground which would invalidate an agreement between the parties. Aushotosh Chundra v. Tara Prasanna Roy (6); Nistarini Dassi v. Nundo Lall Bose (7); Biraj Mohini v. Chinta Moni Dasi (8); Bhut Nath v. Ram Lall (9); Fatmabai v. Sonbai (10). This jurisdiction is part of the ordinary law; the authority for it is to be found in English cases; and the limitations which in England have been set to its exercise have been adopted here. The English cases cited and followed are, e.g., Flower v. Lloyd (11), Gilbert v. Endean (12), Huddersfield Banking Co. v. Lister (13), Ainsworth v. Wilding (3). Now these cases were none of them concerned with merely interlocutory orders, and I have found no Indian cases in which such orders were being challenged. In many of the Indian cases, the English rule has been affirmed that a separate suit is necessary. But the Courts in India have never purported to vary the English rule and have never, so far as I can find, applied it where it is not applicable or considered it with special reference to interlocutory orders. Flower v. Lloyd (11) and Gilbert v. Endean (12) were decisions to which Sir George Jessel was a party, and the latter was cited to him in Mullins v. Howell (2) where he held the rule inapplicable to interlocutory orders. I feel on sound ground, therefore, in holding that the rule in India is the same as the rule in England and in refusing to make it into something different.

If there be any special danger in India of the principle which I have accepted being abused, I think the observations of Lord Halsbury in Neale v. Gordon Lennox (5) are in point, and in any case to shorten the arm of the Court is not the remedy. The Court is not bound to act on motion, where a more formal proceeding is desirable, though Doe d. Carlisle v. Bailiff (14) seems to show that this is no new application of the general power of the Court to act on motion in a proper case.

Now I have before me, apart from the two awards set down by the officers of the Court for confirmation, the following applications:

First a motion brought by notice, dated 24th April 1919, in the insolvency of Nilmoni Das (No. 20 of 1918) on the part of Provasanker & Co., as creditors asking for directions to be given to the Official Assignee. I make an order on that motion that upon giving a proper indemnity to the Official Assignee to the satisfaction of the Registrar in insolvency these creditors be given the conduct of all subsequent proceedings in Suits Nos. 430 and 739 so far as the Official Assignee is concerned, with liberty to act for him and in his name subject to any further order of the Judge in Insolvency: provided further that no new proceedings, whether by way of appeal or otherwise, shall be instituted by the creditors in the name of the Official Assignee without the leave of the Judge in Insolvency. The creditors Provasankar & Co. must pay the costs of this motion to Laduram Nathmull but there will be no other order as to costs, save that after both suits have been finally settled or decided, the creditors are to be at liberty to make application in insolvency to recoup themselves for their own costs of this motion out of the insolvent's estate.

Secondly I have a motion (30th April 1919) by Karuri asking to have the award in Suit No. 430 set aside. I propose to make that order. There will be no order as to costs. I direct the award to be taken off the file but stay this portion of the order pending any appeal.

Thirdly in Suit No. 739 I have a motion by the Official Assignee and Karuri asking me to set aside the consent order of reference dated 17th March 1919. That motion was brought on 2nd May 1919 as a result of my previous judgment. I propose to make that order but without costs. I direct the award in this suit also to be taken off the file but stay this portion of the order pending any appeal.

On the other two motions to set aside the awards, one brought by the Official Assignee dated 30th April 1919 in Suit No 430 and the other by Karuri dated 25th April 1919 and instituted in both suits, I make no order as to costs or otherwise."

Messrs. B. L. Mitter and S. L. Banerjee, for the Appellant.

Mr. N. N. Sircar, for 1st Respondent.

Mr. S. R. Das, for the Respondent Official Assignee.

Sir B. C. Mitter, for the Respondent Nilmony Das, insolvent.

JUDGMENT.

SANDERSON, C J.—This is an appeal from an order of my learned brother Mr. Justice Rankin, by which it was ordered that the award of the arbitrator appointed in the suit by reason of the order made in the suit and dated the 17th March 1919 be set aside and taken off the file. The learned Judge came to his conclusion on the ground that the condition of the jurisdiction which is given by clause (1) of the 2nd Schedule to the Civil Procedure Code had not been complied with.

The suit was brought by one Nandalal Karuri against the Official Assignee of Calcutta, Nilmoney Das who was then an insolvent, and a firm called Laduram Nathmull. It appears that Nandalal Karuri was a mortgagor, Nilmoney was the mortgagee and Laduram-Nathmull were submortgagees from Nilmoney.

The prayers of the suit are set out at page 20 of the paper book in Appeal No. 66 of 1919 and were as follows: "(a) That the said premises Nos. 84 A, 84 1A, 84 2A and 84 3A, Bowbazar Street, in the town of Calcutta be declared redeemed and discharged from the mortgage or charge effected by virtue of the deposit of title deeds made on the 7th day of February 1915: (b) That if necessary, all accounts be taken and enquiries made as to this Hon'ble Courts may seem fit or necessary and the usual redemption decree be passed in his behalf.

(14) (1811) 3 Taunt. 378; 128 E. R. 150.

(c) That the defendants Laduram-Nathmull, Nilmoney Das and the Official Assignee, or whoever amongst them are or is found to be in custody of the title-deeds deposited as aforesaid on the 7th day of February 1915, be directed to return the same to the plaintiff and do also make over the said memorandum of agreement, dated the said 7th day of February 1915, duly cancelled."

A further prayer was that the "Defendants Laduram-Nathmull and the Official Assignee or either of them do pay to the plaintiff his costs of this suit."

Now, the petition was by the plaintiff Nandalal Karuri and he prayed by that petition that all matters in difference in this suit, including the question of costs, be referred to the sole arbitration of Mr. A. N. Chandhuri, Barrister-at-law. The petition alleged that the defendant Nilmoney Das, being an insolvent, had no interest in the suit inasmuch as all his interest in the aforesaid property vested in the Official Assignee by operation of law. The order followed the petition and provided that with the consent of all the parties as aforesaid, all matters in difference in this suit, including the question of costs of the suit and of the reference, be referred to the final decision of Mr. A. N. Chaudhuri, Bar-at-law. "The parties aforesaid" were the Official Assignee, Laduram Nathmull and the plaintiff, and the consent of Nilmoney Das—one of the defendants—was not obtained.

The learned Judge has held that in this case, inasmuch as the consent of Nilmoney Das had not been obtained and inasmuch as all the matters in difference in the suit including the question of costs were referred, the Court had no jurisdiction to make the order of reference. I cannot help feeling in this case that the upholding of this order may involve some hardship upon the appellant and that if proper steps had been taken at the time of the application for reference, either to strike out the name of Nilmoney Das as a defendant in the suit or to modify the terms of the application, the result which has now been obtained might have been different. But this is a matter of importance, as it relates to a question of jurisdiction and inasmuch as our decision in this case may affect other cases in the future, it is impossible to allow any consideration of hardship to influence our decision. I agree with what the learned Judge has said upon that point. It is this: "The question is one of jurisdiction and the conditions of jurisdiction. If these are not satisfied, I cannot refuse to notice the defect nor will I accept something less as sufficient. These conditions are simple and clear and should be kept so. Technicality will in the end be less troublesome if they are exacted firmly and in all cases, than if they are tempered or modified in the hope of avoiding technicality. Rule I of the 2nd Schedule is to be obeyed, not merely to be placated." I think it is obvious from the terms of this clause that it was contemplated that in certain cases all matters in difference in the suit might not be referred; and that when only some matters in difference in the suit were referred, the consent of the parties who were interested in those matters would be sufficient. That, however, is not this case, because, as I have already pointed out, the order of reference was that all matters in difference in this suit including the question of costs should be referred. Having regard to the allegations in the plaint, the relief asked for therein and the form of the order of reference to which I have just referred, in my judgment it is impossible to say that Nilmoney Das was not a party interested in the matters which were referred: even though he did not appear, the Court had no jurisdiction to make the order of reference without his consent. Consequently, inasmuch as the Court had no jurisdiction to make the order of reference the whole proceedings were invalid from the beginning, and the award itself was invalid: and, therefore, the order of the learned Judge was right and the appeal therefrom should be dismissed with costs.

MOOKERJEE, J.—I agree that this appeal must be dismissed.

I desire to add that when the Court is called upon to decide a matter of jurisdiction, no question of hardship, no consideration of technicality can be permitted to affect our judgment. The foundation of jurisdiction here is the agreement amongst all the parties interested that the matters in difference between them shall be referred to arbitration. If all the parties interested do not apply and yet an order of reference is made, the order is illegal because made without jurisdiction. If an award follows on the basis of that reference, it is equally illegal, because it is founded upon a reference, made without jurisdiction. In my opinion, the rules relating to jurisdiction should be strictly construed and the Court should be astute not to permit litigants to circumvent such provisions of the Code, for otherwise parties will be encouraged to evade these statutory directions. On the facts stated by learned Counsel, it is plain that we cannot hold that the insolvent had no interest within the meaning of the first paragraph of the 2nd Schedule of the Code of Civil Procedure; indeed, he frankly admitted that his consent to the reference could not be obtained because he had disappeared in view of the bankruptcy proceedings.

FLETCHER, J. —I agree.

APPEAL No. 66.

SANDERSON, C. J.—This appeal being called on, it is agreed that the judgment in the last Appeal (No. 65 of 1919) covers this appeal. The result is that in our judgment this appeal should be dismissed with costs.

Appeals dismissed.

SURATEE BARA BAZAAR CO., LTD.—RESPONDENTS.

Companies Act (VII of 1913), s. 38—Power of Court to rectify register, when to be exercised.

The power to order rectification of the register of a company is entirely a matter of discretion for the Court, and the power ought not to be exercised when the only object of the application is to save the expense of taking out Letters of Administration and of a legal transfer of the shares to the applicant's name.

Mr. Ohari, for the Applicants.

ORDER.

ROBINSON, J.—This is an application for rectification of the register of a company. The petitioners are minors acting through their certificated guardian and are entitled to a share in eleven shares in the Surati Barra Bazaar Company, Limited, as heirs to their mother's estate. Their father and maternal grandfather are willing to give up their rights in these shares to the minors, and an order is sought to the company to register the shares in the minors' names. The company naturally refuses to do so without an order from the Court.

The application is designed to save the expense of taking out Letters of Administration, and the transfer of the shares to the minors. It is entirely a matter of discretion for the Court to order rectification, and it is necessary to consider whether the Court should in this case exercise that discretion in favour of the minors. If this petition is granted the balance of the estate may be administered privately, and there would be no guarantee that the minors' interests therein are properly safeguarded. The other heirs, though apparently resigning their claims to a share in the shares, may perhaps retain more in the balance of the estate. I do not desire to suggest that they have any such intention, but the Court would be acting entirely in the dark. Again I have nothing but the word of interested parties that there are no other heirs. It may not be improper to avoid taking out Letters of Administration if that can be done legally, but it is not a ground on which the Court should act, and to which it should lend its approval except in the clearest cases. The petition seems to me to be an attempt to make use of the Court's power in a manner that was not contemplated by the Act, and for the reasons given above I must reject the application.

Application rejected.

Appeal against the decree of the Subordinate Judge, Amraoti, in Civil Suit No. 47 of 1916, decided on the 17th April 1918.

Mr. N. M. Bedarkar, for the Appellant.

The Hon'ble Mr. M. R Dixit and Mr. R. B. Gadgil, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—This appeal arises out a suit under Order XXI, rule 63. The plaintiff-appellant asks for a declaration that the house at Amraoti attached by the defendant as belonging to Dada Abu, in execution of a decree against him passed by the High Court of Bombay and transferred for execution to the Court at Amraoti, is not liable to attachment and sale, the title to it having vested in the plaintiff's deceased father under a sale deed dated the 4th January 1908. The suit has been filed as the plaintiff was unsuccessful in getting the house released from attachment in the execution proceedings, the order having been passed after an investigation. The defence is that the sale-deed is a colourable transaction and was also a fraudulent transfer effected by Dada Abu on the eve of his bankruptcy with intent to defeat, delay and defraud creditors. This defence has been successful, and hence the plaintiff has filed this appeal.

The first question I have to decide is whether the lower Court was justified in refusing to admit evidence after the case was closed. An affidavit has been filed in this Court as well as in the lower Court, stating that the appellant attained majority recently and was not aware of the facts of the case. Now the objection was filed in 1915 and disposed of on the 27th March 1916 and the present suit is filed on the 9th May 1916. Assuming that the plaintiff was ignorant of the facts of the case, he had notice from 1915 that the title to the property is being disputed. There was no need for him to have filed this suit in a month and a-half after the adverse decision. He had a whole year within which to make inquiries of his father's old servants and his elder brother.

The suit itself was pending for nearly two years when the application was made. The lower Court in its order dated the 16th March 1918, to be found in the order sheet, has given additional reasons why the plaintiff should not be shown any indulgence in this respect. I am unable to hold that the discretion has been improperly used by the learned Subordinate Judge, and I must, therefore, disallow the prayer for letting in further evidence.

In deciding this appeal I must hold that the burden of proof lay upon the plaintiff to prove that the purchase was bona fide and for good consideration inasmuch as he failed in proceedings under Order XXI, rule 58, which were disposed of after an investigation into the merits: Narayan Ganesh Ghatate v. Bhioraj (1). Although the investigation, as usual, was a summary one, the object of the Legislature is to declare the order passed therein as final, subject to the result of this suit. He who questions a prima facie adjudication must show that it is wrong.

Before going into the merits of the case I propose to deal with an objection urged for the first time in this appeal. Reliance is placed upon certain recent decisions of the Madras High Court: Palaniandi Chetti v. M. V. Appavu Chettiar (2) and Subramania Ayyar v. Muthia Chettiar (3). The learned Judges of the Madras High Court lay down that where a transfer is nominal or colourable, it is void as between the parties, and, therefore, need not be set aside: but where the transfer is fraudulent, though meant to be operative as between the parties, it requires to be set aside. The learned Judges are not agreed as to whether the suit contemplated by section 53 of the Transfer of Property Act must be a representative suit on behalf of all the creditors. They hold that since a fraudulent transfer is only voidable, unless and until it has been avoided by a suit, it holds good. Coutts Trotter, J., in Palaniandi Chetti v. M. V. Appavu Chettiar (2), seems to concede that where an attachment has taken place, the judgment creditor has sufficient interest to question a fraudulent transfer and can use the section as a weapon of defence as well as of offence in a case like this. A great deal can be said in favour of the view that a suit under section 53 should be a representative suit, but that is not the basis of the recent Madras decisions. Except Coutts Trotter, J., none of the learned Judges would commit themselves to this view. The practice hitherto has recognised that a defendant may impeach a transaction voidable as against him when it is sought to be enforced, whether by way of declaration or otherwise. I am not, therefore, prepared to uphold the contention that the defence must be ruled out on the authority of the Madras cases I am fortified in this view by a recent judgment of this Court in Dhansukhdas v. Zangoo, (Second Appeal No. 68-B of 1919) (4).

The lower Court holds that there was no consideration for the sale deed. I am not quite prepared to go so far as that, possibly there was some consideration, and I shall have to consider how far this affects the decision. The sale-deed admittedly was a sale of all the available property of Dada Abu It included the house in dispute as well as his stock in trade. About 23 days after the sale his creditors applied in the Bombay High Court to have him declared an insolvent. There is no evidence on record as to what took place in the insolvency proceedings, whether the Official Receiver was appointed to take charge of the estate and what became of the other creditors. The plaintiff's father Nurmahamad Kasim, the vendee, is a merchant in Bombay having no shop at Amracti. He purchases for the ostensible consideration of Rs. 15,000 all the moveable and immoveable property. He sends a man, Suleman, who came and stayed for five or six months and sold all the moveable property. The sale-deed recited that the consideration was due upon hundis. Evidence is sought to be given that there were four hundis endorsed in favour of Nurmahamad Kasim of the aggregate value of Rs. 10,000. As regards the remaining sum of Rs. 5,000, it is stated to be due for advance made to Karim Abu, brother of Dada Abu. Practically the evidence on this part is nil, the account books not having been produced. It is conceded that there was no hundi in regard to this, and the recital in the sale deed is, therefore, to put it mildly, inaccurate. Karim, the brother of Dada Abu, resided in the house after the goods were sold and continues to do so. He claims to be owner of the property by virtue of an oral agreement made seven years ago for Rs. 7,000, and he alleges that he has been going on making payments towards this money, notwithstanding the fact that there is no document evidencing the agreement, and he claims to have made payments even after the death of Nurmahamad Kasim. As pointed out by the lower Court the accounts showing the dealings with Karim have not been produced. One of the witnesses examined in the case Yadhavaji (P. W. No. 4) says that the house is worth Rs. 7,000 and the goods worth Rs. 8,000. It is possible that any money due to Nurmahamad Kasim has been paid off by the sale of the goods. Karim is said to be paying rent, and it is only entered in the account books for one year. It is impossible to differ from the lower Court and to hold that there was not a secret understanding which entirely negatives the suggestion that the transaction was a real sale of the house, and even if it were, I am not satisfied that there was full consideration. It is idle to argue that Nurmahamad Kasim did not know that Dada Abu was an insolvent when he was selling all his property including his stock in trade. He was not acting in good faith in taking the transfer. I am perfectly clear that Rs. 5,000, said to be due from Karim, is a myth. There were probably some hundis on which money was due to Nurmahamad Kasim, though the exact amount cannot be found upon the evidence as it stands. It is somewhat curious that the partition deed between the plaintiff and his brother makes no specific reference to the house in Amraoti, though it may possibly be included in the expression "assets of Bombay shop" allotted to the plaintiff. Having regard to all the badges of fraud above enumerated, I come to the conclusion that the sale of the moveable property was a real sale and the proceeds went to satisfy the greater part, if not the whole, of the debt due to the plaintiff's father. As regards the sale of the house, it appears to me to be a shield against creditors, having regard to the conduct of the parties. In any case, if there was any consideration for it, it was very far from the full value of the house as deposed to by the witnesses. In other words, even if I were to accept the plaintiff's allegations as proved, there was not consideration for more than Rs. 2,000 for a house worth Rs. 7,000. The transfer was, therefore, in my opinion, a fraudulent transfer. As pointed out in a recent Bombay case, the mere existence of a part of the consideration does not prevent a transfer being a fraudulent transfer voidable at the instance of a person defrauded: Bhikhabhai Muljibhai Patel v. Panachand (4). The Bombay case was one of a fraudulent mortgage purporting to be for Rs. 4,000 and the consideration found was Rs. 1,000. Here I have to deal with a fraudulent sale either without consideration or for an inadequate consideration. I, therefore, come to the conclusion that the decree of the lower Court is correct. The appeal accordingly dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

MADRAS HIGH COURT.

CIVIL REVISION PETITION No. 742 OF 1917.

December 10, 1919.

Present:—Mr. Justice Oldfield and Mr. Justice Seshagiri Aiyar.

THE MADRAS AND SOUTHERN MAHARATTA RAILWAY COMPANY, LIMITED, MADRAS—DEFENDANTS—PETITIONERS

versus

MATTAI SUBBA RAO—PLAINTIFF—RESPONDENT.

Railway Company, carriage of goods by—Railway Risk Note, Form B—Liability of Railway for total loss—"Wilful neglect," what amounts to.

A consignor of bales of gunny bags by Railway, in consideration of a lower charge, executed a Risk Note, Form B, in favour of the Railway Company to hold the Company harmless and free from all responsibility for any loss, destruction or deterioration of, or damage to, the consignment, from any cause whatever, except for the loss of a complete consignment or of one or more complete packages forming part of a consignment, due either to the wilful neglect of a Railway administration, or to theft by or to the wilful neglect of its servants, transport agents or carriers employed by them before, during and after transit over the said Railway or other Railway lines working in connection therewith or by any other transport agency or agencies employed by them respectively for the carriage of the whole or any part of the said consignment: Provided the term "wilful neglect" be not held to include fire, robbery from a running train or any other unforeseen event or accident. While the consignment was in the possession of the Railway Company one of its servants dropped a package of acid, which was leaking, on one of the bales with the result that the acid injured the contents of the bale. The consignee sued the Railway Company for damages. It was found that though some of the bags in the bale had been injured and were useless, all the bags in the bale were not rendered valueless:

Held, (1) that the placing of the leaking package of acid on the bale amounted to wilful negligence; [p. 756, col. 2; p. 759, col. 2.]

(2) that the injury caused to the contents of the bale did not amount to "loss" within the meaning of the exception in the Risk Note, and that, as the plaintiff could recover only if the bale of gunny bags was entirely deprived of value, the Railway Company was not liable. [p. 758, col. 2; 760, p. cols. 1 & 2.]

Petition, under section 25 of Act IX of 1887, praying the High Court to revise the decree of the Court of the 2nd Additional District Munsif, Rajahmundry, in Small Cause Suit No. 751 of 1916.

FACTS.—Suit against a Railway Company for damage done to plaintiff's bales. The question turned upon the construction of a clause in the Risk Note (B. Form) issued by the Company to plaintiff which ran as follows:—"Except for the loss of a complete consignment or parcel, etc., the Company shall not be liable for any damage, deterioration, etc., etc." The District Munsif held that 'loss' included damage, deterioration, etc., caused by the wilful neglect of the Company. The Company having applied in revision,

Mr. D. Chamier (instructed by Messrs. Brightwell and Moresby), for the Company Petitioners.—The Company is liable only if the whole parcel, bale or consignment is lost. See East Indian Railway Company v. Nilkanta Roy (1), following an unreported case in Bombay. So long as the specific parcels are delivered, the fact that they are empty or damaged, etc., does not matter. See also High Court Decisions on the Indian Railways by Thiruvenkatachariar, page 48.

[SESHAGIRI AIYAR, J.—Supposing that water was substituted for Ghee?]

The Company will not be liable, for the authorities of the Company can see only the exterior of the consignment and not the interior. There is complete immunity as regards damage, deterioration, etc. But if the consignment is lost, i.e., if the Company is not able to deliver the thing consigned in specie to all outward appearance, the Company is liable and in no other case.

The English Law is a little different; wilful misconduct is punishable with liability for consequences to the consignor. Heaven v. Pender (2) defines the Company's "duty to the plaintiff." See also Lewis v. Great Western Railway Company (3), where 'wilful misconduct' is defined.

[SESHAGIRI AIYAR, J.—Hirji. Khetsey & Co. v. Bombay Baroda & Central India Railway Company (4) is a case in point and against your contention.]

No doubt Beaman, J., takes a different view on the basis of the burden of proof.

[OLDFIELD, J.—On whom does it lie?]

On the plaintiff who asserts damage.

See also sections 72 and 76 of the Indian Railways Act.

Mr. V. Ramadoss, for the Respondent (Plaintiff)—'Loss' is a generic word meaning and including the specific words mentioned in the clause. See the Century Dictionary. See also Maxwell (5th Edition), pages 537 and 538

[OLDFIELD, J.—The Dictionary won't give you a legal definition.]

The exception in the clause in question does not and cannot cover wilful neglect or misconduct. The general law controls it and it is not open to the Company to contract itself out of its liability. Further the condition also must be reasonable. See 4 Halsbury's Laws of England, page 27, paragraph 46.

[OLDFIELD, J.—The Risk Note has been approved by the Governor-General in Council. Are you prepared to argue that the terms are unreasonable ?]

In Peek v. North Staffordshire Railway Co. (5) it was held that a special contract whereby the Company was made immune from its own neglect or default was bad.

That is the law also in respect of Marine Insurance. See Arnould, pages 1266, 1298. He speaks of "partial loss of a package." What does loss mean there but damage, deterioration, etc.?

The Railway Company is a bailee under section 151 of the Indian Contract Act and a bailee cannot contract himself out of his liabilities.

Further in the present case there is a distinct finding of loss.

JUDGMENT.

OLDFIELD, J.—The decision of the Second Additional District Munsif, Rajahmundry, comes before us under section 25, Provincial Small Cause Courts Act, Act IX of 1887. He has held the defendant Railway Company liable on a risk note in respect of one out of a consignment of bales of gunny bags, of which plaintiff was consignee. The risk note, Exhibit B, is in form B and is a contract by the consignor in consideration of the lower charge he has paid to hold the company "harmless and free from all responsiblity for any loss, destruction, or deterioration of, or damage to the consignment from any cause whatever except for the loss of a complete consignment or of one or more complete packages forming part of a consignment due either to the wilful neglect of a Railway administration or to theft by or to the wilful neglect of its servants, transport agents or carriers employed by them before, during and after transit over the said Railway or other Railway lines working in connecion therewith or by any other transport agency or agencies employed by them respectively for the carriage of the whole or any part of the said consignment: provided the term 'wilful neglect' be not held to include fire, robbery from a running train or any other unforeseen event or accident."

Two questions have been argued. Firstly, was the injury, which one bale admittedly sustained, due to the wilful neglect of the company's servants? Secondly, did that injury amount to loss within the meaning of the exception, which provides for the company's liability?

The first of these questions can be answered shortly in the affirmative. The lower Court held that there had been wilful neglect by the company's servants in (1) unloading inward goods on the outward platform, (2) placing a leaking acid package on the bale of gunnies. We cannot follow the first portion of this finding and confine ourselves to the second. Something has been said regarding the burden of proof. But it is unnecessary to discuss its incidence, because the company admitted in its written statement that the package of acid was dropped by its cooly and fell on the bale and defendants' 1st witness deposed to that effect. The acid according to the evidence had leaked on the shoulder of the cooly, having burnt through his coat and he put it down on the bale, disregarding the certainty that it would leak on it also and injure it. We have no doubt that in doing so he was wilfully negligent.

The more difficult question remains whether the injury to the bale is loss, for which the company is liable under the exception in the risk note; and the difficulty arises from the fact that, whilst the exception provides only for the case of loss, the general portion of the note exempts from liability in respect of all claims not only for loss, but also for destruction, deterioration or damage. It is, therefore, for plaintiff to establish that the bale is lost; and the lower Court has found that it is so. The contention for the company is that this finding is wrong and that, the bale being merely damaged, its liability is not established.

This finding in favour of loss appears to rest on the result of an inspection, to which the lower Court refers as showing that the bale was completely useless, and also on its statement that the acid penetrated the bale completely and affected all the gunnies. This apparently is also based on the statement of plaintiff's 1st witness in examination-in-chief that the bale was burnt in the middle, that the acid affected it right through, that not one bag was whole and all the bags seemed to have been damaged. But there is then the fact that as the same witness said in cross examination, "I saw the burnt bale in Court. It was not yet opened. I cannot say whether whole bags were found in it." It has not been suggested before us that the bale was opened later for the Court's inspection, and we cannot understand how the lower Court could satisfy itself as its judgment implies or how it could neglect the witness's latter statement. Its finding on the question of fact must be rejected on the ground that it was reached without reference to material evidence; and we must, therefore, remand the case. In doing so it is advisable that we should deal with the legal question which arises and indicate the principle, on which the enquiry on remand should proceed.

To return to the terms of the risk note, it would appear at first sight as though a distinction is drawn between loss and destruction, deterioration and damage and the exception is not intended to apply to cases, in which only the three last mentioned can be established. But, whatever the implication from the separation of these terms, it is clear that the distinction proposed cannot be supported by their use in ordinary parlance. For, whilst loss cannot include deterioration and will always include destruction, it will in some cases include damage, when the extent and nature thereof are sufficient. Shortly we have to decide the point, if any, at which damage becomes loss.

One ground of decision has been suggested, which can be dismissed shortly:—that there is no loss, whatever happens to the contents, if the character of the package as such is unaffected by damage sustained by its outward envelope alone. This is based on Bombay Baroda & Central India Railway Company v. Ambalal Sewaklal (Indian Railway Case, 48), followed in East Indian Railway Company v. Nilkanta Roy (1) and in this Court in Civil Suit No. 309 of 1914 by Kumaraswami Sastri, J., though only on the ground that, sitting alone, he was not prepared to dissent from the decisions of two Benches in the cases referred to. Those decisions do not commend themselves to us. For they are based on no earlier authority and, with all due respect, it is unreasonable to suppose that the parties, entering into such contracts as Exhibit B, have regard to the worthless outer covering, not its contents; the bag for instance, not the grain within it; or in the present case the rough gunny covering and iron hoops, not the bags inside, in which the bale really consisted.

Another principle suggested is that damage can be identified with loss, only if the goods concerned have been deprived of the merchantable character, in which they were accepted for transmission: and if the contract before us were one of insurance, this would be sound. Astar & Co. v. Blundell (8) and Cologan v. London Assurance Company (9). But there is no question here of insurance in connection with railway contracts, since railways in India are not common carriers, Irrawaddy Flotilla Company v. Bugwandas (10), and the suggestion must, therefore, be defended on its merits. The objection to it, which must in my opinion prevail, is that even in the absence of a special contract a railway is under section 72 (1), Railways Act (IX of 1890), liable only as a bailee under sections 151, 152 and 161, Indian Contract Act. It follows that a railway will ordinarily be liable in damages only according to the actual condition of the goods; for their full value, if they are rendered totally valueless; for such portions of it, if they have merely sustained deterioration, as would afford reasonable compensation, without reference to their loss or retention of their merchantable character. It is next material that in the present case the contract embodied in the risk note, Exhibit B, was made in consideration of the railway's acceptance of a reduced charge; and it, therefore, cannot be regarded as intended to increase its responsibility. It is then impossible to accept respondent's contention, which by treating 'loss' in the exception in Exhibit B as equivalent to the 'loss, destruction, deterioration or damage' in the general portion and to the "loss, destruction or deterioration" in section 72 (1) of the Railways Act would leave the railway under the liability it would have been under, if Exhibit B had never been given. This entails acceptance of the only alternative construction of Exhibit B, that proposed by the Railway and already referred to as consistent with ordinary parlance. It is said that an unreasonable contract results from it. But the form has, as the Act requires, been approved by Government, and it has not been shown how the acceptance of a smaller responsibility in consideration of a lower charge than that which is normally payable and which respondent's consignor could have paid, if he desired a full idemnity, is oppressive. For these reasons I hold that respondent can recover only if his bale of gunny bags is entirely deprived of value.

The lower Court must, therefore, submit a finding on the issue:—

"Was respondent's bale of gunny bags when delivered to him of no value?"

The bale is, it is alleged, with the respondent. The lower Court will give him an opportunity to produce it in Court and, if it is so produced, will inspect it and the bags composing it, noting their condition in its finding. In any case, fresh evidence may be adduced by both parties regarding its condition and that of its contents. Findings due in two months. Seven days for objections.

SESHAGIRI AIYAR, J.—The question raised in this case is one of considerable importance: therefore, I have taken the liberty of writing a separate judgment, although I do not differ from the conclusions arrived at by my learned brother. The facts are fully set out in the judgment just now delivered. I will first say a few words upon some subsidiary points raised by Mr. Ramadoss before dealing with the main question. It was contended by the learned Vakil for the respondent that a railway company is not competent to limit its liability to less than the minimum care which the Indian Contract Act imposes on bailees. It is now well settled that under the Indian law, a railway company has not the liabilities of an insurer but only those of a bailee. See India General Steam Navigation Co. v. Bhagwan Chandra Paul (11). The observations of Sankaran Nair, J., in Sheik Mahamad Ravuther v. British India Steam Navigation Co. (6) were relied on for the proposition that a common carrier cannot exempt himself from liability for negligence if such an exemption would be inconsistent with the provisions of the Indian Contract Act. The first observation with reference to this dictum is that the learned Judge was dealing with the case of a carrier by sea. The principles applying to carriers by land are not the same which govern the liability of a carrier by sea. In the next place, two other learned Judges differed from him on this very question. In a later case, Kuriadan Kumber v. British India Steam Navigaton Co. Ltd. (7), Justice Sadasiva Aiyar and Justice Tyabji did not act upon this dictum of Sankaran Nair, J. I must, therefore, hold that the contract is enforceable. Reliance was placed on certain English decisions which hold that an exemption from contract by a carrier from liability must be reasonable and just. There is great difference between the English Law and the Indian Law on this subject. If I understand the position aright, a railway company in England would be authorised by Parliament to make its own rules and regulations. It would be created by an Act of Parliament and would have full power to regulate its internal management. Under these circumstances Courts may be at liberty to decide whether the regulations framed by the company are just and reasonable and whether they are inter vires the Act of Parliament. In this country the position is very different. Under section 72 of Act IX of 1890 a railway company may enter into an agreement to limit its responsibility, provided it is in a form approved by the Governor General in Council. It is not denied that the rule with which we are concerned has been sanctioned by the Governor-General in Council. Therefore, prima facie the rule must be regarded as being within the powers of the railway company. It is on the respondent to show that the rule in question, which the legislative authority has sanctioned, is inconsistent with any portion of the Railway Act, and the learned Vakil for the respondent had not satisfied me on this point. I must, therefore, hold that the rule is inter vires. Reference may also be made to Toonya Ram v. East Indian Railway Co. (12), Tppanna v. Southern Maratha Railway Company (13) and East India Railway Co. v. Bunyad Ali (14).

Another point relied on on behalf of the respondent is that the word 'loss' in the exemption clause of the Risk Note (Form B) includes "Destruction, deterioration and damage." The note is not a very carefully drafted one, and it may be possible for the Government of India to scrutinise its language on some future occasion. But as it stands at present, I am compelled to hold that the word "loss" has a meaning distinct from the other three words mentioned by me. All the four words are placed seriatim in the earlier portion. But when it comes to imposing liability, notwithstanding the contract to the contrary, the draftsman has used the word "loss" alone and has left out the words "destruction, deterioration and damage." I take it that this was done on purpose. Reasonable meaning can be attached to the note as it stands by imputing to the draftsman the intention to hold the company liable only for the loss of a complete consignment of one or more complete packages and by exempting the company from liability where there has been "destruction, deterioration and damage" to such a complete consignment of one or more complete packages. I am not concerned in seeing whether this is good policy, or whether the consigning public will not be injured by it. But construing the language of the note as it stands, I can give it only the meaning which I have indicated and not the meaning which the learned Vakil for the respondent has suggested.

One or two minor points raised by Mr. Chamier may now be dealt with. The learned Counsel contended that there was no wilful negligence on the part of the railway company and quoted Heaven v. Pender (2) for this contention. The District Munsif has found on the facts that there was wilful negligence, and on the evidence which has been fully commented on before us it seems to me that the railway company acted carelessly in the matter. The servant who was employed to carry an acid substance, unable to bear the injury which it inflicted on his shoulders, threw the acid over the gunny bags. His act was wilful in the sense that he must have known that the corrosive substance would cause injury to the article over which it was thrown. In Lewis v. Great Western Railway Company (3) Lord Justice Bramwell said: "'Wilful misconduct' means wilful to which the will is a party, something opposed to accident or negligence; the misconduct, not the conduct must be wilful." Lower down the learned Lord Justice said: "I am much inclined to think that that would be wilful misconduct because he acted under the supposition that it might be mischievous, and with an indifference to his duty to ascertain whether it was mischievous or not. I think that would be wilful misconduct." Applying this definition I am satisfied that there was wilful default on the part of the servant.

Mr. Chamier next suggested that the act of the servant should not be charged against the company. It is a well known rule of law that persons who undertake to do certain things and who employ servants to do those things must be held responsible for the act of those servants done in the discharge of the duty entrusted to them. It may be different no doubt if the servant acted in violation of his duties. The very recent case of Joseph Rand Limited v. Craig (15) establishes this proposition very clearly. Swinfen Eady, M. R., pointed out that if the act was done deliberately by the servant to benefit himself, that should not be attributed to the master. But if it is a case of carelessness or negligence in the course of employment, the master would be held liable. The latter is what actually happened in the present case. Therefore, the company is liable for the conduct of the servant.

Now comes the main question as to whether the package can be said to have been lost. The judgment of Kumaraswami Sastri, J., in Civil Suit No. 309 of 1914 was quoted before us and also East Indian Railway Company v. Nilkanta Roy (1). The learned Judge felt bound by the Calcutta decision and by a judgment of the Bombay High Court to hold that if the outer cover which encloses a parcel was delivered, the article cannot be said to have been lost by the railway company. The Bombay and the Calcutta cases do not discuss the matter and it seems to me that they have put too narrow a construction upon the expression "loss". I am inclined to the view that the term "loss" should be construed as including cases where the article consigned is lost to the consignor as such article. If the goods entrusted to the care of the company cease to have any resemblance to the goods of the description which they undertook to carry, it seems to me that the company should be held to have lost the goods. In Asfar & Co. v. Blundell (8) Lord Esher gave this meaning of the term "loss:" "The nature of a thing is not necessarily altered because the thing itself has been damaged; wheat or rice may be damaged, but may still remain the things dealt with as wheat or rice in business. But if the nature of the thing is altered and it becomes for business purposes something else, so that it is not dealt with by business people as the thing which it originally was, the question for determination is whether the thing insured, the original article of commerce, has become a total loss. If it is so changed in its nature by the perils of the sea as to become an unmerchantable thing, which no buyer would buy and no honest seller would sell, then there is a total loss." Although the learned Master of the Rolls was dealing with the case of an article carried by sea, I do not see why the definition of the term 'loss' should not be utilised in cases of other carriers. In Hearn v. London and South Western Railway Company (16) Baron Park expressed himself to the same effect. In my opinion, therefore, if it is proved that the article has lost its identity as such it would amount to loss. On the question of the burden of proof the case in Hirji Khetsey & Co. v. Bombay Baroda & Central India Railway Company (4) lays down that it is the railway company that has to show that there was no loss. But I am not satisfied that in this case the District Munsif has considered the evidence very fully, on this question of loss. I agree that he should be called to return a fresh finding on the question suggested by my learned colleague.

In compliance with the order contained in the above judgments, the Principal District Munsif of Rajahmundry submitted the following

FINDINGS.—In this suit, I have been asked by the High Court to submit a finding on the point "Was respondent's bale of gunny bags, when delivered to him, of no value."

* * * * * *

The Munsif found that the bags were most of them eaten away to a small extent and the other portions of the bags were strong and new enough, those in the middle of the bale being new, and that some of the bags were useless and the others could be used with or without patching up.

This petition coming on final hearing after the return of the finding of the lower Court upon the issue referred by this Court for trial, the Court delivered the following JUDGMENT.—We accept the finding and allow the petition, dismissing the suit with costs throughout.

OTTAPRAKAL THAZATH SOOPI—APPELLANT

versus

CHARICHAI PALLIKAL MARRIYAMMA AND ANOTHERS—RESPONDENTS.

Malabar Law—Kanom granted by karnavan—Suit to redeem by anandravans, maintainability of.

As a suit for redemption of a kanom granted by a karnavan amounts to an act of interference in the karnavan's management of tarwad affairs, it can only be maintained by the anandravans of the tarwad under very special circumstances, and it is for them to establish the existence of such very special circumstances as would justify the suit without the concurrence of the karnavan. [p. 762, cols. 1 & 2.]

Second appeal against the decree of the Court of the Additional Temporary Subordinate Judge, North Malabar, in Appeal Suit No. 23 of 1918, prefered against the decree of the Court of the Additional District Munsif, Tellicherry, in Original Suit No. 216 of 1914.

FACTS.—Suit by the plaintiffs, who are the Anandravans of a Malabar Tarwad, to redeem a mortgage in favour of the 16th defendant by the 1st defendant, who is the Karnavathi of the Tarwad. The 1st defendant put in a statement that she did not want to redeem.

Mr. C. V. Ananthakrishna Aiyar, for the Appellant-Defendant No. 6.—The suit is not maintainable. A Karnavan ought not to be interfered with in the management of the Tarwad property. The junior members cannot compel him to act in a particular way. For his discretion is not to be interfered with [see Nambiatan Nambudiri v. Nambiatan Nambudiri (1), Cheria Pangi Achan v. Unnalachan (2)] unless the Karnavan has disabled himself from suing to recover. A Karnavan is not a mere trustee; he is the sole mouthpiece of the Tarwad until his Karnavanship is impugned for valid reasons. Vasudevan v. Sankaran (3).

Redemption is allowed only to persons who have an existing right in themselves, which entitles them to redeem. Section 91 of the Transfer of Property Act cannot be taken to include Anandravans of a Malabar Tarwad, who have a bare right to maintenance subject to the arrangement made by a Karnavan in his discretion. See Nambiatan Nambudri v. Nambiatan Nambudiri (1). See also Bikutti v. Kalendan (4).

Even if the Melcharths and leases granted by a Karnavan affect the income of the Tarwad prejudicially, the junior members can have no more right than allege it as one of the reasons for removing him from management. Abdulla Koya v. Mavileri Eacharan Nair (5). Further, if a decree for redemption be made in an Anandravan's suit, his failure to pay the money under the mortgage within the time prescribed in the decree would put an end to the rights of the Tarwad.

In the present case, the Karnavathi does not want to redeem because of the difficulty of finding the money due Collusion is not proved. Even if there is collusion, the proper suit is one to remove her. Karunakara Menon v. Kutti Krishna Menon (6). See also Second Appeal No. 959 of 1917.

It was held in a prior suit that the right to redeem under Exhibit A was barred. That finding is binding in this case.

[BENSELL, J.—Exhibit A is void as the demise never came into existence.]

The question of registration rendering Exhibit A bad as registered before a wrong Sub-Registry District, was not raised in the prior suit and so cannot be urged here. Harendra Lal Roy Chowdhuri v. Hari Dasi Debi (7) cannot be applied.

Messrs. K. P. M. Menon and K. R. Kesava Menon, for the Respondents.—When the Karnavan colludes with the alienees, the junior member is entitled to sue to recover on behalf of the Tarwad, as such collusion is conclusive proof of gross indifference to the interests of the Tarwad. See Theniu v. Chimmu (8). The Anandravans are co owners and they are 'persons interested' within the meaning of section 91 of the Transfer of Property Act.

A Karnavan can act only in a fiduciary capacity. Raja of Arakal v. Ohuria Kunhi Kannan (9). The Anandravans can obtain declarations that alienations made by him are not bindings on them or on the Tarwad. A junior member has a right of suit. Kallioni Amma v. Sankaran Nair (10); S. A. 1030 of 1918 (unreported). The case in Cheria Pangi Achan v. Unnalachan (2) was not one for redemption but for the enforcement of a family Karar, and the generality of the proposition laid down is doubted in Karunakara Menon v. Kutti Krishna Menon (6). Further the present suit is against a stranger [see Cheria Pangi Achan Unnalachan (2)] and collusion is not different from disability so far as the interests of the Tarwad are concerned. The facts that no appeal was preferred against the decree in the previous suit, that no attempt has yet been made by the Karnavathi to redeem while on the other hand she is colluding, are special circumstances within the purview of the ruling in Second Appeal No. 957 of 1917 (unreported). Though an Anandravan sues, the decree may be in favour of the Tarwad as represented by the Karnavan.

Mr. C. V. Ananthakirshna Aiyar, in reply. —Karattole Edamana v. Unni Kannan (11) is a case of trust property. A Tarwad is not a trust. And the Karnavan is not a trustee. Kenath Puthen Vittil Tacazhi v. Narayanan (12). See also Vasudevan v. Sankaran (3). He is the natural guardian of the Tarwad.

JUDGMENT.—This is a suit for redemption brought by junior members of what is termed a Strisothu Tarwad, the manager of which is a woman called a Karnavathi and the members of which are governed by Maramakatayam Law. The suit has been decreed and the first question before us is whether the plaintiffs had a right to maintain it. As laid down in Vasudevan v. Sankaran (3) and numerous other decisions, a Karnavan is at once the manager and the mouthpiece of the Tarwad, or in the words of Mr. Justice Holloway, "a Malabar family speaks through its head, the Karnavar, and in Courts of Justice, except in antagonism to that head, can speak in no other way."

So, although we might be prepared to hold that junior members of such a family were, generally speaking, persons having an interest in Tarwad property within the meaning of section 91, Transfer of Property Act, when the individual right of suit from the point of view of the personal law of the parties is in question, we are fully in agreement with the statement of law laid down in Second Appeal No. 959 of 1917, where it was declared by Phillips and Kumarasawmi Sastri, JJ., that only under very special circumstances could the Anandravans of a Tarwad maintain a suit for redemption of a Kanom granted by their Karnavan, as such a suit would amount to an act of interference in the Karnavan's management of Tarwad affairs.

In the present case the plaintiffs alleged in their plaint that the 1st defendant was acting in collusion with the 16th defendant, the Kanomdar, and was ready to do any act prejudicial to the Tarwad, and again, that if the possession of the properties was not recovered at once, the Jenmam title of the Tarwad would in course of time be prejudiced. In her written statement the 1st defendant denied all the imputations made against her in the plaint.

The onus then clearly lay on the plaintiffs to establish under the 1st issue that such very special circumstances existed as would justify a suit being brought by them without the concurrence of the Karnavathi. They adduced no oral evidence at all, and there is nothing on the record to show that the 1st defendant had so misbehaved as to make it imperative to take the conduct of the affairs of the Tarwad in such matters as the institution of suits, etc., out of her hands. The District Munsif assumed that the 1st defendant was colluding with the 16th defendant, but apparently his only ground for drawing this inference was that she asked to have the suit dismissed. There may be many reasons why the continuance of the Kanom might be beneficial to the Tarwad. The terms as to the payment of Purapad may be favourable. The Tarwad may not have enough money readily available for defraying the large amount due for improvements. The Courts below have not gone into these matters and decided that any "very special circumstances" existed for redeeming the Kanom as soon as it became redeemable. In the absence of such proof the plaintiffs cannot maintain this suit. It is unnecessary to deal with the other grounds of appeal. The appeal is allowed and the suit is dismissed without prejudice to the Tarwad's right of redemption in a properly instituted suit. The appellant will get his costs throughout from the respondents Nos. 1 to 4. The other respondents will bear their own costs throughout.

BHAGAT RAM AND ANOTHER—DEFENDANTS—RESPONDENTS.

Appeal—Review, decree modified on—Appeal, whether maintainable.

No appeal lies against a decree which has been modified on review.

Second appeal from the decree of the District Judge, Jullundur, dated the 14th August 1917, varying that of the Senior Subordinate Judge, Jullundur, dated the 19th April 1917.

Bakhshi Tek Chand, for the Appellant.

The Hon'ble Pandit Sheo Narain, for the Plaintiff-Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—Pandit Sheo Narain on behalf of the plaintiff-respondent raises a preliminary objection that an appeal against the decree of the lower Appellate Court, dated 14th August 1917, cannot be maintained as that decree was set aside and a new decree was passed on review on 25th February 1918. The review application was presented on 2nd November 1917, and the defendants' appeal was instituted in this Court on 15th November 1917.

In support of his contention Pandit Sheo Narain cites Kanhaiya Lal v. Baldeo Prasad (1), a case exactly on all fours with the present, in which it was held that as the decree appealed from had ceased to exist, the appeal could not be heard. The same view was taken in Birjbasi Lal v. Salig Ram (2). Bakhshi Tek Chand is unable to cite any authority to the contrary but he urges that this Court acting under section 151, Civil Procedure Code, should consider the appeal as one from the final decree of 25th February 1918. This cannot be done. It is clear that the decree of 14th August 1917 has ceased to exist and, therefore, the present appeal cannot be heard, and I dismiss it, but make no order as to costs which respondents' Counsel does not ask for. Bakhshi Tek Chand says he will now file an appeal from the decree of 25th February 19 8, and in order that he may have facilities for doing so I direct that the records be kept in this Court for 10 days and that if he does file an appeal, fresh copies of judgments will be dispensed with.

MUTHU CHETTIAR—PLAINTIFF—APPELLANT

MUHAMMAD HUSSAIN AND OTHERS—DEFENDANTS NOS. 1, 2, 4 TO 8 AND LEGAL REPRESENTATIVES OF DEFENDANT NO. 3—RESPONDENTS.

Limitation Act (IX of 1908), s. 21, scope of—"Joint-contractors," whether includes joint mortgagors—Application to simple and realty debts—English Law

The distinction between simple debts and real debts maintained in the English statutes of limitation is abrogated by section 21 of the Limitation Act. There is no distinction made by the section between the case of co-mortgagors and that of co-mortgagees. [p. 765, col. 1.]

The word "joint contractors" in the section includes joint mortgagors also. [p. 765, col. 1.]

Section 21 of the Limitation Act is really an explanation to sections 19 and 20 of the Act. The object of the explanation is to provide that one only of the contracting parties shall not ordinarily impose a liability on the other by anything done by him. Limitation, whether treated as a right or as a disability, is prima facie personal and, unless the Legislature so provides, a co-operative right or liability should not be imposed. [p. 765, col. 2.]

Second appeal against the decree of the District Court, Madura, in Appeal Suit No. 413 of 1917, preferred against the decree of the Court of the Principal District Munsif Madura, in Ordinary Suit No. 243 of 1915.

FACTS.—The suit mortgage was executed by the father of defendants Nos. 1 to 6 and by defendants Nos. 7 and 8 jointly. The executants were three Muhammadan brothers. The objection was one of limitation The plaintiff relied on three payments for interest.

The mortgage was in 1901. The payments were in 1904, 1905 and 1913. The last of these was made by the 1st defendant.

Mr. T. R. Venkatrama Sastri, for the Appellant.—Payment towards interest keeps alive the liability. Doni Lal Sahu v. Roshan Dobay (1), Krishna Chandra Saha v. Bhairab Chandra Saha (2), Rushin Lal v. Kanhaiya Lal (3). The question did not arise in Narayana Ayyar v. Venkatrama Aiyar (4). Sarab Narain Das v. Top Ojha (5) is a case of co-heirs who are not joint contractors within the meaning of section 21 (2) of the Limitation Act.

The expression "joint contractors" was taken bodily from 19 and 20 Vic. C. 97, section 14, a Statute dealing exclusively with personal liability. The word 'mortgagees' occurs in 37 and 38 Vic. C. 57, sections 7 and 8. My submission is that "joint contractors" does not include "mortgagors," especially when "mortgagees' are expressly mentioned. Payment by anybody would enlarge time under section 20. The word 'chargeable' in section 21 can only refer to personal liability. The liability of the property cannot be affected. See Frisby, In re, Allison v. Frisby (6), Barnes v. Glenton (7), Bailie v. Irwin (8). Mitra in Volume I, page 414, takes a contrary view.

(2). The property stands in the name of the father of defendants Nos. 1 to 6, acknowledgment by whom is relied on.

(3). Provision of compound interest on default is only compensation for non payment of interest. Annamalai Chetty v. Veerabadram Chetty (9), Vadlamannati Srinivasadikshitulu v. Damera Ranjayya (10). Compensation is due for default in payment of principal.

Mr. K. V. Krishnaswamy Aiyar, for the Respondents.—The Indian Limitation Act is clear and the provisions of English Law should not be imported. See Gopal v. Gopal (11), Brojendro Kissore v. Hindustan Co-operative Insurance Society (12). There is no reason why 'chargeable' should be restricted to refer to personal liability only. Section 21 is not to be read as an exception to sections 19 and 20; Narayana Ayyar v. Venkatarama Ayyar (4), Sarab Narain Das v. Top Oha (5) are clear that "joint contractors" includes co-mortgagors. See also Chandra Kumar Dhar v. Ram Din Poddar (13).

Mr. K. S. Sankara Aiyar, in reply.

JUDGMENT.—In Second appeal No. 418 of 1919 the District Judge has held that the payment of interest by Naina Mohamed Rowther did not save limitation against the 7th and 8th defendants and that only the share of the payee should be sold under the decree. Mr. Venkatarama Sastriar has attacked this conclusion mainly on the basis of the English Statute Law of Limitation and of the decisions thereon. In England the limitation provided by the Mercantile Law Amendment Act (19 and 20 Vic, Chapter 97, section 14) only applied to simple money debts. The Real Property Limitation Act, 37 and 38 Vic, Chapter 57, provided for the saving of limitation by the act of mortgagors and of the mortgagees. Section 8, referring to mortgagors, makes the act of one of the mortgagors binding on his co-mortgagors. Section 7, on the other hand, lays down that the act of the mortgagee is binding only on him and not on his co-mortgagee. In this state of the English Law section 21 of the Limitation Act was introduced into the Act of 1877 in India. The conclusion of the learned Vakil for the appellant is that the Legislature in this country intended to perpetuate the distinction between the cases of co-mortgagors and of co-mortgagees. Reliance was placed on the use of the words joint mortgagees and the absence of the words joint mortgagors. We think that no significance should be attached to this omission, as the expression 'co-contractors' is capable of including joint mortgagors. The Indian Act is a general one applicable to simple debts and real debts as well. Whatever may have been the justification for making a difference between the two classes of cases in England, by section 21 of the Indian Limitation Act the Legislature apparently intends to abrogate such distinction in this country. There is no reason, on principle, why there should be a distinction between the case of mortgagors and that of mortgagees. It was argued that the object was to keep the integrity of the security intact by making the payment of interest by one mortgagor keep the mortgage alive. That argument would apply, if well-founded, to an acknowledgment by one of the joint mortgagees. We do not think the artificial distinction enforced in England should be extended to the construction of section 21 of the Limitation Act.

Moreover in Frisby, In re, Allison v. Frisby (6), Cotton, Lord Justice, held that the acknowledgment yb a mortgagor kept alive the liability of the surety. This conclusion, if right, is not reconcilable with any theory of the integrity of the security or with the distinction between simple debts and realty debts The view of Lord Justice Cotton was regarded as more suited to India by Sir Lawrence Jenkins in Gopal v. Gopal (11) and by Mookerji, J., in Brojendro Kissore v. Hindustan Co operative Insurance Society (12). We have also the opinion of Bnashyam Iyengar, J., about the meaning of the term "co contractors" in Narayana Ayyar v. Venkatarama Ayyar (4), although it was an obiter dictum The Patna High Court in Sarab Narain Das v. Top Ojha (5) takes the same view. See also Chandra Kumar Dhar v. Ram Din Poddar (13) On principle and on authority, we are of opinion that the word 'co contractor' should be held to include joint mortgagor also.

One other argument of the learned Vakil for the appellant was that the use of the words "chargeable only" in section 21 indicates that it is only personal liability that is excluded and that under the general principle that one of the promisors or promisees has implied authority to bind the others, the liability of the mortgaged property is not affected. We are unable to accept this contention. The reference to partners and joint mortgagees in the section is against this argument. As was pointed out by Mr. Krishnasawmi Iyer for the respondents section 21 is really an explanation to sections 19 and 20. The object of the explanation is to provide that one only of the contracting parties shall not ordinarily impose a liability on the other by anything done by him. The general principle being that a suit should be dismissed if barred by limitation, any act which avoids this result must be charged against the party responsible for it and not against the other in whose favour the law has created a right to plead limitation. Limitation, whether treated as a right or disability, is prima facie personal and unless the Legislature so provided, a co-operative right or liability should not be imposed. We are, therefore, of opinion that the District Judge was right in restricting the liability to the share of Naina Mohammed Rowther alone in the property.

It is next argued that the District Judge ought to have given the 6 per cent. interest upon the consolidated amount of principal and interest and not on the principal alone. The decree will be modified to that extent.

On the question of compound interest, it was argued that its imposition was intended to provide compensation for the failure to pay the interest in time and that, therefore, there should be some addition to the 15 per cent. provided for by the District Judge. Annamalai Chetty v. Veerabadram Chetty (9) supports this view. Without expressing any opinion on this question, we think that in this case reasonable compensation should be estimated at 1 rupee five annas per mensem compound interest instead of at 1 rupee four annas. The decree should be further modified as above indicated. In other respects the second appeal is dismissed with costs.

Letters Patent (Cal), cl. 15—Order refusing to issue commission for examination of witnesses, whether judgment—Appeal, whether lies.

An order of a Judge sitting on the Original Side of the High Court refusing to issue a commission for the examination of witnesses is not a "judgment" within the meaning of clause 15 of the Letters Patent and, therefore, no appeal lies from such an order.

Appeal against the following judgment of Mr. Justice Greaves, dated the 7th July 1919:—

"Upon reading on the part of the defendant firm a master's summons bearing date the 26th day of June last and an affidavit of Kherode Chandra Chowdhury of the due service thereof affirmed on the 27th day of June last and an affidavit of Babu Lall affirmed on the 26th day of June last and an affidavit of the said Babu Lall affirmed on the 3rd day of July instant, all filed this day, and upon reading on the part of the plaintiff firm an affidavit of Madan Lall Jalan affirmed on the 2nd day of July instant, filed this day, and upon hearing Mr. A. K. Roy, Advocate, for the defendant firm and Mr. S. N. Banerjee, Advocate, for the plaintiff firm, it is ordered that the application of the defendant firm pursuant to the said master's summons be and the same is hereby dismissed. And it is further ordered that the defendant firm do pay to the plaintiff firm their costs of and incidental to this application, including the fees to Counsel to be taxed by the Taxing Officer of this Court."

Mr. A. K. Roy, for the Appellants.

Messrs. S. N. Banerjee and R. N. Mitter, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This is an appeal from an interlocutory order made by my learned brother Mr. Justice Greaves. An application was made on behalf of the defendants that a commission should issue for the examination of two gentlemen whose evidence the defendants desired to place before the Court. The learned Judge refused the application. In our judgment, there is no appeal from this order: it is not a "judgment" within the meaning of clause 15 of the Letters Patent. I think it is right to add that we would have dismissed the appeal on the merits, because the applicant has not put materials before the Court sufficient to satisfy us that the presence at the trial of these gentlemen cannot be obtained by the defendants.

The result is that this appeal is dismissed with costs.

Transfer of Property Act (IV of 1882), s. 53—Instrument evidencing nominal transaction—Suit to avoid instrument, whether necessary.

An instrument which is executed with the intention of defeating creditors but which passes no title, is not affected by the provisions of section 53 of the Transfer of Property Act. The transaction evidenced by the document is merely nominal and can be avoided without a suit to set it aside. [p. 767, col. 2.]

Appeals against the decrees of the District Court, Tanjore, in Appeal Suits Nos. 15 and 16 of 1918, preferred against the decrees of the Court of the District Munsif, Tiruvadi, in Original Suits Nos. 417 and 132 of 1916, respectively.

FACTS appear from the judgment.

Mr. K. Rajah Aiyer, for the Appellants.—The lower Court's view is wrong. Even if a nominal or sham transaction was intended to defeat creditors it must be avoided under section 53 of the Transfer of Property Act. The parties must have intended that some effect should follow on their transaction. See the judgment of Abdur Rahim, J., in Cheruthazhath Abdulla Haji v. Cheriyandi Ibrayan Kutti (1).

Mr. Bashyam Iyengar, for the Respondents.—A mere sham sale-deed which does not pass title is not within section 53 of the Transfer of Property Act. It is not a transfer at all, and need not be avoided under the section, though intended to defeat creditors. Subramania Ayyar v. Muthia Chettiar (2), Palaniandi Chetti v. Appavu Chettier (3).

JUDGMENT.

SADASIVA AIYAR, J.—The District Judge's view of the law and of the nature of the defence raised by the creditor (defendant) in his written statement is, in my opinion, right. The Full Bench judgments in Subramania Ayyar v. Muthia Chettiar (2), the judgment in Palaniandi Chetti v. Appavu Chettiar (3) and the judgment of Seshagiri Aiyar, J., in Cheruthazhath Abdulla Haji v. Cheriyandi Ibrayan Kutti (1) clearly make a distinction between a real transfer intended to defeat creditors and a sham transfer so intended. No doubt, the judgment of Abdur Rahim, J., in Cheruthazhath Abdulla Haji v. Cheriyandi Ibrayan Kutti (1) is inclined to hold that, if there was an intention to defeat creditors, the transfer deed cannot be called a sham transaction, though no title was intended to pass from the nominal transferor to the nominal transferee. With the greatest respect I dissent. Following the preponderent weight of authority I would dismiss these appeals with costs.

SPENCER, J.—I cannot agree with the appellant's argument based on Cheruthazhath Abdulla Haji v. Cheriyandi Ibrayan Kutti (1) that an instrument which is executed with the motive of defeating creditors, must necessarily be one intended to have some effect and, therefore, falls within the scope of section 53 of the Transfer of Property Act

Whether a transfer is a real or nominal one depends on whether the parties entering into the transaction have at the time an animus transferendi. If they have no such animus, then their act does not fall within the definition in section 5 of the Transfer of Property Act, and is not a transfer of property at all.

Their object may not merely be to amuse themselves. At the same time they may have no real intention that property should pass, and in such a case the document will represent a sham or nominal transaction and it will be unnecessary that a suit under section 53, Transfer of Property Act, should be brought to have it avoided. I agree that the lower Court's orders were right and that these appeals should be dismissed with costs.

CALCUTTA HIGH COURT.

APPEAL FROM ORIGINAL CIVIL NO. 46 OF 1918.

December 11, 1919.

MOHAN LAL SHAH AND ANOTHER—PLAINTIFFS—APPELLANTS

versus

JAHURY LAL SHAH—DEFENDANT—RESPONDENT.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), s. 11—Res judicata—Plaintiff claiming under different title—Point not allowed to be raised by Court, whether can be raised in subsequent suit.

Where in a subsequent suit the plaintiff sues under a title different to that under which he endeavoured to support his claim in a previous suit, the decision in the latter suit will not operate as res judicata in the subsequent suit. [p. 769, col. 2.]

Similarly, where in a previous suit the plaintiff was prevented by the Court from raising a particular point, he is not debarred from raising that point in a subsequent suit. [p. 769, col. 2.]

MOHAN LAL SHAH V. JAHURY LAL SHAH.

Appeal against the following judgment of Mr. Justice Greaves, dated the 2nd May 1918:—

"This is a suit commenced by Mohan Lal Shaha and Moti Lal Shaha against one Jahuri Lal Shaha, and the plaintiffs ask for a declaration that the properties set forth in paragraph 11 of the plaint were acquired by Dilchand Shaha, and that he died possessed thereof, and that the plaintiffs as his heirs are entitled to possession of such properties; the plaintiffs also ask for consequential relief, namely, discovery and an account.

A preliminary objection is taken on the part of the defendant that by virtue of the provisions of section 11 of the Code of Civil Procedure this suit is barred. Section 11 provides as follows:—

'No Court shall try any suit or issue in which the matter directly and substantially in issue has been directly and substantially in issue in a former suit between the same parties, or between parties under whom they or any of them claim, litigating under the same title, in a Court competent to try such subsequent suit or the suit in which such issue has been subsequently raised and has been heard and finally decided by such Court.'

And Explanation 4 of the section is as follows:—

'Any matter which might and ought to have been made the ground of defence or attack in such former suit shall be deemed to have been a matter directly and substantially in issue in such suit.'

The defendant here contends that the matters raised here might have been decided in another suit No. 217 of 1912 which was a suit brought by the present plaintiffs against their father Dilchand, and the present defendant asked for a declaration that Dilchand held the identical properties, which are claimed in this suit, as trustee for them.

Dilchand had two wives, Kulia and another. The present plaintiffs are the sons of Kulia and the second wife had a son Chaitan Lall who died unmarried in 1896, and with whom we are not concerned. The contention of the plaintiffs in Suit No. 217 of 1912 was that their maternal grandfather Misri Lal created a trust of certain properties in their favour. It appears from the schedules A and B to Suit No. 217 of 1912 that what was then claimed as being trust property held by Dilchand on behalf of the plaintiffs was a certain house, No. 2 H 8, Bazar Road, Hastings, valued at about Rs. 2,000 and certain stock-in-trade including gold and silver articles and ornaments valued at about Rs. 7,000. Schedule A to the plaint in that suit has a heading, weight of the gold articles, and the material part of it for the purpose of this application are the first five articles under that heading. In the plaint in this suit, in paragraph 11 it will be found that the claim is made in respect of premises No. 2 H 8, Bazar Road, Hastings, valued at about Rs. 2,000, and a stock-in trade, gold articles and ornaments, valued at Rs. 7,000, and the articles (c), (d), (e), (f) and (g) are identical with the gold articles above referred to set forth in schedules A of Suit No 217 of 1912. Consequently it is clear that so far as the subject-matter of the two suits is concerned, they are identical.

Now, when Suit No. 217 of 1912 was commenced, Dilchand was alive and there is no doubt that as long as he was alive, the plaintiffs in that suit and in the present suit could not raise as an alternative claim that they were entitled to the properties claimed in Suit No. 217 of 1912 and in this suit as heirs of Dilchand. That suit was commenced on the 5th March 1912 and Dilchand died five days later, namely, on the 10th March 1912. On the 10th April 1912 the suit was amended on the plaintiffs' application by recording the death of Dilchand and a new summons was issued to Jahury Lal Shaha, the remaining sole defendant in Suit No. 217 of 1912; and there is no doubt that at that time the claim which is raised in the present suit could have been raised in that suit. On the 24th November 1913 no amendment having then been made or applied for in order to raise the claim put forward in the present, all matters in that suit were referred to arbitration. Late in the arbitration the present plaintiffs applied to the arbitrators to decide the claim which is now made in this suit. The arbitrators quite rightly decided that they had no jurisdiction to do so as the only mater referred to them had been the question of the trust specifically raised in Suit No. 217 of 1912. Thereafter in the month of February 1915 the plaintiffs in Suit No. 217 of 1912 applied to the Court asking that they might be at liberty to amend by raising in that suit the claim that is now made in the present suit. That application was refused and I do not think it is an unreasonable inference to draw that the application was only made in view of the fact that the plaintiffs apprehended an unfavourable decision of the arbitrators with regard to their claim that a trust had been created in their favour by Misri Lal of which Dilchand was their trustee; and I think the inference is also justified by the statements that are contained in paragraphs 7 and 8 of the plaint in the present suit. This being so, I have got to decide whether the case falls within section 11, Explanation 4, of the Civil Procedure Code or not. I think it does. I think, having regard to the words of Explanation (4), that after Dilchand's death on the 5th March 1912 matters that are raised in this present suit might have been raised as an alternative claim in Suit No. 217 of 1912 and when new summonses were issued on the 10th April, the suit was to some extent a new suit in which certainly this question could have been raised.

This being so, I must hold that the preliminary objection prevails, and accordingly the suit fails and must be dismissed. The plaintiffs are suing in forma pauperis, and, therefore, there will be no order for costs. There will be an order for taxation as between Attorney and client on scale No. 2 against the defendant in favour of his Attorney.

Mr. U. P. Roy, for the Appellants.

Messrs. B. K. Lahiri and N. M. Chatterjee, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.

SANDERSON, C. J.—This is an appeal from the judgment of my learned brother Mr. Justice Greaves. The suit was by the plaintiffs claiming, as heirs of their deceased father, certain properties which were mentioned in the plaint.

The learned Judge has disposed of the case upon a preliminary point, namely, that the suit would not lie by reason of the provisions of section 11 of the Civil Procedure Code and by reason of a previous suit which was instituted in 1912. It appears that when the suit of 1912 was instituted, the father of the plaintiffs was still alive. It is, therefore, obvious that when the suit was instituted, the plaintiffs could not claim as his heirs. But the father, who was one of the defendants, died shortly after the suit was instituted, and an amendment was made recording the death of the father (Dilchand) and a new summons was issued to the remaining sole defendant. Then all matters in dispute in that suit were referred to arbitration: and, after the reference the plaintiffs desired to raise the point which they are raising in this suit, and they applied to the Court that they might have an opportunity of amending the plaint by raising in that suit the claim which is now being raised in the present suit. That application was refused, and the Court has now held that although the plaintiffs applied in the first suit to raise the point which they are now raising, and although that application was refused, their present suit must be held to be untenable, because the question is res judicata. In my judgment the learned Judge's decision cannot be supported, first, because in this suit the plaintiffs are suing under a different title to that under which they were endeavouring to support their claim in the first suit: and, secondly, because the plaintiffs did attempt to raise this point in the first suit but were not allowed by the Court to do so.

For these reasons the judgment must be set aside and the suit must be remanded to the learned Judge on the original side for trial. The appellants are entitled to the costs of this appeal and also to the costs in the Court of first instance.

MOOKERJEE, J.—I agree.

FLETCHER, J.—I agree.

Appeal allowed.

OLAPPAMANANNA NANAKAL NEELAKANDAM NAMBUDRIPAD, KARNAVAN AND MANAGER—PLAINTIFF—APPELLANT

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA IN COUNCIL—DEFENDANT—RESPONDENT.

Water rights—Non-tidal and non-navigable river, accretions in—Riparian owners, rights of—Sovereign rights—Madras Land Encroachment Act (III Mad. of 1905), effect of, on riparian rights—Title to land, whether affected by submersion—Identification of land—Palghat Taluk—Custom as to rights of Crown in river-beds, existence of—Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), s. 100—Custom, proof of, whether question of law—Appeal, second—Pleadings and proof—Plaintiff failing to prove entire case, effect of—Decree, partial, whether can be given.

The accretions in non-tidal and non-navigable rivers in India belong to the riparian landlords. It is part of the common law of India that the ownership of river-beds usque ad medium filum aquæ is presumed to vest in the riparian owners. But this presumption is capable of being rebutted. [p. 772, col. 1; p. 775, col. 1.]

The Madras Land Encroachment Act does not affect pre-existing rights and does not supersede the rights of riparian proprietors [p. 772, col. 1; p. 774, col. 2.]

Vasireddi Venkata Lakshmi Narasamma v. Secretary of State, 47 Ind. Cas. 606; 41 M. 840; 35 M. L. J. 159; (1918) M. W. N. 662; Chinnappan Chetty v. Secretary of State for India, 49 Ind. Cas. 673; 42 M. 239; 35 M. L. J. 124; 25 M. L. T. 121; (1919) M. W. N. 120; 9 L. W. 289, followed.

If a party fails to prove all that he wishes to prove, he can be given a decree at least in respect of that which he succeeds in establishing. [p. 773, cols. 1 & 2.]

A person does not lose his title to land by its mere submersion under water, so long as the land is identifiable. Non-resistance to vis major such as flood, which causes the change of a river course, cannot be treated as evidence of acquiescence or of abandonment of rights by a riparian owner. [p. 773, col. 2; p. 774, col. 1.]

There is no special custom having the force of law in the Palghat Taluk by which all river accretions and river beds are vested in the Crown [p. 774, col. 2; p. 777, col. 1.]

The question whether the facts proved and found satisfy the requirements of law to establish a custom is a question of law and one which the High Court can and must consider in second appeal. [p. 775, col. 2.]

Second appeal against the decree of the Court of the Subordinate Judge, South Malabar, at Calicut, in Appeal Suit No. 673 of 1913, preferred against the decree of the Court of the District Munsif, Otapalam, in Original Suit No. 135 of 1911.

FACTS appear from the judgment.

Mr. T. R. Ramachandra Aiyar, for the Appellant.—There is proof that items Nos. 5 to 8 originally belonged to the plaintiff-appellant in jenm. Their recent submersion by the change in the course of the river does not affect his right, when the land can be identified; Rajah Leelanund Singh v. Rajah Mohendernarain (1).

As to S. No. 252-B, the lower Court's finding in appellant's favour is correct. Plaintiff's title before submersion has been proved, and it must be deemed to continue. As regards items Nos. 1 to 4, even if he had failed to prove his title before submersion, he is admittedly the riparian owner on both banks of the river adjoining these lands. He is entitled to these lands under the common law rule that in non-tidal and non-navigable rivers lands in their beds belong to the adjacent proprietor up to the middle of the stream, ad medium filum aquæ. Government cannot claim rights over these lands. Madras Land Encroachment Act III of 1905 cannot give them the right, as the prior rights of parties are reserved by section 2.

The special custom set up of Government's rights in Palghat Taluk should not be entertained, as the case was not mentioned in the pleadings. They only set up a general custom in Malabar. Such a custom has not also been proved and such facts as have been elicited do not satisfy the requisites of a valid custom.

Mr. V. Ramesam, Government Pleader, for the Respondent.—There is proof of a special custom whereby the Government owned these river bed lands in the Palghat Taluk. There is an averment in the written statement of such a special custom in Malabar and Government is not precluded from proving the existence of the custom in any portion of Malabar. A party is entitled to prove a part of his claim, though he may not succeed in establishing the whole of it.

As to S. No. 252 plaintiff has not proved that it belonged to him before submersion.

The rule of riparian ownership in river lands does not apply to Malabar. Meenakshi Amma v. Secretary of State for India (2) (observations of Sadasiva Aiyar, J.) Moreover, the Government are the real riparian proprietors in the Malabar District, as Malabar is a ryotwari tract with periodical settlements of land revenue.

JUDGMENT.

SPENCER, J.—This suit was brought by a Jenmi or landowner of South Malabar to obtain a declaration that the suit land forming the bed of a Thodu or stream, called Pulliyampalli Puzha or Thodu, and the lands on both sides of it belong in Jenm to him and that Government has no Jenm right over the suit plots, and to recover the same. The District Munsif of Ootapalam who tried the suit gave the plaintiff a decree accordingly, but the Subordinate Judge of South Malabar at Calicut who heard the appeal modified the judgment of the District Munsif and dismissed the plaintiff's claim in respect of the items now in dispute with costs.

The items now in dispute are items Nos. 1 to 4 forming the old bed of the stream and items Nos. 6 to 8 which are part of the present bed. Item No. 5 is not subject to appeal. The 1st defendant in the suit is the Secretary of State for India in Council. This defendant adduced a large quantity of documentary evidence to show that from 1855 till 1880, the Government laid claim to the beds of all rivers in Palghat and was levying a Jenmabhogam on persons who occupied the beds, and in some cases was selling Jenm right to the occupiers. In a similar case, Original Suit No. 330 of 1892, the appeal in which was heard by Mr. Benson, (afterwards Sir Ralph Benson, a puisne Judge of this Court) similar evidence was produced of the Government having granted Cowles and collected Jenmabhog for river accretions in certain rivers in the Palghal Taluk between 1859 and 1892, and that between 1863 and 1885 the Government sold Jenm titles in a number of such accretions in the Palghat Taluk, and private persons purchased titles from Government in such cases. The District Judge's judgment was not brought up to the High Court in second appeal, but as it stands, it is certainly a recognition by a judicial tribunal of the existence of the custom which has been sought to be proved in the present case. The Subordinate Judge was evidently influenced by this judgment, Exhibit DL, and relying on the evidence as to the assertion of title by Government to river-beds in Palghat Taluk, he found that a local usage prevailed in that Taluk by which non-navigable and non-tidal rivers belonged to Government in Jenm. He qualified this finding by saying that it is not supported by the general law of the Presidency or by any general custom prevailing in the Malabar District.

Now the proof of custom arising out of the facts found in this case appears to me to be defective in the following particulars:—

(a) It is not a custom or usage of great antiquity, seeing that it is not proved to have existed before 1855. In this connection see the observations of Sankaran Nair, J., in Meenakshi Amma v. Secretary of State for India (2).

(b) Its value is diminished by the fact that in 1885 when a question arose about the levying of Jenmabhogam in several parts of the District, notably Walluvanad Taluk, the then Collector, Mr. Logan, decided not to levy Jenmabhogam for the reason that in non-navigable and non-tidal rivers, the accretions belonged to the riparian landlords, see Exhibit FF. This decision by the Collector was taken in consequence of a reference to the Government Pleader whose reply has been filed as Exhibit DCC XII, in which he expressed his opinion that in dealing with the respective rights of Government and of private persons to accretions in rivers the general principles of English law might be applied as a guide, except where a well established local usage to the contrary was proved.

(c) As regards Palghat Taluk the custom or usage found by the Subordinate Judge to exist has not been traced to any definite local origin.

Now if the 1st defendant, who had to open the case, has failed to prove the existence of a special custom prevailing in Palghat Taluk, what then is the position of the plaintiff? He is admittedly a riparian owner, see the statement of the Tahsildar of Palghat, D. W. No. 1, who stated that lands on both sides of the old Thodu site belonged to the plaintiff and that Government has no Jenmam right to the bed of the present site of the stream. In the Full Bench case Vasireddi Venkata Lakshmi Narasamma v. Secretary of State (3), the question referred to the Full Bench was whether a grantee from Government who holds lands bounded by a non navigable river, has a right extending to half the bed of the river. It was held that there was a presumption in his favour and that the onus of showing that the grant did not cover the bed ad medium filum aquæ lay on the grantor. That was a case of grant from Government of the lands adjoining a non navigable river or stream. The importance of it is that it recognises the principle of ownership of the river-bed, usque ad medium filum aquæ, residing in a reparian owner as part of the common law of India. No doubt this presumption can be rebutted and in some cases the amount of evidence required to rebut it is very slight. But in this case, if the 1st defendant has failed to establish the local usage set up by him, it cannot be said that plaintiff's title as riparian owner is in any way impaired. Madras Land Encroachment Act (II of 1905) declares that "all public roads, streets and the beds of the sea and rivers and streams and all lands wherever situated, save in so far as the same are the property ..... of any person holding under ryotwari tenure including that of Jenmi in Malabar are the property of the Government." But as pointed out in the Full Bench decision Vasireddi Venkata Lakshmi Narasamma v. Secretary of State (3), this Act does not affect pre-existing rights. A similar view was taken in another Full Bench case Chinnappan Chetty v. Secretary of State for India (4), in which Abdur Rahim, J. also observed that the right of Government of regulating the distribution of the water of a river or stream does not supersede the rights of riparian proprietors and does not necessarily imply the ownership of the bed by the Government.

Having thus expressed my opinion that the plaintiff has prima facie the rights of a riparian owner in the plots now in suit, it remains to say a few words on the decisions cited at the hearing of the second appeal. It was held so long ago as 1880 in Secretary of State for India v. Vira Rayan (5) that in Malabar there was no presumption that forest lands were the property of the Government, and in Secretary of State for India v. Kadirikutti (6) the English law of riparian ownership was applied to accretions caused by alluvion in rivers so far as they were not excluded by enactment or legal usage. In another case, Secretary of State for India v. Ashtamurthi (7), in the same volume, the rights of Jenmis to uncultivated waste lands in their Jenms were recognised, and it was held that their rights did not pass in consequence of the sale of such land by Government for arrears of revenue due from the occupants. In Meenakshi Amma v. Secretary of State for India (2) Sankaran Nair, J., laid it down that in Malabar the English law as to ownership in beds of natural streams, namely, that the beds vest in the adjoining proprietor and not in the Crown, is the law of the locality. In his judgment he referred to the judgment of the District Judge, Mr. Benson, Exhibit DL, and expressed doubts whether that decision which supported a local custom in derogation of the general law would be followed in future. Sadasiva Aiyar, J., who sat with him, dissented from his conclusions on the case and also expressed a doubt whether the beds of natural streams and the sites of public paths even in Malabar did not belong to Governments as a rule. I have already referred to the judgment of Mr. Benson as District Judge Exhibit DL, on appeal from the judgment of Kelu Eradi, District Munsif of Palghat (Exhibit DXLIX), which it confirmed on the evidence before the Court. Another judgment was passed in 1908 by Mr. Ananthan Nair, Subordinate Judge of Calicut, Exhibit DLI, in which he dealt with riparian ownership to the bed of streams in the Ernad Taluk. Differing from the lower Court he decided that the land in suit was the Jenm of Government, giving as his reasons that there was a presumption in favour of Government that the beds of natural streams belong to them. He defined "natural stream" "as one which has existed from time immemorial, not an artificial stream coming into existence through the intervention of human agency." If his opinion were correct, no one in Malabar would have a right to a spring rising in his own garden or field. The Subordinate Judge in the present case drew an analogy from roads and the beds of navigable rivers that such property could not have belonged to private owners, as it was public policy that Government should keep roads and navigable rivers under control in the interests of the public. That analogy which applies to streams and roads, which are public thoroughfares, cannot be followed in the case of streams which are not navigable, as there is no public interest in such except in so far as they form part of an irrigation system.

Mr. Ramachandra Aiyar for the appellant took a preliminary objection in the case that the Government did not plead in their written statement the existence of local usage in the Palghat Taluk vesting the ownership of beds of non navigable and non-tidal rivers in the Government, and, therefore, the lower Court should not have admitted evidence as to the peculiar usage in the Palghat Taluk only, seeing that issue 4 in the suit was, "whether the stream in question belongs in Jenmam to plaintiff or to 1st defendant either by law or custom of Malabar." Now Palghat Taluk is a unit in the Malabar District and the whole includes the part. It has already been held by a Bench of this Court that the plaintiff was not prejudiced in consequence of the manner in which this issue was framed upon the defendant's pleadings as he failed to show that he would have adduced different evidence, if he had known that the custom set up by the 1st defendant related to Palghat Taluk only. As observed in Mohidin v. Shivlingappa (8), if a party fails to prove all that he wishes to prove, there is no reason for denying him the right which he succeeds in establishing. I think that there is no substance in this objection and that it should be dismissed. But as the plaintiff has succeeded on the main issue, it is unnecessary to deal with the authorities quoted in support of this preliminary objection. As my learned brother agrees with me, we allow the second appeal and reversing the Subordinate Judge's judgment, restore that of the District Munsif with costs here and in the lower Appellate Court. The memorandum of objections is dismissed with costs.

KRISHNAN, J.—This second appeal raises the question of ownership of river-bed lands in non-tidal and non-navigable rivers between the Government and the private Jenmi, in the Palghat Taluk of South Malabar.

There were 8 items in suit. Of these items No. 5 has been found to be the plaintiff's private Jenm and to have no connection with the river; there is no appeal from the decree of the lower Appellate Court in the plaintiff's favour regarding it. Items Nos. 1 to 4 formed the bed of the "Palliyambatti Thodu" before it recently changed its course and items Nos. 6 to 8 form part of its present bed. The stream itself is a small one with apparently very little water in it in the hot season. The plaintiff's allegation that it has an artificial water-course dug on his own lands was not proved, it is found to be a natural stream and from its very description it is clear that it is neither tidal nor navigable.

The District Munsif held that the ownership of all the lands was in the plaintiff but on appeal the Subordinate Judge has held that except as to S. No. 252B, which is said to be a part of items No. 1 and 2, the Government is the owner of the rest of the lands. The plaintiff has appealed to us and claims all the lands to be his and the Government has filed a memorandum of objections claiming S. No. 252B for themselves.

Taking items Nos. 5 to 8 first, it is found by the lower Appellate Court and it is not disputed that they were lands belonging in Jenm to the plaintiff before they were submerged by the recent change in the course of the river. It is clear law that a person does not lose his title to his lands by mere submersion under water, so long as the land is identifiable. This view was laid down by the Privy Council so early as in the case Rajah Leelanund Singh v. Rajah Mohendernarain (1) and has since been consistently followed. Non-resistance to vis major such as flood, which causes the change of a river's course, cannot be treated as any evidence of acquiescence or of abandonment of rights by plaintiff, as the Sub-Judge remarks. In fact the Government Pleader conceded, and rightly so, that the decree of the Sub-Judge regarding these lands was not supportable. Plaintiff must be given a decree for them as prayed for. The question of water rights in the river is not before us and our decree should not be taken to have affected them in any way.

Taking next S. No. 252B about which Government has filed a memorandum of objections, it has been found by the lower Appellate Court that plaintiff has proved his title to that land before it was submerged by the river when it changed its course on a former occasion; the river is said to have changed its course twice. This finding was not attacked before us and accepting it, it follows from the principle above stated that the land belongs to the plaintiff. The only objection urged by the learned Government Pleader to this part of the case was that the plaintiff's original ownership of land was not set up in the plaint, and that he should not have been allowed to make out a new case afterwards. I consider that paragraph No. 3, clauses (1) and (3), of the plaint do state that the land over which the river originally flowed was plaintiff's Jenmam the fact that that statement was coupled with an assertion that the water-course itself was one dug by the parties does not affect that statement. The decree of the Sub Judge regarding this item must, therefore, be confirmed.

Finally we have items Nos. 1 to 4, excluding S. No. 252B, to consider. As regards these lands the plaintiff failed to prove his title to them before submersion. But there is no allegation or proof that they were the Jenmam of any other landlord. Plaintiff is a very rich Jenmi owning extensive lands in this neighbourhood and his learned Vakil asserts that all the lands in this locality, including these items, are his Jenm. But we must accept the finding that he is not proved to have been the Jenmi of these lands before submersion in second appeal, as it is one of fact. It is then argued for him that as the admitted riparian proprietor of the lands on both banks of the river adjoining these lands, items Nos. 1 to 4, when the river ran over them, he is entitled to them under the rule that land in the bed of a non navigable river belongs to the adjacent riparian proprietor up to the middle of the stream, "ad medium filum aquæ" as it is usually put. If this rule of law applied ,he must be held to have been the owner of the whole bed as he claims, as admittedly he was the riparian proprietor of the lands on both banks. The claim of the Government to these lands cannot be supported by anything in Madras Act III of 1905, as section 2 of that Act expressly reserves, as pointed out in the Full Bench case in Chinnappan Chetty v. Secretary of State for India (4), the prior rights of parties including those of a Jenmi in Malabar.

The learned Government Pleader has, however, put forward two answers to the plaintiff's contention. He first contended that the rule in question did not apply to Malabar at all and, secondly, that in any case its applicability was excluded in the present case by a special custom having the force of law existing in the Palghat Taluk where these lands are situated, by which all river accretions and river bed lands there vested in the Crown.

For the first part of the argument he relied mainly on the observtions of Sadasiva Aiyar, J., in the case in Meenakshi Amma v. Secretary of State for India (2). But as the learned Judges who took part in that case expressed different opinions on the point, that case cannot be treated as of much authority on it. The question of riparian rights to the bed of a non-navigable river has since recently been considered by a Full Bench of this Court in Vasireddi Venkata Lakshmi Narasamma v. Secretary of State (3), and the ruling there is distinctly in favour of the plaintiff's contetion. Though the actual decision was on the construction of a grant, the learned Chief Justice who delivered the judgment of the Full Bench clearly adopts the view that the rule in question is a part of the common law of India and that there is a presumption in favour of its applicability in general. The presumption must be rebutted by the party alleging the contrary. After that decision it is unnecessary to consider the previous decisions on the point in detail as they are all referred to in it. I, therefore, agree with my learned brother that plaintiffs must be held to be prima facie entitled to these lands, unless the custom set up is proved.

It was also suggested by the learned Government Pleader that Malabar being a ryotwari tract with periodical re-settlement of land revenue, the Government must be taken to be the proprietor of the soil as in other ryotwari tracts and that the rule in question should, therefore, be held to apply rather in their favour as the real riparian proprietors than against them. This suggestion of proprietorship in Government is opposed to what has been laid down in decided cases regarding Jenmis' rights in Malabar. It has been recognised that Malabar Jenmis are undoubtedly proprietors of the soil. This question is dealt with at length by Sankaran Nair, J., in the case in Meenakshi Amma v. Secretary of State for India (2) already referred to above, and he has collected all the authorities there and has referred to the leading case on the point in Secretary of State for India v. Vira Rayan (5). It may be remarked that Sadasiva Aiyar, J, in his dissenting judgment in the same case does not controvert the proposition that "Malabar is a land of private proprietors." The same view was stated by Parker, J., in Secretary of State for India v. Ashtamurthi (7). In a later case in the same volume page 369 [Secretary of State v. Kadirikutti (6)] the question arose with reference to the ownership of a river accretion itself in a Malabar river. Though the case was decided in favour of the Crown, it was on the ground that the river was navigable and tidal at the spot and the accretion was a sudden one. The observations in this case show clearly that if the river had been non-tidal or non-navigable, their Lordships would have decided against the Crown and in favour of private ownership. It may be said that by this case the general proposition that there is no presumption in Malabar that waste lands are the property of Government has been abrogated to this extent that "land covered by water of the sea or of a tidal river is not within the category of waste lands", to which the rule of private ownership applied (see page 375); but no further. The learned Government Pleader's argument based on the alleged proprietorship of the soil in the Government must, therefore, be disallowed.

It remains to consider his last contention based on the alleged existence of a special custom in the Palghat Taluk. The District Munsif has found against the custom but the Sub-Judge has supported it. The question whether the facts proved and found satisfy the requirements of law to establish a custom is a question of law and one which we can and must consider in second appeal. See the observations of the Privy Council in Palaniappa Chetty v. Sreemath Deivasikamony Pandara Sannadhi (9) and the ruling of this Court in Kumrappa Reddi v. Manavala Goundan (10). We have been taken by the learned Pleaders on both sides through the evidence regarding this alleged special custom.

Before, however, considering that evidence it must be pointed out that the Government in their written statement did not really set up any special custom in the Palghat Taluk, but set up a general custom as prevailing throughout Malabar; the attempt of the Subordinate Judge to make the existence of a comma after the word "local usage" in paragraph 6 of the written statement that such a custom confined to the Palghat Taluk was set up seems to me to be futile.

In fact the learned Government Pleader did not attempt to support his view. The form of issue 4 removes all doubt in the matter and shows what the parties intended by the pleadings. Mr. Ramachandra Aiyar for the appellant argued that the Government should not have been allowed to change their case in appeal to one of a special custom in Palghat. It is, however, open to a party who sets up a territorial custom to prove it with reference to a smaller area included in the larger area in which it was alleged to exist, when he is unable to prove it for the whole extent, see Mohidin v. Shivlingappa (8) However, if on the evidence on record I was of opinion that a prima facie case in support of the smaller custom had been made out by the defendant, I should have been inclined to frame a definite issue about that custom and remitted it for trial to give an opportunity to the plaintiff to adduce further evidence for the reasons stated in his affidavits filed in this Court. In the view I am taking it is not necessary to pursue the matter further.

I should now consider the evidence which has been put forward in support of the custom. It has been fairly summarised by both the Courts. We start with Exhibit 47 (printed on page 44 of the paper book), where the Government for the first time in 1855 seem to have asserted their right to a river accretion. They were issuing similar Cowles till 1863, when the policy of selling the Jenmi right in such lands seems to have been adopted. Till 1881 no one contested the Government's right, but in that year one Ekkanath Karimal claimed a river accretion as belonging to him. He does not, however, seem to have pursued the matter beyond putting a petition to the Collector which was rejected. The same policy was continued till 1884 At this stage comes in an important document Exhibit FF, which seems to indicate a change in the policy of the Government. It is an order of Mr. Logan, Collector of Malabar, based on the opinion of the then Government Pleader, which was filed in the Appellate Court as Exhibit DCCXII, recognising that in rivers in Malabar which are neither navigable nor tidal the river accretions belonged to the riparian landlord and not to the Government. This order seems to have been circulated to all the Taluks in Malabar. No doubt the Government Pleader's opinion recognized that the rule would not apply where there is a special custom to the contrary. But it is significant that there is no evidence of any levy of Jenmabhogam even in Palghat Taluk between 1885 and 1888, by which time Mr. Logan had retired and left Malabar. In 1888 the old practice was re-started but this time the claim of the Government was challenged in a Court of law. The decisions of both the District Munsif and of the District Judges Exhibit, DXLIa and DL, were, however, in favour of the Government and recognised the alleged custom as a valid one. This case was not brought up to the High Court. Nevertheless the Government seem to have treated it as settling the question in their favour and to have continued the practice up to date of claiming river accretions as belonging to them.

That is how the evidence stands. To prove the existence of a valid custom having the force of law it is necessary to establish (1) that it was ancient, (2) that it was continued and acquiesced in, (3) and that it is reasonable. If any of these conditions fails, the custom cannot be upheld as valid. The question for consideration is whether there requisites have been complied with.

Mr. Ramachandra Aiyar has drawn our attention to the case in Secretary of State for India v. Asthamurthi (7), which is a very important and instructive case on this question as it dealt with a similar claim by Government with reference to waste lands in Malabar. Mr. Justice Parker in an elaborate judgment has traced the history of the way in which Government began to issue Cowles in Malabar for cultivation of waste lands and gives the various steps adopted, in the course of their policy of claiming the Jenmi right in such lands. There is no reason to think, and it is not likely, that Palghat Taluk was treated differently from the other Taluks, or riverbed lands from other waste lands. Though the case itself arose in the Ernad Taluk, the judgment is perfectly general and applies to all Malabar. Reading that judgment it is a fair inference to hold that Exhibit 47 must have been issued in pursuance of the same policy that prevailed elsewhere. It follows that Exhibit 47 probably represents the first assertion of title by Government to river-bed lands in the Taluk and that there is no scope for any inference or presumption that the same practice had existed previously. That judgment shows that the claim to waste lands was not based on any anterior custom but was made as a matter of policy. In fact if there was any antecedent practice in the matter before us, one may fairly expect Government would have been in a position to adduce evidence about it; they have not done so. There is no evidence that such a custom existed during the previous periods of Hindu or Muhammadan domination in Malabar. The reference by the Sub-Judge to the statement in Keralol-pathi which gives the traditions of Malabar is mistaken, as the word is not (attu thurithikal) as the Sub Judge thinks but (attu thiruthkta) which means as the District Munsif says, to regulate (the course of) the river. It has no reference to any islands as supposed by the Sub-Judge.

In this state of evidence can we say that the custom has been proved to be sufficiently ancient to be recognised as the law of the land? A similar question was considered in Secretary of State for India v. Ashtamurthi (7), above referred to, with reference to waste lands generally and answered in the negative. I agree with my learned brother that our answer in the present case must also be in the negative, more especially because as shown above the practice for the last 60 years or so relied on has not been uniform or continuous during the whole period. I think the Munsif was right in attaching much importance to Exhibit FF. It expressed the deliberate opinion of a very experienced Collector of Malabar who, it may be observed, is the author of the Malabar Manual and I have no doubt that the practice of claiming river-beds ceased for a time even in Palghat Taluk on account of it. I am unable to agree with the Sub-Judge that this document should be kept out of consideration because it arose with reference to another Taluk, viz., Walluvananad. Mr. Logan did not evidently treat it as applying only to that Taluk, and it is significant to remember in this connection that even in this case in their pleadings the Government made no distinction between the Palghat and other Taluks. It seems to me the Munsif was right in holding that Exhibit FF showed a break in the continuity of the practice.

Furthermore it has been pointed out to us that Exhibit 47 itself reserves "the right of any persons and the Bohgams that may arise therefrom," and says that these "would be according to local custom." What the exact meaning of this reservation is and what the local custom referred to is, are not explained. It may be that Government did not mean to interfere under Exhibit 47 with the rights of private Jenmis, as Mr. Ramachandra Aiyar contends; his suggestion is supported by what appears in Secretary of State for India v. Ashtamurthi (7) to have been the policy of the Government about the date of that document. If this is correct, Exhibit 47 can hardly be relied on in proof of a custom of exclusive Jenm right in the Government. It is also pointed out that there is an indication in Exhibit 294 that Chennath Nair owned some river-bed lands but without knowing more about the matter, I am not able to attach much weight to it.

The practice was also challenged by private Jenmis more than once as stated above though they failed each time. It must, therefore, be held that the second requisite above stated for a valid custom has also not been properly complied with.

Great reliance has been placed on the judgment of the District Judge, Exhibit DL, in favour of the Government and it is claimed that the custom had been judicially recognised by it and should be upheld by us. That judgment cannot be treated as an authoritative recognition of the custom settling its validity, as it is not that of the High Court, It can only be looked upon as an instance where the Government asserted its title successfully in a Court of law. No doubt it is entitled to weight, but it is not conclusive. As pointed out by the District Munsif, Exhibit FF was not before the Court in that case and thus it loses its weight to a great extent.

Inspite of that judgment it is clearly open to us to consider the validity of the custom set up on the evidence before us. I agree with my learned brother, whose judgment I have had the advantage of reading, that a custom or local usage in the Palghat Taluk as alleged has not been made out.

The result is items Nos. 1 to 4 should also be wholly decreed to the plaintiff. I, therefore, agree to the order proposed by my learned brother.

APPEAL FROM ORIGINAL ORDER No. 56 OF 1919.

JOYLAL & Co.—DEFENDANTS—APPELLANTS

GOPIRAM BHOTICA—PLAINTIFF—RESPONDENT.

Arbitration—Commercial contract--Injunction restraining arbitration proceedings—High Court, power of, to grant or refuse injunction—Discretion.

It is entirely in the discretion of the High Court to grant or refuse an injunction restraining a reference to the tribunal of arbitration in respect of a commercial contract. Such an injunction will not be granted where a suit is obviously instituted for the purpose of preventing arbitration proceedings and is not one in which all the questions in dispute between the parties can be decided. [p. 781, col. 1.]

Appeal against an order of Mr. Justice Chaudhuri, dated the 4th June 1919.

CHAUDHURI, J. (June 4, 1919).—In this case the plaintiffs allege that the defendant firm acted as brokers in passing the contract in suit and that they had sold on their behalf as brokers to Amarchand Madhoji & Co, their principals, and that the defendant firm disclosed the name of their principals to the plaintiffs; that thereafter the plaintiffs ascertained by enquiries from Amarchand Madhoji & Co. that the defendant firm had without the knowledge and consent of the plaintiffs settled the contract with Amarchand Madhoji & Co. by paying them a difference of Rs. 750 only. It is further alleged that the defendant firm had, upon an untrue allegation that they were themselves the principals under the said contract and by suppressing the fact that they had disclosed the name of Amarchand Madhoji & Co. and who were in fact their principals and also suppressing the fact of the said settlement, submitted a case for arbitration to the Bengal Chamber of Commerce on their own account claiming a sum of Rs. 42,250 as damages for breach of the said contract. The plaintiffs contend that the defendant firm had merely acted as brokers in the transaction and that they are not entitled to make any such claim. The defendant firm alleges that they had at first passed the bought note in respect of the said contract to Amarchand Madhoji & Co., but the latter refused to have anything to do with the plaintiff firm and that thereafter they settled with them; that in fact the names of Amarchand Madhoji had never been disclosed to the plaintiff firm. They also rely upon an allegation that there is a well-known custom in Calcutta by which brokers are held responsible by both buyers and sellers for the performance of such contracts and that the brokers themselve either receive the damages or pay the same.

In this application great reliance is placed upon, amongst others, Fleet v. Murton (1), in which it was held that such evidence of custom in the trade is admissible. Produce Brokers Co. v Olympia Oil & Cake Co. (2) was also referred to, which overruled Hutcheson v. Eaton (3) and North Western Rubber Co and Huttenbach & Co., In re (4). It was held in that case that under a clause in a contract referring to arbitration arising under the contract, it is competent to the arbitrator finally to determine the existence of a custom affecting the rights and obligations of the parties under that contract, where such custom is not inconsistent with the terms of the contract. I think, however, having regard to the character of the suit and the allegations of fraud and misrepresentation made as also as it involves difficult questions of law and custom, it is a fit case for this Court and incompetent for the Chamber, and the arbitration should be stayed. In this connection I may refer to my judgment in Birla & Co. v. *Johurmull Premsook disposed of to-day. Another ground has been taken, whether such a suit is at all maintainable having regard to section 42 of the Specific Relief Act, which corresponds to English Order XXV —5. This is a question which ought to be properly determined as a preliminary issue in the suit.

The Rule is made absolute. Costs of this application costs in the cause.

JUDGMENT.

SANDERSON, C. J.—This is an appeal from the judgment of my learned brother Mr. Justice Chaudhuri by which he made absolute a Rule calling upon the defendants, Joylal & Co., to show cause why an injunction should not be granted restraining them, until the final disposal of the suit or further order of the Court, from further proceeding with the arbitration proceedings in respect of contract No. 13,700, dated the 6th day of December 1917. It appears that on the above-mentioned date the defendants had entered into a contract with the plaintiff. It was in the form of a sold note and was addressed to the plaintiff Gopiram Bhotica and was as follows: "We have this day sold by your order and on your account to our principals 1,50,000 yards Hessian cloths" of a description and quality therein stated. It was signed by the defendants as "Brokers." Delivery was to be January to March 1918, 50,000 yards monthly. The contract contained a clause 12, which ran as follows:

"Any dispute whatsoever arising on or out of this contract shall be referred to arbitration under the rules of the Bengal Chamber of Commerce applicable for the time being for decision, and such decision shall be accepted as final and binding on both parties to the contract."

In January 1918, the plaintiff asked for a delivery order for 50,000 yards. This request was not complied with, and on the 31st of January 1918, Messrs. Khaitan & Co., on behalf of the defendants, tendered Rs. 8,750 as the value of the goods deliverable under the said contract. The goods not having been delivered, on the 12th of February 1918 the defendants sent a difference bill for Rs. 13,625 and demanded payment of that sum. On the 20th of February 1918, the plaintiff wrote the following letter:—

"I am surprised to receive your letter of the 12th instant delivered me late by post, enclosing your difference bill No. 15,571, dated 5th current, for Rs. 13,625 and in reply beg to point out to you that due date price charged therein is not correct. Please amend the due date price as settled with you on the due date at Rs. 37 per 100 yards, and send me back at your earliest convenience for payment and oblige. Your bill is returned herewith."

On the 25th of February 1918, the defendants asked the plaintiff for delivery order for further 50,000 yards cloth. After several letters the plaintiff wrote the letter dated the 6th of March 1918. It is as follows:—"I am in receipt of your letter of 2nd instant, delivered me late by the post office, and in reply I challenge your right of purchasing the goods against me after due date. I regret I cannot entertain your claim." A difference bill was sent and the plaintiff replied on the 16th of March 1918 as follows: "I have no other alternative but to refer you to my letter of 6th current. I deny my liability in the matter." A similar demand for delivery order was made in respect of the March consignment, and upon a difference bill being submitted by the defendants, the plaintiff on the 11th of April 1918 denied his liability. On the 18th of November 1918 the defendants wrote to the Registrar, Tribunal of Arbitration, the Bengal Chamber of Commerce, submiting their statement and requesting the constitution of a Tribunal of Arbitration upon the matters in dispute between the defendants and the plaintiff. On the 18th of December 19.8 the plaint in the suit was filed: in it the plaintiff asked "(a) For a declaration that the defendant firm is not entitled to proceed with the said arbitration or claim any damages under the said contract in which he acted merely as broker; (b) for an injunction to restrain the defendant firm from proceeding with the said arbitration pending before the tribunal of the Bengal Chamber of Commerce." On the same day an application was made by the plaintiff for an interlocutory injunction to restrain the defendants from proceeding with the arbitration. The learned Judge on that day granted a Rule, which, as already stated, was made absolute on the 4th of June 1919.

The learned Judge's decision was based upon certain grounds which were as follows: "I think, however, having regard to the character of the suit and the allegations of fraud and misrepresentation made and also as it involves difficult questions of law and custom, it is a fit case for this Court and incompetent for the Chamber, and the arbitration should be stayed."

On the hearing of this appeal, the learned Counsel for the plaintiff said that he did not support the grounds of the judgment, but he relied upon certain points upon which he argued he could support the judgment. The first was that the arbitration clause was confined to disputes arising between "parties to the contract," which, he contended, means the buyer and seller, and that the defendants, who signed the contract merely as brokers, were not parties to the contract of purchase and sale within the meaning of the clause.

On the other hand, it was contended on behalf of the defendants that there is in Calcutta a well known custom by which brokers in contracts in gunny, Hessian and other manufactured jute goods are held responsible by both buyers and sellers for the performance of the said contracts and that the brokers themselves either receive the damages or pay the same.

The learned Counsel for the plaintiff did not dispute the alleged custom, but he contended that the brokers did not by reason thereof become parties to the contract for all purposes or to such an extent that they could be said to be parties to the contract within the meaning of the arbitration clause. It was argued on behalf of the plaintiff that the question whether the defendants were parties to the contract should be decided by the Court: On the other hand, the defendants contended that this was a question which depended upon the express terms of the contract and the terms which would have to be read into it by reason of the custom, and that it was a question which should be left to the Arbitaration Tribunal for decision.

There was a dispute on a question of fact between the parties as to whether the defendants at the time of presenting the sold note to the plaintiff disclosed the name of their principals, Messrs. Amarchand Madhoji & Co. Upon that question I am not in a position to express any opinion at present: it is a question which will have to be decided by the tribunal which adjudicate upon the dispute. It was further contended on behalf of the plaintiff that if the result of incorporating the alleged custom into the terms of the contract was to make the brokers "a party to the contract" within the meaning of the arbitration clause, it was unreasonable. Another contention on behalf of the plaintiff was that by reason of the institution of the suit, the arbitrators appointed or to be appointed by the Chamber of Commerce were or would be functus officio and that the arbitration proceedings would be futile; and lastly it was argued on behalf of the plaintiff that the Court should exercise its discretion and dismiss the appeal, on the ground that the injunction would be the means of avoiding a multiplicity of proceedings.

The defendants contended that the alleged custom was not unreasonable, and that in any event it was for the Tribunal of Arbitration to ascertain the custom and to decide what incidents are thereby imported into the contract. It was further urged on behalf of the defendants that this Court has no jurisdiction to restrain the arbitration proceedings by injunction, as such proceedings do not constitute an interference with any legal right of the plaintiff; that the alleged grounds, namely, that the defendants were not a "party to the contract" and that the arbitration proceedings consequently would be futile, were not sufficient to give the Court jurisdiction, and that even if the Court had jurisdiction to grant an injunction, there was no ground in this case for the exercise of such jurisdiction. It was then urged on behalf of the plaintiff that the arbitration proceedings might not be futitle because in this country the award, if made against the plaintiff, could be executed as soon as it was filed and before the plaintiff could move the Court to restrain execution, and that this distinguished the case from the English cases based on the English Arbitration Act. I think the judgment of Mr. Justice Rankin in Sardarmull Jessraj's v. Agar Chand Mahata & Co. (5) supplies the answer on this point. The learned Judge says: "I think it is a matter of procedure and not of substance that the party complaining in such a case would have to apply to the Court to have the document taken off the file. I do not think that I ought to start granting interlocutory injunctions upon novel considerations, and attempt to commence a new system as regards interfering with arbitrators in such matters by reason of this difference in practice between the Indian Arbitration Act and the provisions of the English rules."

I do not think that it is necessary in this case for us to decide the question whether the Court has jurisdiction to grant an injunction: for, in my judgment, assuming that the Court has jurisdiction, we ought not now to exercise that jurisdiction. The judgment of the learned Judge having been based on grounds, which the learned Counsel for the plaintiff did not support, it is entirely in the discretion of this Court to grant or refuse an injunction; and, in circumstances of this case in my judgment an interlocutory injunction should not be granted. The suit in this case was obviously instituted for the purpose of preventing the arbitration proceedings: it is not a suit in which all the questions which are in dispute between the plaintiff and the defendants could be decided, e.g., the amount, if any, which is due to the defendants in respect of the contract could not be ascertained in the suit: and, I am not able at the present stage of the proceedings to say that the matters in dispute between the parties are such as should not be submitted to and decided by the Arbitration Tribunal.

(5) 52 Ind. Cas. 588; 23 C. W. N. 811 at p. 814.

For these reasons in my judgment the appeal should be allowed and the interlocutory injunction should be set aside with costs both in this Court and in the Court below.

SECOND CIVIL APPEAL NO. 234 OF 1919.

October 31, 1919.

Present:—Mr. Justice Seshagiri Aiyar and Mr. Justice Moore.

VITTAPPA KUDVA—PLAINTIFF—APPELLANT

versus

DURGAMMA alias SHITHAMMA AND OTHERS—DEFENDANTS NOS. 1, 3 AND 4—RESPONDENTS.

Landlord and tenant—Mulgeni lease—Condition forbidding alienation, breach of—Forfeiture, whether can be relieved against—"Vamshasthas," meaning of—Equity, justice and good conscience, principles of, how to be applied.

Plaintiff granted a mulgeni lease to A, a widow, which contained a condition prohibiting alienation of the property by her. A surrendered a portion of the property to the lessor and subsequently executed a deed of gift of the remainder of the property in favour of B, one of her sons. Plaintiff thereupon brought the present suit for a declaration that the gift was not valid or binding on him, and to recover possession of the property on the ground that A had forfeited her rights under the lease by alienating the property:

Held, that the condition in the lease restraining alienation having been infringed A had forfeited her rights under the lease, and that the forfeiture could not be relieved against. [p. 782, col 2.]

The word "vamshasthas" means descendants in the ordinary course of law. [p. 782, col 2.]

Where it is sought to apply the English principles of justice, equity and good conscience to a case those principles should be applied mutatis mutandis without presuming to deduce a new rule. [p. 783, col. 2.]

Second appeal against the decree of the Court of the Subordinate Judge, South Kanara, in Appeal Suit Nos. 243 and 244 of 1917 (Appeal Suits No. 248 and 273 of 1917 on the file of the District Court), preferred against the decree of the Court of the District Munsif, Karkal, in Original Suit No. 147 of 1916.

FACTS appear from the judgment.

Messrs. B. Sitarama Rou and K. Sitarama Row, for the Appellant.—The breach of the condition against alienation in the Mulgeni lease has worked a forfeiture. The Courts cannot relieve against it. Krishna Shetti v. Gilbert Pinto (1). The rules of English law must be applied. See also Varley v. Coppard(2).

Mr. K. Yegnanarayana Adiga, for the Respondents.—The alienation by the donee was only to a member of the family. The gift was to the defendant and his Vamasthas. That expression includes members of the family. The gift in this case was not only to the mother but also to the children.

The alienation was only partial. It did not comprise the whole of the property gifted to her. The rule in Grove v. Portal (3) applies.

Under section 16 of the Civil Courts Act it is not the very letter of the English law that Courts in this country are bound to follow, but the rules of equity, justice and good conscience must be adapted to the requirements of this country.

JUDGMENT—The suit was brought for a declaration that a gift deed executed by the 1st defendant to 2nd defendant was not valid or binding on plaintiff and to recover possession of the property, on the ground that 1st defendant had forfeited her rights under the Mulgeni lease by alienating the property. The property originally belonged to the husband of the 1st defendant, who sold it to the plaintiff. Plaintiff granted a Mulgeni lease to the 1st defendant in 1881 under Exhibit A. A portion of the property was surrendered by the lessee in 1883 under Exhibit B, and the deed of surrender expressly stipulates for the rest of the property being enjoyed under the conditions in Exhibit A. The condition with which we are concerned relates to the prohibition of the alienation by the lessee of the property. The document recites that the property is granted to 1st defendant and to her Vamsasthas and provides as follows:—

"I and my descendants shall not alienate the said property, etc., on the strength of this Mulgeni. If we alienate the same in contravention of the above provision, the said alienation and also this Mulgeni shall become null and void, and the said property etc., shall revert to your possession." In 1916 1st defendant made a gift of the property under Exhibit I to one of her sons, 2nd defendant. It is not disputed that, by the grant of the Mulgeni lease, the property became the absolute property of the 1st defendant. Under the ordinary Hindu Law her daughters would be the heirs. It is found that the 1st defendant has daughters and a son. Exhibit I states that, as the 1st defendant is unable to manage and as the alienee had agreed to maintain her, she made a gift of the property to one of her sons.

The question in these circumstances is whether this gift works a forfeiture of the rights of the 1st defendant. We are obliged to hold that it does. But for the decision in Krishna Shetti v. Gilbert Pinto (1) we would have imposed conditions and would have relieved against the forfeiture. That decision is a direct authority that where a condition restraining alienation has been infringed, there can be no relief against forfeiture. The Subordinate Judge has held that the gift under Exhibit I did not contravene the provision in Exhibit A because it was made to a member of the family. Although Mr. Adiga endeavoured to support the construction placed on the document by the Subordinate Judge, we are clear that the conclusion of the lower Appellate Court cannot be sustained. The word Vamsasthas in Exhibit A means descendants, that is, persons who would take the property in the usual course of law. It does not refer to the members of the family. The expression indicates an absolute gift of the property like the words "from generation to generation." One other matter relating to the construction of the document may be disposed of before dealing with the principal matter, and that is Mr. Adiga's suggestion that the property was given not only to the 1st defendant, the mother, but also to her children. We are unable to agree with this contention. The word "Vamsasthas" only means descendants in the ordinary course of law. We must, therefore, hold that the property was given absolutely to the 1st defendant: there can be no doubt that she did alienate the property. The learned Vakil for the respondents argued that it was not an alienation of the whole of the property and that consequently this case was covered by the decision in Grove v. Portal (3). The property which was not surrendered by the lady was given to the son in its entirety. The fact that it formed part of the property originally given to her under Exhibit A would not make the alienation one of a part of the property. The decision in Grove v. Portal (3) and the case which it follows, Church v. Brown (4), have no application to this case. Now, the question is whether by the alienation to the son, forfeiture has been incurred. The rule of English law seems to be very clear upon this point. In M'Eacharn v. Colton (5) where the property was leased to A, who transferred it to B and B again re-transferred it to A, it was held that forfeiture was incurred. Lord Macnaghten points out that by the breach of a covenant in the lease, forfeiture was incurred and that the covenant in question applied to a re-assignment to the original lessees. In Varley v. Coppard (2) to which Mr. Sitarama Rao drew our attention, Mr. Justice Willes points out that where the grant was made to two persons and one of them transferred his right to the other, forfeiture was incurred. That is an extreme case. In Corporation of Bristol v. Westcott (6) Jessel, M. R., expressed doubts as to the correctness of this decision. But in Langton v. Henson (7), a later case, the Court of Appeal re-affirmed the decision in Varley v. Coppard (2) and pointed out that the doubt thrown upon it in the dictum in Corporation of Bristol v. Westcott (6) was not good law. There is no Indian case upon the question. The case nearest to the present is the decision of the Calcutta High Court in Dharani Kanta Lahiri v. Siba Sundari Debi (8). In that case the property was given to a daughter to be held by her. She gave it to her adopted son, and the question was whether by the alienation her right was lost and whether the grantor could resume the property. It was pointed out by the learned Judges that the right of resumption was expressly reserved by the grantor for the benefit of the grantee, and, therefore, forfeiture should be enforced. Having regard to the English decisions we have referred to, it seems to us that if the English law is to be applied in this country, then the forfeiture clause must be enforced and the plaintiff should be given a decree. It was argued by Mr. Adiga that when the Legislature of this country in section 16 of the Civil Courts Act and in other provisions of law speaks of the rules of equity, justice and good conscience, it is not the letter of the English law that should be imported but some deduction which the Courts can make out of the rules of English law. We are unable to agree with the learned Vakil upon this point. If there is no provision in the Legislature of this country and if we are to apply the principles of justice, equity and good conscience, we are not at liberty to whittle away the force of the rules of English law as proposed by eminent Judges and substitute for it something which, in our opinion, should be regarded as a rule of equity in this country. We think that if the rules of English law afford any ground for the application of the principles of equity, justice and conscience, that should be applied mutatis mutandis, without presuming to deduce a new rule from it. In this view we are obliged to hold that by Exhibit I, 1st defendant has forfeited her right to the property and that the plaintiff is entitled to recover it from her and from her alienee.

Plaintiff will get a decree for possession and for rent and for mesne profits at the rate provided in Exhibit A read with Exhibit B. He is not entitled to any compensation. Compensation will be given to 3rd defendant at the rate agreed upon by the Vakils in this Court, Rs. 126. Each party will bear his own costs throughout.

Hindu Law—Endowment for worship of family deity—Shebait, appointment of, by founder—Dedicated properties, whether vest in deity or shebait—Right of appointment of shebait.

Where a testator dedicates his immoveable properties to the worship of his ancestral deity, and appoints a shebait of the endowment so created, the dedication of the properties is to the deity and not to the shebait. Consequently the title to the properties so endowed vests in the deity, and where such an endowment is of a recent date, the right of appointment to the office of shebait is vested in the founder or, in the absence of express provision to the contrary, his representatives. [p. 784, col. 2; p. 785, cols. 1 & 2.]

Appeal from the decision of the Subordinate Judge, 4th Court of 24-Parganas, dated the 23rd June 1115.

Babu Shibaprasanna Bhattacharyya, for the Appellants.

Babu Amulya Kumar Bhattacharjee (with him Babu Jogendra Narain Majumdar), for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This is an appeal by the representatives of the 3rd defendant in a suit instituted by the plaintiff for establishment of his right as Shebait to five shrines and for recovery of dedicated properties appurtenant thereto. There is also a claim for the recovery of the personal properties of the deceased Mohunt. There were three defendants in the suit. The first is a nominee of the late Mohunt; the other two are the representatives of the founder of one of the shrines, namely, the shrine of Lakhshmi Janardan Jew Thakur. In the Court below, the plaintiff entered into a compromise with the 1st defendant in respect of four of these shrines and a consent decree was made in his favour. There was, however, a contest between the plaintiff and the other defendants in respect of the fifth shrine and a decree has been made in favour of the plaintiff. On the present appeal, the controversy has been limited to the Shebaitship of the properties of this shrine alone. There are really two points for consideration; namely, first, what is the nature of the endowment created by Gopal Chandra Majumdar on the 20th January 1890; and secondly, what is the precise nature of the office of Shebait in relation to that endowment? The answer to these questions depends upon the construction of the Will of the founder.

The testator states in the first place that his ancestral deity was Lakshmi Janardan Salgram in his family dwelling house. He dedicates to the worship of the deity Lakshmi Janardan Salgram all his immoveable properties. He then proceeds to appoint a Shebait of the endowment so created. It is stated in the first place that Sarajudas Mohunt Babaji has been performing the acts of worship of the deity and that the testator now appoints him to be the Shebait in future of the said deity. He then proceeds to define the powers of the Shebait. The Shebait is to enjoy and hold possesion of the properties, to manage and protect them, to make collections of profits and to pay them as also to pay revenue to the Collectorate. Upon these terms he is confirmed as Shebait.

It is clear that the dedication of the properties is to the deity and not to the Shebait. This is the plain meaning of the language used. But it is made clear beyond doubt by a sentence in the second paragraph of the Will, where provision is made for the maintenance of a lady Umasundari Debi; it is stated that the abovenamed Umasundari Debi is to be maintained from the "properties of the said deity," that is, out of the income of the properties dedicated to the deity. Consequently as regards the title to the properties there is no room for controversy. The title is vested in the ancestral family deity of the founder.

As regards the nature of the Shebaitship, the Subordinate Judge, in several places in his judgment, has spoken of 'Shebait Kaem.' He has evidently misread the Will. The original expression is shebaitrupe kaem rahilen, which is accurately translated by the Court translator by the phrase "he is confirmed as a Shebait." This signified that before the Will was executed, Sarajudas Mohunt had been temporarily employed by the proprietor to perform the Sheba; and now that an endowment was created, he was permanently confirmed as the Shebait. His position thus was that of a Shebait who was to hold the properties and to manage them for the benefit of the worship of the idol.

The devolution of the office of Shebait next requires consideration. The appellant has argued that the founder has made no express provision for that purpose: and that as the endowment is of a quite recent date, affording no time for the growth of a usage or a custom, the right of appointment to the office of Shebait is according to the authorities vested in the founder or his representatives. This contention is supported by the decisions in Sital Das Babaji v. Fertop Chunder Sorma (1), Kunjamani Dasi v. Nikun a Behary Das (2), which reviewed the earlier decisions on the subject. The same view is accepted as the well-settled rule by the Judicial Committe in the case of Sethuramaswamiar v. Meruswamiar (3). We may observe parenthetically that there is apparently a misprint in the judgment where the word 'grantee' is used instead of the word "grantor" This is obvious from the earlier decision mentioned in the judgment in Ramanathan Chetty v. Murugappa Chetty (4), which was confirmed by the Judicial Committee in Ramanathan Chetti v. Murugappa Chetti (5).

It is not necessary for us to consider whether the 2nd and the 3rd defendants are the representatives of the founder. Although, on the evidence, we are not inclined to adopt the view taken by the Subordindte Judge, yet it is needless to decide this question, for the reason that it is not the case of the plaintiff that he has been appointed Shebait by the representatives of the original founder, whoever these persons may be His contention is that he has succeeded his Guru as Chela and that he has been nominated a Shebait in respect of the other shrines. That undoubtedly does not constitute him the Shebait in respect of the shrine in suit. Even if we assume for a moment that the right of nomination to the office of Shebait was vested in the first Shebait, it is plain that the plaintiff has no title. If the right of nomination was vested in the first Shebait, that right has been exercised in favour of the 1st defendant and not the plaintiff. This is clear from the Will of Sarajudas Mohunt, which was executed by him on the 28th February 1903. In the course of the argument addressed to us on behalf of the respondent, it was faintly contended that the right of nomination was invalidly exercised. It was suggested, first, that so long as there was a Chela, the Mohunt had no right to make an appointment to the office of Shebait and secondly, that even if the Mohunt was at liberty to make the appointment, his choice was restricted to persons of his own sect. But there is no evidence in support of these propositions. On the other hand, the statement of Sarajudas Mohunt, the Guru of the plaintiff, completely negatives this assertion. Sarajudas Mohunt stated he had succeeded, not as Chela, but on the strength of the nomination made by the Guru; and also gave another instance where a similar succession had taken place, namely, in the case of Mohunt Ajodhya Das. In the next place, his Guru states that he made a nomination in favour of the 1st defendant in respect of the disputed shrine and its properties, because the idol was that of a house-holder and that with regard to an idol so established it was necessary that the Shebait should be a house-holder. In the face of these assertions, it is impossible for us to attach any weight to the argument that the act of the Mohunt was ultra vires. As we have said, however, it is not necessary for us to go into this part of the case, because, in our opinion, upon the construction of the Will of the founder, it is plain that there was no dedication in favour of the plaintiff and that the first Mohunt had no right to appoint his successors. Consequently, the right of appointment was vested in the founder's family. As the plaintiff does not claim to have been appointed Shebait by the founder or his representatives, at the date of the institution of the suit he had no enforceable title.

The result is that this appeal is allowed, and the decree of the Subordinate Judge set aside in respect of the disputed shrine; in other words, the decree will stand, only in so far as it was made by consent between the plaintiff and the 1st defendant. The plaintiff will pay the costs of the defendants both here and in the Court below.

We desire to add one observation as regards the mode in which examination of witnesses on commission was conducted. One of the witnesses—a man of 99 years of age—was harassed by questions in a manner which constituted an abuse of the privileges of the cross-examining Pleader; and we hope that a repetition of this incident will never occur. We assess the Learning-fee in this Court at Rs. 200.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), s. 115, O. VII, r. 11—Interlocutory order—Revision—Remedy, other, open—High Court, interference by—Order rejecting plaint, whether open to revision.

A High Court will not interfere, under section 115 of the Civil Procedure Code, with an interlocutory order when there is another remedy open to the party and no irremediable harm will be suffered by the interlocutory order.

An order rejecting a plaint, being appealable, is not open to revision by a High Court.

Application against the order, dated the 10th December 1918, passed by the 2nd Sub-Judge, Patna, in Title Suit No. 449 of 1917.

Messrs. Rajendra Prasad and Shiveswar Dayal, for the Petitioners.

Mr. Gangadhar Das, for the Opposite Party.

JUDGMENT.—Having regard to the decision in Chandramani Koer v. Basdeo Narain Singh (1), it is apparent that an appeal will lie against an order made rejecting the plaint in this case. We see no reason, therefore, to interfere at this stage. It may be that in Bankey Behari v. Ram Bahadur (2) a Divisional Bench of this Court interfered with an interlocutory order of this description, but generally the cursus curiæ of the Calcutta High Court and of this Court has always been not to take action under section 115, when there is another course open and no irremediable harm can be suffered by the interlocutory order. The learned Subordinate Judge will no doubt give the necessary extension of time for the filing of the deficit Court-fee.

The application for revision is, therefore, rejected.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), s. 95—Attachment before judgment—Damages, separate suit for, whether barred—Limitation Act (IX of 1908), Sch. I, Arts. 29, 36, applicability of.

A claim for compensation for wrongful attachment of property before judgment, made in a counter-affidavit disputing the propriety of the attachment, and, therefore, at a stage at which the Court was not called on to deal with it and could not legally have done so, is no bar to a separate suit for damages. Section 95 of the Civil Procedure Code operates as a bar to such a suit if the claim is made at the stage at which either of the conditions postulated by the section has been fulfilled, but not otherwise. [p. 789, col. 2.]

A suit for damages on account of injury to stock caused by making an attachment before judgment must be brought within the period prescribed by Article 36 of Schedule I to the Limitation Act. [p. 790, col. 1.]

The period of limitation applicable to a suit for damages on account of the sale of goods, attached before judgment, at a low price and injury to trade and reputation consequent on the attachment itself is contained in Article 29 of Schedule I to the Limitation Act. [p. 790, col. 1.]

Appeal against the order of remand of the District Court, Trichinopoly, dated the 1st of November 1918, in Appeal Suit No. 554 of 1917, preferred against the decree of the Court of the District Munsif, Ariyalur, in Original Suit No. 76 of 1917.

FACTS.—Suit for compensation for wrongful attachment. The first Court dismissed the suit as barred under Article 29, Limitation Act, 1908. The lower Appellate Court took a contrary view and remanded the suit. The present appeal was against the order of remand

This appeal coming on for hearing on the 2nd and 4th of April 1919, the Court delivered the following

JUDGMENT.—In this Court the appeal has been based, inter alia, on the ground that in view of the result of plaintiff's claim to damages in prior proceedings the suit, whether in time or not, must fail. Unfortunately the appeal was not resisted in the lower Appellate Court on this ground. But that is no obstacle to its being taken here. We propose to deal with it at once and, therefore, call on the lower Appellate Court to submit a finding on the evidence on record on the second issue framed by the District Munsif.

Finding will be returned within one month after the re opening of the lower Appellate Court. Seven days are allowed for filing objections.

In compliance with the order contained in the above judgment, the District Judge of Trichinopoly submitted the following

FINDING.—This Court has been asked to submit a finding on the 2nd issue framed in the Court of first instance, viz.: "Is the suit barred by res judicata on account of the order in I. A. No. 18 of 1915 in Original Suit No. 558 of 1914 on the file of the District Munsif's Court of Madura?"

2. The District Munsif that framed the issue himself points out that this issue is not correctly framed, that there is no question of res judicata in the case and that the issue ought to be amended into "Whether the suit is barred by reason of the provisions of section 95 of the Code of Civil Procedure." The defendant-respondent (now appellant in the High Court) instituted as against the plaintiff-appellant (now respondent in the High Court) Original Suit No. 558 of 1914 on the file of the District Munsif's Court of Madura and attached before judgment in that suit the moveable properties in the shop of the plaintiff-appellant. The plaintiff-appellant in his counter-affidavit as against that petition for attachment before judgment stated that the said attachment before judgment was taken out with a view to put him to disgrace and loss and that it is but just and necessary to dismiss that petition for attachment before judgment and to order payment of compensation to him to the extent of Rs. 1,000 from out of the amount then in deposit in the Court in connection with that suit. Beyond this statement in the affidavit, the plaintiff-appellant presented no application under section 95 of the Code of Civil Procedure for the award of any compensation to him, in case it appeared to that Court that the attachment before judgment was applied for on insufficient grounds, or in case the suit of the defendant-respondent failed and it appeared to the Court that there was no reasonable or probable ground for instituting such a suit. On the petition for attachment before judgment, the District Munsif of Madura passed the only order that the order of attachment is made absolute. He did not, however, say whether any compensation is awarded or not. It is on these facts that the present plea of res judicata or plea under section 95, Civil Procedure Code, in bar of the present suit is attempted to be put forward.

3. The learned Vakil for the defendant-respondent argued on the 1st sentence in the judgment of the High Court that the High Court has held that in view of the result of the plaintiff's claim to damages in the prior proceedings in the District

Munsif's Court of Madura, this suit, whether in time or not, must fail, and that this Court is precluded from holding to the contrary. This argument is as ingenious as it is absurd. The learned Vakil himself was unable to explain why the High Court called for a finding on the issue in case the High Court has decided that, in view of the result of the plaintiff's claim to damages in the prior proceedings, this suit, whether in time or not, must fail. It is clear that in the opening sentence of the judgment of the High Court, their Lordships were only stating the contention of the defendant appellant before them and were not stating their decision on the issue sent down for finding to this Court.

4 In Original Suit No 558 of 1914 on the file of the District Munsif's Court of Madura, there was no application by the defendant therein, who is now the plaintiff-appellant in this Court, under section 95 of the Code of Civil Procedure. A mere statement in a counter affidavit cannot amount to an application under the Code of Civil Procedure. It is only a regular application under section 95, clause (1), of the Code of Civil Procedure that will give jurisdiction to the Court to pass an order determining such application so as to bar any suit for compensation in respect of the attachment before judgment, In the case reported as Subraya Dasay v. Venkatarama Aiyar (1) relied on by the learned Vakil for the defendant respondent, there was a regular counter-petition praying for the award of compensation, even though there was no further application for the award of compensation. There is no such counter petition in this case.

5. It was again contended for the defendant-respondent that under the Civil Procedure Code of 1882 an order awarding compensation was alone a bar to a subsequent suit for compensation in respect of attachment before judgment, that under the present Code any order determining any application under section 95, Civil Procedure Code, was a bar to any suit for compensation in respect of attachment before judgment, that even in cases in which the compensation was refused, the present Civil Procedure Code barred any subsequent suit for compensation in respect of attachment before judgment by enacting "that any order determining any such applications shall bar any suit for compensation," that an order under section 95, Civil Procedure Code, whether awarding compensation or not, was made appealable under section 104 of the Civil Procedure Code and became final in the absence of an appeal, that the order in this case making the attachment absolute after the perusal of the counter-affidavit, in which the objections to the attachment before judgment were taken and a claim for compensation in respect of it made as being just and necessary, is an order refusing compensation under section 95 of the Civil Procedure Code and that such an order, not having been appealed against, became final as between the parties and operates in bar of the present suit for compensation in respect of that attachment before judgment. I am unable to follow this argument or to see how the change of wording from the old Code to the new has anything to do with the decision of the question now before the Court. The argument omits to take note of the fundamental requisite for an order under clause 2 of section 95 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which alone can bar any suit for compensation in the shape of an application for the award of compensation under section 95, clause 1 of the Civil Procedure Code. Without an application by the defendant for compensation under section 95, clause 1 of the Civil Procedure Code, the Court cannot determine any question of such an application. As there was no such application in this case, an order of Court passed on the application for attachment before judgment cannot by itself amount to any determination of the claim for compensation or even a determination of the question of the attachment having been applied for on sufficient or insufficient grounds or of the question as to whether the suit failed and there was no reasonable or probable ground for instituting it. As a matter of practice the Courts in the Muffasal do not consider the request for compensation contained in counter affidavits without a regular petition for the same, and do not determine even the question whether the attachments before judgment were applied for on sufficient or insufficient grounds when making an order confirming an attachment before judgment usually issued ex parte without notice to the defendant. The question whether the plaintiff-appellant was entitled to any compensation or not would not have been even present to the mind of the District Munsif in this case. The order made by him cannot, therefore, amount to a refusal to grant the compensation claimed in the counter-affidavit. It is not unusual to find orders by the Muffassal Courts to the effect that the attachment is made absolute and that the defendant may apply for compensation if he is so advised.

6. I have, therefore, no hesitation in agreeing with the District Munsif and in finding that the order making the attachment absolute in Original Suit No 553 of 1914 on the file of the District Munsif's Court of Madura does not operate in any manner as a bar to this suit either under section 95 of the Code of Civil Procedure or by any rule of res judicata.

This second appeal came on for hearing on the 10th of December 1919, after the return of the finding of the lower Appellate Court upon the issue referred to by this Court for trial.

Mr. C. V. Ananthakrishna Aiyar, for the Appellant.—The suit is clearly barred. Article 29 of the Limitation Act applies: see Multan Chand Kanyalal v. Bank of Madras (2). Damaraju Narasimha Rao v. Tadinada Gangaraju (3) adopts the same view. Manavikraman v. Avisilan Koya (4) takes a different view. But see Murugesa Mudaliar v. Jotiram Davy (5). Article 29 applies to all cases of wrongful seizure generally. The Calcutta view is also the same: Madras Steam Navigation Co. Ltd. v. Shalimar Works Ltd. (6). See also Ramaswamy Iyengar v. Venkatatanjeri Chetty (7).

[SESHAGIRI AIYAR, J., referred to Koteuri Basivireddi v. Nidumoori Ramayya (8).]

Secondly, the order on the application for compensation is conclusive and no suit lies. See section 95. Under the old Code, the words were "an award of compensation." The present words are "an order determining such application," which may be granted or dismissed.

Mr. P. Nagabhushanam, for the Respondent.—The relief claimed does not fall within the scope of Article 29. The wrong complained of arose by the institution of a suit and not merely by the wrongful attachment.

OLDFIELD, J.—What is the damage that you sustained? Your case is that the suit is malicious.]

Yes.

Mr. C. V. Ananthakrishna Aiyar, in reply.—No suit lies for compensation in such a case in the absence of an undertaking to pay compensation. See Arbut Mir v. Baldeo Ahir (9), Quartz Hill Consolidated Gold Mining Co v Eyre (10), Clerk and Lindsell on Torts, page 601; Salmond on Torts, 477. See also Mohini Mohan Miser v. Surendra Narain Singh (11), Bishun Singh v. Wyatt (12). It is difficult to say whether even proof of actual damage will suffice.

In the present case, section 95, Civil Procedure Code, concludes the matter. The order passed on the application for compensation is conclusive.

[SESHAGIRI AIYAR, J.—The evidence does not show that the order was passed on all the matters in suit.]

JUDGMENT.—We accept the finding that plaintiff's claim to damages in the prior proceedings does not disable him from suing. It is a sufficient reason for doing so that the claim was not made, as section 95, Civil Procedure Code, requires, at the stage at which either of the conditions postulated by that section had been fulfilled, but in an anomalous manner not contemplated by law in an application at the close of plaintiff's counter affidavit disputing the propriety of the attachment before judgment and therefore, at a stage at which the Court was not called on to deal with it and could not legally have done so.

The appeal is then argued with reference to limitation, plaintiff contending for the application of Article 36 or 49, Schedule I, Limitation Act, and defendant for Article 29. In the lower Courts it does not seem to have been noticed that damages were claimed under two headings, firstly, on account of injury to plaintiff's stock in trade caused by the persons who made the attachment before judgment treading on it, and, secondly, on account of the sale of the goods attached by the Court at a low price and the injury to his trade and reputation consequent on the attachment itself. The former cause of action is clearly covered by Article 36 and only the latter calls for further discussion. Article 49 may be dismissed from consideration at once, since this portion of the suit is not for specific moveable property or compensation for its conversion or for injury to it inflicted by the defendant.

The foundation of the claim is in fact that defendant procured a seizure of the property under a perfectly legal process, but by misrepresentations to the Court; and the question is whether this seizure should be regarded as wrongful, because it was obtained by misrepresentation, and Article 29 should be applied, or whether the misrepresentation should be regarded as the tort complained of with reference to Article 36, Article 29 being restricted to cases in which the seizure is intrinsically wrongful, as for instance when it is made without jurisdiction. The lower Appellate Court has taken the former view, relying on Manavikraman v. Avisilan Koya (4), and that case has never been overruled and was distinguished in the first of the series of cases relied on by defendant on the ground indicated above. In each of these cases, Murugesa Mudaliar v. Jattaram Dary (5), Multan Chand Kanyalal v. Bank of Madras (2), Damaraju Narasimha Rao v. Thadinada Gangaraju (3), Pandiri Veeramma v. Mandavili Subba Rao (13) and Ram Narain v. Umrao Singh (14), the plaintiff, whose property was in question, was a stranger to the proceedings, in which the legal process had issued, and, if they contain some expressions consistent with the present defendant's contention, that may be because the argument did not relate to it, but to other points, such as the meaning of "seizure" or the date on which the cause of action under Article 29 arose. Reference has also been made to Madras Steam Navigation Co. Ltd. v. Shalimar Works Ltd. (6), but the portion of the judgment dealing with limitation was obiter and proceeded, it is to be presumed, on the plaint allegation that the seizure was made without jurisdiction. In these circumstances there is no reason for regarding the authority of Manavikraman v. Avisilan Koya (4) as impaired or for dissent from the lower Appellate Court's decision.

The appeal against order is dismissed, except as regards the claim to damages on account of injury to plaintiff's stock in trade in the course of the attachment. As regards it the appeal is allowed, the decision of the lower Courts being set aside and the suit being remanded to the District Munsif for re admission and disposal with reference to this part of the claim in the light of the foregoing. The District Munsif will provide for costs in all Courts, which should follow the result of each part of the claim, in his decree.

Although there is a presumption under section 50 (2) of the Bengal Tenancy Act arising from the payment of rent at the same rate for more than 20 years in favour of a tenant against enhancement, yet in the presence of a kabuliyat executed by the predecessor-in-interest of the tenant stipulating for the payment of enhanced rent, the rent is enhanceable, the kabuliyat being considered either as a new contract under which the tenant agreed to pay enhanced rent or as a contract containing recitals of the incidents of the tenancy which was in existence from before.

Appeal against the decree of the Special Judge, Faridpur, dated the 15th December 1914, reversing that of the Assistant Settlement Officer, Faridpur, dated the 13th July 1914.

Babu Amarendra Nath Bose for the Appellants.

Babu Priya Sankar Majumdar, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—Defendants Nos. 1 and 3, who purchased the tenure in suit from defendant No. 4, appear to have paid rent for about 37 years and the rent was accepted from them. Plaintiff, therefore, is not entitled to obtain khas possession of the tenure as his right to do so is barred by limitation. That being so, the plaintiff cannot ignore the right of defendants Nos. 1 and 3 who were entered in the Record of Rights as tenants. We do not see, however, why the plaintiff should not get a decree for rent at the enhanced rate of Rs. 90 odd. It is true there is a presumption under section 50 (2) of the Bengal Tenancy Act arising from the payment of rent at the same rate for more than twenty years; but the plaintiff has produced a Kabuliyat of the year 1840, executed by the predecessor-in-interest of the defendant No. 4—the vendor of defendants Nos. 1 and 3. There is an express stipulation in the Kabuliyat that the tenants would pay enhanced rent according to the Pargana rate. The Kabuliyat may be considered either as a new contract under which the tenants agreed to pay enhanced rent, or as a contract containing recitals of the incidents of the tenancy which was in existence from before. In either view of the matter it shows that the rent was enhanceable. That being so, the enhancement allowed by the Court of first instance will stand; and to that extent only the decree of the Court of first instance is varied.

The result is that the decree of the lower Appellate Court is set aside and the decree of the Court of first instance affirmed with respect to the amount of rent payable by the defendants. The entry of the names of defendants Nos. 1 and 3 in the Record of Rights will stand. Under the circumstances of the case, we direct that each party do bear its own costs in all the Courts.

Transfer of Property Act (IV of 1882), s. 55—Sale—Title-deeds, delivery of—Purchaser, right of, to obtain title-deeds—Conveyance, tender of, whether necessary.

Under section 55 of the Transfer of Property Act a purchaser is bound to tender a conveyance to the vendor for execution and until such tender is made or waived, the purchaser has no right to obtain the title-deeds as the accompaniment of the transferred title. [p. 792, col. 1.]

Appeal from a judgment and decree of the Additional Judge of the Judicial Commissioner's Court, Upper Burma, dated the 8th March 1917, reversing a judgment and decree of the District Judge, Magwe, dated the 23rd September 1913.

FACTS appear from the judgment.

Sir W. Garth, K. C., for the Appellants.—Section 55 of the Transfer of Property Act, 1882, imposes a duty on the purchaser to tender a conveyance to the vendor for execution. Until that is done, the purchaser has no right to obtain the title-deeds. There is no evidence here that such a tender was made by the purchaser or that the vendor waived such performance. At any rate the purchaser cannot claim the title-deeds until he has paid the price, and the vendor would be justified in refusing to hand over the deeds until payment. The giving of promissory note cannot by itself amount to payment.

MA HNIT v. MAUNG PO PIN.

Sir Erle Richards (with him Mr. J. M. Parikh), for the Respondent.—The promissory note is security for payment. On a true construction of the contract the appellant should have transferred the well. As he did not do so, there was a continuous breach. Thus there was no consideration for the promissory note. There are concurrent findings of fact that the title-deeds were refused.

Mr. Parikh, followed.

Sir W. Garth was not heard in reply.

JUDGMENT.

VISCOUNT HALDANE.—On the 20th October 191 U Lu Gale, the father of the appellants, who sue as his legal representatives, entered into a written agreement to sell an oil well in Upper Burma to the respondent for Rs. 45,000, of which Rs. 10,000 were to be paid when the agreement was executed, and the balance of Rs. 35,000 within 45 days. The purchaser was to execute a deed of sale, and the vendor was also to execute and to register the deed. On the 4th December following the purchaser gave a promissory note for Rs. 35,000, the balance of rupees, with interest at one rupee per cent. per month till payment, and the vendor signed a receipt acknowledging receipt of the price in full. The purchaser later on, on the 10th November 1910, signed another promissory note in favour of the appellants, the vendor having died just before, by which he promised to pay them Rs. 1,050, with interest also at the rate of one rupee per cent. per month. This sum represented interest unpaid under the first promissory note. The respondent afterwards paid interest for five months to the appellants, and since then he has paid nothing.

The action out of which this appeal arises was brought by the appellants against the respondent to recover the sums due under the two promissory notes with interest, the total amount claimed being Rs. 42,849-8-0. The question which now arises is whether the respondent can decline to pay this, on the ground that he has been prevented from obtaining possession of the title-deeds to the well, because U Lu Gale refused to hand them over until the money due under the first note was paid. From the evidence and the findings of fact in the Courts below it appears that the purchaser did, while the money so due remained unpaid, try to get the title-deeds from the vendor in order that he might effect a re-sale. The vender objected to hand them over, the purchase not having been completed. It does not appear that the purchaser at any time tendered a conveyance, which is the preliminary to registration.

The Judge of the District Court, who tried the case, held that the vendor was within his rights in thus refusing to hand over the title-deeds, and gave judgment for the appellants. This judgment was reversed by the Judge who heard the appeal to the Court of the Judicial Commissioner of Upper Burma. He took the view that the promissory note of the 4th December 1909, followed by the receipt already referred to, effected a novation and put the purchaser in the same position as if he had actually paid the full price. He was, therefore, entitled to claim the title deeds. He accordingly held that the contract had been broken by the vendor, and that it was at an end, with the result that there had been failure of the consideration for which the promissory notes were given: and that they could not be enforced.

With this conclusion their Lordships find themselves unable to agree. There was no defence to the action for the amount due under the notes, unless the purchaser could establish a counter claim to set aside the main contract on the ground that the vendor had broken it by refusing to hand over the deeds. But the duty of the purchaser, having regard to the analogy of what is laid down by section 55 of the Indian Transfer of Property Act, 1882, which is treated as defining what ought to be the practice in Upper Burma, was to tender a conveyance, and he would then, and not before such a tender was either made or waived, have the right to the deeds as the accompaniment of the transferred title. There is no evidence that the purchaser in this case ever tendered any conveyance or asked for a change in the register. Probably all he thought of was how, at a time when oil wells were fetching a higher price than they did later on, to get deeds which would show a possible purchaser from himself that he had an actual title to a well. Whether the Judge of appeal was right in treating the receipt, given on the 4th December 1909 with the first promissory note in exchange for which it was signed, as having effected a novation, is a question which may require consideration. But even if it were answered affirmatively, it is far from clear that the purchaser could have counter-claimed against the vendor for rescission, without being ready to pay the amount due under the note. It is, however, enough for the decision of this appeal to say that their Lordships agree with the Judge of first instance that there was no right to obtain the deeds without first tendering a conveyance.

Their Lordships do not attach importance to the suggestion that the appellants are not strictly shown to be the legal representatives of the vendor. Any difficulty in this respect could obviously be cured by amendment, and the learned Counsel for the respondent have wisely abstained from pressing a point which could only add to the cost of this litigation.

The only other observation which their Lordships desire to make is that there appears to have been much delay in disposing of the appeal to the Court of the Judicial Commissioner. The judgment of the District Judge was given on the 23rd September 1913. The case was not heard in the Court of Appeal until the 8th March 1917, although the appeal to that Court was presented on the 24th November 1913. The diary of the Court of the Judicial Commissioner discloses a series of postponements, some of which were due to the apparent inability of the Court to sit for the hearing of the case. Their Lordships think that so great a delay in disposing of the appeal should have been avoided if possible.

They will humbly advise His Majesty that the judgment of the Court of the Judicial Commissioner should be reversed and that of the District Judge restored. The respondent will pay the costs of this appeal, and of the appeal to the Court of the Judicial Commissioner.

Contract Act (IX of 1872), s. 11—Minor, contract by, whether void or merely voidable—Capacity to contract—Counter-claim, whether can be preferred by person not party to suit—Procedure.

Under the Contract Act, where a minor purports to contract his alleged contract is void and not merely voidable: he is a person who is not competent to contract. [p 797, col. 2]

A counter claim in a suit can only be made by a person who is a defendant to the suit. [p. 797, col. 2.]

Appeal from a decree of the Judicial Commissioner's Court, Upper Burma, affirming a decree of the District Court, Magwe.

FACTS of the case will appear from their Lordships' judgment. The appellants sued Ali Hashim Meter and Fatima Bibi on a promissory note purporting to be signed by (a) Fatima Bibi as guardian for Ali Hashim Meter, (b) Ahmed Madari. The promissory note was alleged in the plaint to have been given as part payment of the price of an oil well. Ahmed Madari counterclaimed for money already paid for this oil well, alleging that the plaintiffs had failed to convey it as promised. The trial Judge dismissed the suit on the ground of failure to convey and consequent want of consideration for the pro note; he decreed the counter claim. An appeal to the Judicial Commissioner of Upper Burma was dismissed. Hence the present appeal.

Sir W. Garth K. C. and Mr. J. K. Ray, for the Appellants, submitted that the appellants were not to blame for the failure to convey. The duty of the purchaser, having regard to the analogy of section 55 of the Transfer of Property Act, 1882, which is treated as defining what ought to be the practice in Upper Burma, was to tender a conveyance.

Ma Hnit v. Maung Po Pu (1).

(1) 55 Ind. Cas. 791; 11 L. W. 253; 3 31 C. L. J. 87; (1920) M. W. N. 176; 2 U. P. L. R. (P. C.) 43; 27 M. L. T. 139 (P. C.).

They have not done this, and till they have so done there was no duty to convey. For the same reason the counter-claim must fail. The proceedings were irregular and as Madari was not a party, his counter-claim could not in any event succeed; but we submit he should pay the costs; he has accepted the position and must be dealt with on that footing.

Mr. Kenworthy Brown, for the Respondents. —The action must fail. The signatures were admittedly made by Madari. He says he holds Fatima Bibi's power-of attorney, but the power is not proved. Anyhow, Fatima's signature was as guardian, and it was not within the power of a guardian to pledge the credit of the infant.

As to our failure to tender a conveyance, it would be farcical to tender one to a man who has no title and cannot convey.

[SIR JOHN EDGE.—The fact of the well being in another man's name is no proof whatever that Po Ya had no title.]

[LORD PHILLIMORE.—You have to ask him to get in the title: you haven't done so. You never gave notice.]

[SIR JOHN EDGE.—If a vendor refuses to convey that is another thing.]

The counter claim is provided for by Order VIII, rule 6. The objection now raised is met by section 99 of the Civil Procedure Code, 1908. Our attention has never before been directed to this point, there might be fresh evidence which would dispose of it.

[SIR JOHN EDGE.—Is this a set off or a counter-claim?]

A counter-claim.

[SIR JOHN EDGE.—There is no section in the Civil Procedure Code which authorises such a counter-claim. Your claim has been put forward in an illegal way—a way not authorised by law.]

Then I submit that all the proceedings on the counter-claim should be set aside. It is possible that further proceedings might be taken on it successfully. The various questions which have been half argued should be left open.

As to costs, I submit the course taken in the Courts below should be considered. The infants anyhow have a right to costs.

Sir W. Garth, in reply.—I cannot contend that the suit as it stands was rightly framed, Madari was allowed to put in his counter-claim and deposed that he was the only person responsible.

[LORD PHILLIMORE.—The minor could not make the pro-note: the woman didn't make it.]

These points were not taken in the Courts below. Both parties are in fault, and the suit and counter claim must both go; but anyhow we are entitled to costs against Madari.

[MR. AMEER ALI.—But he was not a party.]

JUDGMENT.

SIR JOHN EDGE.—This is an appeal from a decree, dated the 16th August 1916, of the Additional Judge of the Court of the Judicial Commissioner, Upper Burma, which affirmed a decree, dated the 10th August 1912, of the Additional Judge of the District Court of Magwa. Maung Po Ya and his wife Ma Hnit were originally the plaintiffs in the suit in which this appeal arises. Maung Po Ya has died, and Ma Hnit on her own behalf and as his legal representative has brought this appeal.

Maung Po Ya on the 24th March 1909, by an agreement in writing, contracted to sell to Hamed Ebrahim Madari an oil well No. 2076, at Natsin Quarter, Twingon, for Rs. 40,000, of which Rs. 5,000 were paid as earnest money, Rs. 15,000 were to be paid at the expiration of 45 days from the date of the agreement, and at the expiration of such 45 days for the balance of Rs. 20,000 and interest thereon, Madari was to re mortgage for a term of six months to Po Ya two oil wells as security. The earnest money and the Rs. 15,000 were paid by Madari to Po Ya, and it was subsequently arranged between the parties that instead of the mortgage Madari should give to Po Ya a promissory note for Rs. 20,000 and interest thereon. In pursuance of that arrangement, Madari on the 7th May 1909 gave to Po Ya and Ma Hnit the following promissory note: —

"Yenangyaung.

"The 7th May, 1909.

"The 4th Waning of Kason, 1271.

"Rs. 20,000.

"On demand we the undersigned Ali Hashim Meter and guardian, Fatima Bibi, do hereby promise to pay to Twinza Ko Po Ya and Ma Hnit or order the sum of

Rs. 20,000 (twenty thousand) with interest at Re. 1 per cent. per mensem.

"Fatima Bibi,
"Guardian of Ali Hashim Meter
"Ahmad Madari."

It is stated in the appellants' case, and may possibly be the fact, that Maung Po Ya and his wife Ma Hnit were the owners of the oil well, but if they were, their legal title to the well was incomplete until after this suit had been instituted. Fatima Bibi, who is one of the respondents to this appeal, is the wife of Hamed Ebrahim Madari, and is stated in the respondents' case to have been a minor at the date of the note Ali Hashim Meter is a nephew of Hamed Ebrahim Madari, and was a minor at the date of the promissory note. He is represented in this appeal by Hashim Ebrahim Meter, who is described as the guardian of Ali Hashim Meter, but their Lordships do not know whether or not Hashim Ebrahim Meter is the legally appointed guardian of Ali Hashim Meter. Their Lordships have been informed by Counsel that Ahmed Madari, who signed the promissory note, is Hamed Ebrahim Madari. Hashim Ebrahim Madari may be, and possibly is, Hamed Ebrahim Madari.

It is stated in the appellants' case that the promissory note was executed by Hashim (Hamed) Ebrahim Madari in the Benami names of Ali Hashim Meter and Fatima Bibi. In a counter-claim, which will be again referred to, Hamed Ebrahim Madari alleged that he in the names of Ali Hashim Meter and Fatima Bibi had purchased the oil well from Maung Po Ya. However that may have been, the names of Ali Hashim Meter and Fatima Bibi do not occur in the agreement in writing of the 24th March 1909

The promissory note was dishonoured. Thereupon this Suit No. 13 of 1911 was brought upon the promissory note in the District Court of Magwe by Maung Po Ya and Ma Hnit against Ali Hashim Meter and Fatima Bibi to recover from them Rs. 21,160 principal and interest alleged to be due by them under the promissory note. In the plaint it was alleged that the "two defendants had executed and signed" the promissory note. Subsequently, on the 3rd February 1912 Maung Po Ya presented a petition to the District Court, in which he stated:—

"1. In this case, in the presence of the 1st and 2nd defendants, and with their consent, their representative Hamed Ebrahim Madari signed (the promissory note).

"2. Therefore, under Order VI, rule 17, I pray that I may be allowed to amend the plaint as follows, namely: 'In the plaint I have stated that Ali Hashim Meter and Fatima Bibi signed; in place of this statement, insert the statement that in their presence and with their consent, their Attorney Hamed Ebrahim Meter signed.'"

Their Lordships do not know what order, if any, was passed on the petition of the 3rd February 1912. It will be observed that the plaintiffs were suing on a promissory note alleged to have been made in their favour by a minor through his alleged guardian, and that the defendants are the minor and the alleged guardian, who apparently was a minor when the promissory note was made. There is nothing in the record before the Board to suggest how Fatima Bibi could have been even the natural guardian of the minor, or that she had been appointed by the Court his guardian in the suit, or how a minor could legally be a party to the contract.

No written statement appears to have been filed in answer to the suit by Ali Hashim Meter or by Fatima Bibi, but Hamed Ebrahim Madari, alleging himself to be the guardian of Ali Hashim Meter and of Fatima Bibi, filed on his own behalf a "cross-claim," which was a counter-claim, and it was admitted to the record of the suit as a counter-claim.

In his counter claim, Hamed Ebrahim Madari referred to Maung Po Ya as the "defendant," and alleged:—

"1. In Suit No. 13 of 1911 of this Court, defendant (Maung Po Ya) has made a false claim against 1st defendant, Ali Hashim Meter, and 2nd defendant, Fatima Bibi, on a promissory note. Defendant (Maung Po Ya) came to me and said that oil well No. 2076 at Natsin Quarter, Twingon, belonged to him and asked me to buy it outright for Rs. 40,000.

"Accordingly, on the 24th March 1909, the 4th waxing of Hnaung Tagu, 1270, by mutual consent, the accompanying document (the agreement in writing of the 24th March 1909) was executed and signed, and I paid Rs. 5,000 as earnest money, and then paid another sum of Rs. 15,000; total, Rs. 20,000.

"2 After the execution of the agreement and payment of the earnest money, Maung Po Ya asked me to execute a promissory note for the balance of Rs. 20,000 on interest at Re. 1 per cent. per mensem, and said that he would deliver the oil well No. 2076 to me by means of a registered document. I trusted him, and, therefore, signed the promissory note for Rs. 20,000 produed by Maung Po Ya in Court, the money being the balance of the price of the oil well which I had purchased in the names of my son (in fact, his nephew) Ali Hashim Meter, the 1st defendant, and my wife, Fatima Bibi, the 2nd defendant, who is a purdanashim woman.

"3. After the execution of the promissory note, I asked Maung Po Ya to deliver the oil well No. 2076 to me. But Maung Po Ya said that he would deliver it to me by means of a registered document, only on my payment of the interest due on the promissory note for Rs. 20,000. Accordingly I had to pay him another sum of Rs. 4,000 as interest on that promissory note for Rs. 20, 00.

"4. After the payment of the said Rs. 4,000 as interest, Maung Po Ya did not deliver the well to me. Therefore, in order to sue for the delivery of the well which I had already purchased and paid for I made enquiries in the office concerned, and found that the well No. 2076 belonged to one Maung Hla and not to Maung Po Ya. I, therefore, asked Maung Po Ya to re-pay Rs. 24,000, the earnest money and interest paid by me, and cancel the original agreement and the promissory note, but he would not do so...

"7. Wherefore, I pray that the defendant's (Maung Po Ya's) suit against my wife and son (nephew) on the promissory note may be dismissed with costs, and that a decree, with costs, may be granted me directing defendant (Maung Po Ya)

	Rs.
"(a) To re-pay to me earnest money	20,000
"Interest	4,000
"Total	24,000

and future interest."

The counter-claim is signed "Ahmed Ebrahim Meter, guardian of Ali Hashim Meter and for Fatima Bibi."

In the same suit (No. 13 of 1911), Maung Po Ya filed a written statement as a defence to the counter-claim. In his written statement Maung Po Ya challenged Madari's right to file a counter-claim in the suit thus:—

"1. In Suit No. 13 of 1911, the plaintiffs are myself and Ma Hnit, and defendants are Fatima Bibi and Ali Hashim Meter. In the cross-claim by Madari, I alone am made defendant. Thus the parties are not the same, and, therefore, the cross-claim should not be made in the same suit. If plaintiff wishes to make any claim, he should institute a separate suit."

Maung Po Ya was apparently under the impression that if the parties to the suit and to the counter claim had been the same, the Court would be competent to deal with the counter-claim on the merits. The Additional Judge of the District Court on the 29th April 1912 framed the following amongst other issues:—

"1. Whether the defendants' cross-claim was maintainable?"

The ruling of the Additional Judge of the District Court on that issue is best given in his own words, as follows:—

"So far as the cross claim is concerned, it is admitted by the parties that the sum of Rs. 20,000 and interest paid by the defendants to Maung Po Ya were to account of the price of oil well, and as such the defendants' cross claim for return of the money is quite maintainable. This is my answer to first issue."

On the merits of the counter-claim the District Judge expressed himself thus:—

"According to the agreement, Exhibit I, the plaintiff, Po Ya, was to convey the well in the event of the defendants executing a mortgage of their two wells for Rs. 30,000 (Rs. 20,000 being balance due for purchase of the well in dispute and Rs. 10,000 was the amount for which the defendants have already mortgaged before the said two wells to Maung Po Ya), but both the parties admitted that the agreement to execute the mortgage on two wells was substituted by an agreement to execute a promissory note for Rs. 20,000 only, and that accordingly the defendants executed the promissory note for Rs. 20,000, and have since paid interest. The defendants have, therefore, performed their part of the contract embodied in the agreement, Exhibit I, and this fact is also established by the said agreement being in the possession of the defendants. It now remains for the plaintiff, Maung Po Ya, to perform his part of the contract by conveying the well to defendants, but there was not a particle of evidence to show that he ever offerd the well. In fact, he was not in a position to transfer the well until a few days after the institution of this suit, when the well was transferred into his name. . . . The act of Po Ya in delaying the transfer of the well to the defendants for so long a period as over two years after the execution of the promissory note, Exhibit A, therefore, amounts to failure on his part to perform his part of the contract and as such the agreement, Exhibit I, becomes voidable at the option of the defendant, and Po Ya is now bound to return all the money which he has received from the defendants to account of the well."

As to the claim on the promissory note, the Additional District Judge expressed himself thus:—

"Further, considering that the well has not been conveyed as yet to the defendants, and that no mention was made in the plaint that Po Ya had any intention of making over the well before he is actually paid for the promissory note, Exhibit A, I hold that the promissory note was one without consideration, and the plaintiffs' claim on the said promissory note must under any circumstances fail."

The Additional District Judge dismissed the suit, and on the counter-claim made a decree for the defendants to the suit against Maung Po Ya for Rs. 23,800 with costs.

The plaintiffs appealed to the Court of the Judicial Commissioner, Upper Burma. Before the appeal was heard, Maung Po Ya died and his widow Ma Hnit was duly appointed his legal representative. The Additional Judicial Commissioner did not consider whether the counter-claim was competent, and taking the same view of the facts and the law as had been taken by the Additional District Judge, he dismissed the appeal. From that decree this appeal has been brought.

Each of the Courts below omitted to consider whether a minor is a person competent to contract. Under the Indian Contract Act, where a minor purports to contract his alleged contract is void and not merely voidable; he is a person who is not competent to contract. See Mohori Bibee v. Dharmodas Ghose (2). See also Mir Sarwarjan v. Fakhruddin Mahomed Chowdhuri (3). Ali Hashim Meter certainly was a minor, and Fatima Bibi apparently was a minor when the promissory note was made. The suit should have been dismissed on that ground if there was no other ground for dismissing it. Although the appointment by a Court of a guardian for the suit of a minor defendant sued on a contract which purported to have been made by him would not get over the difficulty that he was incompetent to contract, no guardian for the suit appears to have been appointed by the Court, although each of the Judges below ought to have seen from the proceedings before them that Ali Hashim Meter and Fatima Bibi were minors. They ought to have observed that Hamed Ebrahim Madari described himself in his counter-claim as their guardian. These Judges ought also to have considered the form of the promissory note upon which Fatima Bibi was sued as a principal, and whether, even if she had been of full age at the date of the promissory note, she had made herself liable on it.

Even assuming for the purpose of argument, but not deciding, that the practice as to filing of counter-claims is the same in India as in England, this counter-claim is bad, inasmuch as Hamed Ebrahim Madari, who counter-claimed, is not a defendant to the suit.

Their Lordships will humbly advise His Majesty that this appeal so far as it relates to the dismissal of the suit should be dismissed and that so far as it relates to the counter-claim should be allowed, and the counter claim be dismissed with costs

LAHORE HIGH COURT.

LETTERS PATENT APPEAL No. 8 OF 1919.

February 12, 1920.

Present:—Mr. Justice Scott Smith and Mr. Justice Wilberforce.

MR. F. J. WOOLMER - PLAINTIFF — APPELLANT

versus

MRS. D. I. DALY AND OTHERS—DEFENDANTS —RESPONDENTS.

Will—Presumption in favour of due execution—Subsequent insanity of testator, whether revokes Will—Testator of sound mind at time of giving instructions for Will—Subsequent execution, whether valid—Testamentary capacity, whether affected by physical weakness.

There is a presumption in favour of the due execution and attestation of a Will which is apparently duly executed. [p. 805, col. 1.]

A Will is not revoked by the subsequent insanity of the testator. [p. 805, col. 2.]

Where a testator has given instructions for a Will when he is of sound mind but is not in a normal state of mind at the time of the execution of the deed drawn up in accordance with those instructions, he must be deemed to be of sound mind when it is executed. [p. 805, col. 1.]

A person's mental faculties may be affected by his physical weakness, but he may still be capable of devising and executing a Will of a simple character. [p. 805, col. 1.]

Appeal, under section 10 of the Letters Patent, against the following order, dated 23rd May 1919, of Mr. Justice Martineau:—

"This is an appeal from an order of the District Judge of Ambala granting to the respondent, Mr. Woolmer, Superintendent in the Military Finance Department in the Government of India, Probate of a Will, dated the 30th January 1914, alleged to have been made in London by Thomas Henry Daly, who died at Bangalore on the 3rd November 1916, and dismissing an application by Mrs. Daly for Probate of a Will dated the 4th October 1916. It may be here noted that the last portion of the order appears to be ultra vires, as Mrs. Daly's application was made to the District Court at Bangalore, and I do not find from the record that it was ever transferred to the District Court of Ambala.

The testator was twice married. By his first wife, he had a daughter, Maud, who is the wife of the respondent, and a son, Arthur, who has not been heard of for many years. His second wife is the appellant. By her he has had six children, who are all living.

The executors and trustees named in the Will of the 30th January 1914 are the respondent, Mr. Woolmer, and Sergeant Taylor, who was married to the testator's niece. By that Will one-third of the property of the testator was bequeathed to his daughter, Maud, and one-third to his wife, the present appellant, and the remaining one-third was left in trust for his son Arthur. The income of the last portion was to be applied in making inquiries as to the son's whereabouts and if the son could not be found his portion was, on the expiry of five years from the testator's death, to go in equal shares to the daughter and the appellant. The Will also contained the following peculiar clause:—

'And I hereby expressly direct that if any Will or codicil subsequent hereto, and purporting to be made by me at any time within three months of my death, shall be put forward, I desire the same to be strictly scrutinised, and all the circumstances in connection therewith inquired into and if my trustees shall think fit, opposed, unless I shall have communicated the contents thereof to the trustees appointed by this my Will and requested them not to oppose the same.'

The execution of the Will of the 30th January 1914 is not admitted by the appellant, who also contends that even if it was duly executed, it was revoked by a Will made by her husband at the hospital in Bangalore on the 4th October 1916, by which he bequeathed all his property to her.

The learned District Judge finds that the Will dated the 30th January 1914 was duly executed by Mr. Daly. As regards the Will of the 4th October 1916, he considers that it was probably executed by Mr. Daly, but he is not satisfied that the testator knew and approved of the contents of that Will when he executed it. He also holds that there is reason to believe that the second Will was executed under undue influence or coercion or importunity such as took away the free agency of the testator.

Mr. and Mrs. Daly went to England in April 1913 leaving their children with Mrs. Daly's mother at Bangalore. Mrs. Daly returned to India in November of that year on account of her mother's illness. Her husband returned in the following February and lived with her at Bangalore till March 1916, when, being, Mrs. Daly says, annoyed with her on account of her having constantly to be with her mother, who was ill in hospital, he went off to Bombay. From Bombay he went up to Simla, where he stayed with the Woolmers. He got ill there, and Mrs. Woolmers wrote to Mrs. Daly saying that she had better come up. Mrs. Daly reached Simla early in September and on the 18th she left with her husband for Bangalore. By the time they left Mr. Daly had become unable to walk. They reached Bangalore on the 24th September and Mr. Daly was taken straight to the Bowring Civil Hospital. He was suffering from paralysis of the legs and hands.

On the 2nd October a letter purporting to be from Mr. Daly and to bear his left thumb impression, affixed in the presence of Dr. Harris, House Surgeon of the Bowring Hospital at Bangalore, was received by the Alliance Bank at Simla, in which the Bank was asked to transfer a fixed deposit receipt for Rs. 30,000, which stood in Mr. Daly's name, to the name of his wife. The receipt was enclosed in the letter. Mr. Daly said in the letter that he had had a rather sudden attack of paralysis, and that he wished to take the earliest opportunity of placing his affairs on a clear basis, so that his wife and children might not be put to unnecessary expense and inconvenience in the matter of moneys due to him.

On the 19th October the Bank replied, asking Mr. Daly to send a certificate from the Civil Surgeon of Bangalore as to his being unable to write and being of clear and understanding mind.

On the 30th October a certificate from Colonel Standage, Residency Surgeon of the Bowring Hospital, was sent to the Bank with a letter purporting to be from Mr. Daly and to bear his thumb impression, in which he asked the Bank to carry out the instructions given in the letter of the 2nd October. In consequence, however, of a communication received from Mr. Woolmer the Bank took no action on the letter.

On the 4th October two documents were executed by Mr. Daly at the Hospital at Bangalore, viz., a deed of gift by which he transferred a house at Bangalore and all the money standing to his credit in the Bank of Madras, the Alliance Bank of Simla, and the Allahabad Bank to his wife, and a Will by which he bequeathed all his property to her. On the 2nd November he was removed from the hospital to his house, and on the following day he died.

It is contended on behalf of the appellant that the lower Court had no jurisdiction, as the testator had transferred to her all the property previously belonging to him within the jurisdiction of that Court. Even, however, if the lower Court had no jurisdiction, there has not been a failure of justice in consequence of the want of jurisdiction, and I, therefore, overrule the objection under section 21, Civil Procedure Code.

With regard to the Will of the 30th January 1914, there does not appear to be any doubt that Mr. Daly executed it, but there is no evidence to show that he was of a sound disposing mind at the time of its execution. The only evidence as to his state of mind at that time is contained in an affidavit of one of the attesting witnesses, Mrs. Howard, in which she says: 'Deceased was a heavy drinker and in my opinion was not in a normal state of mind at the time of signing the Will.' The learned District Judge attaches no weight to this affidavit, but it is unrebutted and there does not appear to me to be any strong reason for believing it to be false. Mrs. Howard was the lady in whose house Mr. Daly was lodging at the time when he executed the Will, and it does not appear that she is in any way interested in the matter of the probate. Mrs. Daly says in her evidence that her husband used to drink heavily, and it is significant that his signature to the Will of 1914 is in a shaky handwriting and is markedly different from his ordinary signature.

But even supposing that Mrs. Howard's evidence is disregarded, what other evidence is there to put in its place? No doubt, Sergeant Taylor, who took Mr. Daly to a lawyer for his Will to be drawn up, says that Mr. Daly was sober at the time, but this statement does not show in what state of mind Mr. Daly was at the time of the execution of the Will, which probably took place on some day subsequent to his visit to the lawyer.

Counsel for the respondent relies on a letter written by Mr. Daly to Mr. Woolmer from Bombay on the 25th March 1916, in which he said that he had been anxious about his Will which he had given to Mr. Taylor about the 1st February 1914. Mr. Daly referred in that letter to the terms of the Will and said he wanted to have it recopied, and there might be some difficulties about the London witnesses having to prove the Will and his signature. That letter no doubt shows that Mr. Daly was treating the Will which he had made in England as his Will, but it is no proof of his mental capacity at the time of its execution. It may be that the Will was drawn up in accordance with his wishes, but that he was drunk when he executed it. In such a case it would not become valid by its being subsequently recognized by him as his Will. I find, therefore, that the respondent has failed to prove that the testator was of a sound disposing mind at the time of the execution of the Will of the 30th January 1914.

I am also unable to agree with the learned District Judge in his findings with regard to the second Will. The case for the respondent appears to be that the idea of having that Will and the deed of gift of the same date executed originated with Mrs. Daly, who got the documents written by Mr. Lubeck, a Barrister of Bangalore, and that her husband's thumb impressions were affixed to them without his being in a fit state of mind to know what he was doing.

Mrs. Daly's account of the matter is this: While her husband was in the Bowring Hospital, he told her to look for his Will, which he said was in his box, but she looked and could not find it in the box. He was worried at its not being found. She said that perhaps he had left it with the Alliance Bank in Simla, and by his direction she wrote and also wired about it to the Manager of the Bank, but received a reply to the effect that nothing was held to Daly's account. Then her husband told her to have a deed of gift and also a Will drawn up. She went to see Mr. Lubeck and asked him to draw up the documents. He said he could not draw up the Will without instructions from her husband. He drew up the deed of gift and gave it her. On the 4th October he came with Mr. Burby, the Sub Registrar, to the Hospital. The deed of gift was executed and registered, after which Mr. Daly told Mr Lubeck that he wished a Will to be drawn up, and Mr. Lubeck drew it up in accordance with his instructions.

It is contended for the respondent that Mr. Daly's statement that she made an inquiry from the Alliance Bank about the Will is untrue. She has certainly not produced the telegram which she says she received from the Bank in reply to her inquiry, but there was no particular reason for her to preserve that telegram, and she says in fact she did not. It is pointed out that the letter and telegram which she says she sent are not on the file of the correspondence produced by the Bank. But that file contains only the correspondence which commenced with the letter of the 2nd of October mentioned above regarding the transfer of the fixed deposit to the name of Mrs. Daly. The letter and telegram which Mrs. Daly says she had sent before that related to an entirely different matter, and would not necessarily have been placed with the file about the transfer of the deposit. The Agent of the Bank was not asked in his evidence whether or not the Bank had received the letter and telegram in question. It is to be observed that Mrs. Daly, in her letter of the 14th November 1916 to Mr. Woolmer, mentioned that by her husband's direction she wrote and telegraphed to the Bank about the Will when it could not be found in the box. It seems very unlikely that this can have been a pure invention on her part. It is difficult to see why she should have invented the story, and she must have known, if her statement was false, that it could at once be proved to be false by the evidence of the Agent of the Bank.

The Will was actually in the possession of Mr. Woolmer, whom it had been sent in 1914 shortly after its execution, but it appears that Mr. Woolmer made it over to Mr. Daly at Simla, for Father Dealey states that when he came to administer extreme unction to Mr. Daly while the latter was at Simla, and asked him whether he had made a Will, Mr. Daly pointed to a box and said that the Will was in it. The respondent in fact admits before me that he made the Will over to Mr. Daly. He must have taken it back before Mr. Daly left Simla, and it seems quite possible that Mr. Daly forgot about this, and was worried when the Will was not to be found in his box at Bangalore, and told his wife to enquire from the Bank about it.

But whether or not the enquiry was made from the Bank about the Will of 1914, I can see no good reason for doubting Mrs. Daly's statement that it was at the wish of her husband that the deed of gift and the second Will were drawn up.

It is urged for the respondent that Mr. Daly had never shown any desire to make a new Will. There is no doubt that up to March 1916 he had no intention of making any change, and possibly he had none when Father Dealey saw him at Simla about the 6th or 7th September, though it is to be noted that Mr. Daly never carried out the intention, expressed in his letter to Mr. Woolmer of the 28th of March, of renewing the Will which he had made in 1914 But, as Mr. Oertel points out, it may well be that when he became seriously ill, and reflected that he might not have long to live, he bethought himself of his duties to his wife and the children dependent on him, and decided to alter his Will. The learned District Judge thinks it is improbable that he would of his own accord have made a new Will excluding the children by his first wife from participation in his property. But one of those children, Arthur, had not been heard of for years and it was not known what had become of him, while the other was married to the respondent and was already provided for. Mrs. Daly, on the other hand, had six children, of whom four were dependent on her. Mr. Daly was no doubt angry with his wife for some reason or other in March 1916 and went off to Bombay in consequence. In a letter which he wrote to Mr. Woolmer on the 22nd of March he went to the length of accusing his wife of misconduct. With reference to this Mrs. Daly says that when her husband had been drinking he would accuse her of everything under the sun, but that when he got over it he was loving and affectionate and forgot all that he had ever said. I can see no reason for supposing that the fit of anger against his wife which seized in March 1916 was anything more than temporary. She went to him at Simla where he got ill, and there is no evidence to show that they were on bad terms while they were there together. She took him down to Bangalore and remained in attendance on him during his illness. There seems to be nothing improbable or unnatural in the circumstances in his deciding to make a new Will and leave all his property to her.

The learned District Judge thinks it is strange that Mr. Daly did not give notice to Mrs. Woolmer of his intention to make a second Will leaving all his property to his wife, and that in view of the curious clause in the first Will, to which reference has been made above, he did not after making the second Will inform his executors of the fact. It does not, however, appear to me that there was anything strange in Mr. Daly's conduct in these respects. There would have been a natural reluctance on his part to inform Mrs. Woolmer that he had changed his mind and was not going to leave her any part of his property. It was also in no way incumbent upon him to inform Mr. Woolmer or Sergeant Taylor that he had made a new Will, even supposing that he recollected the peculiar clause in the first Will, which, as that Will was not before him, he may not have done.

Nor can I see anything remarkable in the fact, by which the learned District Judge is impressed, that Mrs. Daly made no mention of the second Will in the letters she wrote to the Woolmers shortly after the Will had been made. There was no need for her to make any mention of it.

Another point taken on behalf of the respondent is that there was no need to execute a deed of gift as well as a Will, and that one document would have sufficed. With regard to this, it may be observed that the deed of gift would not cover such property as household effects which the Will did cover, and also that the testator may possibly have had in view that if he executed a deed of gift, his wife would have less trouble in obtaining possession of the property after his death, besides being saved the payment of probate duty. The contents of the letter written to the Alliance Bank of Simla on the 2nd October lend some support to this theory. At any rate I do not see how the fact of two documents being executed instead of one helps the case for the respondent. If it was unnecessary for Mr. Daly to have two documents drawn up, it was likewise unnecessary for Mrs. Daly (supposing that the plan originated with her) to have this done. If Mr. Daly had had the design which is imputed to her, why should she have created unnecessary difficulties for herself? If she had the Will and the deed of gift drawn up against her husband's wishes and got his thumb marks affixed without his knowing the contents of the documents, it is also necessary to suppose that she did the same with regard to the letters of the 2nd and 30th October, which were sent to the Bank for the purpose of having the deposit transferred to her name. Not only this, it would also be necessary to suppose that she was assisted in the scheme by Colonel Harris, the House Surgeon, Colonel Standage, the Residency Surgeon, and the head clerk of the Bowring Civil Hospital, of whom the first named signed the letter of the 2nd October and the other two signed the letter of the 30th October. The theory put forward appears to be improbable in the highest degree. There was also no strong reason for Mrs. Daly to commit this elaborate fraud, for admittedly the terms of the first Will had been kept concealed from her and for all she knew she might have been the sole legatee under it.

Coming now to the evidence of the execution of the Will and deed of gift on the 4th October 1916, this is entirely in the appellant's favour. The Will was attested by Mr. Lubeck and Mr. Burby, and the latter also registered the deed of gift, which was attested by Mr. Lubeck and Mr. Menezes, a Sub-Assistant Surgeon in the Hospital. These gentlemen have been examined, and all support the evidence given by Mrs. Daly. Mr. Lubeck states that Mr. Daly helped her husband to sit up, sat by his side on the bed, held the the deed of gift before him and read it out and that he smiled and said "that is right" or something to that effect, and affixed his thumb mark to the deed. After the registration of the deed Mr. Lubeck told Mr. Daly that his wife had said he wanted his Will to be drawn up, and Mr. Daly replied that he did express such intention, and that he had little property after making the gift, but he wished all he had to go to his wife. Mr. Lubeck asked about the children, and Mr. Daly said his wife would look after them. Mr. Lubeck then drew up a Will in accordance with Mr. Daly's instructions, read it out to him, and asked whether it was all right, and Mr. Daly said it was, and affixed his thumb mark. The witness states that the testator appeared to be of sound mind and understanding, and that he was aware and approved of the contents of the Will.

Mr. Burby gives evidence to a similar effect. Mr Menezes deposes only to the execution of the deed of gift, as he was called away to an operation before the Will was executed. With regard to Mr. Daly's state of mind all he has said is that Mr. Daly spoke rationally. In addition to the above, there is the evidence of the House Surgeon, Dr. Harris, who says that Mr. Daly whom he used to see every day spoke coherently and rationally to him, though he did not speak to Mr. Daly on any subject except his ailment.

The learned District Judge says with regard to Mr. Lubeck that he is not convinced of the bona fides of the witness who appears to him to be interested in the proceedings, and with regard to Mr. Burby he says he cannot attach any importance to the witness' statement. But his comments on the evidence of these witnesses do not appear to me to disclose any good reason for disbelieving it. He points out that nothing was said by the testator or his wife at the time of the execution of the Will about a previous Will having been made, or about there being children by another wife, but I fail to see what need there was for these matters to be mentioned. It is urged that Mr. Lubeck took no instructions from Mr. Daly before drawing up the deed of gift, but I cannot see that this is at all material, as the deed is stated to have been read out to, and approved by, Mr. Daly before his thumb mark was taken. The fact of Mr. Lubeck not taking a fee for his services does not seem to be of much importance. The learned Judge says that Mr. Lubeck and Mr. Burby are vague as to the conversation that took place, but it seems to me that they could hardly be expected to be very definite about a conversation which took place a year or two before they gave evidence.

Mr. Lubeck was unknown to Mrs. Daly before she went to him and asked him to draw up the documents. Both he and Mr. Burby appears to be disinterested witnesses, and I am unable to see any good reason for disbelieving them. It is to be observed that this District Judge had not the advantage of seeing these witnesses, their evidence, as well as that of Dr. Harris and Mr. Menezes having been taken on commission at Bangalore.

With regard to the evidence of Dr. Harris and Mr. Menezes, the learned District Judge doubts whether they could recollect the condition of any particular patient after the lapse of two years. In connection with the question of Mr. Daly's mental condition Counsel for the respondent relies on a letter (Exhibit P-14) written by Mrs. Daly to the respondent on the 3rd October, the day before the execution of the Will, in which she said: "Father seems better. I think he had a slight stroke on Sunday. When I paid him my evening visit I noticed a decided change. The mouth was slightly crooked and he could scarcely speak..... This morning he seemed better.....Father thinks he is still in Simla, and asks any one who goes to see him how they like the place.....He is quite helpless, and it is pitiful to see him." It is contended that this letter shows that the testator would not have been capable of executing the Will on the 4th October, but I do not agree. The testator was getting better after the stroke he had had on the Sunday (which was the 1st October), and it by no means follows, from the fact of his fancying that he was at Simla, that he would not have been in a fit state to make the Will. It has to be remembered that the Will was an extremely simple one. It merely provided that all the testator's property would go to his wife, who would be his executrix. There were no conditions and no other bequests, and I can see no reason for supposing that Mr. Daly was incapable of comprehending such a simple document, and of understanding how he was disposing of his property and exercising his judgment in the matter. It may be noted that in a letter written by Mrs. Daly on the 3rd November to Mrs. Woolmer she said that before leaving the hospital her husband had told her to write to Mr. Talyor for the amount he had lent him in London. This related to a loan of £ 40 which Mr Daly had given to Mr. Taylor in January 1914. The fact of his remembering such an incident which occurred so long before would go to show that his mental faculties were still alert.

The letter written by Mrs. Daly to the Woolmers about her husband's condition while he was in the hospital, particularly the letter of the 3rd October referred to above, are important as they appear to be quite out of keeping with the theory that Mrs. Daly formed the design attributed to her of having a Will made out in her favour and getting her husband's thumb impression affixed to it at a time when he was not in a condition to know what he was doing. Can it be believed that, if she had had that design, she would have written letters to the Woolmers telling them about her husband's helpless condition, about his having a stroke, and about his being under the illusion that he was in Simla? Those letters, instead of going against her, are really a strong piece of evidence in her favour.

With regard to the finding of the learned District Judge that there is reason to believe that the second Will was executed under undue influence, coercion or importunity, it appears to me that this is not very consistent with his finding as to his not being satisfied that the testator knew of the contents of the Will when he executed it. It is difficult to see how he could have been induced by the exercise of undue influence or by importunity on the part of his wife, to execute the second Will if he was ignorant of its contents. Apart from this, I am unable to discover any evidence to show that either undue influence or coercion was practised. As to importunity, the only indication of it is to be found in Mr. Daly's letter to Mr. Woolmer of the 28th of March 1916, in which he said that his wife had pestered him to make a Will in her favour, but that he had simply refused. That was more than six months before the second Will was written, and even if the statement made in the letter be taken to be true, there is nothing to show that Mrs. Daly continued at any time after March pressing her husband to make a Will. The letter itself shows that Mr. Daly was determined not to give way, a fact which makes it improbable that the execution of the Will was brought about by undue influence, coercion or importunity.

The result is that I find that Mr. Daly executed the Will of the 4th October 1916 voluntarily and while he was of sound disposing mind. I accordingly accept the appeal, set aside the order of the lower Court, and dismiss the respondent's application for probate. The respondent will pay the appellant's costs in both Courts."

JUDGMENT.—This is an appeal under section 10 of the Letters Patent from the order of Mr. Justice Martineau, a single Judge of this Court, reversing the order of the District Judge of Ambala, granting to the appellant Mr. Woolmer Probate of a Will, dated the 30th January 1914, alleged to have been made in London by Thomas Henry Daly who died in Bangalore on the 3rd November 1916, and dismissing an application by Mrs. Daly respondent for Probate of a Will dated the 4th October 1916. The trial Court held that the Will of the 30th January 1914 was duly executed whereas that of the 4th October 1916, propounded by Mrs. Daly, though executed by Thomas Henry Daly, was executed at a time when he was not of sound disposing mind and that he was subject to undue influence brought to bear upon him by Mrs. Daly. Mr. Justice Martineau on the contrary held that Mr. Woolmer had failed to prove that the testator was of sound disposing mind at the time of execution of the Will of 30th January 1914 and that the one of the 4th October 1916 was duly executed by him when he was of sound disposing mind.

Two main points have been argued before us. First, whether the first Will of 30th January 1914 was duly executed and secondly, whether the second Will of the 4th October 1916 was duly executed. The testator's family circumstances are fully detailed in the judgments of Mr. Justice Martineau and of the District Judge and we need not, therefore, repeat them. The first point urged by Counsel for the appellant is that the execution of the first Will having been found both by the District Judge and by the Judge of this Court proved, the initial presumption is that it was duly executed. The fact that the testator executed the Will has not been denied before us. It is duly drawn up with a proper attestation clause by a firm of London Solicitors. There were two attesting witnesses thereto, viz., Margaret Amy Howard and a man called Henham, Solicitor's clerk, living in London. An affidavit sworn to by Mrs. Howard in London was put in evidence by Mrs. Daly, in which she states that at the request of the testator she witnessed his signature on the Will. In the affidavit she says that the deceased was a heavy drinker and in her opinion was not in a normal state of mind at the time of the signing of the Will. This affidavit at all events proves the execution of the Will. In addition we have Sergeant Taylor's evidence to the effect that he took the testator to the lawyer's office in order that he might give instructions for the drawing up of a Will and that at that time Mr. Daly was sober. Subsequently the latter made a Will which he handed over to the witness, and he sent it by registered post to Mr. Woolmer in India. With reference to the presumption of due execution Counsel for the appellant refers to Volume XVIII of Halsbury's Laws of England, page 555, where it is stated: "There is a presumption of due execution where there is a proper attestation clause, even though the witnesses have no recollection of having witnessed the Will. In the absence of an attestation clause, a Will which on its face appears to have been duly executed is assumed to have been duly executed although no evidence of its due execution is forthcoming." Again, in Jarman on Wills, 6th Edition, at page 105, we find the following :—" If a Will appears on the face of it to have been executed and attested in accordance with the requirements of the Act, the maxim 'omnia præsumuntur rite esse acta' applies, unless it is clearly proved by the attesting witnesses that the Will was not in fact duly executed." In the case reported as Brahmadat Tewari v. Ohaudan Bibi (1) it was held that every presumption will be made in favour of due execution and attestation, when a Will is regular on the face of it and is apparently duly executed. The same presumption is referred to in the Law of Undue Influence by Abdur Rahim in Chapter XXI on Wills. In Susil Kumar Banerjee v. Apsari Debi (2) the dictum of Lord Macnaghten in Perera v Perera (3) is quoted to the effect that "Where a testator is of sound mind when he gives instructions for a Will, but at the time of signature accepts the instrument drawn in pursuance thereof even though not able to follow its provisions then, he must be deemed to be of sound mind when it is executed."

Now, in the present case it is to be noted that Mrs. Howard does not say that Mr. Daly was drunk when he executed the Will but only that he was not in a normal state of mind. We do not think she can have meant that he was not of sound disposing mind, for if she had considered him to be so, she would hardly have attested his signature. Having regard to the above authorities, we think the presumption in favour of due execution of this Will has not been rebutted by Mrs. Howard's affidavit, We accordingly differ from Mr. Justice Martineau's finding in respect of this Will and hold that it was duly executed.

We now come to the second Will of the 4th October 1916 propounded by Mrs. Daly. Its execution is amply proved by the evidence of both the attesting witnesses Mr. Burby' Sub-Registrar of Bangalore, and Mr. Lubeck, Bar at Law, who says that under the instructions of the testator he drew up the Will. Its execution is not denied in arguments before us, but it is contended that the testator at the time was not of a sound disposing mind, Before going further we may quote with advantage from Halsbury's Laws of England, Volume 28, on the subject of testamentary capacity at page 532.

"It is necessary for the validity of a Will that the testator should be of sound mind, memory and understanding, words which time out of mind have been held to mean sound disposing mind, and to import sufficient capacity to deal with and appreciate the various dispositions of property to which the testator is about to affix his signature ; but a Will is not revoked by the subsequent insanity of the testator."

"In order to constitute a sound disposing mind, a testator must not only be able to understand that he is by his Will giving his property to one or more objects of his regard, but he must also have capacity to comprehend and to recollect the extent of his property and the nature of the claims of others whom by his Will he is excluding from participation in that property. For this purpose it is essential that no disorder of the mind shall poison his affections, pervert his sense of right, or prevent the exercise of his natural faculties, that no insane delusion shall influence his Will in disposing of his property, and bring about a disposal of it which if the mind had been sound would not have been made. Perversion of moral feeling does not constitute unsoundness of mind."

The principles contained in these two paragraphs are referred to in many of the other authorities which have been quoted before us.

On the same day that the Will propounded by Mrs. Daly was executed, a deed of gift was also executed by the testator in favour of his wife. This as well as the Will was drawn up by Mr. Lubeck, who has given evidence as to the circumstances under which he drew up both these documents. His evidence is fully dealt with in the judgment of the learned District Judge and also in that of Mr. Justice Martineau and we need not refer to it in detail. It is sufficient to note that he states that he drew up the Will under the instructions of the testator and in his presence and that the latter gave witness the impression of having been of sound mind and understanding. He says that the testator was aware and approved of the contents of the Will which was shown to him. Mr. Burby, who had gone to the hospital to register the deed of gift and who is the second attesting witness, gave similar evidence. He said Mr. Daly was of sound mind, memory and understanding. Great stress has been laid by Counsel for the appellant upon a discrepancy between the evidence of these two witnesses. Mr. Lubeck says that the Will was read out in the presence of Mr. Burby, whereas the latter says that it was not read out in his presence. In our opinion this discrepancy is quite unimportant. The evidence was given almost a year after the date of the execution of the Will and Mr. Lubeck may very well have forgotten whether Mr. Burby was present when the Will was read out or not. One cannot expect a witness to remember details of this sort with absolute accuracy. In addition to these two witnesses we have the evidence of Dr. Harris, an Anglo-Indian House Surgeon of the hospital where Mr. Daly was an in patient from the 24th September to the 2nd November 1916. He states that he used to see Mr. Daly every day and that the latter spoke coherently and rationally to him. He was suffering from paralysis of the left leg and both hands. He was able to move about his arms and sit up in bed. Then we have the evidence of Menezes, an Indian Christain and Sub-Assistant Surgeon in the Bowring Civil Hospital, Bangalore. His evidence is not of much importance and is merely to the effect that the testator used to speak rationally and improved in condition after he was admitted to the hospital. Some stress has been laid by Counsel for the appellant on certain notes made by this witness as to Mr. Daly's condition while he was in hospital. One of these notes is to the effect that the patient answered reasonably but at times he spoke 'out of sense.' Now, it is quite possible that Mr. Daly may on occasions have talked nonsense and suffered from delusions, but it does not follow from this that at the time of executing the Will he was not of sound disposing mind.

While the present appeal was pending but before it came up for hearing, an application was made on behalf of the respondent before one of the Judges of this Bench to the effect that the evidence of Colonel Standage, Residency Surgeon, who was in charge of the Bowring Civil Hospital at the time when Mr. Daly was an in-patient, should be taken on commission and taken into consideration at the hearing. While the case was being tried by the District Judge of Ambala, an attempt was made to obtain the evidence of Colonel Standage but without success as at that time he was in Mesopotamia. His evidence has now been taken as requested, but Counsel for the appellant objects to its admission on various grounds. The most important of these we consider to be that in the course of cross examination certain questions were put to the witness which required expert knowledge for their answers, and Colonel Standage objected to answer them unless he was paid a fee of Rs. 300 as an expert. This fee was not paid and the questions accordingly remained unanswered. Mr. Moti Sagar accordingly objects that his evidence should not be admitted, because his client was not allowed to cross-examine him fully. We think there is force in this objection and we have accordingly decided not to consider his evidence. There is, however, on the record a certificate marked Exhibit A. C., dated the 30th October 1916, which he gave in regard to Mr Daly's condition at that time. It is as follows:—

"Certified that Thomas Henry Daly has been and is an in patient of the above hospital (Bowring Hospital, Bangalore) and that owing to an attack of paralysis partially affecting his limbs, he is unable to write or sign his name; but he is able to speak coherently and is of clear and understanding mind."

Mr. Moti Sagar at first objected to the admissibility of this certificate in evidence but after his attention was called to section 32 (2) of the Evidence Act he withdrew his objection This certificate is certainly good evidence that on the 30th October 1916 the testator was of clear and understanding mind. It was given, of course, 26 days after the Will was executed and, therefore, does not prove what the state of the testator's mind was on the date of execution. The testator died on the 3rd November 1916 or four days after the certificate was given. It shows at all events that the disease from which he was suffering was not of such a nature as to support the view that he was probably not of sound disposing mind on the 4th October 1916.

Certain letters written by Mr. Daly to the Woolmers in March 1916 and at other times have been referred to by the District Judge and Mr. Justice Martineau, and special stress before us is laid upon a letter of the 28th March 1916, which shows that the writer was not on good terms with his wife at that time, and in which he says that she was pestering him to make a Will. In our opinion these letters are not admissible in evidence and should not have been admitted by the trial Court. They are written statements of a person who is dead and if admissible at all would be admissible under section 32 of the Evidence Act, but none of the clauses of that section applies and Counsel for the appellant has not cited any authority in support of the proposition that such letters are admissible. In our opinion their importance would not be great, because it is admitted that Mr. Daly left his wife in March 1916 because he was displeased with her for she was in constant attendance on her sick mother.

He left her and went to Bombay and afterwards to Simla, where he stayed with his married daughter Mrs. Woolmer and her husband until he was taken away from there by his wife on 18th September 1916. Even if it be admitted that his wife was asking him to make a Will in March 1916, it would not in our opinion lead to any inference to the effect that she unduly influenced him to make a Will in her favour in October 1916. The first Will left one-third of the property to his son Arthur, one-third to his daughter Maud (Mrs. Woolmer), his children by a former wife, and the remaining one-third to Mrs. Daly. At that time his son Arthur was missing, and so far as we are aware is still missing. The second Will leaves leverything unconditionally to his wife, the respondent. This second Will is, in our opinion, a perfectly natural and just one when it is remembered that the testator's son Arthur was still missing at the time, that his daughter Maud was provided for and that his wife, present respondent, had four small children dependent upon her. The Will can, in our opinion, in no sense be called an "inofficious one." Mr. Oertel on behalf of the respondent has cited inter alia the following authorities:—Halsbury's Laws of England, Volume 28, page 532 Sayad Muhammad v. Fatteh Muhammad (4), Sajid Ali v. Ibad Ali (5) and Bur Singh v. Uttam Singh (6). We have already quoted the passages relied upon in the first of these authorities. Sayad Muhammad v. Fatteh Muhammad (4) is not of much importance, for the man the execution of a deed by whom was disputed was suffering from paralysis and was proved to be affected by difficulties of speech, but it was found on the evidence that he was of sound mind at the time when he executed the deed. In Sajid Ali v. Ibad Ali (5) it was held that although the mental faculties of a person suffering partial paralysis may have been affected by his physical weakness, he may still be capable of devising and of executing a Will of a simple character, although unfit to originate or to comprehend all the details of a complicated document. Very great stress has been laid by Counsel for the appellant upon the letters written by Mrs. Daly to the Woolmers regarding her husband's condition and especially on letters written by her on the 3rd and 11th of October, in which she states that sometimes he suffered from delusions thinking that he was still in Simla. It has been argued that the presence of this delusion on the 3rd and 11th of October shows that Mr. Daly could not have been of sound disposing mind on the 4th October. Now Mr. Daly had been ill for a long time and was doubtless very much reduced in strength by his illness. His mental faculties may have been affected by his physical weakness, but we think that he might still be capable of devising and executing a Will of a simple character such as the one propounded by the respondent. The Will is only of of a few lines in length and is an extremely simple one. It merely states that the testator thereby revokes all former Wills and declares this to be his last Will, and then it goes on to give all the property that he may die possessed of to his wife Dorothy Isabel Daly and appoints her to be the sole executrix of the Will. There is nothing difficult to understand in this and we have the evidence of Messrs. Lubeck and Burby that the testator was of sound mind; and Mr. Lubeck says that he drew up the Will under the instructions given by the testator.

Mr. Moti Sagar has referred inter alia to the following authorities. Tayammaul v. Sashachalla Naiker (7), Lachho Bibi v. Gopi Narain (8), Woomesh Chunder Biswas v. Rashmohini Dasi (9), Indar Narain Shiv Puri v. Onkar Lal (10), Kewati v. Chandu Lal (11) and Raj Bachan Singh v. Shatranji (12). Most of these cases were decided in accordance with the particular facts disclosed therein and we do not consider it necessary to discuss them in detail. It is argued that in order to constitute what is known in law as a sound disposing mind it must be shown that the testator was able to understand his position, that is, to understand that he was giving his property to one or more objects of his regard and was able to recollect the nature of the claims of others whom by his Will he was excluding from participation in his property. Now, bearing these principles in mind and also remembering that the testator did not own a large amount of property, we see no reason to suppose that he did not realise the amount of his property and was not able to form a judgment with respect to the person whom he was benefiting by his Will and those whom he was excluding from any share in his property. Mr. Lubeck knew that he had little children dependent upon him and says that he asked the testator what he was going to do about them, and the latter replied that his wife would look after them. Some stress has been laid in arguments by Counsel on behalf of the appellant on the fact that no mention was made to Mr. Lubeck of the existence of any previous Will or of the existence of children by his previous wife. But in our opinion there is nothing suspicious about this. The instructions given to Mr. Lubeck were clear and perfectly definite and what he had to do was to draw up a Will by which the testator left everything to his wife; it was no business of his to enquire whether any previous Will existed or whether there were any other relations of the testator whom he was excluding from participation in his property. The first Will contained a peculiar clause which is set forth in detail at page 2 of Mr. Justice Martineau's judgment, and it is urged that in accordance with this it was natural that Mr. Daly should have communicated the fact that he had made a new Will to Mr. Woolmer and that he should have requested him not to oppose the same. No communication was, as a matter of fact, made to Mr. Woolmer to the effect that a new Will had been made until after the testator's death; but we see nothing suspicious in this. The effect of the new Will was to disinherit the Woolmers and Mr. and Mrs. Daly both may have naturally wished that the persons affected should not be communicated with until it was necessary.

A good deal of stress has been laid by Counsel for the appellant upon the fact that Mr. Daly made the first Will in January 1914 and was apparently adhering to it at the time when Father Dealey visited him in Simla about the 7th of September 1916. Father Dealey says that at Mrs. Daly's request he asked Mr. Daly if he had made a Will and the latter replied that he had made one and that it was in a box which he pointed to in his bedroom. It is contended that this Will must have been the first Will. We do not, however, think that it follows from this that the testator was not at the time contemplating making a second Will. It is urged, and we consider with reason, that it was most unlikely that he would make such a Will in Simla while he was living with the Woolmers. On the contrary, he would be anxious to conceal from them that he had any such intention. We have carefully considered the evidence in regard to the execution of the Will of the 4th October 1916 and have no hesitation in agreeing with Mr. Justice Martineau that it was duly executed, the testator being at the time of sound disposing mind. We also agree with his criticism of the learned District Judge's reasons for coming to a contrary conclusion. We think there can be no doubt that Mr. Daly did from time to time suffer from the delusion that he was still in Simla after he had returned to Bangalore, but we do not think that this in itself is a sufficient reason for rejecting the direct evidence as to the drawing up and due execution of the Will. It was not a delusion which affected his mind in regard to any of his near relations, he did not for instance imagine that his daughter Maud (Mrs. Woolmer) was dead. Had he had a delusion of this sort, it might well have been urged that it influenced him in the framing of his Will and that he was not of a sound disposing mind.

We accordingly hold that he duly executed the Will of the 4th October 1916 and we dismiss the appeal with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

SHAHZADI BEGUM—PLAINTIFF—APPELLANT

versus

MAHBUB ALI SHAH AND OTHERS—DEFENDANTS—RESPONDENTS.

Court Fees Act (VII of 1870), s. 7 (i), (ii), Sch. II, Art. 17—Declaration of right to receive periodical payment with consequential relief, suit for—Court-fee payable.

Where a plaintiff prays for a declaration of right to receive a periodical payment, and also asks for arrears of the sum so payable, the Court-fee payable should be calculated, under section 7 (ii) of the Court Fees Act, on ten times the amount claimed to be payable for one year in respect of the periodical payment plus the amount claimed as arrears. [p. 812, col. 1.]

Reference under section 5 of the Court Fees Act.

FACTS appear from the following

OFFICE REPORT.—This is an appeal against the decree of the Court below dismissing the plaintiff's suit

(a) for a declaration as against the defendants that the plaintiff and her descendants generation after generation are entitled to receive from the defendants and their representatives Rs. 100 per mensem, which is a charge on the property mentioned in Schedule A attached to the plaint, and

(b) for a decree awarding Rs. 1,800 on account of monthly allowance at the rate of Rs. 100 per mensem for 18 months from 1st January 1913 to 1st July 1914.

The claim regarding relief (a) was, for purposes of jurisdiction, valued at Rs. 76,216 and a Court fee of Rs. 10 was paid thereon, and that regarding relief (b) at Rs. 1,800, and a Court-fee of Rs. 115 was paid thereon. In all a Court-fee of Rs. 125 was paid on the plaint. So far as relief (b) is concerned, the Court-fee has been correctly paid under section 7, clause (i) of the Court Fees Act, but the payment of a fixed fee of Rs. 10 in respect of relief (a) does not seem to be adequate. Relief (a) comes within the purview of clause (ii) of section 7, and so Court-fee ought to have been paid on this relief on 10 times the amount claimed to be payable for one year.

The question of sufficiency or otherwise of the Court-fee paid on the plaint and of the valuation of the suit was the subject of an issue in the Court below. At the trial of the suit the Court appears to have proceeded on a different basis. It was argued by the defendants that relief (b) was consequential on relief (a) and so ad valorem Court fee must be paid on the value of the relief sought. The Court held that the two reliefs being independent of each other, the Court fee paid was sufficient. The question of valuation was not considered. The decision of the Court below in the matter of Court-fee is, I submit, correct so far that the relief (b) is not consequential on relief (a). However, the Court below did not consider whether relief (a) was taxable under section 7, clause (ii), Schedule I of the Court Fees Act and not under Article 17, clause (iii), Schedule II of the Act. A fixed fee of Rs. 10 was paid on the plaint under the above Article 17, clause (iii), on the ground that it was a suit to obtain a declaratory decree where no consequential relief was prayed. In any case the decision of the Court below in regard to Court-fee is not binding on this Court. Under section 12 of the Act this Court is competent to open the question of Court-fee if the Court considers that the question has been wrongly decided by the Court below to the detriment of the revenue.

I have not been able to find a case of this Court on all fours with the present case, but there is a case to be found in Narsinvacharya v. Swami Rayacharya (1).

The facts of that case seem to correspond with the facts of this case. The relief asked for in that case was for a declaration of right to an annuity and it was held that the stamp for a petition of special appeal should be regulated by the market value of the annuity and that "prima facie" ten times the amount of the annuity should be assumed to be its market value. On the authority of the ruling of the Bombay High Court which does not appear to have been overruled by any other High Court and which is quite consistent with the provisions contained in clause (ii) of section 7 of the Court Fees Act, Court fee must be paid on Rs. 13,800, as per detail given below:—

Relief (a)—100 into 12 into 10	=	Rs. 12,000
Relief (b)	„	1,800
		Rs. 13,800.

On the above total valuation a Court-fee of Rs. 595 is payable. A Court fee of Rs. 125 having been paid, there is, therefore, a deficiency of Rs. 470 due from the plaintiff-appellant on the plaint.

The suit having been dismissed the plaintiff has filed this appeal, valuing it at Rs. 50,000 and paying a Court fee of Rs. 125 thereon, as on the plaint. The relief sought by this appeal is that the decree of the Court below be set aside and the suit decreed. For the reasons given above a Court-fee of Rs. 595 is also payable on this appeal. A Court-fee of Rs. 125 having been paid, there is, therefore, a deficiency of Rs. 470 in this Court.

Total deficiency due from the plaintiff-appellant in this Court and lower Court is Rs. 940.

I may mention that the valuation of the suit and the appeal should be taken to be Rs. 13,800.

OBJECTION.—The Stamp Reporter has misunderstood the nature of the suit and the applicability of section 7, clause (ii) of the Court Fees Act.

The present suit is in effect a suit for recovery of arrears of maintenance on the basis of the terms of the sale-deed, dated the 11th of March 1898, executed by plaintiff in favour of defendants Nos. 1 and 2 and Syed Wajid Ali Shah, deceased, by which plaintiff sold her share in the estate of her father for a consideration of Rs. 3,500 in cash and Rs. 100 monthly to be paid to her during her lifetime and to her descendants from generation to generation.

No doubt, the plaintiff in her plaint seeks a relief for declaration that according to the terms of the sale deed plaintiff, and after her, her descendants from generation to generation, are entitled to receive from the defendants Rs. 100 per mensem, but this relief in the first instance is incidental to the second relief, which is the consequential relief, and consequently no separate Court-fee is leviable on the first relief. The amount of maintenance has already been determined by the parties and the plaintiff simply asks for the recovery of the amount. This suit falls under section 7, sub section (iv), clause (c), inasmuch as there is a prayer for a declaratory decree and consequential relief. Unless the Court holds that the contract between the parties entered in the sale-deed was a valid and binding contract, no decree in regard to relief (b) can be passed.

The plaintiff does not ask the Court to determine the amount of monthly allowance or annuity for which any Court fee under section 7, sub section (ii), is required by law.

(1) 5 B. H. C. R. (A. C. J.) 55.

Even if it be held that a separate Court-fee should be paid on the declaratory decree in relief (a), ten rupees already paid are sufficient.

Suits for maintenance should be distinguished from suits for arrears of maintenance: the former are valued at the amount claimed as payable for ten years, and the latter at the amount claimed as arrears. Where the object of the suit is not merely to recover arrears of maintenance already determined but to obtain a decree fixing the rate of maintenance, then section 7, sub-section (ii), applies, otherwise not. See Punjab Stamp Manual, 1888, page 69, paragraph 102. The ruling in Narsinvacharya v. Swami Rayacharya (1) does not apply to the present case. There the right and the amount of annuity was to be determined by the Court, and, therefore, Court-fee was leviable on ten times the amount of the annuity. The case that may be said to closely resemble the present one is that reported as Girijanund Datta Jha v. Sailajanund Datta Jha (2). That was a suit upon an ekrar executed by the priest for recovery of arrears of maintenance and for declaration that the money due was realisable from the surplus of the offerings to the idol. The Judges held that Rs. 10 was the proper Court-fee on the declaratory relief.

My submission is that the suit falls under section 7, sub-section (i). This suit is for recovery of arrears of maintenance based upon a contract between the parties and the declaration sought for is that according to the contract certain properties are chargeable with the said amount for ever.

The matter being referred to the Taxing Officer, he referred it for final decision to the Bench hearing the appeal.

Mr. Nehal Chand and the Hon'ble Dr. Tej Bahadur Sapru, for the Appellant.

Mr. A. E. Ryves (Government Advocate), for the Crown (Board of Revenue).

JUDGMENT.—A question has been raised in this appeal as to the amount of Court-fee to be paid in respect of relief (a), claimed in paragraph 13 of the plaint. That relief is in the following terms:—I may be declared as against the defendants that the plaintiff and her descendants generation after generation are entitled to receive from the defendants and their representatives Rs. 100 per mensem, which is a charge on the property mentioned in Schedule A." There is a further prayer for the recovery of Rs. 1,800 as arrears. Court fees were paid as to the first relief of a sum of Rs. 10, it being contended on behalf of the plaintiff that she was liable under clause 17 of Schedule II of the Court Fees Act to the payment of a Court fee of Rs. 10 only. An objection was raised in the Court below as to the amount of Court-fee in respect of this part of the claim. The learned Subordinate Judge decided in favour of the plaintiff. The claim was, however, dismissed and an appeal has been preferred by the plaintiff to this Court.

The office submitted a report that the amount of Court fee, namely, Rs. 10, which the plaintiff has paid in regard to relief (a) in the plaint and on the memorandum of appeal was insufficient, and Mr. Ryves, on behalf of the Board of Revenue, supports the office report, and urges that the amount of Court-fee payable by the plaintiff is not the fixed sum of Rs. 10 for this part of the claim but ad valorem Court-fee as prescribed in section 7, clause (ii) of the Court Fees Act. If the suit had been a suit for a declaratory decree only, without a prayer for consequential relief, Article 17 might have applied; but in the present case the plaintiff claimed not only a declaration of her right to get a periodical payment of Rs. 100 a month, but also a sum of Rs. 1,800, so that there was a prayer for consequential relief in addition to a prayer for a declaratory decree. In this view Article 17 could not apply to the case. Section 7 of the Court Fees Act provides in clause (i) that in suits for money, including suits for damages, or compensation, or arrears of maintenance, of annuities, or other sums payable periodically, Court fee is to be paid according to the amount claimed. Then follows clause (ii), which is in these terms :—In suits for maintenance and annuities or other sums payable periodically, according to the value of the subject matter of the suit, and such value shall be deemed to be ten times the amount claimed as payable for one year." In the present suit the plaintiff has in clause (a) of the reliefs prayed for in the plaint asked for a declaration that she and her legal representatives are entitled generation after generation to receive from the defendant and from their property Rs. 100 a month. This is a claim for a sum, other than maintenance or annuity, which is payable periodically. In a case like this if clause (ii) is applicable, the Court-fee is to be paid on ten times the amount claimed to be payable for one year. In our opinion this is a case to which clause (ii) of section 7 fully applies. The claim is, as stated above, for a declaration of right to a periodical payment and, therefore, Court fee is to be paid on this part of the claim on ten times the amount claimed to be payable for one year. The sum of Rs. 100 a month is claimed as payable and, therefore, for one year the amount payable is Rs. 1,200; Court-fee is payable on ten times that amount, namely, Rs. 12,000.

We allow the appellant three months to make good the deficiency in Court-fee on the memorandum of appeal presented in this Court and on the plaint filed in the Court below.

Order accordingly.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), s. 47—Execution of decree Application to be brought on record as representative of judgment-debtor—Court to which application should be made.

Where a person applies to be brought on the record as the representative of the judgment-debtor so that he may raise a question to be decided by the executing Court under section 47 of the Civil Procedure Code the proper Court to entertain the application is the Court executing the decree.

Appeal against the order of the Court of the Subordinate Judge, Negapatam, dated the 1st of October 1918, in Execution

ABHE SINGH v. BINODI LAL.

Appeal No. 873 of 1918, in Original Suit No 14 of 1914.

Mr. T. R. Venkatarama Sastriar, for the Appellant

Messrs. T. Narasimha Aiyangar and V. K. Srinivasa Aiyangar, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—We think the Subordinate Judge is wrong in holding that the petitioner, who wanted to be brought on record as the representative of the judgment-debtor in order that he might raise a question covered by section 47, Civil Procedure Code, must apply to the Kumbakonam Subordinate Court which passed the decree. Apparently he has in mind the ruling of this Court in Swaminatha Ayyar v. Vaidyanatha Sastri (1), but that related to an application under section 234 of the Civil Procedure Code to bring in the legal representative of a deceased judgment-debtor on record, which is expressly provided for in the Code. This application is made so that the petitioner may raise a question to be decided by the executing Court under section 47, Civil Procedure Code, and we think that the Court executing the decree is the proper Court to entertain this application.

The appeal is, therefore, allowed. We set aside the order of the Subordinate Judge and remand the petition to him for disposal on the merits. The respondent will pay the costs of the appellant.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), s. 11—Res judicata between co-defendants—Reasons for decree, whether part of decree—Appeal, whether permissible against reasons for decree.

ABBE SINGH v. BINODI LAL.

A decision in a former suit does not operate by way of res judicata between co-defendants, unless it was a decision necessary to the decision of that suit. [p. 814, col 1]

Plaintiffs sued defendants for a declaration that they were owners of a certain plot of land Prior to this one C. had sued the present plaintiffs for an injunction restraining them from interfering with his building on the plot and they had resisted the claim on the ground of ownership The father of the present defendants alleged his own title and asked to be impleaded. He was made a co-defendant and an issue was struck as to the rights of the defendants inter se. He produced a sale-deed showing that the site had been purchased by a common ancestor of himself and C. The Court thereupon dismissed the suit leaving the parties to bear their own costs, The decree contained the Munsif's reasons for arriving at his decision. The defendants present plaintiffs) appealed as to costs and got them from the District Judge:

Held, (1) that the words in the Munsif's decree (in the earlier suit) which gave the reasons for his decision were no part of the decree proper and did not give the defendants, present plaintiffs, any right of appeal: [p 8 , col. 2; p 814, col .]

(2) that the defendants, present plaintiffs, could not appeal and did not appeal against the decree except as to costs: [p. 8 4, col. 1,]

(3) that the former decision was consequently no bar to the present suit. [p. 814, col 2.]

The reasons for a decree are not any part of the decree even though they may be inserted in the decree sheet, and a party can only appeal against the decree proper [p. 814, col. 2.]

Second appeal from the decree of the District Judge, Gurgaon at Hissar, dated the 16th June 1919, affirming that of the Munsif, 1st Class, Gurgaon, dated the 15th February 1919.

Lala Madan Gopal, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The plaintiff Abhe Singh and two others sue the sons of the late Ji Sukh for a declaration that they are owners of a certain plot of land. Their suit has been dismissed by the lower Courts as barred by the principle of res judicata.

In a former suit one Chattarbhuj was the plaintiff. He sued the present plaintiffs, alleging that he was the owner of this plot and asking for an injunction restraining them from interfering with his building on the plot. Abhe Singh, etc. resisted the claim on the ground of ownership. Ji Sukh came forward alleging his own title and asked to be impleaded; he was added as a co-defendant. An issue was then added as to the rights of the defendants inter se. Ji Sukh produced a sale-deed to show that the site had been purchased by a common ancestor of himself and Chatterbhuj. The Munsif dismissed the suit, holding that the production of the sale-deed and the evidence as to Ji Sukh's possession were fatal to Chattarbhuj's claim. He left the parties to bear their own costs. Chattarbhuj did not appeal. Abhe Singh, etc, appealed as to costs and the District Judge accepted the appeal and allowed them costs.

The lower Courts in the present suit have held that the former suit is a bar to the present claim.

Several rulings have been cited on both sides. It seems clear that any decision in the former suit is no bar unless it was a decision necessary to the decision of that suit, and for plaintiffs it is urged (1) that the Munsif in the former suit came to no clear finding as to Ji Sukh's title, but merely held that he was in possession, and (2) that all that was necessary for the dismissal of that suit was to decide that Chattarbhuj had proved his title and that it was unnecessary to go further and decide which of the rival defendants was the rightful claimant. It is also urged that Abhe Singh, etc., could not appeal from the Munsif's decision except as to costs. The reply to this last contention is that as the Munsif's decree embodied a finding as to Ji Sukh's rights, Abhe Singh, etc., could have appealed as to the merits and not only as to costs, and it is pointed out that in their grounds of appeal Abhe Singh, etc., attempted to go into the merits of the case.

The Munsif's decree runs as follows:—"Pas yeh hukm diya jata hai ki chunki ba rue dastawezat wa shahadat arazi mutadawia par kabza Mudaiale number 4 min umla Mudai alahim paya jata hai is liye dawa Mudai kharij kiya jata hai." Now a decree is the formal expression of an adjudication. The adjudication in this case was the dismissal of the suit. The reasons for the decree, are not, in my opinion, any part of the decree even though they may be inserted in the decree sheet. A party to a suit can only appeal against the decree. The decree would have been just the same, i. e, the plaintiffs' suit would have been dismissed if the Munsif had found that Abhe Singh, etc., held the title-deeds and were in possession. How could Abhe Singh, etc., claim to be aggrieved by a decree which dismissed the suit brought against them? They could of course appeal as to costs and they did so. In their grounds of appeal they attempted to advance certain arguments as to the merits, but the appeal is headed merely as an appeal regarding costs, and the District Judge, rightly in my opinion, confined himself to the question of costs when deciding the appeal. I hold that, except as to costs, Abbe Singh, etc, could not and did not appeal from the Munsif's decision.

The learned Vakil for the respondent frankly admits that in his opinion if the decree in the former suit had been simply one dismissing the suit and saying nothing as to the merits of either of the rival defendants, the decision would be no bar to the present suit. I agree with him entirely, and I go further and hold that the words in the decree which give the reasons for the decision are no part of the decree proper and did not give Abbe Singh, etc., any right of appeal.

There are, of course, cases in which a decision as to the rights or liabilities of the defendants inter se makes the matter in dispute res judicata and bars further litigation. A fairly common case is when a plaintiff sues two defendants, and the question is which one of the two is liable to meet the plaintiff's claim. If in such a case the decision is that defendant No. 1 is liable and not defendant No. 2, then defendant No. 1 cannot bring a fresh suit to recover from defendant No. 2. But in such a case the defendant who is made liable has a right of appeal. To hold that even where there is no right of appeal the matter is res judicata would, in my opinion, lead to great hardship in some cases. A dummy plaintiff might be put up to bring a claim which obviously could not succeed, not with the idea of that plaintiff getting a decree but with the intention of getting a decision of a matter in dispute between rivals. If those rivals were made defendants and the suit were dismissed neither defendant would have any right of appeal, though the Court might have come to a perfectly unreasonable and unsound decision as to the claims of the rival defendants. My view is supported by the remarks in Nur Bakhsh v. Ahmad Bakhsh (1) and the rulings there cited.

I hold that the former decision is no bar to the present suit, and I accept this appeal and reversing the orders of the lower Courts dismissing the suit, I remand the suit to the first Court for decision on the merits. Stamp on appeal to this Court to be refunded. Other costs in this Court and in the District Judge's Court to be costs in the cause.

Appeal accepted; Case remanded.

Hindu Law—Adoption—Widow succeeding as heir to son, power of, to adopt—Consent of co-parceners, whether necessary.

A Hindu widow succeeding as heir to her son who dies unmarried is entitled to adopt to her husband, provided that her son had not attained ceremonial competence. In such a case it makes no difference that the husband of the adopting widow died in union with his co-parceners and that her son separated subsequently and that the consent of the co-parceners was not obtained. [p. 815, cols. 1 & 2.]

Mr. H. B. Gumaste, for the Appellants.

Mr. A. G. Desai, for Respondents Nos. 1 and 2.

JUDGMENT.

MACLEOD, C. J.—The plaintiffs sued for possession of a house and a one-fifth share of the lands as described in paragraph 1 of the plaint with mesne profits.

The first plaintiff is the adopted son of the 2nd plaintiff, who is the widow of one Bharmappa. Bharmappa admittedly died in union with his brothers, defendants Nos. 1 to 3 and the husband of defendant No. 4, leaving a minor son Mahadevappa. Thereafter there was a partition between Mahadevappa and his uncles. He died unmarried in 1907, leaving his mother the 2nd defendant as his heir. In 1908 she demanded her share which the defendants refused in 1908, since when they have been in possession against her. In 1909 she adopted the 1st plaintiff.

The 2nd and 3rd defendants in their written statement contended inter alia that the adoption was invalid, and this is the only question which has been argued before us in second appeal. The trial Court decided in plaintiff's favour. The lower Appellate Court, however, modified the decree of the trial Court, holding that the adoption was invalid and awarded possession to the 2nd plaintiff only. It must be considered now as settled law that a widow succeeding as heir to her son who dies unmarried is entitled to adopt to her husband, provided that her son has not attained ceremonial competence: Verabhai Ajubhai v. Bai Hiraba (1).

The principle of such recognition is that the act of adoption is derogatory of no other vested right than those of the adopting mother: see Rajah Vellanki Venkata Krishna Row v. Venkata Rama Lakshmi Narsayya (2), Gavdappa v Girimallappa (3) and Ayappa v. Appanna (4). But it has been contended that because Bharmappa died in union, and thereafter his widow could not adopt without the consent of his co-parceners, her right to adopt came to an end at the separation and could not be revived. No authority which is really in point has been cited for such a proposition. Reliance was place on the decision in Ramkrishna v. Shamrao (5), but what was decided in that case was that when the inheritance of the son has vested in some other heir than the mother herself, her power of adoption comes to an end and cannot be revived. Nor is the case of Datto Govind v. Pandurang Vinayak (6) of any assistance to us. There A and S were two joint brothers. S died leaving a widow, who on A's death succeeded to the estate. She adopted a son to her husband and the reversioners objected. The question whether a widow, who succeeds to an estate not her husband's but as Gotraja Sapinda of the last male holder, in consequence of the absence of nearer heirs such as the mother and grandmother, could make a valid adoption, was answered in the negative.

That is not the question before us in this case, which, as far as I can gather, has never arisen before, and must be decided on general principles. In this Presidency no express authorization by the husband to the widow to adopt is necessary. Only if he is a member of a joint family the consent of the co-parceners is necessary. In this case there could be no talk of adoption as long as Mahadevappa was alive, but it is not correct to say that the power to adopt must be in the widow at the time of her husband's death, and if it is not that it cannot arise afterwards. If Bharmappa had died separate the power to adopt remained suspended, at any rate as long as Mahadevappa did not marry or attain ceremonial competence. Until the separation her power still remained suspended, and if Mahadevappa had died in union, she could have adopted with the consent of defendants Nos. 1 and 3. I see no reason, therefore, why after the separation the power of adoption did not remain suspended, the only change being that if events happened which enabled it to be exercised, there were no longer any co parceners whose consent was necessary. The rights of reversioners are not vested, so that her adoption of the 1st plaintiff was not derogatory of any vested right That, and the condition that the son's estate has not vested first in some one other than herself, are the only two conditions which, in my opinion, stand in the way of the widow's right to adopt even if her husband died in union.

Therefore, the appeal must be allowed and the decree of the trial Court restored with proportionate costs on the defendants Nos. 2 and 3 throughout, except that only Rs. 400 are allowed as mesne profits.

The provisions of Order XXI, rule 83, of the Civil Procedure Code do not apply to a sale of property directed to be sold in execution of a decree for sale in enforcement of a mortgage on such property. [p. 817, cols. 1 & 2.]

A decree was passed in terms of a compromise and directed the judgment-debtor to pay the debt due to the decree-holder by certain specified instalments, providing also that in case of default the property mortgaged to the decree-holder would be sold Default having been made the decree-holder applied for sale of the property. Miscellaneous first appeal from the order of the Senior Subordinate Judge, Multan, dated the 28th August 1919.

Mr. Morton and Sardar Tej Singh, for the Appellant.

Mr. Mukand Lal Puri, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—This appeal arises out of proceedings in execution of a decree obtained by the Punjab National Bank, Limited, Multan, against the appellant, Seth Kora Mal. The decree was passed in terms of a compromise, and directed the judgment-debtor to pay the debt due to the decree-holder by certain instalments specified therein, and further provided that, in default of the judgment debtor paying the money as therein mentioned, the property mortgaged by him to the decree holder should be sold. It appears that a default was made by the judgment-debtor, and the decree-holder consequently applied for the sale of the property.

In pursuance of a notice issued to the judgment-debtor under Order XXI, rule 66, Civil Procedure Code, in connection with the drawing up of a proclamation of sale, he appeared in Court and made several objections to the proposed sale. These objections were rejected by the learned Subordinate Judge, but have again been pressed before me in this appeal. I propose to deal with them seriatim.

It is contended in the first place that the decree, which is sought to be executed, was only a preliminary decree in a suit for sale by the mortgagee as contemplated by Order XXXIV, rule 4, Civil Procedure Code; and that no final decree in terms of rule 5 has yet been passed. Now, it is true that the suit was brought by the mortgagee for the recovery of money upon the strength of a mortgage; but the decree was, as stated above, passed in accordance with the terms of a compromise arrived at between the parties. The decree itself is not a preliminary one within the purview of Order XXXIV, rule 4, Civil Procedure Code, but is a final one ordering the judgment-debtor to pay the money and directing the sale of the property in default of payment. The Court of execution has to execute the decree as it stands, and it is not open to the parties to impeach the validity or correctness of the decree. In view of the terms of the decree, I have no hesitation in agreeing with the Subordinate Judge that it is capable of execution, and that no other decree was necessary or contemplated by the parties.

The next objection is that as the application for execution was made after the expiry of one year from the date of the decree, the Court executing the decree was bound to issue a notice to the judgment-debtor as required by Order XXI, rule 22, Civil Procedure Code. Now it is true that the application for execution was made after the expiry of one year from the date of the decree, and that the Subordinate Judge is wrong in holding that the terminus a quo is not the date of the decree but the date of default in paying the instalment which gave the right to execute the decree. The fact, however, remains that the Court did issue a notice to the judgment-debtor, though it was issued not under rule 22, but under rule 66, and that the latter was afforded an opportunity to show cause why the decree should not be executed against him. There can, therefore, be no doubt that the object aimed at by rule 22 was carried out, and the mere fact that the notice was not under that rule does not vitiate the proceedings. It would, therefore, be an act of supererogation to issue a fresh notice under rule 22, and to adjudicate again upon the objections which have already been determined by the Court. No sale has yet taken place, and the omission to serve a notice expressly under the aforesaid rule has not resulted in any injury to the judgment-debtor.

The appellant also relies upon an agreement alleged to have been entered into between the parties by which he was given further time to satisfy the decree. It is to be observed that no reference was made to such an agreement in the application made by the judgment-debtor on the 26th June 1919, and the allegation appears to be a mere afterthought. It is most unlikely that the creditor, who has been resisting the dilatory tactics of the judgment debtor, would have agreed to the grant of further time.

Lastly it is urged that the judgment-debtor should have been allowed to sell the property privately, and that the Court should have granted him a certificate for a private sale under Order XXI, rule 83, Civil Procedure Code. Considering that sufficient time has already been allowed to the judgment-debtor, the Court was fully justified in declining to exercise its discretion in this matter. Further, the provisions of the rule do not apply to a sale of property directed to be sold in execution of a decree for sale in enforcement of a mortgage on such property, the reason being that in the case of a mortgage decree the right of sale does not depend upon attachment in execution but is conferred by the decree itself. As stated above, the decree in the present case contains a specific provision as to the sale of the property, and the Court has, therefore, no discretion in the matter.

These are all the points argued before me and upon every one of them my opinion is against the appellant. Accordingly I dismiss the appeal with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

JOHURMULL PREMSUKH—PLAINTIFFS—RESPONDENTS.

Arbitration proceedings, stay of—Interlocutory injunction, when can be granted.

Where the parties to a contract agree to refer matters in dispute to arbitration, proceedings in arbitration can only be stayed by an interlocutory injunction where the plaintiff impeaches the contract on an equitable ground, such as that he was induced to enter into the contract by fraudulent misrepresentation. [p. 819, col. 1.]

Appeal against the order of Mr. Justice Chaudhuri, dated the 13th June 1919.

FACTS appear from the following judgment of

CHAUDHURI, J.—The plaintiff firm has instituted this suit for a declaration that the contract, dated the 6th July 1918, is void and unenforceable against them and for an injunction restraining the defendant firm from proceeding with the arbitration proceedings before the Bengal Chamber of Commerce mentioned in the plaint. They allege that after the contract was entered into, they called upon the defendant firm to declare the name of the mill in terms of the contract but the defendant firm failed to declare the name and requested the plaintiffs to send the goods in their name. The plaintiffs thereupon treated the contract as void, inasmuch as the defendant firm had no principals and as they had failed to disclose the name of the mill. The defendant firm's answer is that there is a well-known and recognised usage in the jute and hessian trades in Calcutta that the following incidents were and are annexed to the contract in suit:—"That the persons signing as brokers in the case of contracts purporting to be for their principals are themselves entitled to enforce such contracts and are liable personally on such contracts in all cases, i.e., in cases where they have been undisclosed principals as also in cases where in fact they have no principals and act for themselves and on their own account. They may sign such contracts as aforesaid when negotiations between them and some mill or mills or other party are in progress, and, on the closing of such negotiations, within a reasonable time declare the name of their principals accordingly and when such negotiations are not so closed, the persons signing as aforesaid are entitled to enforce such contracts and remain solely personally liable on such contracts." They allege that the contract was entered into on the defendant firm's risk and responsibility and that they were to be treated and as a matter of fact were treated as principals in the transaction, and they deny that they represented themselves to have acted as brokers. They do not admit that they were bound to declare the name of the mill and that they were entitled to ask for the goods in their own name. They refer to certain correspondence and allege that the plaintiff firm antedated its letter of cancellation. It was held in Ramji Das v. Janki Das (1) that where a person in entering into a contract purported to act as agent for an undisclosed principal, but in fact no such principal existed and the person was in reality acting on his own account, he is debarred from suing on the contract by section 236 of the Contract Act.

It was held in Joy Lal v. Monmotha Nath Mullik (2) that in a suit of this character evidence of the alleged custom is admissible. That case related to an application to set aside an award of the Bengal Chamber of Commerce and it was held that the Chamber had jurisdiction to go into the question and the award was not, therefore, bad. It seems to me that the questions involved in this suit are of a complicated character and involve issues as regards custom and misrepresentations made and also the truth and otherwise of certain important letters between the parties being sent on proper dates. It involves questions of fraud and forgery, and I think under the circumstances it is a fit case for trial by this Court and not by the Chamber. It was held in Gajanand Maskara v. Shaik Taleb Jalaluddin (3) that in a case where the plaintiff was impeaching the contract on the ground of fraud, it was quite right to stay the arbitration proceedings. Another ground has been taken, whether such a suit is at all maintainable having regard to section 42 of the Specific Relief Act, which corresponds to English Order XXV—5. This is a question which ought to be properly determined as a preliminary issue in the suit. The Rule is made absolute; costs of this application will be costs in the cause.

Sir B. C. Mitter (with him Mr. K. P. Khaitan), for the Appellants.

Mr. N. N. Sircar, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.

SANDERSON, C. J.—The learned Judge has granted an interlocutory injunction restraining the arbitration proceedings in this case.

The learned Judge relied upon several grounds in his judgment, but the learned Counsel appearing in this Court for the plaintiff-respondent has said that he can support one of these grounds only, which was as follows (page 30, line 25): "It was held in Gajanand Maskara v. Shaik Taleb Jalaluddin (3) that in a case where the plaintiff was impeaching the contract on the ground of fraud, it was quite right to stay the arbitration proceedings." That is the only ground on which the learned Counsel has endeavoured to support the learned Judge's judgment—he has not argued the points which were urged in the other case and to which I drew attention in my previous judgment*.

(1) 17 Ind. Cas 678; 89 C. 802; 18 C. W. N. 863.

(2) 35 Ind. Cas. 3; 20 C. W. N. 365.

(3) 46 Ind. Cas. 173; 22 C. W. N. 535.

The question is whether the plaintiffs in this suit can be said to be impeaching the contract upon an equitable ground, such as that the plaintiffs were induced to enter into the contract by fraudulent misrepresentation. A statement of the alleged misrepresentation is found in the letter of Messrs. Fox and Mandal at page 19 where it is said: "The contract was on the face of it with a mill whose name was not disclosed and if your clients chose to pass a so-called contract without having secured a mill as their principal, they were guilty of misrepresentation; as soon as this became obvious to our clients, viz, when your clients asked for delivery to themselves, our clients were perfectly justified in repudiation of the so called contract." When I turn to the plaint which was filed in this case, I find that it is in paragraph 4 that the ground, upon which reliance is now placed, is dealt with. There I find this: "inasmuch as the defendant firm had failed to disclose the name of their principals and inasmuch as the defendant firm had in fact no principal, the plaintiff firm treated the said contract as void and inoperative." To my mind, if the plaintiffs desired to impeach this contract on the ground that the defendants had made a fraudulent misrepresentation which induced them to enter into the contract, then they ought to have so pleaded. There is no such allegation in the plaint: It is clear that the misrepresentation must have in fact materially induced the contract in order to give the right of avoidance. There is no allegation in this plaint that the plaintiffs were deceived or that the alleged misrepresentation induced the plaintiffs to enter into the contract. I think this is one answer to the argument which was put forward by the learned Counsel for the plaintiffs.

I think there is a further answer:—The defendants alleged that in the trade in question there is a well-known and universal custom. The custom alleged is set out in the learned Judge's judgment at page 29 of the paper-book—I do not propose to read it all, but part of it runs as follows: "They (i. e., the persons signing as brokers) may sign such contracts as aforesaid when negotiations between them and some mill or mills or other party are in progress, and, on the closing of such negotiations within a reasonable time, declare the name of their principals accordingly, and when such negotiations are not so closed, the persons signing as aforesaid are entitled to enforce such contracts and remain solely personally liable on such contracts."

The defendants argued that the alleged custom is tacitly incorporated into the contract and must be taken as a part, though an unexpressed part, of the agreement between the parties: and, that if the alleged custom is taken as part of the contract between the parties, that custom in itself destroys the allegation of fraudulent misrepresentation which the plaintiffs have urged in their argument in this Court, but which, as I have said before, was not properly pleaded in their pleading. For these reasons, having regard to the form of the pleading in this case, and having regard to the alleged custom which is relied upon by the defendants which they say must be incorporated into the written contract, I am of opinion that this is not a suit in which the plaintiffs can be said to be impeaching the contract upon equitable grounds. For these reasons the appeal should be allowed and the questions at issue between the parties should be referred to the tribunal which the parties themselves have chosen. Consequently, the interlocutory injunction which has been granted by Mr. Justice Chaudhuri should be set aside and the respondents must pay the costs in this Court and in the Court below.

Appeal, under section 10 of the Letters Patent, against the order of Mr. Justice Shadi Lal, passed on the 26th June 1919, in Civil Appeal No. 1074 of 1919.

FACTS appear from the following judgment of.

SHADI LAL, J. (June 26, 1919.)—Upon an application made by the liquidator under section 150 of the Indian Companies Act, VI of 1882, the District Judge, after issuing a notice by registered post to the appellant Mehraj Din, passed on the 20th June 1916 an ex parte order for the payment of a certain sum of money due by the latter on the strength of a pro-note executed by him. On the 5th October 1918 Mehraj Din made an application to the District Judge for setting aside the ex parte order, which application has been dismissed as barred by time. The learned Judge does not refer to any provision of the law which he considers to be applicable to the application in question and which furnishes the bar of limitation.

Mr. Narinjan Parshad for the respondent invites my attention to Article 164 of the Indian Limitation Act, but it is patent that that article applies to an application for an order to set aside a decree passed ex parte. Now, a payment order under section 150 of the Indian Companies Act is not a decree, though it is to be executed as if it were a decree. I must, therefore, hold that Article 164 has no application whatsoever to the case.

Nor am I prepared to accept the contention that the application is governed by the provisions of section 169 of the Indian Companies Act. In this connection it is sufficient to refer to the judgment of the Bombay High Court in Parvatishankar v. Ishvardas Jagjivandas (1), in which it was held that the term "re-hearing" in the aforesaid section means a re-hearing in the nature of an appeal, and that the section does not apply to an application to set aside an ex parte order which is not, strictly speaking, an application for a re-hearing, although it may result in it. This view has my entire concurrence, and I do not, therefore, think that the liquidator can bring the case within the purview of section 169.

Mr. Narinjan Parshad is unable to cite any other provision of the law which would be applicable to the case before me. Article 181 of the Limitation Act, which is the residuary article applicable to all applications for which no period of limitation is provided elsewhere either in the Limitation Act or by section 48 of the Code of Civil Procedure, may possibly apply to the application in question, but it is beyond dispute that the application was made within the period of three years prescribed by the said article.

For the foregoing reasons I am unable to hold that the application is barred by time. Whether the application should be dismissed on the ground that the appellant has been deliberately negligent or on any other ground is not a matter before me, and I accordingly refrain from pronouncing any opinion thereon. Accordingly I accept the appeal and setting aside the order of the District Judge remit the case for decision on the merits. I leave the parties to bear their own costs in this Court.

JUDGMENT.—The facts of this case are given in the judgment of Shadi Lal, J., dated the 23th June 1919. Briefly an application was made by the Liquidator under section 150 of the Companies Act, VI of 1882, to the District Judge for a payment order and a notice was issued by registered post to the respondent, Mehraj Din, and on the 20th June 1916 an ex parte order was passed against him. He applied on the 5th of October 1918 for setting aside this order. His application was dismissed as barred by time by the learned District Judge, who did not refer to any provision of the law which he considered applicable. From the terms of his judgment, however, it is clear that he considered that an application should have been made within 30 days from the date when Mehraj Din had knowledge of the order ; in other words, that the matter was governed by Article 164 of the Limitation Act.

Against this decision an appeal was preferred to this Court and heard by Shadi Lal, J., who decided that a payment order was not a decree and that Article 164 had, therefore, no application. He also considered that the application was not governed by the provisions of section 169 of the Indian Companies Act. He considered that Article 181 of the Limitation Act might possibly apply but gave no definite finding on this point. Against this decision Mr. Niranjan Parshad, Liquidator, has preferred an appeal under the Letters Patent and reiterates his contentions that the application is governed either by section 169 of the Indian Companies Act or by Article 164 of the Limitation Act,

Mr. Niranjan Parshad first refers to section 169 of the Indian Companies Act and urges that this section makes the only provision contained in the Act for the rehearing or re-decision of any matter which has been decided, and that this re-hearing can only take place before a Court of Appeal. As an authority for the latter part of his proposition he refers to Parvatishankar v. Ishvardas Jagjivandas (1) and with this argument we are in full concurrence. He also makes reference to Lindley on Companies, 6th Edition, page 895, in which it is stated that a winding up order might previously have been discharged on motion or petition by the Judge who made it ; but now no Judge can re shear or alter an order, whether made by himself or another Judge, after it has been passed and entered, provided it accurately expresses the intention of the Court ; the power to re hear is part of the appellate jurisdiction and has been transferred to the Court of Appeal. He also relies upon remarks at page 950 of the same volume to the same effect, but he omitted to notice that the learned author referred to other authorities that an order obtained ex parte or one which is in truth a nullity, may perhaps even now be discharged by the Court which made it. We have no difficulty in agreeing with the latter remark as far as Courts in India are concerned and also hold that section 169 has no application to petitions for the setting aside of ex parte decrees. This is plain from the terms of the section itself, as a person affected adversely by an ex parte order cannot in a majority of cases serve a notice of his appeal upon the respondent within three weeks after the order complained of had been made against him. Moreover it is clear that the propriety of setting aside an ex parte order, a function entrusted in all other cases to the Court which made it, cannot be determined by an Appellate Court.

Mr. Niaz Muhammad for the respondent urged that the want of a provision for setting aside an ex parte order in the Companies Act could not deprive his client of any remedy. He contended, therefore, that the Court under the Companies Act, being a Court of civil jurisdiction, was governed in such a matter by the general provisions of the Civil Procedure Code as made applicable by section 141, and that, moreover, under section 151 it had inherent power to make such orders as it considered fit. We think that his contentions represent accurately the law applicable to such cases and that the Court of original jurisdiction should proceed under Order IX, rule 13, mutatis mutandis. Sudevi Devi v. Sovaram Agarwallah (2) is an authority in favour of this view.

Mr. Niranjan Parshad further contends that even if an application for the setting aside of an ex parte decree is competent before the Court of original jurisdiction, the limitation applicable is that provided by Article 164. The ground on which he bases this contention is that a payment order amounts to a decree. He urges that the order conclusively determines the rights of the parties with regard to the matter in controversy in the suit and that insolvency proceedings can rightly be termed suits. As authorities for this proposition he cites Venkata Chondrappa v. Venkatarama Reddi (3), Bhupendro Narain Dutt v. Baroda Prosad Roy (4). We might find it possible to agree with his arguments to some extent if it were not for the proviso (a) to Clause (2) of section 2 of the Civil Procedure Code. This proviso specifically excludes from the definition of a decree an adjudication from which an appeal lies as an appeal from an order. It is not denied before us that an appeal lies from a payment order passed under section 150.

Finally, Mr. Niranjan Parshad disputed the finding that Article 181 of the Limitation Act might possibly apply to such applications. He urges that this article has been held in many judgments to apply to applications only under the Civil Procedure Code. We are inclined to think that the article in question refers to all applications for the making of which the Civil Procedure Code gives authority. As, however, the application is plainly not time barred under this article, it is unnecessary for us to examine or discuss the law thereunder.

We agree with the decision under appeal, which we dismiss with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

JUDGMENT.

RAYMOND, A. J. C.—Plaintiff Mohamad Ali Essaji sought to recover from the defendants A. Phillip & Co. a sum of Rs. 218 13.3, alleging that there was an account between the parties which commenced on the 14th March 1912 and ended on 29th June 1913 and which consisted on the plaintiff's side of goods supplied to the defendants from time to time and payments made by the latter from time to time. A copy of the account was filed with the plaint, and it is evident both from it and from the plaintiff's Pleader's admission that the amount claimed was in respect of interest that had accrued on the principal sum.

The principal contention was that the suit was time barred. The suit was filed on 31st March 1916, more than 3 years after the last debit entry.

The Judge of the Small Causes Court in decreeing the claim relied first on the debit item of Rs. 97 dated 29th June 1913, as being an item in the account as bringing the suit within the period of limitation. It is not disputed that the sum of Rs. 97 was paid by the defendant at the very time he purchased certain goods from the plaintiff, and it seems to me that there was no justification to include this amount as a part of the account. I am of opinion it has been designedly inserted in the account at a later date with the view of extending the period of limitation.

The learned Judge has further relied on two letters, dated 17th May and 28th May 1915, addressed by the defendants to the plaintiff as containing an acknowledgment of liability in respect of the payment of interest, and thus reviving time. He says: "The letters which admit the account should, I think, be treated as acknowledging the account as it should stand, viz., principal and interest which is a legitimate charge on it." He was of opinion that as the debt was admitted, the liability for interest accompanied it.

Now it seems to me that neither expressly nor by necessary implication do either of the letters referred to contain an acknowledgment of liability in respect of the amount claimed in suit in terms of section 19 of the Indian Limitation Act. It is true that the acknowledgment of liability need not be express, but there must be a necessary implication so that the acknowledgment is clear and unequivocal: Bibi Sahibzadi v. Mir Mohamed (1), Benode Behary Mookkerjee v. Raj Narain Mitter (2), and further it is to be remembered that an acknowledgment within the meaning of section 19 of the Indian Limitation Act must distinctly and definitely relate to the liability in dispute, and not any liability: Gopalrao Manohar Tambekar v. Harilal Subrai (3). Now the letter of the 17th May 1915, on which the lower Court has relied as containing an acknowledgment of liability in respect of the interest and which Mr. Dipchand contends saves the bar of limitation, to my mind contains no such acknowledgment either in express terms or by necessary implication. On the contrary, as I read the letter, it distinctly repudiates all liability in respect of the payment of interest. The words are "please note no interest is to be charged as you know us, a century old dealing with you" Mr. Dipchand interprets these words as conveying an implied liability for the payment of interest coupled with a request that the debtor should not be charged any interest in consideration of his being an old customer. And in support of his argument he relies on the case of Shah Mukhun Lall v. Nawab Imtiazood Dowlah (4). But this authority is clearly distinguishable. A perusal of the letter containing the acknowledgment is embodied in extenso in that ruling, and the gist of that letter is that the debtor entreats the creditor to be let off payment of interest as he has no means to pay it. There is a wide difference between the terms of this letter and that of the 17th May 1915 so far as it bears on the question of the acknowledgment and liability of payment of the interest, inasmuch as in the former there can be no doubt the debtor impliedly admits his liability to pay interest but asks to be relieved of payment on account of his poverty. This authority, therefore, gives no support to Mr. Dipchand's contention.

The 2nd letter on which Mr. Dipchand relies is that of the 25th May 1915. But this letter, in my opinion, gives Mr. Dipchand less support than the previous one. The defendant in this letter refers only to the balance of the principal sum due by him, there is no allusion to any interest, much less an acknowledgment of liability of the payment of any interest, either express or implied.

The lower Court is of opinion that as there was an acknowledgment of liability in respect of the amount due as principal, it also involved an admission to pay interest. I do not think so. If a part only of the debt is acknowledged, it is kept alive to that extent only: Chandra Kumar Dhar v. Ram Din Poddar (5). Besides the two letters above referred to Mr. Dipchand has not pointed out any other evidence on the record to save the bar of limitation. I would, therefore, reverse the judgment of the lower Court and dismiss the plaintiff's suit with costs.

FAWCETT, J. C.—I concur. The law, in my opinion, is rightly laid down in Gopalrao

(5) 18 Ind. Cas. 702; 16 C. W. N. 493; 15 C. L. J. 251.

Manohar Tambekar v. Harilal Subrai (3), viz., an acknowledgment must distinctly and definitely relate to the liability in dispute. It need not be express: It may be left to implication; but it must be a necessary implication from the words used that the person acknowledging was referring to and admitting the liability and not any liability. Where a debtor admits that there is a balance due from him on an account which involves, by previous entries or otherwise, a liability for interest, then, no doubt, this admission by him will cover an acknowledgment of liability for interest. But it seems to me absurd and quite unjustifiable to say that an acknowledgment of a balance due on an account can be held to include acknowledgment for liability for interest, when in fact in the very same document a liability for interest is expressly repudiated. The charge of interest which the plaintiff sought to recover may be a fair one in the circumstances of the case, but the Small Cause Court Judge is not on that account justified in ignoring the language of section 19 of the Indian Limitation Act. The plaintiff was clearly to blame for not bringing the suit in time. The last real item in the account is one dated 5th April 1912, and no payment on account was made by the defendants between 7th January 1914 and 28th May 1915. The plaintiff should clearly have taken steps before the 4th April 1915 to see whether the defendants repudiated his claim for interest or not, and have brought this suit in time to recover the interest, if it were disputed.

I also concur with my learned colleague that the item of Rs. 97 clearly cannot be treated as part of the running account. The price of the goods in question was paid by the debtor the very day the goods were supplied. It is, therefore, a case to which section 59 of the Indian Contract Act applies, for the payment of Rs. 97 was made under circumstances implying that the payment was to be appropriated to the discharge of the particular debt of Rs. 97. I, therefore, concur in the order proposed by my learned colleague.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. V, rr. 17, 20—Substituted service, when can be effected—Ex parte decree—Application for setting aside decree suspended—Subsequent application, whether in continuance of original application—Limitation Act (IX of 1908), Sch. I, Art. 164.

Plaintiff sued defendants at Sialkot for an injunction regarding an alleged right of way and the demolition of a wall. Difficulties having arisen in obtaining personal service on the defendants who did not live at Sialkot, notices were affixed on their so-called inhabited house there and an ex parte decree was passed on the 29th November 1912. On the 23rd of December the defendants applied for setting aside the ex parte decree, but in the proceedings it was found impossible to effect personal service on the plaintiff and after vain attempts to do so, the Munsif passed an order that the application be consigned to the record room and that action could be taken when the plaintiff applied for execution. On the 27th March 1914 the decree-holder applied for execution by demolishing the wall and for Rs. 27 as costs. Summonses were ordered to be sent to the judgment-debtors and were served by being affixed on the same house where the judgment-debtors were not residing. An order for demolition was made and the house was ordered to be sold in order that costs might be recovered. The decree-holder, having obtained permission to bid, bought the house for Rs. 40. The judgment-debtors, having obtained information of what had occurred, put in an application on the 25th July 1915 for restoration of the proceedings in the original suit. This application having been dismissed by both the Courts below as time-barred, the defendants applied for revision:

Held, (1) that no legal service as contemplated by the Civil Procedure Code ever took place on the defendants, as no order was passed by the Court under Order V, rule 20, for effecting substituted service. [p. 825, col. 2.]

(2) that upon a proper construction of the law the original application for setting aside the ex parte decree, made as it was within 30 days of the ex parte decree, was bound to succeed; [p. 825, col 2.]

(3) that the mere fact that the original application was consigned to the record room did not in any way necessitate a fresh application; [p. 826, col. 1.]

(4) that the application of the 20th July 1915 must be considered as merely in continuance of the suspended original application; [p. 826, col. 1.]

(5) that consequently no question of limitation arose and the ex parte decree should be set aside. [p. 826, col. 1.]

BARKAT ULLAH v. FAZL-I-MAULA.

Petition for revision of the order of the District Judge, Sialkot, dated the 6th January 1916, affirming that of the Munsif, 1st Class, Sialkot, dated the 23rd October 1915.

Bakhshi Tek Chand, for the Petitioners.

Mr. Mukand Lal Puri, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The plaintiff instituted this suit at Sialkot against three defendants on the 26th August 1912. The suit was for an injunction regarding an alleged right of way and the demolition of a wall. The three defendants were admittedly not resident at the time at Sialkot, and difficulties were experienced in obtaining personal service. Eventually notices were affixed on their so called inhabited house at Sialkot and this service being considered sufficient, an ex parte decree was passed on the 29th November 1912. On the 23rd of December of the same year the defendants applied for the setting aside of the ex parte decree, but in these proceedings the position was reversed and it was impossible to effect personal service on the plaintiff. After vain attempts the Munsif passed an order that the application should be consigned to the record room (dakhul dafter) and that action could be taken when the plaintiff applied for execution. The Munsif in his own hand at the same time wrote a correct address of Barkat Ullah, the principal defendant.

On the 27th March 1914 the decree-holder applied for execution by demolishing the wall and for Rs. 27 in the way of costs. It was ordered that summonses be sent to the judgment-debtors, and these summonses were again served by being affixed on the house in Sialkot in which the judgment debtors were not residing. An order for demolition was duly made, and for the recovery of Rs 27 as costs it was directed that the Sialkot house should be brought to sale. The decree-holder applied for permission to bid and in the absence of other competitors bought the house for Rs. 40. On the 20th July 1915 the judgment-debtors in the case, having obtained information of what had occurred, put in a long and not happily worded application asking for the restoration of the proceedings in the original suit. This application was dismissed by the Munsif on the ground that it was time-barred, and his order was upheld by the District Judge. The judgment debtors have applied for revision of the judgment of the lower Appellate Court and have also instituted a suit on the 27th July 1915 to obtain a declaration that the ex parte decree was obtained by fraud and was of no effect as against them. Their suit has been dismissed, and against this decision they have preferred a second appeal to this Court. We have heard arguments in the application for revision and in the second appeal, and it appears to us that the application for revision must succeed while the appeal must fail.

In connection with the application for revision it is necessary to give the exact facts regarding the so-called service effected on the defendants in the original case. Barkat Ullah, the 1st defendant, was employed in the Police in the Northern Range, his address was given by the plaintiff as employed in the Southern Division, and on the mistake being pointed out, no further efforts were made for personal service. His brother, Muhammad Fazal, was stated as residing with Barkat Ullah and in his case also the summons for personal service had a similar fate. The 3rd defendant, Muhammad Sadiq, was employed at Simla where the summons was sent, but here again on account of an inaccuracy in the address no personal service was effected. The Court at first passed an order for full particulars of the correct addresses to be given, but on the following date, apparently overlooking its previous order, directed that summonses should be given for service to the Pleader of the plaintiff. They were not so given, but copies of the summonses were affixed on the house at Sialkot belonging to the defendants and occupied by tenants. It is clear that no legal service as contemplated by the Civil Procedure Code ever took place on the defendants, as no order was passed by the Court under Order V, rule 20, for effecting substituted service, and the conditions to which Order V, rule 17, relates did not exist in the case. It is, therefore, evident that upon a proper construction of law the application for setting aside the ex parte decree, made as it was within 30 days, was bound to succeed. We have shown above why it failed, and it is for our consideration whether the decisions of the lower Courts on this point are correct.

As we have mentioned, the application for setting aside the ex parte decree was consigned to the record room with the instruction that action would be taken when the plaintiff applied for execution. The judgment-debtors renewed their application apparently as soon as they became aware of the execution, and this application, their Counsel contends, must be considered as merely in continuance of the suspended original application. This view we consider is correct, although the application of the 20th July 1915 is not happily worded. The judgment-debtors, however, were without any legal aid and we are justified, therefore, in deciding the matter not on the exact form of this application but on its substance. There was, it is true, no request for an adjudication of the original application, but the applicants clearly referred to the original application and it was, in our opinion, their intention to revive and continue this application. In these circumstances no question of limitation arises as wrongly considered by the lower Courts. The mere fact that the original application was consigned to the record room did not in any way necessitate a fresh application. It was merely suspended until the plaintiff decree-holder came forward to execute his decree. Holding, therefore, that the lower Courts have misunderstood the situation and, therefore, misapplied the law, we accept the application for revision and set aside the ex parte decree and all the proceedings which have taken place thereunder.

As we have accepted the application for revision, the appeal for a declaration that the decree was obtained by fraud loses all practical importance. We may state, however, briefly that though we do not agree with the ratio decidendi of the lower Appellate Court, we concur in its general finding. The plaintiff gave full particulars, as far as he knew, of the addresses of the defendants and made no attempt to deceive the Court. The facts of the present case differ from those upon which Mela Ram v. Ralla Ram (1) was based. In that case a false address was given by the plaintiffs, with the obviously fraudulent intention that the defendant should not become aware of the suit and that the Court should be induced to pass an ex parte decree in their favour. We dismiss the appeal. The parties can bear their own costs in this Court.

Appeal dismissed.

Mr. Naresh Chandra Sinha, for the Petitioners.

Mr. Lakshmi Kant Jha, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—In this case the petitioner is aggrieved by an order dated the 24th March 1917 in the following words:—"Plaintiff's petition for time is rejected. No steps taken. Ordered, Dismissed for default". What the precise meaning of this order might be is not on the face of it clear; but on looking into the previous orders we find that the petitioner's default consisted in failing to file affidavits of service of summons upon the guardians of the minors in the suit in which he was a plaintiff and two of the several defendants were minors. Since the 24th March the applicant has been taking various ill-considered steps to have this order set aside. He first of all made an application under Order IX, rule 3, and then appealed against the order refusing to act under Order IX, rule 3, to the District Court, where also his appeal was dismissed. We can find nothing in the Code to justify the learned Munsif in dismissing the suit as against the major defendants. What he should have done was to direct the plaintiff to proceed with his case as against the other defendants, making a note in the order-sheet that the decree would not be binding upon the minor defendants. This course was not taken. The order as passed by the Munsif was clearly without jurisdiction and must be set aside. The order dismissing the suit for default is set aside. The case will be restored to the file. In the circumstances we make no order as to costs.

Application allowed.

VALLABHRAO NARAYANRAO DESAI—PLAINTIFF—RESPONDENT.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. XL, r. 1 — Receiver—Joint family property—Partition suit—Receiver, appointment of, when justified.

As a general rule the Court will not, in a partition suit between members of a joint family, appoint a Receiver except by consent, and upon proof by the plaintiff that prima facie he has a very excellent chance of succeeding in establishing the case made out in the plaint, and that the property in possession of the opposite party is in danger of being wasted. The mere fact that there is a dispute is no reason whatever for appointing a Receiver. [p. 827, col. 2; p. 828, col. 1.]

Appeal from an order passed by the First Class Subordinate Judge at Dharwar, in Suit No. 459 of 1915.

Mr. R. A. Jahagirdhar, for the Appellant.

Mr. H. B. Gumaste, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The parties in this case are brothers, and there is no doubt that the relations between them are strained. The defendant is in possession of the family property. The plaintiff seeks partition. All sorts of claims evidently have been made by the plaintiff, alleging that the family properties are of far greater value than the amount admitted by the defendant. It is also alleged that the defendant has been grossly mismanaging the family property, and on that account it appears that in 1915 the plaintiff got an injunction from the Court restraining the defendant from dealing with the property. In 1916 he got an order appointing a Receiver, and the Court appointed the Collector Receiver, and the Collector imposed certain conditions involving expense which the plaintiff was not inclined to pay. The result was that the order appointing a Receiver remained in abeyance until 1918 when eventually the expenses were provided for, and the Collector consented to be appointed Receiver. From that order the defendant appeals. We have before us no grounds whatever upon which the Judge made the order appointing a Receiver. The only ground, as far as I can see after hearing the argument, was that the relations between the plaintiff and the defendant were strained.

Now, generally speaking, in a partition suit between members of a joint family the Court will not appoint a Receiver except by consent, and especially where the family property consists of land. So in order that a Receiver should be appointed of joint family property in a partition suit, special circumstances will have to be proved before the Court will be entitled to appoint a Receiver. Generally speaking, when an application is made to the Court to take the property into its hands by appointing a Receiver, the plaintiff must prove that prima facie he has a very excellent chance of succeeding in establishing the case made out in his plaint, and in the next place he must satisfy the Court that the property in possession of the opposite party is in danger of being wasted. With regard to the property in this suit it appears that a considerable amount is immoveable property, and the defendant's share would be ample security for any claim which the plaintiff would to able to substantiate in the case for damages, or under any other cause of action against the defendant. Then the plaintiff alleges that a certain shop belongs to the family. The defendant denies that the shop is joint family property. Therefore, there is a dispute as regards that shop. The mere fact that there is a dispute is no reason whatever for appointing a Receiver. The plaintiff must show that prima facie the shop does belong to the family. I asked him what is the name of the shop, because if it belonged to the family, it would naturally be carried on in the name of the family. But it appears that the shop is not carried on in the name of the family, and in any event the Collector is not the most suitable person to carry on a cloth shop or any other shop, instead of the party who is in possession. It is always open to the Court to ask the party in possession to file an inventory and to keep accounts. There are no materials from which I can form any certain opinion that a Receiver should be appointed. I am told that there are ornaments and there are mortgages. But in any event those properties are still in dispute, and the same reasons, which I have shown are applicable to the question whether a Receiver should be appointed of the land and the shop, apply with regard to ornaments and mortgages. All these questions will be determined when the suit comes on for hearing, and then the Court will be in a much better position to form an opinion as to whether the Court should take possession of the property until the dispute is finally decided. As far as I can see, as an interlocutory measure, the Court had not sufficient grounds for taking the property into its own possession and depriving the defendant of possession of the property. In my opinion, therefore, the order was wrongly made and must be set aside. The property must be restored to the possession of that party from which it came. Costs of the appeal will be costs in the cause.

Order set aside.

Musammat HUSSAIN BIBI AND OTHERS —DEFENDANT:—APPELLANTS

versus

NIGAHIA AND OTHERS—PLAINTIFFS SUBA AND ANOTHER—DEFENDANTS —RESPONDENTS.

Custom—Succession—Self-acquired property—Sister, whether excludes collaterals in 8th degree—Muhammadan Rajputs, Jullundur District.

In regard to self-acquired property a sister does not, among the Muhammadan Rajputs of the Jullundur District, exclude collaterals in the 8th degree. [p. 830, cols. 1 & 2.]

Second appeal from the decree of the District Judge, Jullundur, dated the 5th October 1915.

FACTS appear from the following order of Scott Smith, J., dated the 13th July 1916, referring the case to a Division Bench:—

"The parties to the case out of which the present appeal arises are Muhammadan Rajputs of the Nakodar Tahsil of the Jullundur District. The plaintiffs, who are collaterals in the 8th degree of Fateh Din, the last male owner of the land in dispute, sued to contest a gift of the land made by Musammat Bholi, mother of Fateh Din, in favour of her three daughters, defendants Nos. 4 to 6. After the death of Umra, husband of Musammat Bholi, the land went to Fateh Din, his son, and upon Fateh Din's death it reverted to Musammat Bholi, his mother, who has now made a gift to her daughters. The third and fourth issues framed by the first Court were—

(3) Have daughters a better right to succeed than such distant collaterals as plaintiffs?

(4) Was the property in dispute held by a common ancestor?

As regards the fourth issue it has been held that the land is not proved to be ancestral qua the plaintiffs. From the form of the third issue it will be seen that the defendants' donees were considered to have the status of daughters of the last male owner, whereas they are really his sisters. The fact that they are sisters of Fateh Din was brought out in the judgments of the lower Courts and it was held, having regard to Hamira v. Ram Singh (1), that they must be considered as sisters and not as daughters of the last male owner. The onus was laid on them to prove that they would have a prior right of succession to the plaintiffs. The Courts considered that they had not discharged this onus and gave the plaintiffs a decree.

Defendants have filed a second appeal to this Court upon a certificate granted by the District Judge which certifies that a question of custom is involved, namely, whether collaterals in the 8th degree exclude sisters of the last male owner in regard to property not ancestral qua such collaterals. Now on the record itself there is no evidence for or against the custom stated, and the reason of this appears to be that the issue framed was whether daughters have a better right to succeed than such distant collaterals. There was no issue as to whether sisters or the collaterals had the superior right. Mr. Kureshi for the appellants says that his clients have been prejudiced by the way in which the issue was framed and asks that there should be a remand for further inquiry. He also urges that the onus should be upon the plaintiffs to prove that they exclude sisters, having regard to the fact that the property is not their ancestral property. The question of onus is rather a difficult one. According to Article 24 of Rattigan's Digest sisters are usually excluded from inheritance, but in Bholi v. Kahna (2) Clark, C. J., thought that the custom embodied in this article was rather broadly stated and that the proposition was hardly warranted by the authorities quoted for and against. He pointed out that the article makes no distinction between ancestral and acquired property such as is made in the case of daughters. He went on to say that having regard to the fact that by Muhammadan Law sisters would exclude collaterals and that daughters exclude collaterals as regards acquired property, the onus should be on the collaterals, who were defendants, to prove that they excluded plaintiff, a sister. In the present case also the parties are Muhammadans and the property is self-acquired, and, therefore, if I follow this ruling, I should hold that the onus was upon the plaintiffs to prove that they exclude sisters.

Respondent's Counsel, however, refers to Harnamon v. Santa Singh (3), in which it was held, following Hamira v. Ram Singh (1) and the ruling published as an appendix thereto, that the onus in such a case was generally on the sister. In Hamira v. Ram Singh (1) the parties were Hindus and there is, therefore, a distinction between that case and the present one. I am, therefore, doubtful as to which party the onus should be on in the present case.

In the grounds of appeal to the lower Appellate Court no exception was taken to the form of the third issue as framed, and it does not appear that the appellants asked that the case should be remanded for further inquiry. At the same time the learned District Judge has given a certificate, and there does not seem to be much object in this unless a further inquiry be made, for on the record as it stands, as already stated, there is no evidence either for or against the custom. Having regard to the doubt as to which party the onus should be on, I think it proper that the case should be remanded for a further inquiry, the question of onus being left open for the present.

I, therefore, under Order XLI, rule 25, Civil Procedure Code, remand the case to the Court of first instance for full inquiry and decision of the issue, whether in the tribes to which the parties belong collaterals in the 8th degree exclude sisters of the last male owner in regard to property which is not ancestral qua such collaterals. The enquiry may be made by the Court itself or by a Commissioner if thought proper.

In view of the importance of the case I further direct that on the return to this remand the appeal be transferred for hearing to a Divisional Bench. Return to be made in four months, after which the parties will be given time to put in objections."

JUDGMENT.—The facts of this case and the point now in issue are sufficiently stated in the referring order, dated the 13th of July 1916. The first point to consider is, on whom the onus lies in the present case. Having regard to the authorities quoted in the referring order, we are inclined to think that the onus is in the first instance on the sister to prove that she excludes collaterals in the 6th degree, even though the property was not the ancestral property of the latter. The case reported as Bholi v. Kahna (2) was decided by a single Judge and does not really help the appellants much. There it was found that by custom among Dogras of the Amritsar District a sister was entitled to inherit acquired landed property in preference to collaterals of the 6th degree. The finding was really based upon the riwaj-i-am of the neighbouring district at Lahore where, among Dogras, sisters exclude collaterals beyond the 5th generation. If, however, any doubt remained as to which party the onus lay upon, we consider it is set at rest by the evidence produced upon the remand. Exhibits P-14 to 17 are attested copies of extracts from the riwaj-i-am of 1885 of the four Tahsils of the Jullundur District. They are to the effect that sisters or their sons do not inherit. We have also examined the latest riwaj-i-am of the Jullundur District prepared at the recent Settlement of 1915, and we find the custom therein stated to be the same. It was held by the Privy Council in Beg v. Allah Ditta (4) that an entry in a riwaj-i-am is a strong piece of evidence in support of a custom and that the onus is upon the person alleging any custom to the contrary to prove such. We, therefore, consider that the onus was upon the defendants to prove that the sister excludes collaterals in regard to self-acquired property. Three instances are relied upon on behalf of the appellants, D. 4, D. 6 and D. 7. D. 4 has no weight in our opinion, because though the plaintiff in that case was the cousin of the last male owner, the learned District Judge wrongly considered her as the daughter of a previous male owner. In D. 6 it was found that a sister succeeded owing to a special family custom, and, therefore, the instance is not in point. In D. 7 there was no decision as to whether the parties were governed by custom or by their personal law, and the decision appears to have been based more upon Muhammadan Law than custom. In our opinion, therefore, the defendants have not discharged the onus which lay upon them, and we dismiss the appeal with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Pre-emption—Suit by pre-emptor with superior right partially withdrawn, effect of.

Where in a suit for pre-emption the pre-emptor, in consequence of a compromise, withdraws his claim to a portion of the property sold, such withdrawal confers no new title on the vendee, but it has the effect of affording an opportunity to the person with the next best right to enforce pre-emption in regard to the portion withdrawn. [p. 831, col. 1.]

Appeal against the decree of the District Judge, Rae Bareli, dated the 15th February 1919, confirming that of the Subordinate Judge, Partabgarh, dated the 26th August 1918.

Mr. A. P. Sen, for the Appellants.

Mr. Girja Saran Lal, for Respondent No. 1.

JUDGMENT.—Har Bhajan was the owner of an 8-pies under-proprietary share in a certain village, which he sold to Debi Dayal, son of Ganga Bakhsh Singh, on the 30th May 1917, for a consideration of Rs. 3,000. Jagmohan Singh filed a suit for pre-emption in respect of the said property, which resulted in a compromise by virtue of which Jagmohan Singh surrendered his claim in regard to a 4-pies share and contented himself with a decree for pre-emption with regard to the remainder.

The present suit for pre-emption has been filed by Indarpal Singh, in respect of the 4-pies share left with the vendees. The Courts below decreed the claim subject to the payment of Rs. 1,500 or half the consideration money mentioned in the original sale-deed to the defendants-vendees.

On behalf of the defendants-vendees it is urged that by virtue of the compromise into which they entered with Jagmohan Singh, they acquired a new title which was incapable of being pre-empted. The title of the vendee does not, however, lapse or terminate till the pre-emptor has obtained a decree for pre-emption and has paid the purchase-money which the decree directs him to pay. The compromise merely amounted to a withdrawal by the pre-emptor of his claim for pre-emption with regard to a 4 pies share. It did not confer any new title on the vendees. The pre-emptive title of Jagmohan Singh was superior to that of the present plaintiff-respondent, but the withdrawal by the former of his claim for pre-emption with regard to a half share in the property gave an opportunity to the person, who had the next best right, to enforce pre-emption in regard to the portion about which the former had withdrawan his claim. The defendants-appellants cannot resist this claim by setting up a compromise, to which the plaintiff respondent was no party.

The compromise operated, so far as the property now in dispute is concerned, to dispel one of the pre-emptive clouds from over it; but the other pre-emptive clouds remained unaffected. The observation in Gobind Dayal v. Inayatullah (1) and Hanuman Rai v. Udit Narain Rai (2) do not apply, because the claim is not here directed against the property acquired by the previous pre-emptor. For the similar reason, the decisions in Kheman v. Aladad (3) and Abdur Razzaq v. Mumtaz Husain (4) are inapplicable. In Nasiran Bibi v. Rahim Bakhsh (5) it was held that the institution of a suit for pre-emption by one co-sharer in a Mahal, which was compromised and decreed, did not preclude another co-sharer, who was not a party to the first suit, from filing a suit for pre-emption in respect of the same property on the ground of his preferential right to pre-empt.

The appeal is, therefore, dismissed with costs.

Companies Act (VII of 1913), ss. 196, 215—Voluntary liquidator, whether can obtain order for examination of witnesses.

Under section 215 of the Companies Act a voluntary liquidator is entitled to ask the Court for an order for the examination of persons, who were connected with the company, with regard to its management or formation, and the Court has power to make such an order. [p. 83', col. 2.]

First appeals from an order passed by the District Judge, Poona, in Miscellaneous Application No. 24 of 1919.

Mr. Campbell (with him Messrs. Kanga, Sayani & Co.), for Nowroji Pudumji.

Mr. Bahadurji, Acting Advocate-General (with him Mr. S. R. Bakhale), for Sadashiv and Hari.

Mr. B. J. Desai (with him Mr. J. B. Gharpure), for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.

MACLEOD, C. J.—The applicants in this case presented a petition to the District Judge of Poona, stating that they were Honorary Liquidators of the Deccan Bank, Limited, Poona, under voluntary liquidation, and asking for the examination of certain persons who were Directors, Managers and other Officers of the Company with respect to their conduct of the business of the Company and as to their conduct and dealing as Directors, Managers and other Officers thereof during the years in which they acted as such Directors, Managers, etc. There were originally nine respondents. The learned District Judge made an order for the examination of respondents Nos. 1 to 4. Against that order respondents Nos. 1, 2 and 3 have appealed.

The first question is whether a voluntary liquidator can apply to the Court for an order for the examination of persons connected with the management of the Company. Section 215 of the Indian Companies Act says: "Where a Company is being wound up voluntarily, the liquidator or any contributory or creditor may apply to the Court to determine any question arising in the winding up, or to exercise as respects the enforcing of calls, or any other matters, all or any of the powers which the Court might exercise if the Company were being wound up by the Court." Sub-section (2) says: "The Court, if satisfied that the determination of the question or the required exercise of power will be just and beneficial, may accede wholly or partially to the application on such terms and conditions as the Court thinks fit, or may make such other order on the application as the Court thinks just."

It has been argued by the appellants that that section does not give the Court power to make an order on the application of a voluntary liquidator, for the examination of persons who were connected with the Company, with regard to its management or formation. It is difficult to see where the basis of that argument lies. Section 215 is framed in the very widest terms. It enables the Court to make any order, which it might have made in a compulsory winding up, in favour of a voluntary liquidator, if it thinks that the exercise of that power is just or beneficial. It seems to me it is quite useless to refer to any other sections of the Act in order that we may give its proper meaning to section 215. There is no ambiguity whatever in that section. Therefore, I am very clearly of opinion that a voluntary liquidator is entitled to come to the Court and ask the Court to make an order for the examination of witnesses, which the Court may make on the application of an official liquidator under section 196 of the Act.

The second question is whether the Court ought to have made the order in this particular case. Now the liquidation began in 1916, and apparently has proceeded in very unfortunate circumstances for the Company, for instance, as the learned Judge in the Court below has stated, the liquidators have been trying to bring on this application for the examination of Directors and other persons for a considerable time, but owing to the unfortunate deaths of two successive liquidators and other reasons this matter has remained unsettled. In January of this year a suit had to be filed by the liquidators against certain persons including the present appellants for misfeasance, and it has been argued that this order ought not to have been made for the examination of the appellants because that suit had been filed. But it is quite clear that if the Judge had power to make the order at any time after the liquidation commenced, if the liquidator had been able to bring the application before him, there is no reason why the Judge should not have granted the order when he made it in February, merely because the suit had been filed against these opponents, which no doubt was filed to save the bar of limitation. It is quite true that in some cases the Court will not exercise its discretion in favour of the liquidator, if it thinks he is asking the Court to exercise its power without sufficient reason. But that is a pure question of discretion, and it is impossible to lay down any definite rules as regards the exercise of that discretion more than this, that the Court must exercise its discretion. The learned District Judge has considered this question in his judgment, and I agree that he was right in considering that the objection of the opponents, the present appellants, that the order ought not to have been made for their examination ought not to succeed. It is really difficult to see why the Court should not make the order on the application of the voluntary liquidators, or why the appellants should shirk giving such information as they may have regarding their management of the affairs of this Company. In my opinion, therefore, the order of the learned District Judge was perfectly correct, and the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

HEATON, J.—I agree. I feel quite clear in my own mind that section 215 of the Indian Companies Act gives the power, and I really am not at present able to conceive any reason of importance why the Court should not have the power. Seeing that the Court has the power, then undoubtedly the District Court would be in a better position to make up its mind whether the examination of the Directors ought to proceed than are we sitting here. The liquidation has come before the District Court in Poona. I suppose it is very likely to come before it again. That Court would be a good deal more conversant with the facts than we are.

The principal reason urged against allowing the examination of the Directors seems to me to be a reason for allowing that examination. If there is a suit filed, then the sooner the Directors are examined the better, and the fact that there is a suit makes it more urgent, not less urgent, that the examination should take place speedily; provided of course, as I assume it will be, the examination is made for the purposes of the liquidation.

Appeal dismissed.

I, Art. 12—Suit for possession of property sold in execution—Limitation applicable.

The absence of an affidavit such as is required by section 456 of the Civil Procedure Code, 1882, is not sufficient to render the proceedings for the appointment of a guardian illegal and void as against the minor on the ground that he was not properly represented. [p. 834, col. 1.]

Where a decree is made against a minor in a suit in which he is duly represented by his guardian, and on attaining majority he seeks to set aside that decree by a separate suit, he can succeed only on proof of fraud or collusion on the part of his guardian. [p. 834, col. 2.]

The period of limitation applicable to a suit for possession of property sold in execution of a decree is prescribed by Article 12, Schedule I, of the Limitation Act. [p. 835, col. 1.]

Second appeal from the decree of the District Judge, Ludhiana, dated the 22nd February 1918.

Pandit Ram Bhaj Datta, for the Appellant.

Bakhshi Tek Chand, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—In the suit out of which the present appeal arises the plaintiff-appellant sued for possession of a house which was sold during his minority in execution of a decree passed against him in favour of one Buja Mal. The lower Courts have held that in the suit in which the decree was passed against the plaintiff he was properly represented by a duly appointed guardian who looked after his interests and that he, therefore, cannot ignore the decree, and that the suit is governed by Article 12 of the First Schedule to the Indian Limitation Act, and as plaintiff was admittedly over 20 years of age when the present suit was brought, it is barred by time. There were two suits brought, the first on 7th January 1904 by Buja Mal against Phalla, the father of the present plaintiff, and the other by Asa Ram against the present plaintiff himself on the 12th January 1905. In Buja Mal's suit he on the 21st March 1904 made an application to the effect that Phalla had died and asked that Mamun, i.e., Iman Din, the present plaintiff, should be brought on the record as his legal representative under the guardianship of Musammat Chando with whom he was living. This was accordingly done, and on the 8th April 1904 Musammat Chando filed pleas and on the 22nd April 1904 a decree was passed. On the 11th February 1905 Buja Mal applied for execution by attachment and sale of property and a notice was sent to Musammat Chando which she refused to sign. On the 18th May 1905 the house in dispute in the present case was sold and on the 23rd June 1905 the sale was confirmed. Meanwhile in Asa Ram's suit an ex parte decree was passed on the 24th January 1905 and on the 15th May Asa Ram, referring to the attachment in Buja Mal's case, applied for a pro rata share. The house was attached and sold in Buja Mal's decree and, therefore, it is only necessary to see whether Imam Din was properly represented in that suit. If he was, any irregularity in Asa Ram's suit does not affect the point now in dispute.

Pandit Rambhaj Datta on behalf of the appellant says that the decree passed in Buja Mal's case is not binding on the minor for three reasons:—

(1) Along with the application for appointment of guardian of the minor no affidavit was filed in accordance with section 456, Civil Procedure Code, 1882;

(2) Musammat Chando, the guardian, was a married woman, and, therefore, her appointment was illegal under section 457 of the same Code; and

(3) Musammat Chando's formal assent to her appointment was not obtained.

Now as regards the first objection, Munnu Lal v. Ghulam Abbas (1) is a clear authority for the proposition that the absence of an affidavit such as is required by the provisions of section 456, Civil Procedure Code, 1882, is not sufficient to render the proceedings illegal and void as against the minor on the ground that he was not properly represented.

As regards the second objection, it is based on the fact that Musammat Chando is described in the application as chachi of the minor, and it is contended that chachi means the wife of an uncle and that, therefore, Musammat Chando was a married woman and her appointment was illegal. This objection has been raised for the first time in this Court. It was never raised in either of the lower Courts and it is pointed out that, whether Musammat Chando was at the time of appointment a married woman or not, is a question of fact depending upon the evidence which would have been produced had the matter been put in issue. It is contended that though she is described as a chachi, she may have been a widow at the time and it does not follow that she was a married woman within the meaning of section 457. I hold that it is too late now to raise this objection in second appeal.

As regards the third objection, it is a fact that Musammat Chando appeared in Court and acted as guardian of Imam Din and, therefore, it is clear that she consented to her appointment as guardian.

It is further contended by Pandit Rambhaj Datta that Musammat Chando raised no objections in the execution proceedings to the sale of the house in dispute. He refers to Jagdip Singh v. Narain Singh (2) as an authority for the proposition that the minor's ancestral property was not liable to attachment and sale in execution of a decree, the said property not having been expressly made chargeable by his father during his lifetime. The question whether ancestral property is liable in such a case is a difficult one and was only finally set at rest by the Full Bench judgment in Jagdip Singh v. Narain Singh (2), and it cannot be said that Musammat Chando was grossly neglectful of her duties in not raising such a question in 1905. Moreover, Raghubar Dyal Sahu v. Bhikya Lal Misser (3) is an authority for holding that where a decree has been made against an infant duly represented by his guardian, and the infant on attaining his majority seeks to set that decree aside by a separate suit, he can succeed only on proof of fraud or collusion on the part of his guardian. Similarly in Chandar Sekhar v. Balakdhar Dubey (4) it was held that where a minor was represented in a suit by a duly constituted guardian and by a person who could legally act as such, he is as much bound by the decree passed in the suit as he would have been if he were of full age. If the guardian neglected to support the case of the minor, and there is nothing to show that he did so deliberately, that circumstance alone would not entitle the minor to avoid the operation of the decree. In the present case there is absolutely no reason for supposing that Musammat Chando deliberately neglected the interest of Imam Din. Cases such as Hira Singh v. Ghulam Qadir (5), Narsing Narain v. Jahi Mistry (6) and Khiarajmal v. Daim (7), where the minor was not properly represented on the record, have no bearing on the present case. Therefore, I agree with the lower Courts in holding that Imam Din was properly represented by Musammat Chando as his guardian ad litem, and that he cannot ignore the decree which was passed against him, and that a suit for possession of the property sold in execution of that decree is governed by Article 12 of the First Schedule to the Limitation Act and is, therefore, barred by time.

The appeal fails and is dismissed with costs.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. XLI, r. 10—Security for costs, order for, when justified—Poverty of appellant, whether ground for demanding security.

To justify an order requiring an appellant to furnish security for the costs of the respondent, it must be shown that the appellant is merely a nominal party acting on behalf of others the mere fact that he is a pauper is no ground for demanding security. [p. 835, col. 2.]

Application against the order of the Registrar, High Court, Patna.

Messrs. L. N. Singh, Chandra Shekhar Banerjee and Jadubans Sahay, for the Appellant.

Messrs Kulwant Sahay and Har Narain Prasad, for the Respondent.

ORDER.—This is an application directed against the order of the learned Registrar, directing the appellant, under Order XLI, rule 10, of the Code of Civil Procedure, to furnish security for the respondent's costs in this Court.

Mere poverty of the appellant is no ground for demanding security. The principle is well established that it must be shown that the appellant is merely a puppet in the hands of others and that he is merely a nominal party acting on behalf of others, who are keeping themselves behind the scenes.

Now there is undoubtedly an allegation in the petition that the appellant is a puppet in the hands of Babu Isri Prasad and Mahabir Das, but the facts, which are set out in the petition, do not warrant the conclusion that the appellant is a puppet in the hands of either Isri Prasad or Mahabir Das. For, what are the facts? The allegations are that Mahabir Das, at the instigation of Isri Prasad, brought several civil and criminal cases against the respondent. It may be true or it may be untrue, but it does not warrant the conclusion that Isri Prasad is the real person who is fighting this litigation. The next allegation is that the respondent brought a suit to eject Mahabir Das from the Asthal. That has again nothing to do with the present application. If Mahabir Das were the plaintiff in this action, something might be said, but he is not. And then comes the mere allegation that he is a puppet in the hands of Isri Prasad and Mahabir Das. That allegation has been denied by the appellant. The learned Registrar does not say that he accepts the allegations made by the respondent. The learned Registrar concedes that mere poverty is not a ground for demanding security from the appellant, but it seems to me that his order is really based on the poverty of the appellant. He says: "he has been financed by outsiders. He is a man with no property and I am, therefore, of opinion that this is a suitable case for an order for security of costs of this Court and the Court below." In our view the finding of the learned Registrar is not a finding that the appellant is a mere puppet in the hands of others. Having examined the affidavits for myself, I am unable to hold that the petitioner has established that the appellant is a mere puppet in the hands of others. That being so, in our view, the order of the learned Registrar, in so far as it directs the appellant to furnish security for the costs of this Court, cannot stand and must be set aside.

It appears that the learned Registrar has also directed the appellant to furnish security for the costs incurred by the respondent in the Court below. It seems to us that it was unnecessary to make that order. The respondent has got a decree for costs in his favour and is entitled to execute that decree.

The whole order is set aside.

Order set aside.

Bakhshi Tek Chand, for the Appellant.

JUDGMENT.—The plaintiff Bhana Mal sues for principal and interest due on a bond for Rs. 400 executed by the defendant Beli Ram on 18th January 1910. The defendant pleaded that the bond was benami and that the real creditor was Chhajju Ram and that the bond had been repaid.

The plaintiff at first said the money was his own, but later on he said it belonged to his sister Musammat Shankar Devi and that he was her trustee. The lower Courts have decreed the claim, holding that the money did not belong to Chhajju Ram, and that no payments to him or to his widow can be allowed. Defendant appeals to this Court, urging that important evidence has been ignored.

The following genealogical tree will show how Chhajju Ram and others to be mentioned are related.

When Chhajju Ram died his widow, Musammat Amar Devi, applied to be appointed guardian of her step-son Sansar Chand. In those proceedings Bhana Mal put in certain lists of debts, etc, due to Chhajju Ram. Those lists contain the bond now in suit, on which the balance due was then stated to be Rs. 200, and also a mortgage dated 10th January 1912 executed by defendant in favour of Musammat Amar Devi for Rs. 1,500. Part of the consideration of the mortgage money was Rs. 230 babit miniumla tamassaq sabka muwarrkha 18th January 1910 Musammi Bhana Ram.....karzkha ko ada kare. These documents seem to me to have been entirely ignored by the lower Courts, though I regard them and the statements of the plaintiff with regard to them as most sufficient. Plaintiff has admitted that he put in the lists in the guardianship case. Why should these documents, the bond and the mortgage deed, have figured in these lists, if they were not the outstandings of the deceased Chhajju Ram? In the present case too he states as witness (see statement of 15th January 1918) that Chhajju Ram used to get documents executed in favour of himself or his brother and not in his own name. Chhajju Ram was a Forest Ranger, and apparently did not want his superior officers to know of his money dealings.

On only the oral evidence produced in this case I think I should certainly have come to the same conclusion as the lower Courts, but having regard to the above evidence which has been entirely ignored, I have no hesitation in holding that the debt belonged to Chhajju Ram and that the debt has in part at least been discharged, and that at the outside only Rs. 200 remained due when Chhajju Ram died. But I do not think I need go further and find whether the bond has been fully discharged, as I do not consider plaintiff has any right to sue at all. It is urged that a benamidar even can sue to recover and here Gur Narayan v. Sheo Lal Singh (1) is cited. I have no doubt that he can in some cases, but he must come into Court with a clean case. Here plaintiff first claimed the money as his own, and then claimed it as his sister's money. But there is not a scrap of evidence that his sister even had any connection with this bond, and my finding is that Chhajju Ram was the real creditor. Then it is urged on his behalf that Chhajju Ram and his brother Hem Raj were joint and that their sons Sansar Chand and Girdhari Lal are a joint Hindu family and that plaintiff is managing their estate and can sue on their behalf. They may be a joint Hindu family, but plaintiff cannot be allowed to keep changing his position. Had he sued on behalf of Sansar Chand or of Sansar Chand and Girdhari Lal in the first place, the case would have been different. His real object in suing on his own behalf seems to have been a dishonest attempt to recover payment on the bond in full (with a small exception of Rs 30 admittedly repaid) in spite of the fact that Rs. 230 at least have been repaid by incorporation in a later mortgage. Such a plaintiff must in my opinion be held down to the case he has set up and not allowed to shuffle from one position to another.

I accept this appeal and reversing the lower Court's decision, I dismiss the suit with costs in all Courts.

Appeal accepted.

Applications for extension of time in Second Civil Appeal No. 321 of 1918.

Mr. St. O. Thompson, for the Applicant.

JAMIAT SINGH v. UJAGAR SINGH.

JUDGMENT.—These are applications for extension under section 5 of the Limitation Act of the period within which an appeal may be filed. It is admitted that limitation expired on the 16th of July 1918, and the appeals were not presented to this Court until the 30th of July 1918. The applications are made on the ground that though arguments were heard on the 15th of March 1918, the judgment was not delivered until the 17th of April and no notice of delivery of judgment was given to the parties and it was not until the 15th of July that the applicant heard that judgment had been delivered.

Though it would appear that no notice was given to the parties of the date fixed for delivery of judgment yet there is nothing on the record, nor has any affidavit been filed to show, that such notice was not given to the Pleaders of the parties. Under rule 1 of Order XX, if judgment is reserved due notice must be given either to the parties or their Pleaders of the date fixed for pronouncing a judgment and in the absence of any indication to the contrary, it must be presumed that notice was given. And we find that the Pleader for one of the parties applied for a copy of the judgment on the 18th of April, the day after the judgment was delivered, and the Pleader for the other party admits that he was informed of the delivery of the judgment. But even if we were to assume that the applicant had no notice or knowledge that judgment had been delivered until the 15th of July 1918, I am of opinion that these applications ought not to be allowed. He applied not personally but by post for copies on the 16th of July 1918. His application was returned on the 19th, when he was present in Hardoi, to have the correct date of the decree entered in it and he represented his application on the 20th of July. Copies were ready for delivery on the 23rd of July but he did not choose to take them until the 24th. He handed the papers over to his Counsel on the 25th July 1918. He has no satisfactory explanation of the delay between the 25th of July 1918 and the 30th of July, on which date his appeals were filed. There was nothing to prevent him from filing his appeals on the 26th or on the 27th or 29th of July. The 26th and 29th were both working days and on the 27th the Registrar could have received his appeals. It is said that the applicant had to prepare an affidavit, but the affidavit which was filed is a very short one which ought not to take more than quarter of an hour in preparation. A person who wishes to take advantage of the provisions of section 5 of the Limitation Act must show that he has not been negligent and that he has been prosecuting his case with due diligence.

In the present case it is quite clear, even if all the applicant's statements be accepted as true, that he ought to have filed his appeals before the 30th of July. That being so, he is not entitled to the benefit of the provisions of section 5 of the Limitation Act

The applications are, therefore, dismissed with costs.

Applications dismissed.

Custom—Adoption—Brother's daughter's son—Jats of Mauza Manko, Jullundur Tahsil.

Among Jats of Mauza Manko in the Jullundur Tahsil, the adoption of a brother's daughter's son is not recognised by custom [p. 840, col. ..]

Second appeal from the decree of the District Judge, Jullundur, dated the 20th May 1915.

Bakhshi Tek Chand, for the Appellants.

The Hon'ble Pandit Sheo Narain, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—In this suit Ujagar Singh, a Jat of Manko, Tahsil and District Jullundur, claims the land and property of Bur Singh, deceased, he brother of his maternal grandfather, Khushal Singh, on the allegation that he was validly adopted as a son by the said Bur Singh, the adopting being evidenced by a registered deed of 15th November 1907, and is, therefore, entitled to succeed him. His suit has been decreed in the first Court and the lower Appellate Court.

The defendants, the collaterals of Bur Singh, have appealed, and the main question for decision is whether by custom the adoption of a brother's daughter's son is valid amongst Jats of the Jullundur Tahsil.

There is no doubt that the weight of judicial authority is very much against the plaintiff's claim, as there are a number of decisions against the validity of such an adoption amongst Jats of the Jullundur District.

In the Full Bench decision Ralla v. Budha (1), the onus was definitely laid on the party setting up such an adoption, namely, of a daughter's or sister's son, to prove that it was authorised by custom.

The riwaj-i-am clearly lays down that a daughter's son cannot be adopted; the presumption attaching thereto is fortified by several recent judgments of the Chief Court to the same effect, viz., Surain Singh v. Jawahir Singh (2), Randhawa Jats of Jullundur, Rulia v. Wariam Singh (3), Jats of Jullundur, and Natha Singh v. Mangal (4), a Nakodar case of a sister's son.

In view of the repeated decisions of this Court we have thought it desirable to examine closely the evidence on which two Munsifs and the learned District Judge have been led to decree the plaintiff's claim.

The documentary evidence is summarised at pages 8 and 9 of the paper-book, and we may take each instance given in turn.

Case (1).—This is the case decided in Uttam Singh v. Kesra Singh (5). It was dissented from in the recent case of Surain Singh v Jawahir Singh (2) decided in 1913. The view taken was that the old decision proceeded on the assumption that the onus lay on the party denying the validity of the adoption of a daughter's son, whereas since the publication of the Full Bench ruling [Ralla v. Budha (1)] the onus is on the other side, and that if this view had been taken in 1890, the result might have been different.

Case (2).—No particulars whatever are available, but the case is one of village Pindori Nijran, and these instances of this village have been held ineffective to prove the custom: see the Chief Court judgment in Sant Singh v. Megha, Civil Appeal No. 1232 of 1907, decided on 30th January 1908.

Case (3).—The suit to contest an adoption was dismissed as time barred, but the judgment gives no particulars as to who was adopted and by whom.

Case (4).—This is a definite case of the adoption of a sister's son, and of a gift of the whole ancestral estate to the adopted son.

This occurred in Dasarpur, Tahsil Jullundur, and the suit to contest the adoption was dismissed as time barred; and the instance is no doubt a good one, but it is isolated, and the adoption is of old date about 1880 and not contested until 1903.

Cases (5) to (8).—Are of adoptions in the village of Pindori Nijran in the years 1879 to 1884.

These have all been dealt with in the judgment in Sant Singh v. Megha (1908) alluded to above, and cannot be regarded as now possessing any value.

At that time a view, since believed to be erroneous, was entertained that custom regarded such adoptions with favour. Consequently several adoptions were effected in this village about the year 1880.

Case (9).—This is a case of a gift by a widow to her daughter's son—the land was ancestral qua the collaterals.

It was held by the judgment to be valid against the collaterals, but the judgment is decidedly open to question, and it is very doubtful if the decision was correct on the facts disclosed, as the collaterals were not bound to sue until the death of the widow who had a life interest in the property, and they did sue very shortly after her death.

Case (10).—A gift to a sister's son, but the property gifted was definitely stated not to be ancestral qua the reversioners, and this fact was established beyond doubt.

(1) 50 P. R. 1893.
(2) 20 Ind. Cas. 839; 281 P. L. R. 1913; 162 P. W. R. 1913.
(3) 20 Ind. Cas. 454; 94 P. R. 1913; 267 P. L. R. 1913; 177 P. W. R. 1913.
(4) 26 Ind. Cas. 812; 90 P. R. 1914; 237 P. L. R. 1915; 194 P. W. R. 1914.
(5) 159 P. R. 1890.

The wording of the gift deed lays stress on this point.

Case (11).—This is really the dispute which gave rise to Rulia v. Wariam Singh (3) and the decision was against the validity of the adoption of a daughter's son.

Case (12).—No particulars are given, but the case is of Hoshiarpur, and it has been ruled in Sant Singh v. Megha that Hoshiarpur cases are not to be considered in Jullundur.

Page 9—Cases (1) and (2).—This is a very old case of a gift by an old blind man of a portion of his property to his daughter's son.

The land gifted was found not to be ancestral qua the collaterals.

Case (3).—A Hoshiarpur case of gift to daughters of a brother.

This does not prove much, as apparently the donor's surviving brother was a consenting party.

Case (4).—A Pindori case of 1879.

These cases have been already treated of.

Case (5).—This appears to be a case of Sabaipur, a village in the Hoshiarpur District.

The adoption by Bhup Singh of his daughter's son took place in 1889 and a suit in 1903 to contest it was held to be time-barred.

This, however, is a judgment of the Chief Court and is not new material.

Case (6).—This is a gift of land to a brother's daughter. It was at Badali Mahi in the Hoshiarpur District in 1905.

The above eighteen cases exhaust the documentary evidence, and it is evident that no new instances of the Jullundur District are available in which a daughter's son or a sister's son has successfully maintained his position by adoption.

The only instances established are old ones in which the collaterals delayed their suit and then found it time-barred.

The oral evidence is quite inadequate to support the plaintiff's case.

Gopal Singh of Sikandarpur says that Kala Singh, Subadar, adopted his daughter's son, but no particulars are given, and it may be surmised that the Subadar's property was in part at least self acquired.

Mihan Singh of Manko (the plaintiff's village) says that he has adopted his own sister's son, but does not state what measures he has taken to prevent contest, and Gopal Singh of Manko mentions three instances but gives no details, and admits that he has been provided with a written memorandum for fear that he should forget them.

One or two other miscellaneous instances of adoption are given, but they are not supported by documentary evidence and are either irrelevant or unascertained.

Against these there are four distinct cases, apart from those which reached the Chief Court, in which adoptions of daughter's sons amongst Jats of Jullundur have been set aside. The judgments of Khan Ahmad Shah, Chuhr Singh v. Basant Singh (1903); Mr. Waring, Uttam v. Jiwi (1909); Mr. Leslie-Jones, Jiwan Singh v. Mangla Singh (1910); and Lala Rangi Lal, Thakar Singh v. Kartara (1913), have been placed on this file.

The invalidity of such adoptions in Jullundur is treated as being hardly open to question, and it seems to be clear that there is no evidence adduced in the present case that can lead to a different conclusion, such evidence as there is being merely a representation of instances which have already been dealt with judicially and held not to establish the custom claimed.

It is evident that the Courts below have not fully considered the series of judicial pronouncements against the validity of such adoptions, and they hardly seem to have been aware that the instances now relied upon are not new material.

The record does not provide any ground for a reconsideration of the views consistently adopted in recent years, which are in accord with the rivaj-i-am, and the adoption set up cannot be maintained.

On this view it is unnecessary to enter on any discussion as to the succession to the occupancy holding as distinct from the proprietary holding.

At the hearing it was suggested that the deed of 1907 might be regarded as a Will under which Ujagar Singh could succeed as a persona designata.

This, however, is a new case, and we are satisfied that the deed of 1907 must be taken as what it purports to be, namely, a deed evidencing an adoption.

We accordingly accept the appeal and dismiss the suit with costs throughout.

Appeal accepted.

Contract Act (IX of 1872), s. 45—Mortgage—Death of mortgagee—Payment to one of several co-heirs, whether discharges mortgage.

Where property is mortgaged to a person who subsequently dies leaving two or more heirs jointly entitled to his estate, payment made by the mortgagor of the amount due on the mortgage to one of those heirs without the concurrence of the rest does not amount to a valid discharge of the mortgage. [p. 845, col. 1]

Appeal against a decision of the Subordinate Judge of Cuttack, dated the 6th June 1918.

Rai B N. Bose Bahadur, Mr. Subodh Chandra Chatterji, for the Appellant.

Messrs. Biswanath Sinha, Gopal Chandra Prahary and Satyendra Nath Kay, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This appeal arises out of a suit brought by the plaintiffs in the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Cuttack to enforce a mortgage, dated the 23rd November 1903, executed by defendant No. 1, Talua Rambari Pattra, father of defendant No. 2, in favour of Biswanath Satpathi.

Biswanath Satpathi had two brothers, Sribatsa Satpathi and Srikar Satpathi. All these three brothers are now dead. Srikar Satpathi is said to have died 22 or 23 years ago, about the year 1896; Sribatsa 7 or 8 years ago, October 1910; and Biswanath 12 or 13 years ago, in 1905 or 1906.

The plaintiffs Nos. 1 and 2, Banamali Satpathi and Kripasindhu Satpathi, are the sons of Sribatsa Satpathi. The plaintiff No. 3, Madan Mohan Satpathi, is the natural born son of Sribatsa and the adopted son of Srikar Satpathi.

Defendant No 3, Radhamoni, is the widow of Biswanath Satpathi. Ladukishore Satpathi, defendant No. 7, is the son of Gopi Nath Satpathi, who is said to have been adopted by Biswanath Satpathi.

On the 3rd October 1910 Gopi Nath Satpathi transferred the mortgage deed in suit by a deed of sale (Exhibit A) in favour of defendant No. 5, Krishna Sahu, for Rs. 3,700 and made over to him the original mortgage bond in suit.

Defendant No. 4, Raghunath Sahu, held a subsequent mortgage of the premises mortgaged in the bond in suit and obtained a mortgage decree (Exhibit D) dated the 30th October 1911, in execution of which he purchased the property at the Court sale for Rs. 200, subject, to the lien of the mortgage bond in suit, on the 21st June 1913, per certificate of sale (Exhibit F) and obtained delivery of possession through the Court on the 18th February 1914, per writ of Court (Exhibit G).

In July or August 1906 defendant No. 4 sold the mortgaged property, purchased by him in execution of his subsequent mortgage decree, to defendant No. 6, Parmananda Sahu, for Rs. 7,000 per deed (Exhibit B) and is said to have paid off the sum due under the mortgage, amounting to Rs. 6,500 to Krishna Sahu, defendant No. 5. The original bond (Exhibit 1) was thus in possession of Parmananda Sahu and has been produced by him in this Court.

It was originally alleged in the plaint, paragraph 0, that defendant No. 4 had sold the mortgaged property to defendant No. 5, but in the written statements filed by the defendants Nos. 4 and 5, it appeared that defendant No. 5 was only a purchaser of the mortgage bond and that the mortgaged property was purchased by Parmananda, as stated above. The plaint was, accordingly, upon the application of the plaintiffs amended by order of the Court, dated the 13th June 1917, and defendants Nos. 6 and 7 were added as defendants.

The plaintiffs rest their claim upon the alllegation that the amount of the bond in suit was advanced from the joint fund of the plaintiffs' father and Biswanath, but as the latter was the Karta of the family the bond was executed in his name and was in his possession and that defendant No. 3, his widow, withheld the original bond and did not give it to the plaintiffs and hence the suit is brought upon a certified copy thereof. The claim was laid at Rs. 7,472 as due under the bond, principal and interest, with a prayer for a usual mortgage decree.

The defendant No. 1, the executant of the bond, and his son, defendant No. 2, did not contest the plaintiffs' claim. Defendants Nos. 3 to 7 resisted the plaintiffs' claim and filed separate written statements, but their line of defence was substantially the same. Their main contention was that Biswanath and his brothers were separate in mess and property at the time of the execution of the bond in suit and that the consideration was paid out of the separate fund of Biswanath, and not out of the joint fund of the three brothers; that Gopi Nath, the adopted son and heir of Biswanath, sold the bond to defendant No. 5 by a Kabala, dated the 3rd October 1910; that defendant No. 4, after having paid off the mortgage dues to defendant No. 5, sold the property to defendant No. 6 by a Kabala, dated the 29th June 1916, and that the latter is in possession of the property since then.

The Court below upheld the contentions of the defendants and dismissed the suit, holding that the amount covered by the mortgage bond in suit did not appertain to the joint fund of the plaintiffs and Biswanath; but that it belonged exclusively to the latter and that the plaintiffs are not the heirs of Biswanath and have no interest in the bond in suit and have consequently no right to sue on the basis of that bond. The suit was accordingly dismissed by the Court below, and the plaintiffs have appealed to this Court.

The principal points for determination are:—

(1) Whether the amount covered by the mortgage bond in suit appertained to the joint fund of the plaintiffs and Biswanath and whether the plaintiffs have any subsisting interest in the said bond?

(2) whether the plaintiffs are entitled to any relief in this case? If so, to what extent and from which of the defendants?

* * * * *

The evidence in this case conclusively proves that neither the shop nor the bond in question was in any way divided The question of onus is only one of evidence and if the evidence in this case proves to the satisfaction of the Court that the plaintiffs are interested in the bond in suit, the Court is bound to give effect to it. The finding of the Court below on Issue No 9 must, therefore, be set aside The plaintiffs have subsisting interest in the bond in suit and are entitled to recover the money due to them under the bond, This leads us to the consideration of the next question in the case.

That Gopi Nath was the adopted son of Biswanath has been amply proved and is not disputed by the learned Vakil on behalf of the appellants. He, therefore, had a joint interest along with the plaintiffs in the bond in suit. He had no right to convey to Krishna Sahu, defendant No. 5, by the sale-deed, Exhibit A, dated the 3rd October 1910, the interest held by the plaintiffs, the representatives of the other two brothers of Biswanath. The defendant No. 5, therefore, did not acquire more than the interest held by Gopi Nath. The Court below has rightly held that defendant No. 4, Raghunath Sahu, purchased the mortgaged property in execution of his subsequent mortgage-decree on 21st of June 1913, subject to the prior lien of the mortgage bond in question. He transferred the property to Padamananda Sahu, defendant No. 6, who also, therefore, acquired the property subject to the prior lien of the bond in suit. Padamananda Sahu, defendant No 6, was an arbitrator and signed the award (Exhibit 2) on 30th June 1913. He, therefore, knew perfectly well that Gopi Nath or Krishna Sahu had no right to transfer to him the entire interest in the bond to the detriment of the interest of the plaintiffs. He also knew that the share of Gopi Nath and of defendant No. 7, his son, was six annas six pies only in the bond in suit. Defendant No. 5 is nephew of defendant No. 6 and defendants Nos. 4 and 5 have a joint shop at Puri. The defendants Nos. 4 to 6, therefore, knew perfectly well that the share of Gopinath or of defendant No. 7 was only six annas six pies, and that of the plaintiffs was 9 annas and 6 pies in the mortgage bond in suit. Hence, neither Gopinath nor defendant No 5, his assignee, nor any of the other defendants had any right to give a valid release or discharge of the debt or security of the bond in suit to the extent of the shares held in it by the plaintiffs, namely, 9 annas and 6 pies.

The Court below has held that the transfer deed executed by Gopinath in favour of defendant No. 5 was valid and for consideration, and that Parmananda Sahu, defendant No. 6, is in possession of the mortgaged property on the strength of the purchase of the same from the defendant No. 4, but the Court has not determined the extent to which the transfer in favour of defendant No 5 or defendant No. 6 was valid.

The learned Vakil on behalf of the respondents contends that the release or discharge given by one of the co-sharers of Biswanath Satpathi in whose name the bond originally stood, namely, Gopi Nath or his assignee, defendant No. 5, would operate as a release of the entire mortgage debt and sum including the interest of the plaintiff. Reliance has been placed upon a decision of a Division Bench of this Court in Parbhu Ram Pandey v. Jhalo Kuer (1). The facts of that case are quite dissimilar to those of the present one. That was a case of joint creditors whose names appeared in the bond itself, and not a case of co-heirs of one mortgagee as in the present case. Again, there the mortgage debt of Rs. 997 11 was reduced by a compromise to Rs. 400 as a full discharge and satisfaction of the mortgage debt if paid within 8 days from the date of the compromise. This was embodied in a decree. The payment of Rs. 360 only was accepted by one of the plaintiffs and a receipt, therefore, given by him 8 days after the time had expired. It was held that the plaintiffs by their acceptance of the money, after the expiry of the time fixed for payment, must be deemed in law (section 55 of the Contract Act) to have waived the limitation as to time incorporated in the compromise and cannot be allowed to repudiate it or to go behind the terms thereof. As to the argument that the receipt by one of the plaintiffs did not bind the other creditors who did not join in giving the receipt, the learned Judges observed that the law is that "one joint creditor in equity can give a valid receipt to a debtor in full discharge of the claims of himself and of the other joint creditors, and authority for this proposition is to be found in Steeds v. Steeds (2) and Powell v. Brodhurst (3)." The learned Judges may be perfectly right so far as the equity in that case was concerned, but the equity arising in one case is not the same in the circumstances of another case. If on the other hand the learned Judges wanted to lay down a general principle that one joint creditor can discharge the claims under a mortgage including the interest of his co-mortgagees, the authorities relied upon do not support the view.

In Steeds v. Steeds (2) it was held that according to equity joint creditors must prima facie be taken to be interested as tenants in common, and not as joint tenants, both of the debt and any security held for it, and the statement of defence as to accord and satisfaction was good only as concerned the claim of the plaintiff who was party to the accord and satisfaction. That case quoted with approval the observation of Lord Alvanley, M. R., in Morley v. Bird (4) "that though they take a joint security, each means to lend his own money and to take back his own," and the decision of Justice Robert Bruce in Matson v. Dennis (5) that where a mortgage debt has been paid to one of the mortgagees, the land was not discharged and the concurrence of the other mortgagees was necessary to make a good title, on the ground that the debt is held by two in common and not jointly. The principle was held to be equally applicable, whether the debt was secured by a mortgage or was merely the subject of a personal contract. The earlier decision in the case of Wallace v. Kelsall (6), where the plea of accord and satisfaction with one of the plaintiffs was held good without alleging any authority from the other two plaintiffs to make the settlement, was distinguished in Steeds v. Steeds (2) on the ground that the reason why the defence is a good one at law is that the two creditors are treated as having a joint interest in the debt with its incident of survivorship.

In the year 1887 the Madras Court in Barber Maran v. Ramana Goundan (7), while admitting that the Indian Legislature in the Contract Act, (sections 42, 43 and 45) "has declared against the Common Law rule of survivorship as well in the case of joint creditors as in that of joint debtors" and "has abolished the rule of English Law according to which the release of one debtor operates to release his co-debtors," observed that there is no foundation for the proposition that "the Legislature intended to go beyond this and refused recognition altogether to rights or liabilities in solidum." The Madras Court accordingly, basing their decision upon Wallace v. Kelsall (6), held that payment to one of two joint mortgagees in the absence of fraud on the part of the mortgagor will operate as a valid discharge. Their Lordships of the Madras Court declined to follow the later authorities of Matson v. Dennis (5) and Steeds v. Steels (2), the former on the ground that in their opinion the authorities quoted therein do not support the conclusions arrived at, and the latter on the ground that Lord Justice Knight Bruce, in holding that the estate was not fully discharged by a receipt for the money signed by one of the mortgagees, carefully avoided expressing an opinion as to the question which might arise in an action for the mortgage money. As pointed out by Sir Rashbehary Ghose in Tagore Law Lectures, Volume I, page 454, 4th Edition, Lord Justice Knight Bruce distinctly says in his judgment in Matson v. Dennis (5) that payment to one joint tenant or tenants in common does not discharge the estate in equity. The learned Judges in the Madras Court, however, admitted that the authorities quoted in Steeds v. Steeds (2) go to show that in equity persons lending money to a third person are deemed to be tenants in common as well of the debt as of any security given for it. The aforesaid decision of the Madras Court is, therefore, open to criticism. The matter was, however, finally set at rest in the year 1901 by the decision in Powell v. Brodhurst (3), where following Matson v. Dennis (5) and Steeds v. Steels (2) it was held that where mortgagees have advanced money on a joint account, payment, to one of them during the others' lifetime, though a good discharge of the debt at law, only discharges the security to the extent of the payee's beneficial interest (if any), even though the payee ultimately becomes the survivor in the joint account. Farwell, J, observed: "If a mortgagor pays to one, although such payment may be a good discharge in law, yet the matter is at large when he comes into equity, and the Court takes into consideration all the facts of the case, and ascertains whether the payee was beneficially entitled to the whole or to a part only, or whether he was a trustee with the other mortgagee, and treats the payment as good in whole, or in part, or altogether bad accordingly." The decision in Powell v. Brodhurst (3) has considerably shaken the authority of Wallace v. Kelsall (6), which is the basis of the decision of the Madras High Court in Barber Maran v. Ramana Goundan (7). Consequently, the same Court in Ahinsa Bibi v. Abdul Kader (8) observed that the authority of the decision in Barber Maran v. Ranana Goundan (7), so far as the principle laid down therein was applied to co mortgagees as such, was considerably shaken by the recent decision of the Court of Chancery in Powell v. Brodhurst (3). It was further observed that even if the principle of that ruling applied where money is advanced to one by several persons jointly, each of them authorising the others by implication to act on his part, and a release or discharge, therefore, of the claim by one is binding upon the others, yet it is clearly inapplicable to the case of co-heirs and it would be dangerous to extend and apply the English doctrine to a lease given by one of such co-heirs, the co-heirs being tenants in common and not joint tenants. For this reason also, the case of Barber Maran v. Ramana Goundan (7) does not apply to the present case. In the case of Moti Ram v. Hanku Prasad (9) it was held that one of the joint decree-holders is not competent without being authorised by others to certify, under section 258 of the Code of Civil Procedure, payment out of Court of the entire decree.

The present case is clearly governed by the decision in the case of Sitaram Apaji Kode v. Shridhar Anant Prabhu (10), where it was expressly laid down that where property is mortgaged to a person who subsequently dies leaving two or more heirs jointly entitled to his estate, payment made by the mortgagor of the amount due on the mortgage to one of those heirs, without the concurrence of the rest, does not amount to a valid discharge to the mortgagor. There also the correctness of the decision in Barber Maran v. Ramana Goundan (7) was doubted as being contrary to the case of Powell v. Brodhurst (3). Similar was the decision in the case of Abdul Hakim v. Adyata Chandra Das (11), where a string of cases of the Calcutta High Court have been cited in support of the decision. The principle is also to be deduced from the decision of their Lordships of the Privy Council in Shrinivasdas Bavri v. Meherbai (12), where a release of the entire mortgage given by a co-mortgagee was not accepted as a sufficient discharge of the mortgage, unless it was shown that the other mortgagee was dead and that the mortgagee giving the release was his sole heir or legal representative.

It would thus appear that except the solitary decision in Barber Maran v. Ramana Goundan (7) the trend of the decisions has been in favour of the view that release given by one of the co mortgagees is not a discharge of the entire mortgage, much less a release given by one of the heirs of a deceased mortgagee, as in this case.

I, therefore, hold that the release given in this case does not operate as a discharge of the entire mortgage money, but only as a valid discharge in respect of 6 annas and 6 pies, being the shares of Gopi Nath or his son, defendant No. 7, as held in Abdul Hakim v. Adyata Chandra Das (11). The mortgage, therefore, still subsists in respect of the 9 annas and 6 pies share of the plaintiffs and they are entitled to a mortgage decree for a sum proportionate to their shares.

The appeal is, therefore, decreed in part with proportionate costs; the judgment of the Court below is set aside in so far as it relates to 9 annas and 6 pies share of the plaintiffs in the mortgage money, and it is directed that a usual mortgage-decree be prepared in this Court for the proportionate mortgage money to be payable within 6 months from this date. Interest will run at the stipulated rate during the period of grace, and thereafter the aggregate amount will carry interest at 6 per cent. per annum till realization. In default of payment within the period of grace, the mortgaged property will be sold.

Appeal partly allowed.

CIVIL REVISION NO. 93 OF 1919.

Musammat KHODEJA AND ANOTHER —PLAINTIFFS—PETITIONERS

versus

GHULAM NABI—DEFENDANT—RESPONDENT.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), Sch. II, para. 20—Award, loss of—Procedure to enforce award.

Where an award, which has been reduced to writing, is lost, resort cannot be had to the special procedure provided by para. 20, Schedule II, of the Civil Procedure Code: the proper course is to refer the parties to a regular suit to enforce the terms of the award. [p 846, col. 2.]

Revision from the order of the District Judge, Jhelum, dated the 2nd December 1918.

Mr. Jai Gopal Sethi, for the Petitioners.

The Hon'ble Mr. Sheo Narain, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The facts of the case giving rise to this petition for revision are briefly as follows:—On the 24th of March 1917, Musammat Nur Bhari sold certain property to Ghulam Nabi for Rs. 1,500. Plaintiffs, Musammat Khodeja and Fazl Karim, were desirous of bringing a suit for pre-emption. It appears, however, that the brotherhood intervened and it was decided that the matter should be referred to arbitration rather than be taken into Court.

Accordingly, on the 18th March 1918, an agreement was drawn up referring the matter to the arbitration of four persons, an umpire (Mohkam Din) being appointed. An award was duly drawn up and signed by the arbitrators as well as most of the parties on the 20th of March 1918. As, however, Ghulam Nabi appeared to be unwilling to act in accordance with the award, the plaintiffs filed an application under paragraph 20 of the Second Schedule, Civil Procedure Code, asking for an order directing the filing of the award in Court and the passing of a decree in accordance therewith. The matter was duly taken up, when various objections were taken. The only one which requires determination here was that the original award not being forthcoming, no award could be filed and no secondary evidence of its contents could be given. This contention was upheld by the first Court and, on appeal, by the learned District Judge. The plaintiffs have, therefore, moved this Court on the revision side through Mr. Jai Gopal Sethi, and I have heard Mr. Sheo Narain for the respondent.

Whether the original award has been lost or is being deliberately withheld by some interested party is immaterial. The fact remains that no award has been filed in Court. Mr. Sethi contended that secondary evidence of the award was permissible, and in support he referred me to Banerji's Law of Arbitration, page 370, and to the case of Hill v. Townsend (1) referred to therein. Mr. Banerji, on the authority of Hill v. Townsend (1), points out that in England, in the case of a lost award, the Court would permit judgment to be entered upon an affidavit of its contents. Hill v. Townsend (1) does not appear to support that assertion, for there the original draft of the award was annexed to the affidavit and the rule nisi was made absolute, no cause being shown. On the other hand, Mr. Sheo Narain has referred me to a number of rulings, chiefly relating to the question whether when a document has been drawn up and not duly stamped, the penalty could be levied on a copy thereof. Gopi Reddi v. Mahanandi Reddi (2), however, is a case which is directly in point. It was there held that when an award had been lost a Court acting under section 255, Civil Procedure Code, 1882 (corresponding to paragraph 20 of the Second Schedule of the present Act), cannot take secondary evidence of its provisions. It was held that as the award could not be produced and, therefore, could not be filed, the persons seeking to have it filed must be referred to a regular suit to enforce the terms of the award. Mr. Sethi was unable to distinguish this decision, merely contenting himself by saying that he had been unable to discover that this decision had ever been subsequently considered. In this, however, he appears to be wrong inasmuch as this case was referred to in Gowardhan Das v. Kesho Ram (3) and there distinguished without, however, in any way being disapproved. Following this decision I hold that when an award has been reduced to writing, as in this case, and has been lost, the special procedure provided by paragraph 20 of Schedule II, Civil Procedure Code, cannot be resorted to and that the parties should be referred to a regular suit to enforce the terms of the award.

I accordingly dismiss this petition with costs.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), s. 11—Res judicata—Suit by managing member of joint family—Subsequent suit by one member of family, whether maintainable.

GOWARDHAN DAS v. VIRU MAL.

A suit brought by the managing member of a Hindu joint family with the consent and knowledge of the remaining members of the family and on their behalf operates under section 11 of the Civil Procedure Code to bar a subsequent suit by the other members in respect of the same property, on the same cause of action and against the same defendant.

Appeal, under section 10 of the Letters Patent, against the judgment of Mr. Justice Knox, dated the 15th May 1918.

The Hon'ble Mr. N. P. Asthana, for the Appellant.

Mr. S. N. Mukerji, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—There are certain facts which are necessary to explain the decision in this suit. According to the plaintiff-respondent's own story there was a certain house which was acquired by a joint family of which he was a member It became joint family property. The defendants-appellants before us, according to him, began to disturb the plaintiff and the joint family in possession of the property and began to do various improper acts in respect to it. He accordingly brought this suit for an injunction to restrain them. He also admitted that his brother Balmakund was the managing member of the joint family, that this brother Balmakund had brought a former suit in respect to this very house against the very same defendants on the very same cause of action, which suit had been dismissed. He admitted that prior to the institution of that suit his brother Balmakund consulted him as to its institution and he gave his consent thereto. Both the Court of first instance and the lower Appellate Court have, on these facts, held that the present suit is barred by the principle of res judicata, in that the former suit was brought by the managing member of the family with the present plaintiff's consent and knowledge and on his behalf. A second appeal was preferred to this Court. A single Judge who heard it reversed the decision of the Appellate Court and remanded the suit for decision on its merits to the Court of first instance. The learned Judge held that Explanation 6 of section 11 of the Code of Civil Procedure did not apply. We think that on the facts admitted by the plaintiff in his plaint and in his statement in Court the present suit is clearly barred by the rule of res judicata. Actually as a matter of fact, though he was arranged as a pro forma defendant in the former suit, the present plaintiff was a plaintiff to that suit. Though in his plaint Balmakund did not say that he sued in his capacity as managing member of the family, still the plaintiff has had to admit in the present suit that he actually did so in that capacity. If the present suit were not barred, there would, in the case of a joint family, be endless litigation, as no other member of the family would be bound by the decision arrived at in the suit brought by the managing member on behalf of the family. We think the question is not open even to argument. We allow the appeal, set aside the decision of this Court and restore the decree of the Court below. The appellants will have their costs in this Court.

Appeal allowed.

Hindu Law—Widow—Alienation, when justified—Necessity—Payment of debt to third person—Burden of proof.

Under the Hindu Law a widow cannot, except for special purposes, alienate of her own free will the property received by her from her husband. For religious or charitable purposes or for purposes conducive to the spiritual welfare of her husband she has a much larger power of disposition than she possesses for purely worldly purposes, and to support an alienation for the last named purpose she must show necessity [p. 848, col. 2]

The mere payment of a debt to a previous creditor is no justification for an alienation by a widow under the Hindu Law, nor does the purchase of house by her after the alienation furnish such justification [p. 848, col. 2.].

It is the duty of an alienee from a Hindu widow to prove to the satisfaction of the Court that the transfer is binding on the collateral relations of the widow's late husband. [p. 848, col. 2.]

GOWARDHAN DAS v. VIRU MAL.

Second appeal from the decree of the Additional District Judge, Lahore, dated the 10th June 1915.

Mr. Jagan Nath, for the Appellant.

Bakhshi Tek Chand, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This is an action brought by the collaterals of one Shankar Das to contest the sale of a house effected on the 3rd of October 1912 by his widow, Musammat Sukh Devi, for Rs. 1,900. It is beyond dispute that the alienor being a Brahmin widow residing in a town, the transfer made by her must be judged by the doctrines of the Hindu Law applying to a case of an alienation by a widow; and the sole question for determination is whether Musammat Sukh Devi was justified in selling the house inherited by her from her husband.

It appears that Shankar Das, who died nearly 30 years ago, left considerable house property; and that in pursuance of a partition carried out in 1901 between Musammat Sukh Devi and her co-widow, Musammat Uttam Devi, the former got not only the house in dispute but also another large house. The latter house was sold by her for Rs. 3,000 in 1906, and the house in question was encumbered by means of two mortgages made by her in 1909. Now, one of the items which constituted consideration for the sale is a sum of Rs. 733 paid to the previous mortgagee, Lehna Singh, but there is not a scintilla of evidence upon the record to show that the money was borrowed from Lehna Singh for any necessary purpose.

The Additional Judge was evidently labouring under a misapprehension as to the law applicable to an alienation of immoveable property by a Hindu widow. It is a well-recognized principle that a widow cannot of her own will alienate the property received by her from her husband except for special purposes. For religious or charitable purposes or for those which are supposed to conduce to the spiritual welfare of her husband she has a larger power of disposition than that which she possesses for purely worldly purposes. To support an alienation for the last she must show necessity.

Now, the learned Judge of the lower Appellate Court appears to be under the impression that the payment of a debt contracted by a widow from a third person justifies an alienation of immoveable property. That is no doubt the rule of customary law applicable to an alienation by a male proprietor; but the Hindu Law does not recognize the mere payment of such a debt to a previous creditor as a justification for an alienation by a widow. Neither the fact that the plaintiff did not contest the mortgages for three years, nor the circumstance that he ultimately compromised the suit instituted by him to contest the sale made in 1909, raises any presumption in favour of the validity of the mortgages. The learned Judge has incorrectly stated the facts in connection with that sale and the suit which was brought to impeach it. The sale was effected in favour of one Kartar Singh, and not of Shankar Das as wrongly stated by the lower Appellate Court; and the plaintiff did not give up the claim until he had received Rs. 600, a matter entirely ignored by the Court.

There can be no doubt that the alienee upon whom the onus rested has failed to establish any necessity for the previous mortgages; and it is obvious that, if these mortgages cannot bind the reversioner's interested in the husband's estate, the purchase of a house by the widow after the sale in dispute cannot be put forward as a justification. Upon the record there is no indication as to the pecuniary circumstances of the widow in 1909 beyond the fact that three years before she had alienated one of the houses for Rs. 3,000, out of which she must have kept some money with herself. Be that as it may, it was clearly the duty of the alienee to prove to the satisfaction of the Court that the transfer was binding upon the plaintiff, and this he has failed to do.

Accordingly we accept the appeal, and reversing the decrees of the lower Courts allow the plaintiff's claim with costs throughout.

Appeal accepted.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), s. 16—Bench of Magistrates—Rules regulating constitution of Bench—Trial held in contravention of rules, legality of.

A trial held by a Bench of Magistrates in contravention of the rules regulating the constitution of such Bench is void [p. 849, col. 2.]

Thus, where the rules regulating the trial of cases by a Bench of Magistrates provide that a trial must be completed before the same Magistrates who commenced it, or must be held afresh before a different set of Magistrates, a trial continued and finished by two of three Magistrates who constituted the Bench in the first instance, is a trial held in contravention of the rules, and is, therefore, void. [p. 849, col. 2; p. 850, col. 1.]

Application against the convictions and sentences passed by a Bench of Special Magistrates, Second Class, at Satara, confirmed on appeal by the Sub-Divisional Magistrate at Satara.

Mr. S. S. Patkar (Government Pleader), for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.

SHAH, J.—The petitioners before us in this case were tried by a Bench of 2nd class Magistrates on a charge of grievous hurt under section 325, Indian Penal Code. The prosecution evidence was heard by three Magistrates and the defence evidence was heard by only two out of the three, with the result that the decision was given by the two Magistrates who had heard the case throughout. The Magistrates in question are appointed for the District of Satara, and the rules regulating the constitution of the Bench of Magistrates are to be found in the Notification of 30th October 1885 at page 1262 of the Bombay Government Gazette for 1885, Part I. These rules were framed under section 16 of the Criminal Procedure Code of 1882 and are still in force.

The petitioners were convicted by the Bench of Magistrates on the 13th of May 1919. They appealed to the District Magistrate, and it was urged on their behalf that the whole trial was void as it was contrary to the said rules, in so far as only two Magistrates finished the trial though it was commenced by a Bench of three Magistrates. The Appellate Court held that the trial was valid. In the result the convictions of the present petitioners were confirmed.

They have presented an application to this Court, and it is urged that the trial is void as it contravenes the rules. It is provided by these rules that the Bench may try any cases triable by a 3rd class Magistrate, and that if for any cause it is found necessary to adjourn the hearing of a case after the evidence has been partly taken, the trial must be completed before the same Magistrates who commenced it or must be held afresh before a different set of Magistrates. In the present case the trial was not completed before the same Magistrates who commenced it. It was not held afresh before a different set of Magistrates, but it was continued and finished by two out of the three Magistrates who constituted the Bench in the first instance. It is clear that the trial in this case contravenes the provisions of rule 4, and that it is void on that ground. It is urged, however, that under the rule it is open to hold a fresh trial before a different set of Magistrates and as rule 2 allows that any two persons appointed as Honorary Magistrates may constitute a Bench, in the present case the two Magistrates who continued the trial may properly be deemed to have substantially complied with the rule, as they had heard the whole case from the beginning to the end. It is further urged that the accused has not been prejudiced in any way and that it must be treated merely as an irregularity and not an illegality vitiating the trial. I am, however, unable to accept these contentions as sound. In my opinion there is no substantial compliance with the provisions of the rule which directs in the alternative that the trial should be held afresh before a different set of Magistrates. It could not be said that when the two Magistrates continued the trial, heard the defence evidence and decided the case, they held the trial afresh or that they constituted a different set of Magistrates at the time. I do not say that those two Magistrates could not have constituted a different set of Magistrates within the meaning of the rule, but in fact they could not be said to have done so with reference to the case. In fact they simply continued the part-heard case in the absence of their colleague. It is also difficult to say that there was no prejudice to the accused. But it seems to me that apart from any prejudice to the accused, where such a rule affecting the constitution of the Bench has not been complied with, the trial cannot be treated as valid. There is a further objection that the charge under section 325, Indian Penal Code, though not triable by a 3rd class Magistrate has been tried by the Bench of 2nd class Magistratee, in spite of rule 1 which provides that the Bench may try any case triable by a 3rd class Magistrate. This objection was not taken in the lower Courts. On the information we have on the present record, we see no answer to this objection which affects the jurisdiction of the trial Magistrates. It is enough, however, for the purposes of this case to hold that the trial held is invalid on the first ground. The convictions and sentences must be set aside and the fine, if paid, refunded.

Having regard to the period of imprisonment already suffered by the petitioners as also to the circumstances of the case generally, I do not think that we need direct any further proceedings against the petitioners.

HAYWARD, J.—I agree. It is provided by rule 2 that a trial should be by a Bench of two where it is not possible to obtain three Magistrates. But it is provided by rule 4 that a trial once commenced must be ended before the same Magistrates. The meaning of this seems to me to be not before two only but before the same three Magistrates. The only alternative provided is a fresh trial before another set of Magistrates. If the rules result in inconvenience, then the remedy seems to me to be revision of the rules. They are old rules of 1885 and differ materially from the more recent rules prescribed for the Benches of Magistrates in Poona and Bombay. There was also another difficulty that the trial of an offence of grievous hurt was not triable by this particular Bench, which only had authority to try cases triable by 3rd class Magistrates. The conviction and sentence must be set aside as proposed by my learned brother.

Rule made absolute.

U. P. Municipalities Act (II of 1916), s. 247, complaint under—Duty of Court—Evidence, nature of.

Where a Magistrate receives information under section 247 of the U P. Municipalities Act that a house is being used as a brothel or for the purposes of habitual prostitution to the annoyance of respectable inhabitants in the vicinity, he should, before taking action thereon, take evidence and satisfy himself, first, that the complainants are persons residing in the immediate vicinity of the house to which the complaint refers, and, second, that the house is used for the purpose mentioned in clause (b of section 247 of the Act to the annoyance of respectable inhabitants in the vicinity. [p. 851, col. 1.]

Criminal revision against the order of the Magistrate, First Class, Cawnpore, dated the 26th November 1919.

Mr. Nehal Chand, for the Applicant.

The Assistant Government Advocate, for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.—This is an application for revision of an order purporting to have been made under section 247 of the Municipalities Act No. II of 1916. It appears that an application was presented to the Municipal Board by a number of persons complaining of the existence of houses occupied by prostitutes in a particular Mohalla in the city of Cawnpore. This application was forwarded to the Joint Magistrate, (who is a Magistrate of the first class) for necessary action. The Magistrate thus received information within the meaning of section 247. Clause (a) of that section was not applicable to the case because the brothel complained of was not alleged to be in the vicinity of a place of worship or an educational institution or a boarding house, hostel or mess used or occupied by students. It was apparently an application which fell under clause (b) of the section, namely, that the house complained of was being used as a brothel or for the purpose of habitual prostitution to the annoyance of respectable inhabitants in the vicinity. Under the proviso to the section it was necessary that the complaint should have been made by three or more persons residing in the immediate vicinity of the house to which the complaint refers. In the present case the Magistrate, who made an inquiry into the matter and passed orders, does not appear to have recorded any evidence whatever. The learned Counsel on both sides were unable to find on the record any evidence, which the Magistrate had taken and upon which he could base his finding. It was necessary for him to take evidence and to satisfy himself first that the complainants were persons residing in the immediate vicinity of the house to which the complaint referred and, second, that the house was used for the purposes mentioned in clause (a) of section 247 to the annoyance of respectable inhabitants in the vicinity Unless an enquiry was made upon the aforesaid points, the Magistrate could not legally pass any order under the section. I accordingly set aside the order of the Magistrate and send back the case to him with instructions to take action in accordance with the provisions of section 247 as pointed out alone and then to pass such orders as he might think fit.

Order set aside;
Case sent back.

In re NAGINDAS CHANUSA—APPLICANT.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), s. 250—Compensation, order for—Order not made on same day as order of discharge—Legality of order.

The mere fact that an order for compensation is not made on the same day as the order of discharge, but on a subsequent day fixed on the application of the complainant for an adjournment to show cause in response to a notice issued on the same day on which the accused was discharged, would not make the order bad for non-compliance with the provision contained in clause (b) of section 250 of the Criminal Procedure Code. [p. 852, col. 1.]

Criminal application from an order passed by the Magistrate, First Class, East Khandesh, confirmed on application by the Sessions Judge, Khandesh.

Mr. Ratanlal Ranchhoddas, for the Applicant.

JUDGMENT.

SHAH, J.—The only question in this application is as to the order of compensation. On the merits there is nothing to be said in support of the application. But it is argued that as the accused were discharged on the 13th of January and the order of compensation was made on the 28th of January, the provisions of section 250 contained in clause (b) of the proviso have not been complied with inasmuch as the Magistrate has not stated in writing in his order of discharge or acquittal his reasons for awarding compensation. It is argued that in consequence of this non-compliance with the provisions of the section the order is bad. No doubt the wording of the clause lends colour to the argument urged on behalf of the applicant. But in this case the notice to the complainant to show cause why an order of compensation should not be made against him was given on the same day as the order of discharge and practically in the same proceeding. The order of compensation was made, after hearing the complainant some days later, below the order of discharge. On these facts it seems to me that clause (b) of the proviso has been sufficiently complied with; and that the Magistrate in directing the compensation to be paid has stated in writing practically in his order of discharge his reasons for awarding the compensation. The mere fact that the order came to be made some days after the order of discharge does not, in my opinion, affect the question. This view seems to accord with the view taken by this Court in Emperor v. Punamchand (1). The only differentiating fact here is that the order of compensation was made not on the same day as the order of discharge, but on a subsequent day fixed on the application of the complainant for an adjournment to show cause in response to the notice which was issued on the same day on which the accused were discharged.

I would accordingly discharge the Rule.

HAYWARD, J.—I concur. The compensation order is part of the order of discharge, though completed some days later: The common sense view ought, in my opinion, to be taken of the obvious intentions of the provisions of section 250 of the Criminal Procedure Code. This was the view held when the order which was on different pieces of paper was held to be one order by this Court in the case of Emperor v. Punamchand (1). The contrary and highly technical view taken by single Judges of the Allahabad High Court in the cases of Sofdar Husain, In the matter of the complaint of (2) and Ram Singh v. Mathura (3) was not followed in a subsequent case before the Allahabad Bench in the case of Ghurbin Koeri v. Khalil Khan (4). They got over the difficulty in that case by having recourse to section 537 of the Criminal Procedure Code. My own view is that upon a practicable interpretation of the provisions of section 250 it would not really be necessary to have recourse even to the saving provisions of section 537 of the Criminal Procedure Code.

EMPEROR—OPPOSITE PARTY.

Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860), s. 183—Attachment of property—Warrant not signed by Judge—Removal of property—Offence.

A warrant for the attachment of property which is not signed by the Judge or such officer as the Court may appoint in this behalf, is not a legal warrant and the removal of property directed by such warrant to be attached is not punishable under section 183 of the Penal Code. [p. 853, col. 1.]

Criminal reference made by the Sessions Judge, Shahjahanpur.

REFERRING ORDER.—Seth Taiyab Bhai, Zamindar of Mauza Ghusgawan, obtained a decree for ejectment, under section 58 of Act II of 1901, against his tenant. Tulla. The said tenant having died, the decree-holder took out execution of his decree for costs against the deceased judgment-debtor's heirs. A warrant, dated 20th May 1919, for attachment of moveables was issued by the Assistant Collector, M. Abdul Wahid, and in execution thereof the qurq amin, on 7th June 1919 attempted to attach a cart as assets of Tulla, deceased. Baddhan asked Karamatullah to remove the cart and the latter removed it before it was attached. On the report of the amin, the Assistant Collector made a preliminary enquiry and sanctioned prosecution of the applicants under section 183, Indian Penal Code. The Special Magistrate who tried the case convicted them under the said section, sentencing each of them to 3 months' rigorous imprisonment. They preferred an appeal against that order to the District Magistrate, who transferred it to the Court of K. B. M. Fasihuddin, first class Magistrate. It was argued in appeal that the warrant, not being signed by the officer issuing it, was illegal. The lower Appellate Court found the argument to be untenable and remarked that the Board of Revenue has authorised peshkars to sign such warrants. The sentence was, however, altered to one of Rs. 20 fine only. Both the applicants have now come in revision to this Court and the sole question is whether the warrant was legal. The Public Prosecutor was given time to show the authority relied on by the lower Courts. He has failed to do so and has stated that no such circular as is referred to in the lower Court's judgment exists. Order XXI, rule 24, of the First Schedule to the Code of Civil Procedure, which has been made applicable to proceedings in Revenue Courts by section 183 of the Tenancy Act, requires that "every such process shall be signed by the Judge or such officer as the Court may appoint in this behalf." The document in question bears the signature of the peshkar, who is not shown to have been appointed by the Court in that behalf. This being so, the amin had no lawful authority to attach the applicants' property and in removing the said property before its attachment they cannot be convicted under section 183, Indian Penal Code.

I, therefore, submit the case to the Hon'ble High Court under section 438 of the Code of Criminal Procedure and recommend that the conviction of both the applicants be quashed and the fine, if realised, be ordered to be refunded.

The record will first be sent to the lower Appellate Court for such explanation as it may have to offer.

JUDGMENT.—I accept the reference in this case and direct that the convictions be quashed and the fines, if paid, be refunded.

With reference to the practice mentioned by the Magistrate, the attention of the District Magistrate should be drawn to the matter and some circular issued to prevent the repetition of this mistaken practice, so that warrants may be signed in accordance with the provisions of the Code in future.

Reference accepted.

Mr. S. S. Patkar, Government Pleader, for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.

SHAH, J.—In this case the petitioners before us were asked to furnish security by the first class Magistrate on the 31st of January 1919 under section 110, clauses (a) and (b), of the Code of Criminal Procedure. The petitioners appealed to the District Magistrate, and it appears from an endorsement on the petition of appeal, dated the 17th of March, that notice was ordered to be issued to the Pleader for the accused and to the Public Prosecutor to appear on the 22nd of March. This endorsement does not appear to be signed, It further appears that the notice was served on the Pleader for the petitioners at Amalner in the afternoon of the 21st of March to be present at Jalgaon or any other place where the camp of the District Magistrate may be on the 22nd. On the 22nd of March the District Magistrate dismissed the appeals, remarking that there was no appearance and that he saw no grounds for interference with the Sub-Divisional Magistrate's finding.

It seems that there was not sufficient notice to the Pleader for the accused to be able to appear on the 22nd of March. The notice was served in the afternoon of the 21st, and the place where he was to appear was not definitely mentioned. Having regard to the facts disclosed in the judgment of the trial Magistrate, it seems to me that this case required to be examined on the evidence by the District Magistrate; and the endorsement that the notice was to be issued to both the parties shows that the District Magistrate also decided to hear the appeals and did not summarily dismiss them.

In view of the fact that the appeals have been disposed of in the absence of the petitioners and that there was not sufficient notice of the date and the place of hearing to their Pleader, I am of opinion that the order made by the District Magistrate dismissing the appeals should be set aside and the appeals should be sent back to his Court for disposal according to law.

HAYWARD, J.—I agree. The applicants' case was one demanding careful consideration. It arose out of factions in the village, which have led to quarrels between the parties which had obviously been exaggerated from mere mischief into habitual thefts. It was moreover apparently recognized that there should be a full hearing, as notice for a regular hearing had been issued by the learned District Magistrate. It unfortunately, however, turned out that the time given in the notice was not sufficient. The notice was not received until the afternoon of the 21st and required the Pleader to appear on the 22nd either at Jalgaon or at whatever camp he might find the District Magistrate. It has been admitted that the camp was then a long way from Jalgaon, So there really was not reasonable time to appear for the hearing before the District Magistrate. The result was that the parties were deprived of the benefit of having their pleas properly represented by their Pleader. It is true that in the case of one only has the time for which the security was taken not expired. But there ought, in my opinion, in any case to be a regular hearing as regards that one, and as regards the other four it is a matter of considerable importance to them in regard to their position in their village, and it seems to me desirable, therefore, to send the case back in order that there should be the regular hearing which was originally contemplated by the learned District Magistrate.

Order set aside.

A Magistrate exercises his discretion wrongly, where he adopts the summary procedure for the trial of a case in which, from the nature of the dispute and the plea taken by the accused, it is apparent that complicated questions of right and title are involved, and in such a case the High Court will interfere with the exercise of his discretion [p. 855, col. 2.]

The admission in evidence of an unregistered document which is compulsorily registrable is both illegal and irregular, and a decision founded upon such a document cannot be sustained. [p. 855, col. 2.]

It is outside the province of a Criminal Court to decide a complicated question of title: the question should be left for determination by a Civil Court. [p. 857, col. 1.]

Application against the order of the Judicial Commissioner, Ranchi, dated the 7th January 1920.

Messrs. Manuk and S. N. Palit, for the Petitioners.

JUDGMENT.—This is an offshoot of a series of litigation arising out of a dakhaldahani or delivery of possession given to the auction-purchaser, Rai Bahadur Baldeo Das Birla, in respect of a tenure belonging to the judgment-debtor, Thakur Madan Mohan Nath Sahi Deo. The delivery of possession was effected on various dates on the several properties comprised in the writ of the Court, from the 30th of March to the 14th of April 1919. Exhibit A in this case shows that the possession was delivered in respect of village Kisko on the 23rd of April 1919. Nilmoni Nath Sahi Deo was under tenure-holder under the judgment debtor, and by the operation of law his under-tenure was rendered void by the auction-sale under section 208 of the Chota Nagpur Tenancy Act, read with section 16 of the Bengal Rent Recovery Act (VIII of 1865). Nilmoni Nath Sahi Deo resisted the claim of the auction purchaser to obtain possession of the under-tenure, but was defeated in a proceeding under section 145 of the Code of Criminal Procedure by the order of the Magistrate, dated the 1st of September 1919, passed in favour of the auction purchaser, which was upheld by this Court on 13th October 1919. Apparently when the proceeding under section 145 was going on, on the 12th of September 1919 the complainant in this case, Shaikh Karim Bux, filed a petition before the Magistrate complaining against the petitioners, who are the servants of the auctions-purchaser, of having cut and removed paddy crops from a plot No. 370 of the cadastral survey, on the allegation that the said paddy was grown by the complainant on the strength of the possession derived from a settlement alleged to have been made with him by Nilmoni Nath Sahi Deo on the 13th of Magh Sambat 1970, corresponding to the 24th of January 1914, by a hukumnama. The Police was ordered to investigate into the matter but they returned the petition, with a report that they were unable to come to any decision as to the respective claims of the parties. This report is dated the 14th of October 1919. On the 27th of October the Magistrate summoned the accused under section 379 of the Indian Penal Code. The plea of the accused, as recorded by the Magistrate, was that "they removed the paddy as they had sown it and had ploughed the field this year." The Magistrate tried the case summarily and after examining 5 witnesses on behalf of the prosecution and 4 witnesses on behalf of the defence, recorded a judgment of conviction and sentenced the accused to six weeks' rigorous imprisonment.

The petitioners moved the Judicial Commissioner of Ranchi who, by his order of the 7th January 1920, declined to recommend the case to this Court for an interference with the order of the Magistrate.

From the nature of the dispute, and particularly from the plea taken by the accused, it was obvious that the case involved complicated questions of right and title, and that it was not possible in a summary procedure to come to a definite and correct decision upon those points. This is also obvious from the long judgment of the Magistrate, who appears to have taken great pains in order to solve the intricate questions involved before him. In spite of all this, the Magistrate chose to adopt the summary procedure for the trial of the petitioners.

The learned Judicial Commissioner seems to have realized the unreasonableness of the procedure adopted by the Magistrate, for he says that he agrees with the argument on this point urged on behalf of the petitioners before him, but he declined to take any action, inasmuch as in his view the wrong exercise of the discretion was not in itself a sufficient ground for an interference with the decision of the Magistrate. Whether the Judicial Commissioner is right or not in the abstract principle of law laid down by him, in the circumstances of this case it is obvious that the accused have been prejudiced by this wrong exercise of the discretion by the Magistrate and that in itself is a good ground for interference with the discretion exercised by the Magistrate to try the case summarily and for setting aside the conviction and ordering a re-trial. Another reason why the conviction cannot be supported is the illegal and irregular acceptance of the most important document in the case, the title deed of the complainant, the hukumnama referred to above. This hukumnama is an unregistered document, with a stamp of one anna affixed thereon. It purports to create a lease without fixed terms and is, therefore, of the nature of a perpetual lease with the fixity of rent of Rs. 2-8-0 besides cesses. Such a document comes well within clause (d), section 17 of Indian Registration Act, under which it is compulsorily registrable. The document was, therefore, inadmissible in evidence under section 49 (c) of the Act. The whole decision as to the right of the complainant in the land in question has been decided on the basis of this hukumnama, which was improperly admitted in evidence. The conviction on this ground also is liable to be set aside.

It may, however, be said that there was oral evidence in the case on behalf of the prosecution to show that the settlement was made, and that the complainant was in possession of the land for the last six or seven years before the date of the occurrence, and that even if the hukumnama be taken out of consideration, the finding of the Court below can be supported upon the oral evidence. In this state of the circumstances there can be no legitimate complaint that this Court should not go into the evidence in this case in revision. But before doing so and finding out how far the finding of the Magistrate can be supported upon the oral evidence in the case, it is impossible for this Court to find out how far the Magistrate was not influenced in his estimate of the oral evidence on account of the document which was improperly accepted in evidence. From the tenor of the judgments of the Courts below, I am inclined to think that their estimate of the oral evidence is to a great extent influenced by the said document. Coming to the evidence it is impossible to place any reliance upon the testimony of the witnesses, judging it externally or internally. From the evidence it is clear that there was a proceeding under section 147 started by the Magistrate, at the instance of the manager of the auction-purchaser. Witnesses Nos. 1, 2, and 5 were accused in that proceeding, whereas all the 5 witnesses have recently taken settlement of the land from Nilmony Nath Sahi Deo, most probably out of the disputed under-tenures. Their evidence is ridiculous and to read it is sufficient to discard it. The Judicial Commissioner has declined to go into the evidence, as he thought that his hands were fettered in revision. As I have observed above, this is a case in which this Court is justified in looking into the evidence, particularly when the trial has been summary. The Magistrate has given no reasons in his judgment as to why the evidence of Mr. A. P. Hanson, manager of the auction-purchaser, should not be accepted. He has in clear terms stated that he took delivery of possession of the lands in question from the civil Court Nazir, and had them sown and cultivated, and that the paddy crops were cut by the accused under his instructions. As to the delivery of possession, the Nazir corroborates Mr. Hanson, though it could not be expected that he would be able to swear to the possession being given of particular plots when he had been engaged in giving possession from the 30th March to the 14th April 1919 over innumerable properties covered by the writ of the Court.

Compared with the evidence on behalf of the defence, the evidence on behalf of the prosecution appears to me not only unreliable but also vague and insufficient for conviction. The Magistrate as well as the Judicial Commissioner appear to have been greatly influenced by the plea taken by the accused. That plea is recorded by the Magistrate and as referred to above, appeared to them to be a plea of having actually sown and ploughed the field, but from the evidence in the case, particularly of the manager, it appears that the land in question was not actually sown by the accused but that the crops were cut and removed by them under the orders of the manager. As the accused were claiming the possession of the land on behalf of their master, it was consistent with their plea to allege that they had sown and ploughed it, meaning thereby evidently that it was sown and ploughed on behalf of their master. On account of the summary nature of the trial their statement has not been recorded in their own words, and hence they cannot be pinned down to the purport of their statements recorded by the Magistrate. This also shows how the procedure adopted in this case has prejudiced the accused. The learned Judicial Commissioner has declined to give effect to their plea of not having acted mala fide and with dishonest intention in cutting the crop, inasmuch as they were cutting it under the orders of their master, simply upon the ground that their plea was that of having actually sown and cultivated the land, but the evidence in this case, as already pointed out, shows that the plea was misunderstood. There is, therefore, no reason why the principle of the law should not be applied to this case, that even if the fact alleged by the prosecution be accepted, it has not been shown that the accused acted with any dishonest motive in cutting and removing the crop from the land in question under the orders of the master, who, they believed, had grown the crop. There was a clear plea of bona fide title raised in the case, which took the case out of the province of the Criminal Court, and the Magistrate could well have left the parties to have their rights determined by a Civil Court.

The allegations made in the complaint and the note of the Magistrate thereon referring to the khatian must also have made it clear to him that the dispute in this case raised a bona fide question of title.

This was made clearer still by the report of the Police, which stated that in spite of their local investigation they could not come to any conclusion as to the respective rights and claims of the parties. Nowhere in the evidence of the case it has been asserted that the complainant was a settled raiyat in the village or had acquired a right of occupancy in the lands in suit apart from the hukumnama. It thus becomes a matter of great controversy as to what rights the complainant had in the lands, even if he be held to have been in possession of the lands. Prima facie the auction-purchaser is entitled to obtain possession of all the lands comprised within the writ of the Court, free from any incumbrance created by the judgment-debtor, and it is for the persons claiming right to remain on the land in spite of the delivery of possession to prove conclusively the right set up by them.

The litigation arising out of a Civil Court dakhldahani has already become most unfortunate, and every attempt should be made by a Criminal Court to maintain the auction-purchaser in possession of the property unless a clear right to possession is established in any other person. I purposely refrain from giving any opinion as to the right of the complainant in the land in question, and I do not consider it pertinent for a Criminal Court or this Court sitting in revision to attempt to decide such complicated questions of title raised in this case. I think the matter should be left to be determined by a Civil Court.

The Rule must, therefore, be made absolute and the conviction and the sentence passed upon the petitioners must be set aside.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), s. 122—Security for good behaviour, object of—Sureties, acceptance of—Duty of Court.

The object of an order for furnishing security for good behaviour is the prevention of crime, and not to secure the imprisonment of the person concerned. [p. 858, col. 2; p. 859, col. 1.]

Under section 122 of the Criminal Procedure Code when a surety for good behaviour is offered, the Magistrate is required to consider the matter judicially, and to state his reasons for not accepting a surety. [p. 858, col. 2; p 859, col. 1.]

The mere fact that the sureties offered, although solvent and respectable, live at a distance from the persons bound over is not a good reason for refusing to accept them. [p. 858, col. 1; p. 859, col. 1.]

Criminal application for revision from an order passed by the Sub-Divisional Magistrate, First Class, Kaira, confirmed by the District Magistrate, Kaira.

Mr. H. V. Divatia, for the Petitioners.

Mr. S. S. Patkar, Government Pleader, for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.

SHAH, J.—In this case seven persons, including Dhula Bhatha and Mangal Chuna, were ordered by the Sub-Divisional Magistrate on the 18th of December 1918 to execute a personal recognizance for Rs. 100 and to furnish two solvent and respectable sureties for the same amount each for good behaviour for a period of one year. On the same day they were ordered to suffer rigorous imprisonment for one year or until within such period the security required was furnished, as no sureties were furnished by the persons concerned on that day. On the 16th of April last an application was made by the relations of these two persons, Dhula and Mangal, offering the necessary sureties on their behalf. The persons offered as sureties were two brothers, Purshotam and Gangashankar. The Sub-Divisional Magistrate referred the matter to the Police and on the 3rd of May last a report was made by the Sub-Inspector of Umreth that the sureties offered had land in the village of Araj, and that they were ordinary men. The matter was further referred to the Sub-Inspector of Police at Dakore, who made a report on the 12th of June last that the persons concerned had land at Araj and that they intended to employ the two persons Dhula and Mangal to work on their fields, that the sureties lived at Umreth and were not in a position to exercise control over the two persons, that the outlaws, for harbouring whom Dhula and Mangal along with others were called upon to furnish security for good behaviour, were still at large and that it was desirable not to accept any sureties until those outlaws were arrested. On this correspondence an order addressed to the Sub-Inspector was endorsed by the Sub-Divisional Magistrate in Gujarati on the 5th of July as follows:—"Under the circumstances stated by you bail cannot be granted. Please inform the applicants to that effect and report." The relations of the two persons made an application against the said order to the District Magistrate, who refused to interfere. They have made an application now to this Court. At the outset I desire to point out that this application should have been filed in the names of the persons concerned. In view of the fact that the order now in question was made on the application of the present petitioners, we do not consider it necessary to postpone the matter in order to have the application formally in the names of the two persons concerned. The matter has been brought to our notice, and it seems desirable to make the proper order without any further delay.

It is clear that according to the order made by him on the 18th of December 1918 the Sub-Divisional Magistrate had to inquire whether the two sureties offered were solvent and respectable. Under section 122 he could refuse to accept these sureties if they were unfit persons for reasons to be recorded. In the present case I cannot accept the conclusion reached by the Sub-Divisional Magistrate, nor can I approve of the procedure followed by him. The materials before the Sub-Divisional Magistrate clearly showed that the sureties offered were solvent persons. There was nothing against them and they were apparently respectable persons. The other reason given in the Police report for not accepting them was that the persons in jail should not be released until the outlaws were arrested. It is hardly a reason for not accepting these sureties. The Sub-Divisional Magistrate has simply endorsed the report made by the Police. He has given no reasons of his own, and having regard to the state of the original papers in this case it seems to me that he has not treated the matter judicially. Under section 122 when a surety is offered, the Magistrate is required to consider the matter judicially and to state his reasons for not accepting a surety. In the present case he has failed to do so. He does not seem to have realised that according to his previous order he had only to consider whether the sureties were solvent and respectable and he took a little over two months and a half to decide this simple question.

The District Magistrate recognized the defects in the order but refused to interfere on the ground that he doubted whether the sureties offered were of sufficient standing. It seems to me that that reason is vague. In dealing with the question of sureties under section 122 it must be remembered that the object of the order for furnishing security for good behaviour is the prevention of crime and not to secure imprisonment of the persons concerned: see Jivanatha v. Emperor (1). The report of the Sub-Inspector of Police clearly shows that he has put forward a reason for not accepting sureties which really has the effect of diverting the preventive provisions to a punitive purpose. I am of opinion that the Sub-Divisional Magistrate was clearly wrong in accepting such a reason and that the sureties offered ought to be accepted in this case.

I would accordingly make the Rule absolute, set aside the order of the Sub-Divisional Magistrate and order that the sureties may be accepted.

HAYWARD, J.—I agree. The acceptance of the sureties ought to be ordered. It was directed in the preliminary order that two solvent and respectable sureties for Rs. 100 each should be furnished. Two sureties named Gangashankar and Parshotam were produced. They were reported to be solvent and respectable. They owned houses and lands and they were prepared to employ the persons required to give sureties upon their land. It was, however, suggested that they would not be satisfactory sureties, as the lands were at a place called Araj which would appear to be about six miles from their residence at Umreth. It was also suggested that it would be unwise to release the men from prison owing to the presence of outlaws in the neighbourhood. The sureties were, therefore, refused by the Sub-Divisional Magistrate, and though it was recognized that the refusal was not quite in order, it was not interfered with by the learned District Magistrate.

It seems to me that the discretion to refuse sureties was not properly exercised. The sureties were within the description of the surities required. They would, in my opinion, have proved as satisfactory as any sureties to be offered, in that they would have taken the men required to give sureties as their own tenants and would, therefore, have had good opportunity of preventing them from getting into mischief. The distance of six miles of the land from their residence would not seem to me to be really material in the Mofussil. It was obviously no good reason in law to refuse to release the men from prison that there happened to be other outlaws in the neighbourhood.

It seems to me necessary also to observe that the scrappy order in vernacular refusing the sureties gave no reasons whatever for the refusal, and to point out that an order refusing sureties ought to be passed as a judicial order upon proper materials and that it has been specifically provided that reasons for refusal should be recorded. These provisions have been overlooked by the Sub-Divisional Magistrate and ought to have been set right, if he had jurisdiction to do so, by the District Magistrate under section 122 of the Criminal Procedure Code. It seems to me desirable also to repeat that sureties for good behaviour and not imprisonment were the primary objects of the preventive provisions of Chapter VIII of the Criminal Procedure Code.

It is perhaps unnecessary to press the point, as the matter is before us and would seem to require the orders proposed, but it is unusual to proceed on petitions received merely from the relations of parties and should not be taken as a precedent under section 439 of the Criminal Procedure Code.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), ss. 203, 403, 439—Complaint, dismissal of—Second complaint, whether entertainable—Revision—Interlocutory proceeding—High Court, interference by.

There is nothing in the law to prohibit a Magistrate who has dismissed a complaint under section 203 of the Criminal Procedure Code from reviving the proceeding upon a second complaint, if he considers that there are good grounds for so doing. [p. 859, col. 2.]

As a general rule, the High Court will not interfere in interlocutory proceedings. [p. 860, col. 1.]

Criminal revision against the order of the Magistrate, First Class, Agra, dated the 9th December 1919.

Mr. S. S. Ghosh, for the Applicant.

Mr. R. P. Sorabji, for the Opposite Party.

JUDGMENT.—This revision is immediately connected with the previous case (Criminal Miscellaneous No. 283 of 1919) in which I have just passed orders. The prayer is that an order be issued directing that no further proceedings be taken against the petitioners on the complaint now alleged against them. In the case Queen-Empress v. Umedan (1) this Court pointed out that there was nothing in the law which prohibited a Magistrate, who had dismissed a complaint under section 203, from reviving proceedings should he, upon a second complaint, consider that there was good ground for proceeding against an accused person. We pointed out that there might be great fear of miscarriage of justice if a complainant, who had made a hasty complaint and had had his complaint dismissed, found himself prevented upon the discovery of good evidence from taking further proceedings against an accused person. I was a party to that judgment and it was my intention to make it clear that while a Magistrate who had dismissed a complaint could upon a second complaint revive proceedings, but that his action should be limited by considering that there was good ground for the second proceeding that he entertained. It was never my intention that a Magistrate should, after dismissing a complaint, take the complaint over again simply because it was filed before him. Before passing such an order he should consider whether there was good ground for proceeding against the accused person, otherwise there might be no limit to an accused person being harassed a second time. The complaint has been filed and has been accepted by the learned Magistrate. I have every confidence that he will proceed carefully with the hearing of the case and not be led to the conclusion that this Court is giving him any directions as regards its trial. If he finds from fresh evidence or any other reason that there are good grounds for the complaint, he will no doubt proceed to pass proper orders upon the same. If on the other hand he finds that the matter before him in this case simply rests where it is in the previous case, he will again take proper action and determine the case in any manner authorised by law. I decline to interfere, as I hold that interference in interlocutory proceedings is generally a mistake.

(1) A. W. N. (1895), 86.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), s. 250—Bombay Public Conveyances Act (VI of 1887), s. 28—Complaint under s. 28, whether complaint of offence within s. 250, Criminal Procedur Code—Compensation, whether can be awarded.

Section 23 of the Bombay Public Conveyances Act provides a summary remedy for the recovery of the legal fare of a public conveyance, and a complaint under the section is not a complaint in respect of an offence within the meaning of section 250 of the Criminal Procedure Code. A Magistrate, therefore, has no power to make an order awarding compensation under section 250 of the Criminal Procedure Code in respect of such complaint.

Appeal from an order passed by the Acting Fourth Presidency Magistrate, Bombay.

Mr. Katanlal Ranchhoddas, for the Applicant.

Mr. S. S. Patkar, Government Pleader, for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.

SHAH, J.—In this case a victoria driver lodged a complaint against the opponent under section 28 of the Bombay Act VI of 1867 in the Court of the Fourth Presidency Magistrate for the lawful fare due to him. The Magistrate found against the complainant on the merits and held that what the opponent had offered was the proper legal fare. He, however, held that the complaint was vexatious and ordered the complainant to pay to the opponent Rs. 25 as compensation under section 250 of the Criminal Procedure Code. Having regard to the language of section 23 of the Act it appears that it provides summary remedy for the recovery of the legal fare and that a complaint under the section is not a complaint in respect of an offence within the meaning of section 250, Criminal Procedure Code. It is clear from the language of the other sections in the Act that when the Legislature intends that a particular act or omission should be treated as an offence, appropriate language is used to indicate the intention. Here in section 28 reference is made to the fare and reasonable compensation for loss of time. It cannot be said that the omission to pay the legal fare is made punishable under the section. I do not think that the last clause which empowers the Magistrate to sentence the defaulter to imprisonment, for default of payment of the sums referred to in the previous part of the section, makes the alleged omission on the part of the party against whom the complaint is made under the section an offence. The Magistrate had, therefore, no power to make an order under section 250, Criminal Procedure Code, in this case. It is not necessary to examine whether on the merits the order of compensation is proper. I would set aside the order of compensation and direct the amount, if paid, to be refunded to the complainant.

CRUMP, J.—I agree.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), s. 476—Police report recommending prosecution—Accused called on to prove his case—Case not proved—Court, whether can sanction prosecution.

Where upon a Police report, and in the absence of a complaint, a Magistrate called upon the person who gave information to the Police of the commission of the offence, to prove the case, and upon his failure to do so, sanctioned his prosecution under section 476 of the Criminal Procedure Code:

Held, that the order was bad in law, inasmuch as an order under section 476 of the Code could only be made after the person to be affected thereby had been called upon to show cause why he should not be prosecuted and an order to prove the case was altogether different from an order to show cause.

Application against the order passed by the Deputy Magistrate, Muzaffarpur.

Messrs. S. P. Varma and Harnandan Sahay, for the Petitioner.

JUDGMENT.—The petitioner laid information before the Police, alleging that his brother's wife and her sister had set fire to his house. The Police enquired into the case and reported that it was maliciously false and asked for the prosecution of the petitioner under section 211, Indian Penal Code.

The learned Magistrate passed an order on the Police report that the petitioner was to prove his case. He heard the witnesses the petitioner produced, and then, finding that the case had not been proved, passed an order sanctioning the prosecution of the petitioner under section 211 under the provisions of section 476 of the Criminal Procedure Code. It is against this order that the present application is now made.

The learned Counsel for the petitioner relies on the case of Sarba Mahton v. Emperor (1), where it was held that a similar order to prove his case was not sanctioned by any provision of the Criminal Procedure Code. There is no doubt that had the Magistrate called upon the petitioner to show cause why he should not be prosecuted under section 211, no objection could have been taken to the order. The learned Counsel contends that an order to prove the case is altogether different from an order to show cause and I must agree with this contention. Had the petitioner been called upon to show cause, he would have been able to bring forward matters which would have shown the Court that there was justification for discharging the accused. Where he was only called upon to prove his case, all he could do was to examine the witnesses as to what actually happened. The Magistrate relied, it seems, on the case of Habit Khan v. Emperor (2), where it was suggested that if the Magistrate had made an inquiry into the truth or falsity of the charge, he might have had power under section 476 of the Code. There seems to be no express provision in the Code for calling on the petitioner to prove his case on the Police report, for there had been no complaint. The order, therefore, in the form that it was made was bad and should be set aside. If the Police, however, desire to prefer a complaint under section 195, they are at full liberty to do so. The order purporting to be made under section 476 is set aside.

Order set aside.

Mr. G. N. Thakor, for the Accused.

Mr. D. G. Dalvi, for the Complainant.

JUDGMENT.

MACLEOD, C. J.—The petitioner has appealed from an order of the Additional Sessions Judge, reversing an order of the First Class Magistrate, who refused to give sanction to prosecute the petitioner. A Rule was granted on the petitioner's application of the 16th October 1919, and, therefore, it seems it was treated by the learned Judges who granted the Rule as an application in revision. The petitioner charged the accused with causing hurt with a dangerous weapon. The accused was acquitted, and the trying Judge expressed the opinion that if the Police applied for sanction to prosecute the petitioner he would have granted it. The Police did not apply. The First Class Magistrate appears to have thought that he was prevented from giving sanction, because he had previously said that he would only give sanction if an application was made by the Police. The fact remains that it is evident from his judgment in the assault case that he thought that it was a case in which sanction ought to be given.

The Additional Sessions Judge has granted sanction to prosecute the petitioner. It has been argued before us that he had no jurisdiction to make the order. Section 195 of the Criminal Procedure Code deals with sanctions for prosecutions for certain offences, and under sub-section (6) any sanction given or refused under this section may be revoked or granted by any authority to which the authority giving or refusing it is subordinate; and under sub section (7) for the purposes of the section every Court shall be deemed to be subordinate only to the Court to which appeals from the former Court ordinarily lie. Clearly the First Class Magistrate was subordinate to the Sessions Court. An appeal would lie ordinarily to the Sessions Court. Section 409 especially provides that an appeal to the Court of Session or Sessions Judge shall be heard by the Sessions Judge or by an Additional Sessions Judge. Therefore, it is difficult to see how it can be said that an appeal would not ordinarily lie and could not be heard by the Additional Sessions Judge. Under section 193 (2), Additional Sessions Judges and Assistant Sessions Judges shall try such cases only as the Local Government by general or special order may direct them to try. It has not been contended that there has been no general order by the Local Government empowering the Additional Sessions Judge in this case to try ordinary cases and appeals, such as are intended by section 409. Otherwise the Additional Sessions Judge would have no power to try any case at all. Once we come to the conclusion that the Additional Sessions Judge would ordinarily have jurisdiction to hear appeals from the First Class Magistrate, then it seems to follow from section 195 that the Additional Sessions Judge would have jurisdiction to hear an application or an appeal from the First Class Magistrate refusing to give sanction. Therefore, in my opinion, the Additional Sessions Judge had jurisdiction to give sanction, reversing the order of the First Class Magistrate, and I see no reason to interfere with the conclusion he came to. The Rule is discharged.

HEATON, J.—I concur in the order proposed, and I will add a few words on the question of jurisdiction. As I understand the Code, when an Additional Sessions Judge is appointed under section 9 of the Code, he is appointed to exercise the jurisdiction of the Court of Session. So far as section 9 taken by itself makes it clear, or enables us to understand matters, an Additional Sessions Judge and even an Assistant Sessions Judge has all the powers of a Sessions Judge, and if we confine our attention to section 9, he is a Sessions Judge. But thereafter the Code proceeds to limit in certain particulars the powers both of Additional and of Assistant Sessions Judges. It does so, for instance, in section 31 in the matter of the sentences which an Assistant Sessions Judge can impose. It does so in section 193 in the matter of the trial of cases. It does so in section 409 in the matter of power to hear appeals. An Additional Sessions Judge has power to hear appeals, an Assistant Sessions Judge has not. But the theory of the Code to my thinking is quite clear. The Additional Sessions Judge has those powers of the Court of Session which he is not by some specific provision of the Code prohibited from exercising. He is certainly not prohibited from exercising the power to hear an appeal or an application, whichever you call it, against an order of sanction or refusal to grant sanction made by a lower Court. It seems to me, therefore, that it is not made out that the Additional Sessions Judge acted without jurisdiction. There is no other reason of importance why his order should be interfered with.

In order to sustain a conviction under section 498 of the Penal Code, it must be established that the woman had been enticed away or taken away from her husband's house and that she was detained for the purpose of illicit intercourse. The mere fact that she was seen outside the accused's house is not sufficient.

Criminal revision from an order of the Sessions Judge, Azamgarh.

Mr. Iqbal Ahmad, for the Applicant.

The Assistant Government Advocate, for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.—This application for revision must be allowed and the conviction of the applicant under section 498 of the Indian Penal Code must be set aside. The applicant Deonandan was tried by a Magistrate of the First Class under the aforesaid section. The Magistrate was of opinion that Deonandan along with two other persons had taken or enticed away Musammat Jagwatia, the wife of the complainant, with intent that illicit intercourse would be had with her by some person. The Magistrate convicted him. On appeal the learned Sessions Judge disbelieved the evidence for the prosecution upon the question of the woman having been taken or enticed away. He found, however, that the woman had been seen outside the house of Deonandan and from that he apparently concluded that she had been concealed or detained with intent to commit adultery with her or for the purpose of illicit intercourse with some one else. Upon this finding this conclusion could not follow. If the woman was seen outside the house, there was clearly no concealment and there is no finding that she was kept in his house either willingly or unwillingly. Therefore, there was neither detention nor concealment and as it was found that the woman had not been enticed or taken away from her husband's house, the accused could not be convicted under section 493 of the Indian Penal Code. I allow the application, set aside the conviction and sentence and as the applicant is on bail, I discharge the bail bond.

Bombay Prevention of Gambling Act (IV of 1887*)*, s. 8—Cash and ornaments found on persons of gamblers, whether liable to forfeiture.

Under the terms of section 8 of the Bombay Prevention of Gambling Act, cash, currency notes and ornaments found on the persons of those in a gaming house cannot be treated as instruments of gaming, even though they may have been used, or may be intended to be used for the purposes of gaming, and, therefore, are not liable to forfeiture. The power of forfeiture extends only to securities for money, and other articles seized in the house which are not instruments of gaming.

Criminal application for revision from convictions and sentences passed by the Magistrate, 1st Class, at Honawar, in Criminal Calendar Case No. 63 of 1919.

Mr. J. G. Rele, for Mr. Nilkanth Atmaram, for Accused Nos. 3, 5 to 8 and 15.

JUDGMENT.—In this case several accused have been convicted under sections 4 and 5 of the Bombay Prevention of Gambling Act, IV of 1887. In the course of the search under the Act not only were certain articles, including cash, found in the house attached, but also certain cash, ornaments and currency notes on the persons of the several accused were attached. The trial Magistrate has found on the evidence that the cash, ornaments and other articles, except those mentioned in his judgment, had been either used in gaming or intended to be used, and he has ordered them to be forfeited to Government under section 8 of the Act.

It is clear from the provisions of section 8 and the decision in the case of Emperor v. Waili Mussaji (1) that the power of forfeiture extends only to securities for money and other articles seized in the house which are not instruments of gaming. It is clear from the first paragraph of the section that the convicting Magistrate may order all instruments of gaming found in the house or on the persons of those who were found in the house to be forthwith destroyed, and it is clear from the second paragraph that the power of forfeiture really is confined to those articles which are not instruments of gaming and which have been seized in the house. The power of forfeiture does not extend to articles found on the persons of the accused which are not instruments of gaming. The order of the Magistrate as to forfeiture seems to me to be inconsistent with his finding as to the cash, and ornaments being instruments of gaming. It seems to follow from the terms of section 8 that the cash, currency notes and ornaments found on the persons of the accused cannot be treated as instruments of gaming for the purpose of that section, even though they may have been used or may be intended to be used for the purposes of gaming. The cash, currency notes and ornaments found on the persons of the accused cannot be ordered to be forfeited to Government, but ought to be returned to the respective persons from whom they were taken.

The petitioners before us are accused Nos. 2, 5, 6, 7, 8 and 15. But as the case is brought to our notice on this petition, we make the order which would apply to all the accused, on whose persons cash, currency notes and ornaments were found, even though some of them may not have applied to this Court.

The order of forfeiture made by the Magistrate is set aside and the cash, currency notes and ornaments found on the persons of the accused as noted in the Panchnama to which the order of forfeiture relates are ordered to be returned to the respective persons from whom they were taken.

Order set aside.

Pre-emption, suit for—Compromise in previous suit for possession—Abandonment of rights, effect of—Compromise, whether sale—Suit, whether maintainable.

In a suit for possession of land which was genuinely contested, before any evidence was recorded, the parties effected a compromise, whereby on receipt of a consideration the plaintiff gave up all his claims and the suit was dismissed. In a subsequent suit for pre-emption a contest ranged round the question whether the compromise amounted to a sale of the land so as to give rise to a right of pre-emption:

Held, that the compromise did not amount to a sale of the land; that the plaintiffs for a consideration merely abandoned their rights to obtain a decision by the Court on the question whether they were to be recognised as the owners of the land, and that, therefore, the suit for pre-emption could not be entertained. [p. 868, col. 1.]

Second appeal from the decree of the District Judge, Karnal, dated the 8th February 1916, reversing that of the Munsif, Rohtak, dated the 25th June 1915, decreeing plaintiff's claim.

Mr. Abdul Ghani, for the Appellant.

Lala Shamair Chand, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—Counsel for the appellants in the connected Second Appeal No. 1320 of 1916 has adopted the arguments addressed to us on behalf of the appellant in this appeal and has added that, in the event of the appeal being accepted, there should be a remand to decide the rights of the appellants inter se. We will, therefore, dispose of both appeals in the one judgment.

The facts necessary to be stated are the following—

One Jamaluddin was, under Act XXXV of 1858, judicially declared insane and his wife, Musammat Rashid ul-Nisa, was appointed the manager of his estate. They had three minor sons, Sarfaraz-ud-din, Niaz-ud-din and Latif Din. The last named died, and we are not concerned with him. By a deed, dated the 19th January 1883, Musammat Rashid-ul-Nisa sold, or rather purported to sell, the land in dispute which formed part of her husband's estate for Rs. 400 to Naunid Rai, the father of Matu Ram, defendant-respondent. Naunid Rai was in possession of the land as mortgagee and the paying off of the mortgage was part of the consideration for the sale. In consequence of this and other alienations by Musammat Rashid-ul-Nisa she was removed from the appointment of manager of the estate on the 10th May 1883 and Masihuddin, brother of Jamaluddin, was appointed in her place and the various alienees, including Naunid Rai, were informed that the alienations were invalid by reason of the Court's sanction to the alienations not having been taken in accordance with the provisions of section 14 of Act XXXV of 1858. Nothing further appears to have been done at the time and Naunid Rai continued in possession. A dispute arose in July 1895 in the course of mutation proceedings in connection with the sale-deed of the 19th January 1883. The Revenue Assistant refused to trench upon the functions of a Civil Court in deciding as to the validity of the sale and sanctioned the mutation on the ground of long possession by Naunid Rai and his representatives after his death, and the title deed, which was apparently valid on the face of it.

Jamaluddin died on the 3rd March 1909 and, on the 29th February 1912, Sarfaraz-ud-din and Niaz-ud-din his sons, who had then attained majority, instituted a suit in the Court of the District Judge at Rohtak against the representatives of Naunid Rai for possession of the land in suit on the ground that the sale to Naunid Rai was void. The suit was subsequently amended so as to include a prayer for redemption on payment of Rs. 260.

It is important to see what defences were raised. These can be seen from some of the issues framed, which included the following:

1. Whether the plaintiffs are governed by Muhammadan Law or custom (this is to cover the plea that Musammat Rashid-ul-Nisa is herself a sharer).
2. Whether the suit is within time.
3. Whether the doctrine of acquiescence and estoppel applies.
4. Whether the defendants have been in possession as owners and adversely for more than twelve years.

5. Whether the sale was made for the benefit of the plaintiffs and they benefited by it and hence are barred from bringing the suit.

Before any evidence was recorded this suit was compromised. The plaintiffs gave up all their claims on payment of Rs. 500 by the defendants and the suit was accordingly dismissed. The compromise was on the 6th August 1912.

On the 5th August 1913 Arif-ud-din, a cousin of Jamaluddin, instituted a pre-emption suit against the sons of Jamaluddin and Matu Ram, defendant-appellant, on the basis that the compromise was a sale of the land. On the following day Masihuddin, the brother of Jamaluddin, instituted a similar suit. The two suits were consolidated. Matu Ram raised various pleas but it is necessary only to notice one, namely, that the compromise was not a sale of the land. The first Court held that the compromise was a sale and gave a decree in favour of Masihuddin and, on his failure to deposit the money within the time stated, in favour of Arif-ud-din. Both plaintiffs and Matu Ram appealed, Masihud-din in respect of the amount of money and on the ground that he had prior rights and Matu Ram on various grounds. The lower Appellate Court held that there was a valid and completed sale in 1883 and that Musammat Rashid ul Nisa, as sarbarah of her husband, was competent to sell the land, that the want of the Court's sanction was merely a technical defect which was cured when the sons ratified the sale by the compromise of 1912. It, therefore, accepted the two appeals of Matu Ram and dismissed the appeals of the plaintiffs as time-barred. The plaintiffs appeal to this Court.

Though Lala Shamair Chand attempted at first to support the decision of the lower Appellate Court on the grounds and for the reasons stated by that Court, he wisely abandoned that attempt and has supported the decision on the ground, all along urged on behalf of his client, that the compromise was not a sale of the land, a point not touched by the lower Appellate Court. It is clear that under the provisions of section 14 of Act XXXV of 1858 the sale by Musammat Rashid-ul-Nisa in 1883 was void and that a void transaction cannot be ratified.

By the Transfer of Property Act 'sale' is defined as "a transfer of ownership in exchange for the price paid or promised or part paid and part promised." In Janki v. Girjadat (1) it was held that the above definition could be accepted for the purposes of the pre-emption law, but in Gul Mohammad Khan v. Khan Ahmed Shah (2) it was held that "Now the general question is the meaning of the word 'sale' as used in section 9 of the Punjab Loans Act, 1872, and we do not think that section can be interpreted by reference to the definition of sale or be effected by the definition of exchange in the later Act (the Transfer of Property Act) * * * Without attempting to define sale or exchange we entertain no doubt that a permanent transfer of land in a village for a sum of money, plus something that is not money, does not, merely because of such addition, of necessity cease to be a sale within the meaning of the Act. If a transfer of land for Re. 100 is a sale, we entertain no doubt that the parties to the transaction, by agreeing that the price should be Rs. 100 and (for example) a brass lota, could not alter the true character of the transaction and exclude it from being the subject of a claim of pre-emption * * * We consider that whatever the form the parties to the transaction may choose to give to it for their own purposes, or for the purposes of defeating a pre-emptor's claim, the question remains open to the Courts to decide whether the particular transaction does or does not amount to a sale within the meaning of that section."

In Tikaya Ram v. Dharam Chand (3) it was remarked that the essence of a sale is that the owner of property parts with it permanently for consideration. The first Court was of the opinion that the compromise was a sale, the consideration for which was partly the price originally paid in 1883 and partly what it describes as the price of the chose in action.

Chand on Krishna Tanhaji v. Aba Shetti Patil (4) in which the learned Judges, quoting the Privy Council in Rani Mewa Kuwar v. Rani Hulos Kuwar (5), remarked that the nature of a compromise is that it is an aknowledgment of the existing rights of the parties and held that a compromise was not a sale within the definition of the Transfer of Property Act. Reliance has also been placed on a number of judicial decisions relating to pre emption under the Oudh Laws Act, the provisions of which, in relation to the right of pre emption, are similar to those of the Punjab Laws Act.

In Abdul Wahid Khan v. Shaluuka Bibi (6) their Lordships of the Privy Council held, in a case in which the facts were that the plaintiff, who sought to recover possession of land in possession of others on alleged good title, had sold a share of the land claimed by her in order to raise funds for the purposes of the suit, that the transfer was a sale of a share in a law suit and that a transfer of a part of the claim created no right of pre emption under the provisions of the Oudh Laws Act.

In Raj Bahadur v. Jagrup Pande (7) the Judicial Commissioner, Oudh, followed the above Privy Council decision and also supported his decision by two decisions, Mirza Mohammed Abbas Ali Khan v. A. Quieros (8) and Khurshaid Ali v. Rashid Husain (9). These last reports are not at our disposal.

In Laiq Singh v. Harnam Singh (10) the Judicial Commissioner distinguished the two Oudh cases mentioned, in that in those cases the property sold was not in the possession of the vendor at the time of the sale and all that was sold was a doubtful right to recover the property, if the suit was successful, and that, in other words, what was sold was a chose in action and, therefore, it had been rightly held that it was not a sale on which a right of pre-emption could be claimed, whereas, in the case before him, the vendor was in constructive possession and there was no cloud over his title.

On the question of the meaning of "sale" it was also held that where a sale is effected partly in lieu of money and partly in view of something computable in money, or valued in money, a right of pre-emption would accrue.

We have also been referred to Pollock and Mulla's Indian Contract Act, 3rd Edition, page 152, where the legal aspects of a compromise of a suit are discussed.

For the appellants it is contended that there was no legal defence to the suit which was compromised, that the defences of limitation and adverse possession were clearly untenable, that there were no rights for the defendants to give up, that the only consideration moving from the defendants was the payment of Rs. 500, that up to the date of the compromise the defendants were not owners and had no rights under the void sale of 1883, that after the compromise they became owners and that the transaction was, therefore, a sale. It is also contended that to hold otherwise would be to defeat the law of pre emption because all that had to be done was to go through the farce of a suit and compromise. This result, however, does not follow. Where the facts indicate that the suit and compromise are a sham, there is nothing to prevent the Courts from holding that the transaction was in reality a sale.

The facts in the present case are quite different. The defendants, whether rightly or wrongly, were genuinely contesting the claim and had been fighting the matter even previously at the time of the mutation. Apart from the fact that no evidence was recorded and the defendants had no opportunity to prove their defence, we are of opinion that we are not entitled to go behind the compromise and see whether the defence was well founded. If the parties were governed by Muhammadan Law, as contended by the defendants, it is probable that the defendants would have been at least entitled to retain Musammat Rashid-ul-Nisa's share. In law, the abstaining from doing anything which a man is lawfully free to do, or no do, is a good consideration. It cannot be presumed that the parties knew the law and what the judgment of the Court would be and the defendants had the right to obtain judgment on their defence. It was pointed out in Miles v. New Zealand Alford Estate Company (11) that "If an intending litigant bona fide forbears a right to litigate a question of law or fact which it is not vexatious or frivolous to litigate, he does give up something of value. It is a mistake to suppose it is not an advantage, which a suitor is capable of appreciating, to be able to litigate his claim, even if he turns out to be wrong." Again, as pointed out by Pollock and Mulla, that which is abandoned, or suspended, in a compromise is not the ultimate right or claim, of the party, but his right of having the assistance of the Court to determine, and, if admitted, or held good, to enforce it. We hold that the sons of Jamaluddin by the compromise did not sell the land. For the consideration of Rs. 500 they abandoned their rights to obtain a decision by the Court. They abandoned their alleged rights which were to be recognised as the owners of the land and to redeem it.

There is evidence on the record to show that the land was of considerably more value than Rs. 500 and it cannot, therefore, be said that the Rs. 500, taken with the previous Rs. 400, represented the sale price of the land. It is clear that the parties to the litigation were not at all certain as to the merits of their respective claims and genuinely compromised. It appears to us immaterial whether the compromise amounted to a sale or not. If a sale, a chose in action, and not the land was sold.

On the above findings we dismiss the appeals with costs throughout.

Agra Tenancy Act (II of 1901), s. 18—Occupancy rights, nature of—Mortgage of occupancy rights—Lapse of rights on death of tenant—Mortgagee, position of—Ejectment.

A right of occupancy is a personal heritable right and lapses when there is no one to inherit it so where such rights are mortgaged and the tenant dies without issue, the mortgage is determined and the mortgagee is liable to ejectment at the instance of the zemindar. [p. 869, col. 1.]

Second appeal from the order of the Collector, Benares, (with powers of Commissioner), dated the 13th of June 1919.

JUDGMENT.

HARRISON, J. M.—(January 19, 1920).—This is a second appeal in a suit for ejectment. The appeal relates to one plot only No. 351, from which the Collector of Benares, exercising the appellate jurisdiction of the Commissioner, decreed the ejectment of the appellant though the Assistant Collector had held him not liable to ejectment.

The plot has been in the possession of the appellant as mortgagee since 1850 and the last tenant died recently without heirs. The Zemindar has now sought to eject the mortgagee, and it is only on the ground that the mortgage is of so old a date that the appellant is able to contest the Collector's order. It is admitted that if the mortgage had been executed after the passing of Act XVIII of 1873, the well-known rulings of the Board would have applied, that is to say, the mortgagee would have been liable to ejectment at the pleasure of the landlord. It is contended, however, that in 1850, when the mortgage was made, there was nothing to prevent such a transfer of tenancy right and that the position is exactly like that of a fixed rate tenancy which has been mortgaged. In that case it is urged that the Zamindar must first redeem the mortgage before claiming possession over the holding. Now the only connected and readily accessible account of the rights of occupancy tenants before the passing of any regular Act dealing with the subject is to be found in the introduction to House's edition of the N. W. P. Rent Act, 1881, paragraphs 39 to 49. From a perusal of that portion of his work it appears that there was no right of transfer even in the early days, at any rate unless it was authorised by local custom. No such local custom is set up in this case.

But it appears to me that on general principles a right of occupancy cannot in any case continue to a mortgagee after the right itself has been extinguished. It needs little demonstration to show that any right of occupancy, of however old standing, is extinguished when the conditions of section 18 of the Agra Tenancy Act, 1901, are satisfied. The old rights were continued by section 2 of the Act but their continuance became subject to the Act itself. The well known ruling of the Allahabad High Court, Khiali Ram v. Nathu Lal (1), is also to the point. It distinctly lays down that a mortgage determines on the termination of the right of occupancy. That right is, of course, a personal right, now definitely heritable, but when there is no one to inherit it, it must lapse. In the case of a usufructuary mortgage what is mortgaged is the right to occupy and not the land itself; and when the right ceases, the land must be given up.

Hence I find that the appellant is liable to ejectment and I would dismiss the appeal with costs, but as the matter is of some importance I lay the case before my colleague for his opinion.

FERARD, S. M.—I agree.

Custom—Adoption—Stranger, whether can be adopted—Jats of Mauza Bangraon, Tahsil Fatehabad, District Hissar—Estoppel—Collateral consenting to adoption—Descendant of collateral, whether can challenge adoption.

Among Jats of Mauza Bangraon, Tahsil Fatehabad, District Hissar, the adoption of a stranger is invalid by custom. [p. 870, col. 2.]

Where, however, an adoption takes place with the consent and active assistance of a collateral of the adoptive father, the descendants of the collateral are estopped from subsequently challenging the adoption as being opposed to custom. [p. 871, col. 1.]

Second appeal from the decree of the District Judge, Hissar, dated the 12th August 1918.

Mr. Nanak Chand, for the Appellant.

Mr. Jagan Nath, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The facts of the case giving rise to this appeal are briefly as follows:—Ram Rikh, Uda and Toda were three brothers. Ram Rikh died leaving two widows, Musammat Surjan and Musammat Singari, but no issue. In 1909 Uda and Toda instituted a suit against Musammat Surjan and Musammat Singari, claiming possession of Ram Rikh's property on the ground that the two widows had become unchaste. Musammat Surjan had given birth to a posthumous child named Bega, alleged to have been born some 21 months after the death of Ram Rikh. This suit was compromised in 1909, and according to this compromise it was agreed that Musammat Singari was to retain possession of one-fourth of Ram Rikh's property, the boy Bega was to take another one-fourth and the two plaintiffs Toda and Uda were to receive the remaining one-half. Further, Uda who had no issue was to adopt Bega as his son, and in accordance with this compromise the property was divided and Bega was adopted with all necessary ceremonies in the presence and with the consent of the brotherhood. In 1913 Uda executed a deed of adoption adopting Kusla, son of Toda whereupon Bega instituted this suit asking for a declaration that the adoption of Kusla by Uda was invalid and would not affect his rights in his adoptive father's property. The litigation has been a protracted one, with the result that at this date the parties before me are Musammat Dhanni, a minor girl, widow of Bega, as representing Bega, and Moman son of Kusla, Uda, Kusla and Bega all having died. It is obvious that, assuming that Bega was validly adopted by Uda, Moman, the present appellant, is bound ultimately to succeed to the property as a reversioner when Musammat Dhanni's estate comes to an end either by her death or re-marriage. It should be stated here that Bega was married to Musammat Dhanni by Uda and, as stated by Harsukh, Musammat Dhanni's father, he gave his daughter in marriage to Bega, having been distinctly given to understand that Bega was the adopted son of Uda.

The Courts below have found (1) that Bega was the illegitimate son of Musammat Surjan; (2) that Bega was adopted by Uda in accordance with the compromise; and (3) that this adoption took place with all necessary ceremonies and in the presence and with the consent of the entire brotherhood. These are questions of fact which cannot be re opened in second appeal. The Courts below have also held that by custom Bega, treated as a stranger, was validly adopted by Uda. The successor of the learned District Judge, who decided the appeal below, granted the appellant a certificate under section 41 (3) of Act III of 1914, certifying that there was sufficient ground for an inquiry regarding the existence of a custom, viz., whether an illegitimate nephew could be adopted by his uncle. No authority has been cited before me by Mr. Nanak Chand for the appellant relating to any custom precluding the adoption of an illegitimate child, and Malagir v. Jagir (1) is an authority for holding that a foundling may be adopted with the consent of the brotherhood.

The question still remains, however, whether a custom has been established by which Jats of Bangraon, Tahsil Fatehabad in the District of Hissar, may adopt strangers. As pointed out at page 54 of Rattigan's Digest of Customary Law, the appointment of a person of a different got is generally opposed to custom, and in paragraph 37 (b) the same learned author points out that amongst agriculturists, especially in the eastern districts of the Punjab, such appointments are not now favoured and are to be presumed to be invalid. There seems, therefore, no doubt at all that the general custom is against the validity of the adoption of Bega by Uda and that, therefore, the onus rests on him to prove that there is a custom existing amongst Jats in his village validating his adoption. The evidence on the record through which Mr. Nanak Chand took me is not very convincing. Three instances alone have been referred to, and the evidence regarding these is by no means clear and it is impossible for me to say that in these three instances the person adopted was as a matter of fact of another got to the adoptive father. Mr. Jagan Nath, however, contended that the defendant in this case was estopped from attacking the validity of his adoption, inasmuch as Toda was a party to the compromise under which the adoption was made and was also present and consenting when the ceremonies were performed. He pointed out that by that compromise the attack against the chastity of Musammat Surjan came to an end and that Toda obtained a material benefit, inasmuch as he and Uda were, under the terms of the agreement arrived at, given possession of one-half of Ram Rikh's property. My attention was drawn to Bhagat Ram v. Gokal Chand (2), where it was pointed out that when a person had himself acquiesced in an adoption, he was estopped from disputing it at a subsequent stage. Similarly in Chuhar v. Musammat Jas Kaur (3) a similar decision was arrived at and it was held that where an adopted son had been brought up as a member of the village community to which his adoptive father belonged and had been regarded as an adopted son in consequence of the attitude taken up by the collateral heirs of the adoptive father, it would be grossly inequitable to allow the validity of the adoption to be challenged as being opposed to custom. It seems to me that this case is very similar to the rulings cited. There can be no doubt that the adoption of Bega was brought about owing to this compromise—a compromise which gave Toda a substantial benefit—a benefit which Kusla undoubtedly in his turn enjoyed and which Moman is now enjoying. I have no doubt whatever that the adoption in question was made with the active assistance of Toda and that the present appellant is bound by his grandfather's action [see Labhu v. Musammat Nihali (4), Devi Dial v. Utam Devi (5), and Habib Khan v. Muhammad (6)]. Mr. Nanak Chand contended that the question of estoppel was never directly put in issue. That is no doubt correct to some extent. The issue, however, was whether Bega could be validly adopted by Uda and the question of Toda's consent to the adoption has been considered by the Courts below and a finding arrived at thereon. It seems to me, therefore, that the appellant had sufficient notice of this question of estoppel and that a further remand on this point is not necessary. I accordingly dismiss this appeal with costs.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), s. 115—Revision—Limitation, wrong decision on question of—High Court, whether will interfere.

Inasmuch as section 115 of the Civil Procedure Code is restricted in its application to questions of jurisdiction, the High Court will not entertain an application for revision of a non-appealable order on the ground that the Court below has wrongly decided the question of limitation raised in the suit.

Civil revision against the order of the Additional District Judge, Moradabad, dated the 20th December 1918.

Mr. Muhammad Ishaq Khan, for the Applicant.

Dr. S. M. Sulaiman, for the Opposite Parties.

JUDGMENT.—This is an application for revision of a non appealable order on the ground that the Court below has wrongly decided the question of limitation raised in the suit. The application is one under section 115 of the Code of Civil Procedure. A preliminary objection has been taken to the hearing of the application on the ground that it is not maintainable under the provisions of that section. This objection is, in my opinion, well-founded. There was no question of jurisdiction in the case and the only question is whether the Court below in the exercise of its jurisdiction has committed a mistake of law. It was held by their Lordships of the Privy Council in the case of Balakrishna Udayar v. Vasudeva Ayyar (1) that "the section applies to jurisdiction alone, the irregular exercise or non-exercise of it, or the illegal assumption of it. The section is not directed against conclusions of law or fact in which the question of jurisdiction is not involved." As I have already stated, there is no question of jurisdiction involved in this case. The question is whether the Court below has committed a mistake of law in the exercise of its jurisdiction. That is not a question which can be considered by this Court under the provisions of section 115, I accordingly dismiss the application with costs.

Limitation Act (IX of 1908), Sch. I, Art. 85—Mutual, open and current account—Suit to recover balance—Limitation—Terminus a quo.

The period of limitation contained in Article 85 of Schedule I to the Limitation Act is applicable to a suit to recover the balance due on a mutual, open and current account, and is to be reckoned from the close of the year in which the last item admitted or proved is entered in the account, such year to be computed as in the account. [p. 872, col. 1.]

Where no fresh item is entered in the account within three years of the close of the year in which the previous items are entered, the Statute operates and the previous account becomes barred by time. [p. 872, col. 2; p. 873, col. 1.]

Second appeal from the decree of the District Judge, Lahore, dated the 2nd August 1915.

Mr. Durga Das, for the Appellant.

Mr. Tirath Ram, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The plaintiffs sue for the balance due on a mutual, open and current account, and have been given a decree for Rs. 823-12-0. The only question in this appeal is that of limitation, which the Courts below have decided in the plaintiffs' favour.

Under Article 85 of the First Schedule to the Limitation Act, which admittedly applies, the period of limitation is three years, to be reckoned from the close of the year in which the last item admitted or proved is entered in the account, such year to be computed as in the account. It is admitted that the claim for the last item in the account, namely, Rs. 100, is within time, but it is contended for the appellant that that item was advanced to him more than three years after the close of the year in which the last preceding item was entered, and that therefore the suit in respect of the account prior to the item of Rs. 100 is barred by limitation.

The plaintiffs' account is kept according to the Sambat year. The admitted item of Rs. 100 is dated the 22nd Baisakh 1967 (corresponding to the 4th May 1910). We have, therefore, first to see whether prior to that there is any proved item which was entered after the close of Sambat 1963. The dispute on this point is in regard only to an undated item of Rs. 60-11-9 which is the last item on the credit side. The learned District Judge gave no finding as to the correctness of this item or the date on which it was entered, as according to the view which he took of the case it was not necessary to do so.

The sum of Rs. 60-11-9 was not received by the plaintiffs in cash, but was the balance due from them to the defendant on a factory account. The latter's contention is that the item has been entered in the account in suit without his authority. It is said to be in the handwriting of one Mohri Ram, who died in Sambat 1966. The only evidence in regard to it is that of the plaintiff Jawala Ram and Ganga Ram, who is a son of one of the proprietors of the plaintiffs' firm. Jawala Ram says at the beginning of his statement that he credited the Rs. 60-11-9 to the account now in dispute with the appellant's knowledge and consent, but finally admits in cross-examination that he was not present when the accounts were gone into and this item was credited. Ganga Ram merely says that the item is in the handwriting of Mohri Ram, and does not say that he was present when it was written or that the appellant consented to its being entered in this account. The evidence of Jawala Ram and Ganga Ram in regard to the entry of the Rs. 60-11-9 is clearly of no value, and we find, therefore, that it has not been proved that the item was transferred from the factory account to the account in dispute with the appellant's consent.

All the other items in the account, prior to the entry of the Rs. 100 advanced to the appellant on the 22nd Baisakh 1967, were entered before the close of Sambat 1963. A suit for the amount due on the account had, therefore, become barred under Article 85 before the entry of the Rs. 100 was made, and the making of that entry cannot revive the period of limitation. Rustomji on page 308 of his Law of Limitation, 2nd Edition, says: "it seems that where there have been mutual accounts, the Statute is retarded by every fresh item falling within three years from previous items," and he refers to Banning's Limitation of Actions, page 214, where a similar opinion is expressed. The implication is that where no fresh item occurs within three years of the previous items, the Statute operates.

We hold that the claim is barred by limitation, except with regard to the last item of Rs. 100 which is not disputed. The plaintiffs are entitled to a decree only for that amount with interest at 12 per cent. per annum up to the date of the suit. The interest comes to about Rs. 31.

We accept the appeal and reduce the decretal amount to Rs. 131. We direct that the parties shall bear their own costs throughout.

Appeal accepted.

RAM BHAROSE AND ANOTHER—PLAINTIFFS—RESPONDENTS.

Custom—Inheritance, scheme of, repugnant to personal law—Wajib-ul-arz, entry in, value of, in absence of instances—Adverse possession—Muhammadan Law—Mother, whether can hold adversely to daughter—Mortgage by mother—Daughter, whether can assert title—Estoppel—Consent, what amounts to—Transfer of Property Act (IV of 1882), s. 41.

A scheme of inheritance recorded in a wajib-ul-arz, which is altogether repugnant to the personal law of the persons affected thereby, cannot, in the absence of instances of succession having taken place according to that scheme, be regarded as evidence of the existence of the custom it purports to set out. [p. 877, cols. 1 & 2.]

A Muhammadan mother is the natural guardian of her daughter and is bound to provide for her out of her husband's estate. By the mere fact that a mother maintains her daughter and herself out of the income of such estate, she does not acquire an absolute title to the property by prescription, and her possession is not adverse to her daughter. [p. 878, col. 2; p. 879, col. 1.]

In the absence of evidence that the daughters of a widow, who own a 7-8ths share in the property left by their father, consented either expressly or by implication to their mother's posing as the ostensible owner of the property, they are not estopped from asserting their title as owners to their share in the property. Mere acquiescence or absence of interference on their part would not amount to the consent required by section 41 of the Transfer of Property Act. [p. 879, col. 1.]

Appeal from the decree of the Subordinate Judge, Sitapur, Tahsil Biswan, dated the 13th April 1918.

The Hon'ble Syed Wazir Hasan, for the Appellants.

The Hon'ble Pandit Gokaran Nath Misra, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This appeal has arisen out of a suit brought by two plaintiffs, Ram Bharose and Mata Din, to recover Rs. 8,403-8-0 alleged to be due on a simple mortgage executed on the 9th November 1903 by Musammat Sadrunnisa, the 1st defendant, in favour of Badlu Ram, now deceased, whom the plaintiffs claim to represent.

The other defendants in the suit were Aminunnisa and Sughrunnisa, the daughters of Sadrunnisa, who were impleaded on the ground that the mortgaged property, an 8-anna share in Mirnagar, had been transferred to them in the year 1906 under a deed of gift executed by their mother. Sadrunnisa entered no defence to the claim.

The suit was resisted by the daughters on various grounds set out in the written statement, which were subsequently explained in Court in greater detail by the Counsel for the defence.

The main plea for the defendants was that the document in suit was not in fact the deed of Sadrunnisa. In the 13th paragraph of the written statement it was alleged that on the date recorded on the instrument in suit one Ilahi Bakhsh, an agent of Sadrunnisa, executed a mortgage of lands owned by himself in favour of Badlu Ram; that Ilahi Bakhsh had represented to Sadrunnisa that the mortgagee insisted upon her joining in the execution of the deed; that she signed the deed accordingly in the belief that it represented a mortgage of Ilahi Bakhsh's own property: and that she herself neither borrowed any money nor intended to execute any mortgage security to charge the 8-annas share in Mirnagar which belonged to her.

In the 7th paragraph of the written statement the defendants stated that the property in suit had formed portion of the estate of their father Wajid Ali Khan and that at the time of his death the estate had descended by inheritance to themselves and their mother Sadrunnisa, the latter being entitled to a 1-8th share only under the Muhammadan Law.

And in the 20th paragraph of the statement of defence the ground was taken that in any event plaintiffs could not get a decree for sale of more than a 1-8th share of the property mentioned in the deed.

These latter grounds of defence were met by the plaintiffs in their replication by two distinct pleas, namely, (1) that by custom the daughters of Wajid Ali Khan were excluded from inheritance and (2) that at the time of the mortgage Sadrunnisa had acquired a full title to the property by reason of adverse possession exercised over a period of more than 12 years counting from the date of her husband's death.

On these pleadings were raised the principal issues in the case with which I am concerned here in appeal, the other matters in issue are not now in debate.

With reference to the main defence as to the manner in which execution of the deed was brought about, the issues were thrown into the following form: —

"2 (a) Whether defendant No. 1 intelligently executed the deed in suit for consideration?

2 (b) Whether the deed was obtained by fraud as pleaded in paragraph 13 of the written statement?"

The findings of the Subordinate Judge were (1) that Sadrunnisa did execute the deed in suit, that she knew it to be a mortgage of her own property, that she had the intention of making a mortgage of her own property and that she received the full consideration set out in the deed and (2) that the defendants had failed to prove the fraud set up in paragraph 13 of their written defence.

Issue 5 (a) related to the question of custom "Are the daughters excluded by family or tribal custom from inheriting their father's property?"

The Subordinate Judge held that such a custom was proved.

Issue 5 (b) touched upon the plea of adverse possession. The finding was that Sadrunnisa had acquired as against her daughters an absolute title by prescription.

On the 6th issue it was found that the daugthers, by accepting the gift of the property from their mother in 1906, were estopped from questioning the validity of the mortgage in suit. It was further found that they were similarly estopped on the ground that Sadrunnisa had been dealing with the property as ostensible owner with the express or implied consent of her daughters (section 41, Transfer of Property Act).

The result was that the plaintiffs were given a decree for the principal sum and for interest (at a reduced rate) with a direction for sale of the property in default of payment.

The defendants now appeal, and the points for decision here are—

(1) whether the Court below was right in finding that Sadrunnisa had executed the deed intentionally and intelligently and that she had received consideration?

(2) whether the custom of exclusion of the daughters was proved?

(3) whether it was rightly found that Sadrunnisa had acquired a title to the property in suit by adverse possession? and

(4) whether her daughters were estopped from questioning the validity of the mortgage?

The other pleas raised in the memorandum of appeal were not argued. To begin with the question of the execution of the deed in suit, it purports to have been drawn up on the 9th November 1903 and registered on the 10th of that month by the Sub Registrar at Sadrunnisa's own residence. She is admittedly a pardanashin lady and it was probably for this reason that she was excused from presenting the document at the registration office. The document recites that the mortgage money Rs. 3,200 consisted of Rs. 1,700 previously received by the lady and Rs. 1,500 handed over to her at the time of registration. It is proved that on the date on which this deed was registered, a separate deed executed by Ilahi Bakhsh was also registered at the same place by which he mortgaged certain plots of sir land to secure a debt of Rs. 1,500 already incurred. It is shown from the record that Ilahi Bakhsh was the owner of these sir plots which had been granted to him by Sadrunnisa and her husband Wajid Ali Khan; but it is not clear why he was permitted to register this mortgage at the house of Sadrunnisa. Ordinarily he would not be exonsed from attendance at the registration office and would not be entitled to ask the Sub-Registrar to attend him upon commission. The Sub-Registrar's evidence was not taken in the case, nor was that of Ilahi Bakhsh, though it is to be recorded that the plaintiffs tried to secure his attendance as a witness but failed.

The direct evidence adduced by the plaintiffs, for the purpose of proving that Sadrunnisa executed the deed in suit with full understanding of what she was doing, is contained in the statement of two witnesses who attested the deed. They are Sadhu Lal, a retired Patwari, and Bachu (P. Ws. Nos. 3 and 4).

The first of these deposes that he was present when the deed was executed. He swears the document was read and explained to the lady by the scribe Safdar Ali in his presence. He further states that this was done by the Sub-Registrar at the time of registration. The lady declared that she was making a mortgage of Mirnagar: she received Rs. 1,500 in cash and admitted that she had previously received Rs. 1,700. The statement of the other witness Bachu is to the same effect. He went to the lady's house with Mata Din, one of the men who advanced the money, though the deed was executed only in favour of Badlu Ram. It was this witness who brought the money to the house.

Both men depose that the document was handed to the lady behind the purdah by Ilahi Bakhsh, that she put her hand outside the pardah and made her mark with Ilahi Bakhsh's assistance. Bachu says definitely that the money, Rs. 1,500, was handed over to Sadrunnisa.

As against this evidence we have the deposition of Sadrunnisa who, although she entered no defence to the suit, allowed herself to be examined on commission as a witness for her daughters.

In her evidence she denies having made any mortgage of Mirnagar or having borrowed any money. She repeats, with some variation, the story set out in the written statement, namely, that it was Ilahi Bakhsh who was taking money on mortgage and who had asked her to join in the deed to satisfy the mortgagee, though she speaks in her statement of having been asked to 'attest' and not to 'execute' the document. She says the money was offered to her, but she passed it on to Ilahi Bakhsh who was the real borrower.

The lady did not fare well in cross-examination. She denied, although it is proved, that she had executed two other mortgages, one with possession, in favour of the same mortgagee, and she prevaricated a great deal concerning the execution of the deed of gift in 1.06 concerning which there is abundance of evidence.

Sadrunnisa was of course a highly interested witness whose statement would have to be regarded with reserve. It compares most unfavourably with the stories told by the two plaintiffs' witnesses, Sadhu Lal and Bachu. While it is possible to argue that the latter, being a man who went to the house with the mortgagee, is not entirely independent, nothing of the kind can be suggested in respect of Sadhu Lal, the ex-Patwari whom Sadrunnisa subsequently called in to attest the deed of gift executed by her in 1906.

It may be that there are discrepancies in small matters between the statements of Sadhu Lal and Bachu—they are in my opinion of no moment and can reasonably be explained by the fact that they were deposing to events of more than 14 years before.

To my mind the whole question of this transaction is settled by the recitals in the deed of gift of 1906. There can be no doubt that this document was executed by Sadrunnisa and when we find in the deed admissions by the lady that the property which was being transferred was subject to previous mortgages which the donees would be liable to discharge, it is idle for Sadrunnisa to protest that she was not well aware of the fact that she had borrowed money on the security of the Mirnagar property. These admissions are sought to be attributed to suggestions made by Ilahi Bakhsh, but why he should have brought about such admissions is not apparent. It was made clear in the deed of gift that certain lands had been transferred absolutely to Ilahi Bakhsh with which the donees were to have no concern: and Ilahi Bakhsh, if he took any part in bringing about the execution of the deed of gift, might naturally desire to have it provided that the grant to him should not be interfered with. But there is no reason why he should have got a false admission regarding the mortgage of the Mirnagar property recorded, that would be of no benefit to him. The mortgagee already held Ilahi Bakhsh's own document of mortgage executed on the same day as the mortgage now in suit. I fail to find anything on record to lead me to believe that Ilahi Bakhsh had been acting in collusion with these mortgagees, and it is not pretended or suggested that the mortgagees knew anything about the deed of gift executed in 1906.

Further, with reference to Sadrunnisa's denial of her having mortgaged the property in suit or of her having borrowed the money, there is the evidence of a witness Mathura, who swears that he had advanced Rs. 1,200 to Sadrunnisa on a promissory note and that in discharge of the debt he had been paid about Rs. 1,600 0-0 by the mortgagee, Mata Din. The only ground upon which I am asked to reject his evidence is that he produced no account in Court, his explanation being that he kept no books of account. I am unable to discard his evidence merely on this ground. It was believed by the Subordinate Judge and the man appears to be a respectable money-lender who pays Rs. 35-0-0 per annum income tax, a fact which shows that he carries on a good deal of business in this line.

Lastly, it is not to be doubted that previous to the transaction in suit Sadrunnisa had on two occasions mortgaged items of property to these mortgagees—and had put them in possession; so that she was not a novice in dealings of this kind. The result is that I have no hesitation in agreeing with the Court below that the plaintiffs have established that Sadrunnisa executed the deed in suit well knowing that she was giving a mortgage and that she received the money.

The next question for consideration is that of the custom pleaded by the plaintiffs. The evidence on this issue consists of the statement of a custom contained in the wajib ul arz of Mauza Babupur (Exhibit 4). This statement is incorporated by reference in the wajib-ul-arz of Jannagar (Exhibit 5), and it is admitted that Wajid Ali Khan, the deceased husband of Sadrunnisa, was owner in part of these villages at the time of the first Regular Settlement. The only evidence in support of the alleged custom to which the Subordinate Judge refers is the conduct of Sadrunnisa and her daughters since the time of Wajid Ali's death.

So far as the wajib-ul-arz of Babupur is concerned, it is not made to appear that Wajid Ali attested the document himself: all that we have is that it was attested by Kasim Ali, one of the co-sharers. The Jannagar document was signed on behalf of Wajid Ali by his special agent, Kalka Prasad. The scheme of inheritance set out in paragraph 4 of the wajib-ul-arz of Babupur is, with some peculiar variations, a statement of the rules which govern succession in Hindu families subject to the Mitakshara Law.

It provides in the first instance for the exclusion from inheritance of female issue in favour of male issue. In default of male issue the property goes to the widow in case her husband held his estate in severalty. It is then laid down that if there be no widow, or if the husband's estate was not held in severalty, the property goes to real brothers of the deceased and their male issue—otherwise (wa illa) the daughters and their descendants are entitled to the inheritance. This last clause is somewhat obscure, but it probably means that in default of male collaterals the daughters and their issue are admitted to inherit. A peculiar feature of the scheme is that the widow who takes as heir is given powers of transfer over the estate. The other provisions do not call for notice, except that it is laid down that where several widows take together they divide the estate according to the rule of "Patni Bhag," which is observed by Hindus.

If it is proved that a custom of inheritance in accordance with this plan exists, I think it might safely be concluded that after Wajid Ali's death his wife succeeded with full powers of alienation and that his daughters could only claim inheritance on the death of the wife and the failure of male collaterals. It is admitted that Wajid Ali left no male descendants,

I am not, however, prepared to allow that in the circumstances of this case the custom contended for is proved on practically no evidence but what is contained in this wajib-ul arz

It will be conceded at once that the scheme of inheritance is altogether repugnant to Muhammadan Law and that the conditions relating to jointness or separation of estate contemplate a state of things which in an ordinary Muhammadan family would be inconceivable, and the question arises as to how it is possible to account for the adoption by a family or tribe of Muhammadans of a law of inheritance so different from that laid down by their own scheme of law.

There are, no doubt, cases in which a change of this nature can be explained; such for example are the cases in which Hindu families have been converted to Islam.

There is nothing, however, to suggest that the people with whom we are dealing here fall within this category. The history of the family is set out in the first paragraph of the wajib-ul-arz. It is said that they are of the same stock as the family of Bhatawa Mon, who are in possession of the Taluqa of that name, which was first acquired by Nawab Pahar Khan who came from Delhi. The territory acquired by the family was once in possession of the Bhars—and came into the hands of Pahar Khan in the Fasli year 1028, more than two centuries before the time of the first Regular Settlement.

It is stated that the family are Sheikhs who have adopted the distinctive name of "Khanzadas," and there is no reason to suppose that these people are recent converts: the facts all point the other way. In these circumstances, is it to be held, on the strength of what is contained in these documents, one of which was not signed by Wajid Ali and the other was signed not by him but by his special agent, that this peculiar custom of inheritance, which is certainly against Muhammadan Law and is at variance in certain respects with the Hindu law, governs succession to property in this Muhammadan family? I think not.

I am aware of cases in which the entries in a solitary wajib-ul-arz have been held to be sufficient evidence of the custom therein stated. On the other hand, it has also been held that there is no class of evidence so likely to vary in value as that supplied by documents of this description, but for the reasons given, I hold that this is not a case in which the custom should be imposed merely upon the strength of the record produced in Court.

Not an instance in which succession has taken place according to the scheme set out in the wajib-ul-arz has been deposed to, though there must be many families of these Khanzadas now in the Sitapur District. It is true, of course, that proof of instances in which the alleged custom has been observed is not invariably necessary: and it may be conceded that the plaintiffs here, who are Kurmis, would have found it difficult to adduce proof of such instances, but they could not, on this ground, be relieved from the burden of proving the custom they were setting up.

In his judgment the Subordinate Judge observes that the evidence supplied by these documents was not rebutted and comments upon the fact that in her deposition Sadrunnisa says nothing about the custom. It is not clear to me that she was asked to say anything about it, and it is important to remark in this connection that she did say that she believed the property to be ancestral estate of which her daughters were owners.

The execution of the deed of gift by Sadrunnisa is a fact relied upon by the Court below as showing that the lady was conscious of the custom by which she took as sole heir with powers of alienation. His argument is that if the daughters inherited under the Muhammadan Law, there was no necessity for the execution of the deed of gift in their favour. Sadrunnisa was examined about this matter and gave an explanation of the reasons why she executed the deed. She said that at the time of her husband's death her two daughters were mere children, one of 5 and the other of $1\frac{1}{2}$ years, and that on the advice of Ilahi Bakhsh mutation was obtained in her (Sadrunnisa's) favour alone. She had the children with her and supported them out of the income of the property; when the girls grew up they were married, though even after that event they continued to live with her.

In 1906 it being thought advisable that the names of the girls should be recorded in the revenue papers, Ilahi Bakhsh was sent to the Tahsil and came back and reported that it would be necessary to have a deed executed in their favour in order to secure mutation. The deed of gift was drawn up accordingly.

Sadrunnisa is certainly not a wholly reliable witness, but this story of hers appears to be pretty near the truth. Nothing would be more likely than that at the death of her husband mutation should be made in the name of the widow alone, the other heirs being small children, and it is hardly likely that the authorities would have altered the Khewat record years after merely upon the assertion by Sadrunnisa that her daughters were co-owners. It is extremely likely, therefore, that some sort of a formal transfer to the daughters was insisted upon and the transfer took the form of this deed of gift, and I think that the explanation of Sadrunnisa should be accepted; and I cannot agree that the execution of the gift deed affords any convincing proof that she knew that the custom had made her the sole owner of her husband's estate.

In short, beyond what is contained in the wajib-ul-arz there is no evidence at all of the existence of this custom; and, for reasons already given, I find that the custom was not proved.

Next as to adverse possession.

The Subordinate Judge says Sadrunnisa was in exclusive possession from the time when her husband died some 30 years before suit till the year 1903 when the deed of gift was drawn up. He further says that the daughters accepted the gift and asserted their possession over the property only from 1906—a fact which in his opinion shows that Sadrunnisa was holding adversely to her daughters for over 12 years and to their knowledge. Attention is drawn to the undoubted fact that in the course of the mutation proceedings, which followed upon the execution of the gift, both daughters declared that they had come into possession as the result of the gift.

Now according to Sadrunnisa's statement which was made in April 1918, her daughters were then 34 and 30 years of age respectively. According to this the younger daughter was born about the year 1888, and as she was about $1\frac{1}{2}$ years old when her father died, it would seem that Wajid Ali's death took place about 1889-90.

It cannot be assumed that in these circumstances Sadrunnisa entered upon her husband's estate with any intention of holding adversely to her children. She was their natural guardian and was bound to provide for them and she says, in fact, that she did maintain the children and herself out of the income of the estate. Her statement on this point must be accepted, and I am unable to agree with the Court below that there is evidence of adverse possession dating from the time of Wajid Ali's death. In the year 1900 or thereabouts Sadrunnisa seems to have mortgaged a portion of her husband's property in Jannagar to Mata Din with possession. The mortgagee remained in possession till about 1908, when he was redeemed (see the evidence of Badri Prasad Patwari, P. W. No. 1.)

Again in 1902 she made a mortgage with possession of lands in Palia—also a portion of her husband's estate; this mortgage is still running (see paragraph 11 of the defendants' written statement), and then in 1903 she made the mortgage in suit.

These are the first acts on the part of Sadrunnisa regarding which it is possible to argue that they disclose any assertion of adverse title. But in 1900 and 1902 both girls were still minors and in 1903 one of them was still a minor, the other being then perhaps a year over the age of majority: and I do not think it can fairly be said that these transactions are brought home to the knowledge of the daughters. The last transaction of the three was a simple mortgage, and there is no evidence at all to show that the daughters were at that time cognisant of its execution. Then as to the deed of gift, while it is true that it is so framed as to declare that Sadrunnisa, the donor, was the proprietor and while it is also true that the daughters got independent physical possession after the execution of the deed, we have the statement of Sadrunnisa, which I have already accepted, that she did not consider herself to be the full owner of the estate and the further statement that the girls had all along been living with her and had been supported out of the property.

I am unable, therefore, to accept the lower Court's finding that Sadrunnisa had acquired an absolute title to this property by prescription. There remains the question of estoppel. There, again, I differ from the Court below. There is nothing arising out of the gift transaction of 1906 which is a bar to the plea of the daughters that they were the owners of the property in suit to the extent of 7 8ths as heirs of their father.

And further there is no evidence at all that the daughters up to the time of the mortgage transfer now in suit were consenting either expressly or by implication to their mother's posing as the ostensible owner of the property, so as to entitle the plaintiffs to the benefit of section 41 of the Transfer of Property Act. Mere quiescence or absence of interference on their part would not amount to the consent which the section requires.

I have now disposed of all the questions raised and argued on behalf of the appellants.

The respondents have filed a petition by way of objection to the decree, complaining that the Court below was worng in reducing the rate of interest contracted for; but no argument on this point has been addressed to me by the respondents' learned Advocate.

The result is that the appeal is allowed in part. The decree of the lower Court will be modified by a direction confining the right of the plaintiffs in the matter of bringing the mortgaged property to sale: they will be entitled to bring to sale only a 1-8th share of the mortgaged property representing the interest which Sadrunnisa had at the time of the mortgage,

The respondents will pay to the appellants $\frac{5}{4}$ths of the latter's costs in this Court.

The cross-objections are dismissed with costs to the appellants.

Appeal partly allowed.

Pre-emption—Pre-emptor refusing to purchase for more than certain sum—Waiver.

A pre-emptor who, without expressing any intention of enforcing his right of pre-emption, declines to purchase the property for more than a certain sum, which is much below the price offered, and there is nothing to show that he honestly believed that that price was in excess of the real price, or gave expression to that belief, must be held to have waived his right to pre-empt, and cannot enforce that right. [p. 880, col. 2.]

Second appeal from the decree of the District Judge, Karnal, dated the 15th April 1915.

Mr. Ramanand, for the Appellants.

Mr. Manohar Lal, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This appeal arises out of a suit for pre-emption, which has been dismissed by the Courts below on the ground that the plaintiffs must be deemed to have refused to purchase the property when it was offered to them before the sale to the defendant vendee, and they thus waived their right of pre-emption. The property sold consists of two-thirds of a plot of land belonging to the vendor Harjas, and also two-thirds of a house owned by him; and the price stated in the deed was Rs. 2,000, which both the Courts have concurred in holding was duly paid.

The circumstances, which resulted in the sale by Harjas in favour of the vendee Ram Nath, are briefly as follows:—

Harjas, who is a member of an agricultural tribe, applied to the Deputy Commissioner that he should be granted permission to sell his land. His application was forwarded to the Tahsildar, who went to the village and made enquiries from various persons who were prepared to buy. It appears that on the 8th January 1913 the vendee Ram Nath offered to purchase the land for Rs. 1,600 and the house for Rs. 400. On the 19th January the plaintiffs, who are the collaterals of Harjas, made a statement that they were not prepared to pay more than Rs. 950 or Rs. 960 for both the properties, and declined to buy them for more than that sum. It is to be observed that they did not express any desire that time should be granted to them to consider the matter, and the Court of first instance is wrong in stating that the plaintiffs said "they would consult and pay the price in 4 or 5 days." A perusal of the record shows that this statement was made, not by any of the plaintiffs, but by a person Sher Singh, who is not a party to this litigation.

As the plaintiffs declined to purchase the property, the sale was effected in favour of Ram Nath for Rs. 2,000 on the 24th February 1913.

Mr. Rama Nand for the plaintiffs contends that the circumstances mentioned above do not amount to a waiver: and that the plaintiffs bona fide believed that the price offered by Ram Nath was excessive, and that they were not bound to pay that price. Now upon the record there is not an iota of evidence to show that the plaintiffs honestly believed that the price was excessive, and indeed the fact that Rs. 2,000 has been proved to have been paid by Ram Nath is a clear indication that the plaintiffs could not entertain a belief in good faith that only Rs. 950 or Rs. 960 was the proper price. The facts of the case Indraj v. Brother Olement (1) appear to be similar to the present case. In that case the vendor offered the property to the pre-emptor before the sale, but the latter wanted to buy it for Rs. 160 and declined to give more. Thereupon the vendor sold it to another person for Rs. 235. The learned Judges held that the conduct of the plaintiff amounted to a refusal to purchase the property, and that he was not entitled to pre-empt it.

This judgment does not appear to be in full harmony with the rule laid down in Sri Kishan Singh v. Bacha Pande (2), which is to the effect that a person having a right of pre-emption does not lose it by refusing to purchase the property at the price at which it is offered to him, because he believes that such price is in excess of the real price, where such belief is entertained and expressed in good faith. We consider it unnecessary to determine whether the view taken in the earlier judgment or that expressed in the later judgment is the correct one, but taking the plaintiffs' case in the most favourable light, we are not prepared to hold that they had any reasonable ground for entertaining the belief that Rs. 2,000 was an excessive price. The learned Vakil places his reliance upon Karam Chand v. Ghulam Hassan (3), but the facts of that case are distinguishable from those of the present case. It is true that in that case the property had been offered to the pre-emptor for the price at which it was subsequently sold, but the pre-emptor protested that that was not its fair market value, that the price had not been fixed in good faith, and that he was prepared to enforce his right of pre-emption in Court. He never by any act or conduct waived his right of pre emption; on the contrary, he all along proclaimed his intention of suing to pre-empt the land on what he considered to be the proper price. The plaintiffs in the present case simply declined to purchase the property for more than Rs. 950 or Rs. 960, and never expressed any intention of enforcing their right of pre-emption. As pointed out above, there is not a particle of evidence to show that they honestly believed that the price offered by the vendee was in excess of the real price, or gave expression to that belief in the presence of either the Tahsildar or any other person interested in the sale.

We must accordingly hold that the plaintiffs are precluded by their own conduct from enforcing their right of pre emption, and we, therefore, dismiss the appeal with costs.

BADRI NARAIN—RESPONDENT.

Appeal—Person not a party to decree, whether can appeal.

A person who is a stranger to a suit and is not a party to the decree therein, but whose name is brought on to the record after the decree is passed on the ground that he is the real owner of the property in dispute has no right of appeal against the decree. [p. 882, col. 1.]

Appeal from a decision of the Subordinate Judge, Patna.

Messrs. K. Sahay and H. N. Sahay, for the Appellants.

Messrs. G. N. Sinha and N. E. Ghosh, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.

MILLER, C. J.—The respondent Badri Narain instituted a suit No. 114 of 1919 before the Subordinate Judge of Patna for partition of certain property impleading as defendant Rai Saheb Suraj Mal, and on the 28th November 1919 obtained an ex parte preliminary decree for partition.

Subsequently Suraj Mal in the course of the proceedings for a final decree presented a petition asserting that he was merely a Benamidar for the present appellants Gobind Ram and others and one Puran Mal, who were the beneficial owners of the share ostensibly held by him. Similar petitions were also presented by the appellants and Puran Mal, and on the 9th January 1920 the names of the appellants and Puran Mal as beneficial owners were substituted on the record in place of Suraj Mal. On the following day the appellants applied under section 151 of the Civil Procedure Code to have the case retired but their petition was rejected. On the 23rd January 1920 the appellants filed a memorandum of appeal before this Court from the preliminary decree obtained against Suraj Mal on the 28th November 1919. The learned Registrar before whom the application for registration of their appeal came pointed out that they were not parties to the decree appealed against, but granted time for an application to the lower Court to have the decree amended. The petition to amend the decree was refused by the Subordinate Judge, although the names of the appellants had already been substituted in place of the Benamidar in the subsequent proceedings. Thereafter on the 11th February the appellants presented the present petition, alleging the facts already stated and that the plaintiff was aware that Rai Saheb Suraj Mal was the Benamidar of the appellants and Puran Mal and further that the preliminary decree appealed against was passed without service of process on either Suraj Mal or the appellants or Puran Mal, who had no knowledge of the suit. They claim that they may be allowed to file and prosecute the present appeal, although their names do not appear as parties in the decree. They further ask that Puran Mal, who is unwilling to join in the appeal, should be added as a respondent.

Rule 5, Chapter VI, of the High Court Rules provides that a beneficiary in property, which at the date of the decree was vested in or was in the possession of a trustee who as such was a party to the decree, may, where his interest in the property is affected by the decree, name himself as appellant in the memorandum of appeal if he wishes to appeal, although he may not have been a party to the decree. The respondent contends that this does not apply to the present case, as a Benamidar is not a trustee nor was he as such a party to the decree. It is contended by the appellant on the other hand that the only interest of Suraj Mal was that of Benamidar and that it must be assumed that he was sued in that capacity and that as he had no personal interest in the property which rendered him liable to the suit, this was the only capacity in which he could be sued. It has been definitely decided by their Lordships of the Privy Council in Chowdhuri Gurnarayan v. Sheo Lal Singh (1) that a Benamidar represents the real owner and that so far as their relative legal position is concerned, he is a mere trustee for the latter. I had some doubt during the argument as to whether this application should not be allowed on the ground that in the circumstances the original defendant could only have been sued in the capacity of trustee or Benamidar for the beneficial owners. It is not admitted, however, by the respondents that Suraj Mal was a Benamidar and it does not appear that he was sued as a trustee within the meaning of rule 5, Chapter VI, of the High Court Rules.

Parties have sometimes been added as defendants after decree under Order I, rule 10 (2), but the correct procedure in such cases was referred to in Mihin Lal v. Imtiaz Ali (2) where the right of appeal was denied. The present application concerns only the right of appeal and although I feel that the matter is not altogether free from doubt I think the application should be refused, and the memorandum of appeal is rejected.

COUTTS, J.—I agree that this application should be refused.

Appeal rejected.

Agra Tenancy Act (II of 1901), s. 11—Tenant becoming usufructuary mortgagee—Occupancy rights, accrual of—Period of usufructuary mortgage, whether can be counted.

A tenant, who takes a usufructuary mortgage of the share of his landlord and on that share being redeemed again becomes a tenant, cannot count the period of the mortgage towards the accrual of occupancy rights, because for that period his tenant right merged into his proprietary right as usufructuary mortgagee. [p 682, col. 2.]

Second appeal from the decree of the Commissioner, Jhansi Division, dated the 5th of August 1919, in the case of ejectment.

JUDGMENT.

FERARD, S. M.—I do not agree with the Commissioner. The plaintiff-appellant Atmaram is landholder. Defendant-respondent Jodha Singh is tenant. He had held the plots in suit for a short term, not long enough to give occupancy right, when in 1894 he became usufructuary mortgagee of Atmaram's share. He became tenant again when that share was redeemed, his tenant right being merged in his proprietary right as usufructuary mortgagee in the interval. Both Courts below have rightly held, and it is no longer contested, that he cannot count towards accrual of occupancy rights the years of his non-occupancy tenancy prior to 1894. This is settled law based on the word "continuously" in section 11, Tenancy Act. The question is whether he ceased to be usufructuary mortgagee and became a tenant again on 11th October 1905 or on 17th January 1907, as on this depends the decision as to whether he has now held long enough as tenant to have occupancy right. The Assistant Collector took the latter date and decreed ejectment. The Commissioner takes the former date. This date, 11th October 1905, is the date of a Special Judge's order under section 18, Bundelkhand Encumbered Estates Act, I of 1903, terminating proceedings which settled the claim between the parties. It settled the amount still due from the mortgagor to Jodha Singh, his usufructuary mortgagee in possession, and directed dispossession of the latter from his position of usufructuary mortgagee with effect from the time "this award is liquidated." In view of this clear wording I fail to understand how the Commissioner comes to take 11th October 1905 as the date when Jodha Singh's proprietary possession as usufructuary mortgagee ceased and his tenancy revived, nor why he does not discuss what the words above quoted meant in the Special Judge's order, and why the tenancy should be considered to have revived before the award was liquidated. The evidence and copies of the Collector's orders of 17th January 1907 on the record show that liquidation took place through the Collector under section 21 (a), i. e., the award being paid to Jodha Singh from the Treasury and the property being taken by the Collector under direct management to recover the amount due to the State. It was on the 1st January 1907 that the Tahsildar was ordered to take the property under direct management and he did so on 17th

January, the first instalment to be paid in from the ensuing December, as there was no rabi in the village and, vide Collector's order of 17th January 1907, the mortgagee in possession, i. e., Jodha Singh himself, had collected the kharif. The Assistant Collector's finding that Jodha Singh remained in possession as usufructuary mortgagee until 17th January 1907 seems to me on these facts clearly correct and the Commissioner should have maintained it. Jodha Singh's tenancy did not revive before 17th January 1907 and he has not held for 12 years since then. Respondent Jodha Singh's Counsel suggests that really Jodha Singh was a tenant throughout the whole period, as the share was part of a larger share and Jodha Singh was really holding under a proprietary body including himself and was, therefore, a tenant. This was clearly not pressed in the first Court and I cannot entertain it now.

I would allow the appeal, set aside the Commissioner's appellate decision and restore that of the Assistant Collector with costs to appellant throughout.

HARRISON, J. M.—I agree. I have some doubts whether the tenant right in the circumstances merged in the proprietary right during the mortgage, but this was not raised except apparently in argument before my colleague and was not a ground of appeal in this Court. I think my colleague was justified in refusing to consider it at this stage.

Appeal allowed.

Application was made on behalf of the 5 sons to have their names brought on the record as legal representatives of their deceased father. The application was granted subject to all just exceptions. On the hearing of the appeal it was urged on behalf of the respondent that the appeal had abated inasmuch as the names of the daughters and the widow, who were also heirs under Muhammadan Law, had not been brought on the record:

First appeal from the decree of the Senior Subordinate Judge, Rawalpindi, dated the 12th May 1916, dismissing the plaintiffs' suit.

The Hon'ble Pandit Sheo Narain, for the Appellants.

Mr. Nanak Chand, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—This is a first appeal from the decision of Mr. H. B. Anderson, Senior Subordinate Judge, Rawalpindi, dated the 12th of May 1916, and has arisen under the following circumstances:—Muhammad Din, the plaintiff, and Shahab-ud-din, the defendant, were partners in respect of a contract business of the Military Works Department, Murree. They held equal shares. The business had extended over a number of years but no final settlement of accounts had taken place between the parties. In order, therefore, to have the accounts settled, they agreed to refer the matter privately to arbitration and by an agreement, dated the 6th of December 1904, they appointed two arbitrators, namely, Ilam Din and Ali Ahmad, and empowered them to go into the contract accounts and decide what was due to one party from the other with reference to the accounts. In the agreement they stated that "whatever amount both the arbitrators will unanimously find as due from one party to the other with reference to the account will be accepted by us and we shall abide by their decision without any objection." In case of difference of opinion the arbitrators were empowered to appoint an umpire. It appears that the arbitrators began to check the account books and other papers relating to the partnership business and had worked for three or four months, when the parties unanimously asked them to postpone the arbitration proceedings until a final decision had been given by the Chief Court in a suit between the parties and one Nur Din who claimed to be a sharer in the partnership business. The arbitrators accordingly stayed the proceedings by the following order, dated the 16th of July 1905:—"The proceedings are postponed pending the final decision of the case Muhammad Din etc. and Nur Din, as desired by the parties. The accounts will be settled between them and award given at any time they would wish after the decision of the said case." On the 13th of December 1914, the following application was made to the arbitrators:—"We both the parties had appointed you arbitrators in writing in 1904 for checking the accounts relating to the Murree contract and you had for some time examined the accounts. Then the examination of the accounts was postponed with our consent till the decision of the case of Muhammad Din, etc. plaintiffs versus Nur Din. Now that case has been decided by the Chief Court. It is, therefore, prayed that our accounts may now be checked and the award given." This application was signed by both Shahab-ud din and Muhammad Din. By the final decision of the Chief Court, Nur Din was awarded four-anna share in the partnership business and Shahab-ud-Din and Muhammad Din were, therefore, held to have a half share each in the remaining business after deducting the share of Nur Din. The arbitrators proceeded to check the accounts and hear the objections of the parties. They are said to have given a unanimous award on the 24th of January 1915. Muhammad Din accordingly made an application under paragraph 20, Schedule II, of the Code of Civil Procedure to have the award filed in Court and to have a decree passed in the terms of the said award. This application, according to the provisions of the law, was registered as a suit between Muhammad Din plaintiff and Shahab-ud-Din defendant. After some preliminary proceedings before the Court below the hearing of the suit was adjourned at the request of the defendant to enable him to file his defence. Eventually a written statement was put in on his behalf on the 6th of May 1915. He contested the suit mainly on two grounds namely, (1) that he had never entered into an agreement to refer the matter to arbitration; that he had no knowledge of the arbitration proceedings and that the award was not binding upon him; and (2) that the award was illegal inasmuch as the so-called arbitrators never sat to arbitrate, that no notice of the proceedings was given to the defendant, that no evidence was recorded in his presence, that no opportunity had been given to him to plead his cause or produce his evidence, that no account had been gone into in his presence and that the whole transaction being fictitious and bogus, the award relied upon was altogether null and void. Two issues were accordingly framed by the Court, namely,

(1) Was there any valid reference to arbitration?

(2) If so, was there any valid award thereon?

The Court decided the first issue in favour of the plaintiff and against the defendant. The second issue was decided against the plaintiff and it was held that there was no valid award on which the decree could be passed. The suit was accordingly dismissed and the present appeal was preferred to this Court by Muhammad Din, the plaintiff. The sole plaintiff, Muhammad Din, died on the 20th March 1919 leaving five sons, the present appellants in the appeal, and two daughters Musammat Aishan and Musammat Karam Bibi and a widow Musammat Begam Bibi. An application under Order XXII, rule 3, was made on behalf of the present appellants to have their names alone substituted in the appeal in the place of their deceased father Muhammad Din, the sole appellant, in the case. The application was granted subject to all just exceptions, and the names of the present appellants were brought on the record. On the appeal being called on for hearing a preliminary objection was raised by Mr. Nanak Chand, the learned Counsel for Shahab-ud-Din, respondent, that as the names of the daughters and the widow, who were also heirs of Muhammad Din under the Muhammadan Law, had not been brought on the record along with the names of his five sons, the appeal must be held to have abated. It was contended by him on the authority of Ghamandi Lal v. Amir Begam (1) and Haidar Husain v. Abdul Ahad (2) that under Order XXII, rule 3, all the legal representatives ought to have been brought on the record and as this was not done, the appeal should be dismissed as having abated. In reply to this preliminary objection, Pandit Sheo Narain on behalf of the appellants relied on the case of Musala Reddi v. Ramayya (3) and argued that as the parties were governed by customary law and not by Muhammadan Law, the appellants bona fide believed that they were the sole heirs and legal representatives of the deceased Muhammad Din and accordingly had made the application for substitution relying on that belief. In our opinion the decision in the Madras case applied to the facts of the present case. We accordingly overruled the preliminary objection and proceeded to hear the appeal on the merits.

The decision on the second issue has been challenged in appeal on behalf of the appellants and that on the first issue is contested on behalf of the respondent, for the learned Counsel of the defendant Shahab-ud-Din has tried to support the judgment of the Court below on the ground decided against his client. We have, therefore, to decide in this appeal both the issues raised in the Court below.

The argument addressed to us on behalf of the defendant-respondent on the first issue was necessarily somewhat feeble, for the evidence on the record in support of the view of the Court below was so overwhelming that the decision of the learned Subordinate Judge could not be seriously contested. The agreement for reference dated the 6th of December 1904 bears the signature of Shahab ud-Din and the oral evidence of the scribe Muhammad Husain fully proves its execution by him. The register of deeds kept by the scribe also bears the signature of the defendant and the genuineness of this signature is also testified to by him. The agreement, dated the 12th of January 1905, and the mukhtar-nama executed by Shahab-ud-Din in favour of Qutab Din on the 28th of April 1903 have also been proved by cogent evidence to have been executed by him. On the 16th of July 1903, Shahab-ud-Din made a statement before the arbitrators to have the arbitration proceedings postponed. Then on the 13th of December 1914 he joined the plaintiffs in making an application requesting the arbitrators to proceed with the arbitration. The learned Subordinate Judge has felt some doubt as to the attestation of this application by Shahab-ud-Din, but even putting this last piece of evidence aside the remaining evidence, both oral and documentary, is so overwhelming and convincing that we hold that the attempt on the part of Shahab-ud-Din to deny the reference to arbitration is wholly futile and dishonest. After considering the evidence we find ourselves in complete agreement with the learned Subordinate Judge as regards the decision of this issue. The lower Court rightly rejected the plea of alibi set up on behalf of the defendant, on the allegation that on the day of the execution of the agreement to refer, the defendant was not present in Rawalpindi. The entry in the register produced to support this plea does not appear to be genuine and cannot be relied upon.

The second issue raises a question of some difficulty. The learned Subordinate Judge has felt some doubt as to the existence of the award on the date of the suit and has felt inclined to hold that Ali Ahmad, one of the arbitators, had not signed it at the time alleged by the plaintiff. The evidence of Ali Ahmad clearly shows that he had been won over by the defendant, as on the face of it it is clear that he made every attempt to destroy the case of the plaintiff by trying to make out that he had never taken part in the arbitration proceedings and that he had not signed the award at the time it was made. The Court below appears to have attached too much signifi-sance to the circumstance that Ilam Din, the other arbitrator, in his statement, dated the 27th of April 1915, had not said a word about the completion of the award. The decision of the lower Court, however, is not very definite as to this point. We, however, after considering the evidence feel no doubt on the point and hold that the award had been completed before the institution of the suit. The evidence of Ali Ahmad, as we have mentioned above, on the face of it appears to be partial to the defendant and is, therefore, unreliable. The lower Court, not being quite sure as to the correctness of its view on the point, went on to hold in the alternative that "In any case it is, I think, quite clear that Ali Ahmad arbitrator did not sign the award on the same date or at the same place as Ilam Din and this is in itself sufficient to invalidate the award." We are not prepared to accept this statement of the law by the learned Subordinate Judge. In support of his view he has relied upon Bhagwan Das v. Shiv Dial (4). In that case the award was impugned upon two grounds, namely, (1) that it was not conclusive as to all the matters in dispute between the parties; and (2) that the arbitrators had signed it on different dates. It was held that the arbitrators having failed to decide all the matters in dispute between the parties and having left undecided the dispute as to two out of twenty-three cases of goods, the award was bad in law. This decision was quite sufficient for the disposal of the question before them, but the learned Judges proceeded to decide the second point also and relying on Russel on Arbitration, page 169, held that the award was bad also for the reason that it had not been executed at the same time and place. In our opinion the decision on the second point was unnecessary and went beyond the exigencies of the case. Even according to the passage at page 169 of Russell's book, all that appears to be necessary is that the arbitrators must all act together in order to pronounce a valid award. At page 230 of D. C. Banerji's Law of Arbitration in India, Second Edition, the rule of law on the subject is thus stated:—"Where a case has been regularly heard by the arbitrators sitting together, evidence taken in the presence of all, and an award has been made, drawn up, and signed by them, the mere omission to sign the award at the same time and in each other's presence does not necessarily invalidate the award." In support of this statement of the law Bhabasundari Dasi v. Makhun Lal Dey (5) and Muthukutti Nayakan v. Acha Nayakan (6) are cited. At page 231 of the book reference is made to the observation of Cockburn, C. J., in Hopper, In re (7) and the rule of law is stated in these words:—"The concurrence of the arbitrators is the judicial act and the signing is merely ministerial. All that is essential is that there must be combined action of the arbitrators and judicial exercise of their minds upon the matter to be decided." We have, therefore, to see in this case whether the arbitrators did as a matter of fact combine in the consideration of the materials on which they had to base their award.

Ghulam Hussain's evidence (printed at page 40 of the paper-book) gives a full account of the proceedings in arbitration. At page 41 he is said to have stated that "After the execution of Exhibit P. A I used to go to the arbitrators when they started going through the accounts. I made up the whole accounts and gave it to the arbitrators. They looked through the accounts but gave no award, as Muhammad Din and Shahab-ud-Din asked them to postpone their decision till after the case brought by Nur Din in respect of the same Khata was decided." In his cross-examination he made a fuller statement as to how the accounts were prepared by the Mukhtars appointed by the parties and how they were checked and examined by the arbitrators. This being the most important point in this case, we give this portion of the statement in extenso:—"We saw and went through the accounts in the house in the city already referred to. There were about fifteen or twenty books. They were given to us by Muhammad Din and Shahab-ud-Din. Qutab Din also used to look through the accounts with me. This was after the execution of Exhibit

ABDUL RAHMAN v. SHAHAB-UD-DIN.

P. A. and Exhibit P.3. Some of the accounts plaintiffs had at home and some were in Kacheri. We got them from here. All these books were in the city house when we went there. I had not met the arbitrators up to the time I went to the house. We were looking through the accounts for $3\frac{1}{2}$ or 4 months. During this time the arbitrators used to come to see us here. Ilam Din used to come every second or third day and Ali Ahmad once a week. We prepared the accounts at the instance of the arbitrators. Part of the accounts were prepared by Qutab Din and part by me. We gave these accounts over to the arbitrators. They had come to the house and I gave them to them there. The statements in Exhibit P. 8 were recorded by the arbitrators in the city house. Ilam Din recorded the statement. The accounts shown me, Exhibit P. 10, were prepared by me. These are not all the accounts prepared by me. These accounts were prepared by me in 1905. These accounts are only a part of the accounts prepared by me. These accounts were prepared by me after the perusal of the books. The arbitrators struck out a number of items in the accounts prepared by me and then asked me to prepare the accounts from the items left by them. The accounts Exhibit P. 10 were prepared before the statements in Exhibit P. 8 were recorded. Some of the accounts were prepared in 1914 also by myself and Qutab Din. These accounts also comprised several pages. We made these accounts over to the two arbitrators. I do not remember to which of the two arbitrators I made over the P. A

* * * * The parties did not say anything re accepting the accounts as correct or not. Muhammad Din and Shahabud Din saw the accounts prepared by Qutab Din and myself in 1905. They looked through the accounts but did not object to any of the items therein. Fresh accounts were prepared in 1914 as a part of the accounts had been left undone in 1905."

Thus it is clear from this evidence that the accounts were fully gone into and checked. Ghulam Hussain was appointed a Mukhtar by the plaintiff Muhammad Din to act and look after the arbitration proceedings before the arbitrators on his behalf. Qutab Din was appointed by Shahab-ud-Din as his Mukhtar to conduct the proceedings before the arbitrators. Qutab Din has also been examined as a witness in this case. He also has described the procedure as to the preparation of the accounts by the arbitrators. According to him, the accounts were gone into for about 3 or $3\frac{1}{2}$ months by the arbitrators before the proceedings were postponed at the request of the parties to await the decision of the claim of Nur Din. When the proceedings before the arbitrators were re-commenced at the request of the parties, the accounts were again gone into and checked. Ilam Din, the arbitrator, has also given a full account of the procedure adopted by the arbitrators in deciding the case referred to them. According to his evidence Shahab-ud-Din appointed Qutab Din as his Mukhtar and Muhammad Din appointed Qazi Ghulam Hussain as his Mukhtar. Shahab-ud-Din executed Exhibit P.A in favour of Qutab Din. If Ilam Din is to be believed, the interest of Shahab ud-Din was fully looked after by his Mukhtar Qutab Din, and this is corroborated by Qutab Din himself. Ilam Din first gave his evidence in Court on the 3rd of December 1915. He was again examined on the 24th of January 1916, when he stated that Ali Ahmad, the other arbitrator, used also to be present when the Kacha accounts used to be produced by the Mukhtar before them. When the arbitration proceedings restarted in 1915, Ali Ahmad and he began comparing items in Exhibits P. 10 and P. 10 (a) with the Bahis of the parties. The examination of the books was conducted in the presence of the Mukhtars of the parties in the baithak of the plaintiffs in the Sadr. After going through the accounts they were satisfied as to the correctness of the items in Exhibits P. 10 and P. 10 (a) and they sat together in the Sadr baithak and drew up the arbitration award jointly. After the award was read, Ilam Din took it to his house to write it out on a stamped paper. During the preparation of the draft Ali Ahmad made certain corrections with his own hand and so did Ilam Din. After writing it on a stamped paper at his own house Ilam Din took it to Ali Ahmad for his approval and signature. Ali Ahmad compared the fair copy with the original draft and pronounced it to be correct. The fair copy was left with Ali Ahmad with the rest of the papers, and the evidence of Ali Ahmad shows that after the institution of the suit he produced it in Court. In his statement made on the 7th of June 1915, Ali Ahmad totally denied having taken part in the examination of the accounts or having signed the award. When he was reminded that the fair copy of the award along with other papers had been handed over to him, he undertook to make a search for it at his house. An adjournment was granted (see order of Court printed at page 32 of the paper-book) and he was again examined on the 10th of July 1915. He was then driven to admit that four or five months previously Ilam Din had given him the award and the papers and told him to go through the accounts and sign the award after understanding them. Ilam Din, he stated, left the award with the other papers with him. He checked the papers which were explained to him by Ilam Din. He could not say whether he put his signature on it then or not. He could not remember what was settled about the copying of the papers and could not give any reasons why the papers were kept by him. As we have already remarked, Ali Ahmad apparently was inclined to be partial to the defendant and tried his best to defeat the claim of the plaintiffs. Even when compelled to admit the reference to arbitration and the preparation of the award, he added the following words to his statement of the 10th of July 1915: "All the proceedings in the said papers were taken by Ilam Din. I only joined in giving the award. I took no part in the other papers. I signed the award after going through it and the papers." It is not very clear what he meant by saying that "I took no part in the other papers." One thing is, however, clear that he admitted the signing of the award. In his cross-examination he stated that he got the papers after a search '10 or 15 days ago' and that after he had found the papers, Ilam Din again explained them to him at his request '10 or 15 days ago.' To a question put in cross-examination by the Pleader for the defendant, he gave the following reply: "I read the award again on that day. I did not sign the award after reading it 10 or 15 days ago." This was clearly an admission that he had signed the award previously, i. e., about the time it was originally handed over to him by Ilam Din. The evidence discussed above, in our opinion, sufficiently proves that both the arbitrators had taken part in the examination of the accounts and had conjointly drawn up a draft of the award, which was subsequently faired out on a stamped paper and was signed by them though not at the same time. The learned Subordinate Judge, in our opinion, was not right in holding that the arbitrators were guilty of misconduct and that they did not do their duty by acting together in deciding the dispute referred to them for arbitration. The rulings Thammiraju v. Bapiraju (8) and Nand Ram v. Faqir Chand (9), relied upon by the learned Subordinate Judge, therefore, have no bearing on this case. The main ground, however, upon which the learned Subordinate Judge appears to have held the award to be invalid was that it had not been signed on the same day and at the same place by both the arbitrators. This is not a valid ground for invalidating an award so far as the law of arbitration in this country is concerned. We have already referred to the authorities bearing on the question. In our opinion the lower Court was wrong in refusing to pass a decree in accordance with the award.

We accordingly decree the appeal, set aside the decision of the first Court, order the award to be filed in Court and pass a decree in accordance with the award with costs to the successful plaintiff throughout.

Appeal allowed.

Agra Tenancy Act (II of 1901), s. 10—Agreement by ex-proprietor to pay rent in excess of rate fixed by section, whether enforceable.

An agreement by an ex-proprietor to pay rent at a rate in excess of the rate fixed by section 10 of the Agra Tenancy Act, being contrary to the provisions of that section, is not enforceable. [p. 890, col. 1.]

Letters Patent Appeal against the order of the Hon'ble Mr. Justice Knox, dated the 21st January 1919, in Second Appeal No. 417 of 1917.

Dr. S. N. Sen, for the Appellant.

Mr. P. L. Banerji, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The facts of this case may be briefly stated as follows:—One Ganga Ram mortgaged his property on November the 27th, 1896, to one Tika Ram. It was apparently a usufructuary mortgage, because he took from Tika Ram a lease of his sir lands agreeing to pay a rent of Rs. 60. In December 1908 he sold his equity of redemption to Mansa Ram, the present appellant, before us, and he then executed a kabuliyat which was registered, under which he continued to hold his sir lands at the rental of Rs. 60. His sir lands constituted two holdings; the rental of one was fixed at Rs. 12 and the rental of the other at Rs. 48. He clearly at that time was an ex-proprietary tenant but the Patwari, for reasons best known to himself, recorded him as a non-occupancy tenant. In 1913 Mansa Ram redeemed the mortgage and became full proprietor of the estate. He then brought a suit to eject Ganga Ram from the holding the rent of which was Rs. 12. In that case they came to an agreement and filed a compromise. Under the compromise Mansa Ram agreed that Ganga Ram should be recorded as the occupancy tenant of the land in both the holdings and Ganga Ram agreed that he would in future pay a rent of Rs. 70 per year in lieu of Rs. 60, and on this agreement the ejectment suit was dismissed. Mansa Ram has now sued Ganga Ram for rent. The first Court dismissed the suit, holding that the agreement was not binding on Ganga Ram as it was contrary to the provisions of section 10 of the Tenancy Act. The lower Appellate Court decreed the suit, holding that there was no reason why Ganga Ram should not be bound by his compromise. On second appeal to this Court the learned Judge who heard it, held that the provisions of section 10 of the Tenancy Act were mandatory and that Ganga Ram could not be allowed to contract himself out of his rights under that section, as that would be clearly contrary to the policy of the Act, and would make the provisions of section 10 entirely nugatory.

The plaintiff comes here on appeal under the Letters Patent and his plea is that there is nothing on the record whatsoever to show that the rent agreed to between Ganga Ram and Mansa Ram was a rent which was in excess of that which would be fixable according to the provisions of section 10 of the Tenancy Act. The learned Judge of this Court placed reliance on the ruling in the case of Pirag v. Sital Pershad (1). The learned Vakil for the appellant does not seek to go outside that decision. He points to the fact that in that case the rate of rent agreed upon was Rs. 8 per bigha, whereas the fair rate of rent under section 10 of the Act would have been Rs. 3 11·0. In the present case, however, the defendant clearly raised the plea that the agreement was not binding on him and was contrary to law. If the rate of rent agreed upon between the parties had been less than that fixable under section 10 of the Act, the plaintiff not only would, but ought to have replied to the defence by pointing out that the rent agreed upon was less than the statutory rent, or at least not in excess of it. This he did not do, nor did he raise this question of fact either in the Court of first instance or in the lower Appellate Court. We think it is too late for him to raise it now, and that the case must be decided on the assumption that the rent agreed upon between the parties was in excess of the statutory rent. This being so, in view of the ruling of this Court, the suit was properly dismissed. This appeal must fail and we dismiss it with costs.

The Hon'ble Syed Wazir Hasan, Mr. J. N. Chak and Syed Ali Mohammad, for the Appellants.

Rai N. N. Ghoshal and Mr. L. M. Banerji, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—In this case certain issues were remitted by our order of the 16th of August 1918. To the findings submitted by the learned Subordinate Judge on those issues both the parties have taken objections. One of the objections urged on behalf of the plaintiffs-appellants is that the Court below erred in not allowing them a reasonable opportunity to produce their evidence.

It appears that an application was made by the plaintiffs-appellants on the 12th September 1918 for the summoning of nine witnesses, six of whom lived in the district of Partabgarh and three in the district of Allahabad. The date fixed for hearing was the 19th October 1918. Owing to the intervention of the vacation the summonses could not be served and the witnesses whom the plaintiffs-appellants wanted to produce were not in attendance. The learned Subordinate Judge refused to grant an adjournment, but we do not consider that his order can be sustained. The document in reference to which the plaintiffs-appellants wanted to tender evidence was old, and they naturally needed some time to find out what witnesses were available or should be summoned. But for the intervention of the vacation there would have been enough time to serve the witnesses. An opportunity should therefore, be given to the plaintiffs-appellants to produce those witnesses now.

We direct the Court below accordingly to give an opportunity to the plaintiffs-appellants to produce the witnesses mentioned in their application of the 12th September 1918, and to send the evidence of those witnesses or of such of them as they wish to produce, after it has been duly recorded, to this Court within two months from this date.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. XXI, r. 2 (3)—Adjustment of decree not certified—Executing Court, jurisdiction of, to take cognisance of adjustment.

The provisions of clause (3) of Order XXI, rule 2, of the Civil Procedure Code are imperative, and no executing Court can take cognizance of an adjustment of any decree which is not certified in accordance with the provisions of the rule above cited. [p. 893, col. 1.]

IMAMUDDIN KHAN v. BINDABASINI PRASAD.

Appeal against order passed by the Sub Judge, Muzaffarpur, dated the 3rd August 1918.

Mr. Purnendu Narayan Sinha, Rai Tribhuvan Nath Sahai and Mr. Nitai Chandra Ghosh, for the Appellant.

Messrs. Kulwant Sahay and Harnarayan Prasad for Mr. Raghunath Singh, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—This miscellaneous appeal comes before us from the order of the learned Subordinate Judge of Muzaffarpur, dated the 3rd August 1918.

The judgment-debtor, who is the appellant before us, instituted a suit claiming a certain declaration with reference to the title of a certain property. The suit came on for hearing and was disposed of, the suit instituted by the judgment debtor, who was the plaintiff in the original suit, being dismissed.

From the order of dismissal the plaintiff in the original suit appealed to this Court, and this Court also dismissed the plaintiff's suit.

The plaintiff then expressed his intention of proceeding by way of appeal to the Privy Council, and filed an application for leave to appeal to the Privy Council in this Court.

The plaintiff alleges that the decree-holder, who was the defendant in the original suit, agreed to compromise the suit with the plaintiff on the basis that he, the defendant, would not execute the decree for costs, which had been awarded to him, on condition that the plaintiff would withdraw his application for leave to appeal to the Privy Council.

The agreement alleged by the plaintiff was supposed to have been made in the month of May 1917. The agreement, which it is alleged was arrived at between the plaintiff and the defendant in the original suit, was to be an adjustment or settlement of the rights of the defendant under the decree for costs, which he obtained when the plaintiff's suit was dismissed. Let there be no doubt about this, because it is the foundation of the case so far as the question of fact is concerned. The plaintiff now asserts that the compromise agreed upon in the month of May 1917 with the defendant with regard to the execution of the decree for costs was on the terms that he (the plaintiff) should giv up his right to pursue his application for leave to appeal to the Privy Council that was pending in this Court. In the evidence of the plaintiff, which was given before the learned Subordinate Judge, the plaintiff swears positively that in fact he withdrew his said application for leave to appeal to the Privy Council on the faith of the alleged agreement made between him and the defendant.

So far from this version of the making of the alleged agreement being true, it would appear that in the month of August 1917 this Court adjudicated upon the plaintiff's application for leave to appeal to the Privy Council, which application was rejected by the learned Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Chapman. Therefore, so far as I can see with regard to the question of facts, the plaintiffs did not accept the terms offered by the defendant by withdrawing his application for leave to appeal, because he pursued his remedy in this Court and was defeated in respect of it.

The plaintiff endeavours now to extricate himself from the difficult position in which he is placed, relative to the existence of the alleged contract, by averring that the contract that was made was referable, not to the application for leave to appeal to the Privy Council pending in this Court at the date when the contract is alleged to have been made, but with regard to an application for special leave to appeal to be made to the Board of the Privy Council itself which had not even then been instituted. If the evidence given by the plaintiff be deserving of any credence, I do not think that this attempt to give it an appearance of reality can be accepted as legitimate, fair or honest. We hold, as a question of fact, that no such contract or agreement as is alleged by the plaintiff was ever made by the plaintiff with the defendant in adjustment or settlement of the decree for costs awarded to the defendant. Let us, however, assume that the contract alleged by the plaintiff was made in fact, for the purpose of considering the law applicable to the facts of this appeal acting on the assumption stated.

The decree-holder, ignoring the agreement asserted by the plaintiff, proceeded to execute his decree for costs, amounting to the sum of Rs. 1,400. In execution proceedings instituted in respect of such decree the plaintiff intervened and claimed to have the execution proceedings stayed, on the ground that the decree for costs had been adjusted between the plaintiff and the defendant in the original suit. The learned Subordinate Judge came to the conclusion that as no adjustment of the decree for costs had been certified or recorded in the manner provided by Order XXI, rule 2, of the Civil Procedure Code, he was powerless to give effect to the terms of the alleged adjustment of the decree for costs, and by his order dated the 3rd August 1918 he directed that the execution proceedings already instituted should proceed.

From that order the judgment-debtor has appealed to this Court: and the contention put forward on his behalf before us, by the learned Vakil who appears for him, is that, inasmuch as the question in issue between himself and the decree-holder is one touching and concerning the discharge, satisfaction and execution of a decree, therefore, he is entitled to assert his right under the provisions of section 47 of the Civil Procedure Code by an independent proceeding in execution to enforce the alleged agreement, or otherwise to challenge the validity of the execution proceedings on the ground of fraud, irrespective of the provisions of Order XXI, rule 2, of the Civil Procedure Code; and reliance is placed in support of this argument on several authorities: Bairagula v. Bapanna (1), Ramayyar v. Ramayyar (2), Prasanno Kumar Sanyal v. Kali Das Sanyal (3), Deno Bundhu Nandi v. Hari Maty Dasee (4). Perhaps of the cases cited by Mr. P. N. Sinha in support of his argument the case of Deno Bundhu Nandi v. Hari Maty Dassee (4) is most opposite to the facts of this case.

However, the more modern line of authority prevailing in all High Courts in India, in my opinion, completely disregards the ruling in Deno Bundhu Nandi v. Hari Maty Dasee (4) as being a binding authority for the proposition which is now contended for before us.

On the other hand, the decree-holder contends that if the adjustment of the decree is not certified and recorded in accordance with the provisions of Order XXI, rule 2, of the Code of Civil Procedure then no execution Code can possibly, in the execution of such decree, take notice of an adjustment for the purpose of restricting or limiting the rights of the party entitled to execute such decree, even if there be fraud on the part of the decree-holder in failing to have the adjustment duly certified and recorded.

Mr. Justice Mookerjee in Biroo Gorain v. Musammat Jaimurat Kuer (5) lays down as a proposition of law that "It is not open to the Court of execution to enquire into the fact of a payment or adjustment of a decree which has not been certified or recorded as provided in clause (1) of rule 2 of Order XXI of the Code of Civil Procedure, even when the conduct of the decree-holder is alleged to have been fraudulent."

In the present case Mr. P. N. Sinha has suggested that there was fraud on the part of the decree-holder in attempting to execute the decree in violation of the terms of the alleged arrangement or agreement come to between the plaintiff and defendant and whereby, it is contended, the decree was adjusted. No suggestion, however, is made that the alleged contract, if made, was procured by any fraud. All at best that can be alleged by the plaintiff is that the decree-holder fraudulently failed to have the alleged adjustment certified and recorded. In my opinion if the decree holder did fail to have the adjustment certified and recorded in accordance with the provisions of clause (1), rule 2, of Order XXI, that would not be in any sense be a fraudulent act on his part which would give the judgment-debtor any right by action or otherwise to relief because by rule 2, clause (2), of the same Order, the same right is conferred on a judgment-debtor to have the adjustment arrived at between him and his decree-holder certified and recorded in accordance with the provisions of Order

XXI. If the judgment-debtor desires to protect himself, it is open to him to have the adjustment certified and recorded in the sam way as the decree-holder may do under the provisions of rule 2, clause (1). One thing is certain, clause (3) of rule 2 of Order XXI prohibits any executing Court from entertaining directly or indirectly an uncertified or unrecorded adjustment of a decree. Mr. Justice Woodroffe and Mr. Justice Mullick, as Judges of the Calcutta High Court, followed the line of reasoning expreseed by Mr. JusticeMukerjee in the case to which I have already referred and the ruling will be found in Golam Mujahar Chowdhery v. Goloke Charan Dass (6), and the ratio decidendi of these two cases applies, in my opinion, directly to the facts of this particular case. In addition, the aforesaid rulings cited above have, in more recent times by more modern authority been sanctioned and approved, viz., Jogendra Prasad Mitra v. Asutosh Goswami (7), and in this Court a ruling will be found reported as Musammat Sukhdei Kumri v. Mahamaya Prasad Singh (8), where the same point, as here, appears to have been taken, and their Lordships of this Court laid down that the provisions of clause (3) of Order XXI, rule 2, were imperative in their terms and that no executing Court could take cognizance of an adjustment of any decree, which was not certified in accordance with the provisions of Order XXI of the Civil Prosedure Code. Likewise modern authority in the Madras High Court also appears to have modified the views originally expreseed in the rulings in Bairagula v. Bapanna (1) and Ramayyar v. Ramayyar (2). In the more modern rulings in Ganapathi Ayyar v. Chenga Reddi (9) and Badrudeen v. Gulam Moideen (10) it will be found that the tendency in that Court too is to lean in favour of the views expressed in the Calcutta High Court, which have been sanctioned by many of the Judges of that Court in accordance with the opinion expressed by Mr. Justice Mukerjee.

Accordingly, we are of opinion that in this miscellaneous appeal, in point of law, the learned Subordinate Judge was right in ignoring the adjustment relied upon by the judgment-debtor in support of his application to stay the execution proceeding on the ground that the adjustment of the decree had not been certified or recorded in accordance with the provisions of Order XXI, and accordingly we dismiss this appeal with costs.

In 1885, without their knowledge, the talukdar was himself recorded in the revenue papers as the owner of certain portions of this property. In 1912 the plaintiffs became aware of the entry and applied for its correction, but their application was refused. In 1917 they brought the present suit to obtain a declaration that they were the under-proprietors of the property in question and obtained a decree. In second appeal it was contended that the suit was barred by limitation, as no cause of action had accrued within six years of the date of institution of the suit, that the right to sue accrued in 1885, as it was the entry in favour of the talukdar which gave the cause of action, and that having failed to avail themselves of the cause of action which then accrued to them, the plaintiffs could not now bring the present suit in 1917:

Mr. A. P. Sen, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The only question which I have to consider in this second appeal is a question of limitation. The point is whether or not the plaintiffs, who brought this suit for declaration, were able to show a cause of action accruing to them within six years from the date upon which the suit was brought. The plaint, it may be mentioned, was filed in the month of May 1917. The purpose of the suit was the obtaining of a declaration that the plaintiffs were under-proprietors of three plots Nos. 137, 568 and 569. So far as plot No. 137 is concerned, there is no longer any dispute. The learned Counsel for the appellant has admitted that he is not in a position to contest the judgment of the Court below regarding this plot. The other two plots Nos. 568 and 569, which are described in the proceedings as a grove-plot of old fallow, are still in dispute.

The plaintiffs' case was that in the year 1869 fifteen persons obtained a decree from the Settlement Court declaring them to be under-proprietors of certain groves measuring some 23 bighas in area. This area comprised the plots which are now in dispute. By the year 1885 a number of these decree-holders had died without issue and the present plaintiffs, four in number, were the only survivors of the decree-holders and their representatives.

In the year 1885 the taluqdar, in some way or other which is not apparent, got an entry made in his favour in the revenue registers declaring him to be the owner of a certain portion of this under proprietary property on the ground that the previous owners had died and left no issue. According to what is set out in the plaint, this entry was made without the knowledge of the present plaintiffs; and I may note here at once that the learned Judge of the Court below has recorded his opinion that this was probably the case. In the year 1912, according to the allegations in the plaint, the plaintiffs became aware that this entry had been made in the revenue papers. It is said in paragraph 4 of the plaint that the Girdawar Kanungo made a report to the authorities regarding the entry and that having obtained information regarding this report, the plaintiffs applied for correction of the khewat. Their application was refused both in the Revenue Court of first instance and in successive Courts of Appeal, and it is the refusal of the Revenue Courts to correct the entry in the interests of the plaintiffs which is set up as the cause of action for this declaratory suit. Both the Courts below have given the plaintiffs a decree. It was argued there, as here, that there was no cause of action for the present declaratory suit accruing to the plaintiffs within six years of the date on which the suit was brought.

Limitation for declaratory suits is prescribed by Article 120 of the First Schedule to the Limitation Act. The period is six years to run from the date upon which the right to sue accrues. It is argued here by the learned Advocate for the appellant that the right of these plaintiffs to sue accrued in the year 1885, that it was the entry made in favour of the taluqdar in that year by the Revenue Courts which gave the plaintiffs a cause of action for a declaratory suit and that having failed to avail themselves of the cause of action which then accrued to them, they are not now in a position to bring this suit in the year 1917. With regard to what took place in the year 1912, when the Revenue Courts refused to correct the khewat for the benefit of the plaintiffs, the argument is that this was only a continuation of the previous cause of action which came into existence in the year 1885. The learned Judge of the Court below, however, was not moved by this argument and was clearly of opinion that whatever cause of action might have arisen to the plaintiffs in the year 1885, there nevertheless was a fresh cause of action accruing in the year 1912, and so the present suit was within limitation. In my opinion this finding of the learned District Judge is quite correct. It is necessary here to refer to the facts which have been found and which are no longer in controversy. The plaintiffs in this suit are legal representatives of the fifteen persons who obtained the decree for under-proprietary rights in the year 1869. Further it is held by both the Courts that from that time down to the present these plaintiffs have been in possession of the plots in dispute. That finding of fact has plenty of evidence to support it and cannot be disputed here

In this state of affairs how is it possible to say that the plaintiffs were under any obligation to bring a declaratory suit in the year 1885, even if we assume for the moment that they were aware of the fact that an entry unfavourable to them and favourable to the talukdar had been made in the revenue registers? We have it that, entry or no entry, their possession continued in the same way and that no attempt was ever made to interfere with that possession. This being so, even if the plaintiffs were aware of this entry of 1885, they could afford to ignore it. A man is not obliged to rush into Court and seek for a declaration of his title merely because some casual denial of his title is made—a denial which in no way affects him in the enjoyment of his rights of property. The plaintiffs might, of course, have availed themselves of a cause of action arising in 1885, if they had been so minded to and if, of course, they were aware that the entry had been made; but they were certainly under no obligation to do so; and by failing to bring a suit within six years from the year 1885 they are not liable to incur the penalty of having a subsequent declaratory suit dismissed. We have it, therefore, that in the year 1912, these plaintiffs were in possession when circumstances arose which rendered it, as they thought, advisable for them to apply to the Revenue Court to have their title as under-proprietors recognised and established. They had against them an entry in the mutation record—an entry, be it observed, which could not by itself confer any title on the talukdar. The Revenue Courts refused to disturb the entry and this refusal has necessarily cast a cloud upon the plaintiffs' title. This being so, it seems to me impossible to argue that they had not a right to bring the present suit for the purpose of having that cloud removed. The suit was brought within the legal period of limitation and consequently this plea that it was barred by limitation must fail. This is the only point for decision in the case and I decide it against the appellant, with the result that the appeal fails and is dismissed with costs to the respondents.

Appeal dismissed.

Petition, under section 44 of Act VI of 1918, for revision of the order of the Subordinate Judge, 2nd Class, Delhi, dated the 14th April 1919.

Lala Moti Sagar, R. S., for the Petitioner.

Lalas Sardha Ram and Balwant Ram, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The house in question belonged to Gopal Kishen and Har Kishen, who first mortgaged $\frac{1}{4}$th of it to Tara Chand. They then mortgaged the whole house to Sri Ram, who sued and got a preliminary decree on 7th June 1917 and a final decree on 22nd November 1917. Tara Chand was made a party to that suit. In execution of decree the house was sold to Raj Kishore on 12th July 1918 for Rs. 5,900 and of this sum Rs. 1,605-5-9 were handed over to Tara Chand.

Tara Chand lodged his suit on 13th October 1917, got a preliminary decree on 22nd

November 1917 and a final decree for Rs. 2,090-7-6 on 1st August 1918. Now Tara Chand wants to re-sell the house in execution of his decree, and Raj Kishore objects. The objections have been allowed by the learned Subordinate Judge. Tara Chand applies to this Court for revision, and on his behalf it is urged that in such cases where the decree is one for sale of the property and no attachment is necessary, Order XXI, rule 58, does not apply, and the executing Court has no jurisdiction to entertain objections. This appears quite correct. The following are clear authorities on the point, Deefholts v. Peters (1), Hari Mohan Dalal v. Lachmi Chand (2) and Ratan Lal v. Bala Pershad (3).

It is pointed out for the respondent that Deefholts v. Peters (1) has been distinguished in Krishnam v. Chadayan Kutti Haji (4). That is true, but it was in no way overruled or dissented from. The facts in Krishnam v. Chadayan Kutti Haji (4) are quite different and so are distinguishable both from the present case and from the Calcutta case.

For the respondent it is urged that he is the representative of the judgment-debtors, and so the case comes under section 47 of the Code. But I fail to see how the respondent can claim to be the representative of the judgment debtors in this suit merely because he has bought the house in execution of the decree passed in another suit.

Then it is urged that justice has been done, and I should not interfere on revision. All I can say is that Tara Chand has not yet succeeded in realizing his decree in full, and that the real merits of the case will probably be fought out in a regular suit which will now be brought by either one side or the other and that I am not prepared to judge that suit in advance.

I accept this application and set aside the order of the Subordinate Judge allowing the objections.

The respondents will pay costs in this Court.

Application accepted.

OUDH JUDICIAL COMMISSIONER'S COURT.

FIRST CIVIL APPEAL No. 100 OF 1916.

April 4, 1919.

Present:—Mr. Stuart, J. C., and Pandit Kanhaiya Lal, A. J. C.

Babu NARAIN SINGH AND OTHERS—PLAINTIFFS—APPELLANTS

versus

THE DEPUTY COMMISSIONER OF PARTABGARH, AS MANAGER, COURT OF WARDS, KALAKANKAR ESTATE—DEFENDANT—RESPONDENT.

Oudh Estates Act (I of 1869), ss. 13, 15—Transfer of property by gift or Will—Registration and attestation, whether necessary—Deed merging in decree, effect of—Evidence Act (I of 1872), s. 90—Presumption as to ancient document, rebuttal of—Procedure—Full proprietary title, transfer of—Succession, fetter as to, effect of—Evidence produced and proved in trial Court but not pressed—Plea, whether can be raised in appeal—Custom, proof of.

Under section 13 of the Oudh Estates Act a transfer of property, whether by gift or Will, to be effective, must be registered and attested; the fact that the document evidencing the transaction became merged in a decree in a suit to which the transferee was not a party, would not make any difference [p. 905, col. 1.]

Although section 90 of the Evidence Act enables a Court to presume the genuineness of a document thirty years old, it is due to the party against whom the document is produced to be afforded an opportunity of rebutting the presumption, and if this is done, the party producing the document is entitled to an opportunity of proving fully the deaths of the witnesses or of producing the attesting witnesses, in which case there would be no necessity to apply the presumption. [p. 906, col. 2; p. 907, col. 1.]

When a person having a right to make a transfer transfers full proprietary title, the enjoyment of which is subject to the life-estate of a certain person and endeavours to fetter the succession to the estate, effect must be given to the transfer of full proprietary title, and the attempt to fetter the succession should be ignored. [p. 910, col. 2.]

Where in support of his title a party has a valuable piece of evidence which he produced and proved before the lower Court, the fact that he omitted to lay due stress upon it in the Court, would not prevent him from advancing a plea based on that evidence in appeal. [p. 919, col 2.]

Where a transfer by gift falls under the provisions of sections 13 and 15 of the Oudh Estates Act, the rights of the transferee are governed by the personal law, as modified by custom, if any, to which he is subject and not by any custom of succession prevailing in the taluka, and the property becomes his self-acquired property which, in the event of his dying intestate, would descend under the rules of his personal law. [p 918, col 2.]

Where it is sought to establish the existence of a special custom of succession in a particular family the fact that there is an abundance of evidence that proves that the custom prevails in other families in the tribe, would not be of any avail. [p. 916, col. 1.]

First appeal from the decree of the Subordinate Judge, Lucknow, (Tahsil Mohanlalganj), dated the 20th May 1916.

The Hon'ble Syed Wazir Hasan, Mr. J. N. Chak and Syed Ali Mohammad, for the Appellants.

Rai N. N. Ghoshal and Mr. L. M. Banerji, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—This appeal relates to the succession to the Taluka of Rampur Kaithaula in the Patabgarh District. The following pedigree shows the relationships of the parties :—

HANWANT SINGH
(Died 30th June 1881.)

Partab Singh (died, 1265 F.) =M. Dirgaj Kunwar (died 1882)	Lachhman Singh (died 1st July 1898)
Rampal Singh (died 28th February 1909).	Ram Prasad Singh (died 1901) — Narain Singh (Plaintiff).
	Ram Ghulam Singh or Ramesh Singh (died August 1900) — Awadesh Singh (Defendant).
	Ramdin Singh.
	Ramadhin Singh.

The preliminary facts may be given almost in the words of the report in Rampal Singh v. Ram Prasad Singh (1). They are as follows:—

"The second Summary Settlement of that Taluq" (Rampur Kaithaula) "was made with Raja Hanwant Singh, to whom a Talukdari Sanad was granted on 28th October 1859, and after the passing of the Oudh Estates Act (I of 1869), his name was entered in the lists Nos. I and II prepared in accordance with the provisions of that Act. Raja Hanwant Singh had two sons, Partab Singh and Lachman Singh. The elder, Partab Singh, died before his father, leaving a son Rampal Singh, the present appellant. In order to settle the succession to the estate, and prevent disputes between his grandson Rampal Singh and his son Lachman Singh, Hanwant Singh on 2nd April 1859 executed what purported to be a deed of gift of the whole estate (with the exception of six villages) in favour of Rampal Singh, then a child; and Rampal Singh's name was entered on the revenue registers by an order dated 19th January 1860. Hanwant Singh, however, remained in possession and managed the estate. On 5th October 1864, Rampal Singh, who was then about 15 years of age, leased a portion of the estate called Kalakankar to Hanwant Singh for his life rent-free; and the remaining portion of the estate called Dharupur was placed under the management of Rampal Singh.

"When Rampal Singh attained majority, disputes arose between him and Hanwant Singh, which eventually on 4th October 1867, they agreed to refer to arbitration; and in the arbitration proceedings Dharupur was also awarded to Hanwant Singh, who was directed to make an allowance to Rampal Singh for his maintenance. On 24th January 1869, Rampal Singh leased six more villages to Hanwant Singh for life, rent free, and the Dharupur portion of the estate was placed under the management of the Deputy Commissioner. Disputes continued between Hanwant Singh and Rampal Singh, and a suit was in 1871 brought by the former against the latter in the Court of the Deputy Commissioner of Sultanpur for a declaration that, notwithstanding the deed of gift, dated 2nd April 1859, he (Hanwant Singh) was the absolute proprietor of the whole Taluq. This suit was compromised on 1st September 1871, the deed of compromise providing that Rampal Singh should hold the Dharupur portion of the estate for life with remainder to his mother Dirgaj Kunwar (widow of Partab Singh), with remainder to Hanwant Singh; that Hanwant Singh should hold the Kalakankar portion of the estate for his life with remainder to Rampal Singh for life, with remainder to Dirgaj Kunwar for life; and that the ultimate remainder to both estates on the deaths of Hanwant Singh, Rampal Singh and Dirgaj Kunwar should be to Lachman Singh and his heirs. A petition was presented to the Court praying that the suit might be disposed of in accordance with the compromise, and, on 7th September 1871, under section 98 of Act VIII of 1859, the then Code of Civil Procedure, a decree was made accordingly. Appended to the decree was a note to the effect that 'the Court directs that each party shall within two months draw up a formal agreement embodying the terms of the compromise filed in this Court:' but the only formal agreement afterwards made was one executed on 30th October 1871 by Hanwant Singh alone, and duly registered.

"On 5th June 1873, Rampal Singh made a gift of an absolute estate in certain villages in the Taluq to his wife Subhao Kunwar. Thereupon Hanwant Singh and Lachman Singh brought a suit in the Court of the Deputy Commissioner of Sultanpur against Rampal Singh and Subhao Kunwar to set aside the deed of gift of 1873, as being in violation of the terms of the compromise of 1871 and the decree made on it, and praying that it might be declared void, and the donee be dispossessed, and that the rights of Hanwant Singh and Lachman Singh might be declared in conformity with the compromise and decree. In defence it was contended that Rampal Singh had power to alienate as he had done, and that the gift was, therefore, valid: that the possession of Subhao Kunwar could not be disturbed during the lifetime of Rampal Singh; and that Lachman Singh had no right to sue, as such right would not accrue to him until the deaths of Hanwant Singh, Rampal Singh and Dirgaj Kunwar. No plea was raised that the compromise and decree of 1871 were invalid. In that suit issues were settled:—'(1) Clause 2 of the sulehnama standing as it does, can a cause of action accrue to the plaintiff Raja Hanwant Singh from an alienation made during the lifetime of the defendant Raja Rampal Singh of the nature of the alienation in suit,' and '(9) Has a cause of action accured to Babu Lachman Singh or not?'

"On these issues the Deputy Commissioner on 31st October 1873 gave judgment as follows:—

"'With regard to issue No. 9. Has a cause of action accrued to Babu Lachman Singh or not? The Court was of opinion that plaintiff's replication is sound, viz., that whereas the decision of the Judicial Lords of Her Majesty's Privy Council, relied on by defendant, relates to a claim to a future inheritance, the present claim relates to an actual breach of agreement, and is, therefore, not covered by the ruling cited. If the ultimate devolution of the estate to Babu Lachman Singh and his heirs were only a mere doubtful and contingent probability, the ruling might be relevant. But his position is far different to this, he is a certain remainderman under the terms of the agreement, clause 7. That clause runs thus:—"On the death of the last survivor of these three persons, to wit, Raja Hanwant Singh, Raja Rampal Singh, and Dirgaj Kunwar, mother of Raja Rampal Singh, Babu Lachman Singh, the second son of Raja Hanwant Singh, and his heirs or representatives, under the meaning of Act I of 1869, section 22, shall succeed to the whole of the Taluqa of Rampur Kaithaula, but the said Babu Lachman Singh, or his heirs or representatives, shall not exercise any interference or control whatever over the said Taluqa, except over the six villages alluded to in clause 8 hereof, till the death of the said Raja Rampal Singh and of his mother, Dirgaj Kunwar." By this clause Babu Lachman Singh, or his representatives will certainly inherit the estate some time or other. Issue No. 9, accordingly, was found against the defendants in this shape, that if cause of action be found to have accrued to plaintiff, Raja Hanwant Singh, it will also have accrued to plaintiff Babu Lachman Singh:'

"and on the issue whether the deed of gift was void as against Hanwant Singh the Court said:—

"'As regards the cancelment of the deed of gift it appears to the Court that as in drawing up this instrument the Raja defendant has gone beyond the powers assigned to him under clause 9 of the agreement, the instrument must be pronounced to be null, void, and of no effect whatever, either as authorizing the present possession of the Rani defendant or the devolution of the gifted villages after her death. The decree will pronounce accordingly.'

"As to the right to eject Rani Subhao Kunwar the judgment proceeded:—

"'With regard, lastly, to that portion of the claim which seeks to eject the Rani defendant from the gifted villages, the Court finds that no right whatever to claim such ejectment has accrued to the plaintiff, Raja Hanwant Singh. Clause 2 of the agreement provides "that the estate of Dharupur shall remain and continue in the proprietary possession of the said Raja Rampal Singh during the lifetime of the said Raja Hanwant Singh without the power to will, sell, mortgage or otherwise transfer for a period beyond his life or otherwise dispose of the said Taluqa or any portion thereof, and that the said Raja Rampal Singh is declared to be at once competent to receive all the profits arising out of the said estate." It is not contended for plaintiffs, and it could not reasonably be contended, that this clause does not empower the Raja defendant to allow his wife, the Rani defendant, to exercise possession during his life on any terms that may be arranged between themselves, as long as no sort of alienation beyond his life is made. By the decree about to be given the basis of the possession of the Rani defendant is altered, but the Court holds that so long as Raja Rampal Singh is alive, he alone has the right to remove her from possession as long as the possession exercised by her is of the same nature as that which might have been exercised by himself under the agreement. In this view the Court will not decree the ejectment of the Rani defendant from the gifted villages.'

"The Deputy Commissioner thus held that the deed of gift of 5th June 1873 was in contravention of clause 9 of the compromise; that under clause 2 of the compromise Rampal Singh had a life-interest in the villages mentioned in the deed of gift of 5th June 1873, and that the Rani Subhao Kunwar could accordingly hold those villages for Rampal Singh's lifetime, and, therefore, refused to eject her from those villages.

"Hanwant Singh died on 30th June 1881; Dirgaj Kunwar died in 1882, and Lachman Singh died on 1st July 1888."

The above note contains certain omissions. The Sanad granted to Hanwant Singh was an ordinary Sanad. No primogeniture Sanad was granted. Under the compromise of 1st September 1871, it was laid down that, should both Raja Rampal Singh and Dirgaj Kunwar predecease Raja Hanwant Singh, the absolute proprietary right in the whole of the Rampur Kaithaula Taluka was to revert to Raja Hanwant Singh with the power to will, sell, transfer, or dispose of the whole or any portion of the said Taluka under the power conferred on him by Act I of 1869. The omission of Mr. Harrington, Deputy Commissioner of Sultanpur, to give weight to this passage affects the question of the interest acquired by Lachhman Singh under the compromise. Further it is not the case that the only formal agreement made under the terms of the compromise was the one executed on the 30th October 1871 by Hanwant Singh alone and duly registered. Rampal Singh also executed a formal agreement but omitted to register it. This point, as will be seen later, is of some slight importance. It is here admitted by Counsel on both sides that Hanwant, at the time that the compromise of 30th October 1871 was executed, was the sole proprietor of the Rampur Kaithaula Taluka.

The note continues to state the facts of the case then under report. The words are as follows:—

"On 23rd May 1889, Messrs. Eyre and Spottiswoode, having obtained a decree against Rampal Singh, brought to sale in execution the village of Parbara, part of the Taluq Rampur Kaithaula, and on 21st January 1896 it was purchased by Basant Singh. Having failed in the execution proceedings to limit the sale to the life-interest of Rampal Singh, Ram Prasad Singh, son of Lachman Singh, instituted, on 24th March 1896, the suit out of which the present appeal arose against Rampal Singh and Basant Singh, and Messrs. Eyre and Spottiswoode. The plaint prayed for a declaration that the sale would be inoperative and of no effect against the plaintiff after the death of Rampal Singh, the plaintiff claiming as the immediate reversioner on the death of Rampal Singh.

"The defence, so far as material, was that Rampal Singh acquired an absolute title to the whole Taluq under the deed of gift dated 2nd April 1859; that the compromise dated the 1st September 1871 was invalid, not having been registered; and that neither Lachman Singh nor the plaintiff could claim the benefit of the compromise, or the decree on it, not having been parties thereto. During the course of the hearing in the Court of first instance the plea was taken that the decree of the Deputy Commissioner of 31st October 1876 had finally decided that Rampal Singh had only an interest for his life in the Taluq, the vested estate in remainder being in Lachman Singh and his heirs; and that decision constituted a res judicata in this suit.

"The Subordinate Judge held that the judgment of 31st October 1876 did not operate as res judicata; that the compromise not having been registered was inadmissible in evidence; that Rampal Singh had acquired an absolute title to the whole Taluq under the deed of gift of 2nd April 1859, which title had never been displaced; and that the plaintiff not being a party to the decree on the compromise could claim no benefit under it.

"On appeal by the plaintiff the Court of the Judicial Commissioners of Oudh (Messrs. Blennerhasset and Deas) delivered the judgment of the Court."

This judgment decided that the decision of the Civil Court in 1876 was conclusive between the parties to that suit and established the fact that Raja Rampal Singh had a life-interest only in Mauza Parbara with remainder to the plaintiff. It is to be noted that Lachhman Singh died in 1888, and that Ram Prasad Singh was his heir and representative. Their Lordships agreed with the decision of the Court of the Judicial Commissioner and quoted with approval the reasons given by that Court. They are as follows:—

"There can be no doubt that plaintiff is claiming under Babu Lachman Singh within the meaning of section 13 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Babu Lachman Singh was a party to the litigation of 1876, the question directly and substantially in issue was whether he had a contingent or vested interest under the compromise and decree of 1871. The Court substantially held that he had a vested remainder and could, therefore, sue to set aside an alienation;" and "the judgment of the Civil Court in 1876 is conclusive between the parties to the present suit and establishes the fact that Raja Rampal Singh has a life-interest only in Mauza Parbara with remainder to the plaintiff. It is unnecessary to decide whether, irrespective of the plea of res judicata, the plaintiff has established his case. The question involves only matters of law."

Ram Prasad Singh had died in 1901. Rampal Singh died on 28th February 1909. Mutation was effected in the name of Ram Ghulam Singh (or Ramesh Singh) on 25th March 1909. Ram Ghulam Singh died in August 1910 and was succeeded by his son Awadesh Singh, who is a ward under the guardianship of the Deputy Commissioner of Partabgarh as manager of the Court of Wards.

The present suit was instituted by Narain Singh, the younger brother of Ram Prasad Singh, on 25th June 1913. His claim proceeded broadly on the following allegations:—First, that the compromise of September 1871 did not affect the rights of Lachhman Singh who was no party to it and that no title could be based by the defendant under the terms of that compromise as it had not been registered, and second, that on the death of Rampal Singh, and not before his death, the property had devolved to the line of Lachhman Singh, that the succession to the property was governed by the Hindu Law of Mitakshara which was binding upon the family of Lachhman Singh, and that under the provisions of that law the plaintiff was entitled to succeed to the property as the nearer in degree. He also asserted a claim under an unspecified custom and further under the terms of a registered Will, dated the 20th June 1888. It is asserted in appeal that under the provisions of his claim he based his title through either Rampal Singh or Lachhman Singh.

The defence was to the effect that Hanwant Singh was the Talukdar of the Rampur Kaithaula Taluka (it is now conceded by the plaintiff-appellant that Hanwant Singh was Talukdar and sole proprietor). The compromise was defended as a deed of family settlement which did not require registration and further as having been incorporated in a decree of the Court. It was set up that the suit was barred res judicata, and that succession to the property was by male lineal primogeniture both under custom and under the terms of the Sanad. It is not now contended that the terms of the Sanad, which is not a primogeniture Sanad, provided for male lineal primogeniture. The custom, so far from being in the plaintiff's favour, was asserted by the defendant to be against him. The authenticity of the Will of 20th June 1888 was denied and its validity was questioned, even if genuine, on the ground that it had not been registered within a month and that Lachhman Singh had died on the 1st July 1888. There were further questions raised as to alleged Wakfs.

The learned Subordinate Judge decided the suit against the plaintiff on the 20th May 1916. He held that the plaintiff was suing as a representative of Ram Prasad Singh. The first three issues were as follows:—

"1. Was Raja Rampal Singh legally incompetent to enter into the compromise of 1871 because part of the estate was then under the management of the Deputy Commissioner, Partabgarh?

"2. Whether the compromise and the decree based thereon were inoperative—

"(1) for want of stamp and registration,

"(2) for omission to execute an agreement as required under the decree?

"3. Whether the questions raised under the aforesaid issues are barred under the rules of res judicata and estoppel?"

The learned Subordinate Judge decided that it was not open to the plaintiff to question whether Raja Rampal Singh was legally incompetent to enter into the compromise of 1871, because part of the estate was then under the management of the Deputy Commissioner of Partabgarh, or whether the compromise or the decree based thereon was inoperative for want of stamp and registration or for omission to execute an agreement as required under the decree, inasmuch as the decision in Rampal Singh v. Ram Prasad Singh (1) was binding on the plaintiff by way of res judicata though not by way of estoppel, and that he had to abide by the terms of the compromise of September 1871. Issues Nos. 4 to 7 were as follows:—

"4. Was the gift in favour of Rampal Singh a mere paper transaction and never intended to be operative?

"5. Was it inoperative for want of a transferable title in the donor on the date of the gift?

"6. Was Raja Hanwant Singh in possession of the estate, after the gift, as trustee for Raja Rampal Singh?

"7. Did Raja Hanwant Singh receive the Sanad as trustee for Raja Rampal Singh, or the Government intended to grant the estate under that Sanad to Raja Rampal Singh exclusively?"

They refer to the title of Raja Hanwant Singh. They were decided against the defendant. The appellant has not in appeal questioned the accuracy of this portion of the decision (as has already been stated).

The next issue was the 8th—This is one of the most important issues in the suit. It is as follows:—

"8. Did the compromise with the agreement create a vested remainder in favour of Lachhman Singh, as regards the estate?"

The plaintiff's case was that three estates, resembling Hindu widow's estates, were created by the terms of the compromise, if those terms are binding. Lachhman Singh and his heirs were according to him in the position of reversioners, but their rights as reversioners did not come into being till the life-estates fell in. On his argument the life-estates did not fall in until the death of Rampal Singh. The plaintiff's case was that the succession did not open till the 28th February 1909. Lachhman Singh and Ram Prasad Singh were then both dead and he claimed under the Mitakshara Law as nearest in degree. The defendant's case was that under the compromise Lachhman Singh obtained at first only a contingent remainder. He did not take up the position which was taken up by the Deputy Commissioner of Sultanpur in 1876, that Lachhman Singh obtained a vested remainder. The defendant's case was that Lachhman Singh obtained a contingent remainder which became a vested remainder on the death of Hanwant Singh in 1881. The learned Subordinate Judge decided this issue in favour of the defendant.

The 9th issue was as follows:—

"9. Whether the compromise and agreement were inoperative for want of registration?"

The learned Subordinate Judge did not decide that issue.

The 10th issue was as follows:—

"10. Whether the plaintiff became entitled under Mitakshara, Act I of 1869 or family or tribal custom, to succession to the estate of Rampal Singh, or the vested remainder, after the death of Rampal Singh?

"Or, the title accrued to Ramesh Singh under the law, custom (family or tribal) or Sanad or Lachman Singh's Will, if any?"

The learned Subordinate Judge decided that there was no primogeniture Sanad but that the custom of male lineal primogeniture was proved to prevail in the tribe and family and that this custom overruled the ordinary rule of succession under the Mitakshara Law. He decided this issue in favour of the defendant. The defendant has set up a Will alleged to have been executed by Lachhman Singh on 18th June 1888. The learned Subordinate Judge did not arrive at a finding with regard to the validity of this Will, but found its execution proved and referred to it incidentally as going to establish the custom of male lineal primogeniture.

The 11th issue was—

"11. Did Hanwant Singh make a Wakf as regards items Nos. 1—6, list B, before the gift to Rampal Singh and was the said Wakf subsequently recognised as operative by Rampal Singh?"

The learned Subordinate Judge decided this issue in the affirmative.

The 12th issue was—

"12. Can plaintiff now repudiate that Wakf?"

The learned Subordinate Judge decided that the plaintiff could not repudiate the Wakf.

The 13th issue was—

"13. Was no effect given to this Wakf or were its objects non-religious or non-charitable?"

"Is the Wakf inoperative for any of the aforesaid reasons?"

The learned Subordinate Judge decided that effect was given to the Wakf and that the Wakf was not inoperative for any of the reasons alleged by the plaintiff.

The 14th issue and 15th issue were as follows:—

"14. Were items Nos. 7—10, list B, transferred to plaintiff and Ram Prasad under a gift by Hanwant Singh?

"Or, under a trust?"

"15. Did the transferees transfer the said property to Rampal Singh?

"Or, it was a surrender for better management of the trust?"

The learned Subordinate Judge decided that Hanwant Singh received certain villages from Rampal Singh under an award of 17th March 1873, that he assigned these villages as a Wakf appointing Ram Prasad Singh and Narain Singh plaintiff as managers and that the plaintiff had resigned his rights under the terms of the Wakf to Rampal Singh for compensation.

The 16th issue was as follows:—

"16. Were items Nos. 11—34, list B, purchased by Raja Rampal Singh and formed part of his estate?"

The learned Subordinate Judge did not decide this issue.

The 17th and 18th issues were as follows:—

"17. Was the Wakf under the deed dated the 21st August 1906 a mere paper transaction and was neither intended to be operative nor was any effect given to it?

"18. Has the Wakf become inoperative for that reason, or because some of the trustees have not accepted that position?"

The learned Subordinate Judge decided that Rampal Singh made a Wakf in 1906 and that this Wakf was operative.

The 19th and 20th issues were:—

"19. Do items Nos. 35—53, list B, lists C, E and F form accretions to the estate or have been incorporated in the estate?

"20. If so, would they follow the estate in its devolution?"

The learned Subordinate Judge did not decide these issues.

The 21st issue was:—

"21. Has plaintiff a right to possession of all the Wakf property, if the Wakf by the two Rajas be held binding?"

The learned Subordinate Judge decided that the non-Talukdari property went with the Taluka.

The 22nd issue was:—

"22. Whether Ramesh Singh or the defendant got any of the moveables detailed in list G?"

The learned Subordinate Judge found that Rs. 27,329.7-1 left by Raja Rampal Singh in a Bank came into the possession of Ramesh Singh.

The 23rd issue was:—

"23. Whether the Wakf by Rampal Singh as to moveables is invalid?"

This issue was decided in the negative.

The 24th issue was:—

"24. Did Lachman Singh execute the Will dated 20th June 1888?"

It was decided that the Will of the 20th June 1888 was not proved.

The 25th issue was:—

"25. What amount has Ramesh spent on the obsequies of Rampal Singh out of his pocket?"

It was decided that Ramesh Singh had spent about Rs. 18,000 on the obsequies of Rampal Singh.

The 26th issue was:—

"26. Is the plaintiff bound to repay the same in case he is entitled to succession to Rampal Singh's estate?"

It was decided that such expenses operated as a charge upon the property.

The 27th issue was:—

"27. What amount of mesne profits is the plaintiff entitled to?"

This issue was not decided.

The learned Counsel who has argued on behalf of the plaintiff appellant has confined himself to the following points. His case is that the claim is not barred by the rule of res judicata and that his client has a right to examine the legal effect of the compromise of 1871. He urges that this compromise does not bind the plaintiff-appellant owing to want of registration and attestation, but, if the Court considers that these defects are nullified, he further questions the validity of the compromise as against his client because it attempts to lay down a rule of succession. On his interpretation the compromise would have given Lachhman Singh a life-estate at most. But in event of that objection being also overruled he further went on to urge that under its terms was created only a succession to estates similar to the estates of Hindu widows with final succession of reversioners His argument took this course that, if the compromise were bad, the estate devolved in full on Rampal Singh on the death of Hanwant Singh. He maintained that on the death of Rampal Singh it should have come to his client under the provisions of section 22, clause 11, Act I of 1869, as the ordinary law to which persons of the religion and tribe were entitled to succeed was the Mitakshara Law, and he further went on to maintain that, even if the compromise were held to be binding, the estate should devolve on his client under the provisions of the Mitakshara Law. He admitted that to arrive at this result he had to upset the finding that a custom of male lineal primogeniture existed in the family, and he argued at length in support of his contention that no such custom existed. He took the following minor point that in any case the non-Talukdari property should pass to his client and argued that under this head were included the so-called Wakf property and the money in the Bank to which reference is made in the 22nd issue. These pleas will now be taken in order.

The first plea is with reference to the finding that any attempt to question the validity of the compromise is barred by the rule of res judicata. The learned Subordinate Judge based his finding on this point mainly on the decision of their Lordships of the Privy Council in Rampal Singh v. Ramprasad Singh (1), to which reference has already been made. His argument was that, inasmuch as Hanwant Singh and Lachhman Singh had obtained in 1876 a declaration against Rampal Singh in legal proceedings to the effect that Lachhman Singh had a vested remainder and that Rampal Singh had only a life-interest under the compromise of 1871, and their Lordships of the Privy Council had decided in 1904 that Rampal Singh was prevented by the rule of res judicata from questioning this decision against Ram Prasad Singh, the son of Lachhman, Singh, Narain Singh who was claiming, as the learned Subordinate Judge held, under Rampal Singh could not re-open the question again. The argument of the learned Counsel for the plaintiff-appellant is that the learned Subordinate Judge assumed that the plaintiff-appellant represented Rampal Singh and that the defendant represented Lachhman Singh, and that that position was untenable. He argued that, so far as his client's title was concerned, he was claiming from Hanwant Singh in the first instance, not from Rampal Singh at all, and that the title which he now asserts had not come into existence in 1876 and could not have come into existence until the death of Hanwant Singh. Further he continued that there was no controversy between Hanwant Singh and Lachhman Singh in 1876 upon this point as they were co-plaintiffs, so that no issue then arose between them. When the suit, which was decided by their Lordships in 1904, came into being, both Hanwant Singh and Lachhman Singh were dead. In that suit the question of Rampal Singh's interest in the estate was not decided on the merits. The Courts only held that under the previous decisions the point was res judicata against him. It might have been open to Rampal Singh to have contested the validity of the compromise in the latter suit, but his omission to do so, even if the plaintiff-appellant be held to represent Rampal Singh, could not affect the plaintiff appellant further than by depriving him of relief to the village of Parbara. But the position taken by the plaintiff-appellant in this Court is not that of a representative of Rampal Singh. He comes in as a successor to Lachhman Singh. Both the plaintiff and the defendant are claimants to the succession of Lachhman Singh. If that succession be taken further back to Hanwant Singh and thence down to Rampal Singh they still remain claimants to the same succession. The point as to who would be entitled to succeed in this way was never before any Court and this could not be considered to be res judicata. The circumstance that Lachhman Singh established his claim as a remainderman under the compromise against Rampal Singh cannot, according to the argument of the learned Counsel, be utilized against his client, for the decision was in favour of Lachhman Singh under whom he claims. These arguments must, in our opinion, prevail. They have not been met by the defendant respondent. Put shortly, the question of title must be decided. If the plaintiff-appellant has a good title, the suit is not barred by res judicata. If he has a bad title, the question is of no importance. It appears to us that too much stress was laid upon this point in the lower Court. This is broadly a suit as to which of the two branches of Lachhman Singh's family is entitled to succeed and against such a suit there is no bar of res udicata. This carries us to the point of the compromise, which in our opinion the plaintiff appellant is entitled to attack in any way he wishes, as there is nothing to bind him to accept that compromise as it stands. Exactly the same position will arise if the two parties be taken as claimants through Rampal Singh. We agree with the learned Counsel for the plaintiff-appellant that they must either be taken as claimants from Lachhman Singh or claimants from Rampal Singh and that it is impossible to take the plaintiff as a claimant from Rampal Singh and the defendant as a claimant from Lachhman Singh.

We now proceed to examine the next point as to whether the compromise of 1871 is bad for want of attestation and registration. It is agreed between the parties that in 1871 Hanwant Singh was the Talukdar of Rampur Kaithaula and was bound by the provisions of Act I of 1869. The compromise purports to confer a certain title upon Lachhman Singh. We shall discuss later what was the nature of the title conferred. Under the provisions of section 13, Act I of 1869, the gift or bequest of an estate or any portion of the estate or any interest in the the estate by a Talukdar, whose name appears in the second list mentioned in section 8, cannot be effective, if not made in favour of a person who, under the provisions of the Act or under the ordinary law to which persons of the donor or testator's tribe and religion are subject, would have succeeded to such estate or to a portion thereof or to an interest therein if such Talukdar or grantee, heir or legatee, had died intestate, except it be made by an instrument of gift or a Will executed and attested not less than three months before the death of the donor or testator in the manner provided in the Act in the case of a gift or Will and registered within one month from the date of its execution. Lachhman

Singh was not a person who under the Act or ordinary law would have succeeded to anything, if Hanwant Singh had died intestate. We shall discuss later exactly what Lachhman Singh obtained under the terms of this compromise. It is sufficient to note here that he obtained an interest in the Taluka. As we shall subsequently show, the transfer to Lachhman Singh was of the nature of a gift. In these circumstances the transfer required in our opinion to be registered and attested under the provisions of section 13, Act I of 1869. It is true that the compromise became merged in a decree, but that circumstance does not affect the question. Apart from any other point Lachhman Singh was not a party to the suit. The objections taken up to this point by the defendant-respondent do not, in our opinion, meet the argument for the plaintiff-appellant. But it was pointed out to us in argument on the part of the defendant-respondent that the plea of the plaintiff-appellant is without weight, because Hanwant Singh actually executed a deed of transfer which purports to have been attested and was certainly registered and the deed carries out the terms of the compromise. This was executed on 30th October 1871. This deed is Exhibit A98 on the record. Hanwant Singh, as has been stated above, was the Talukdar. It is true that Rampal Singh did not execute a similar registered agreement. He executed an agreement but omitted to register it. Rampal Singh's action or inaction in the matter does not, however, affect the question. The only person to be considered is Hanwant Singh. The learned Counsel for the plaintiff-appellant argued strenuously that it was not open to the defendant respondent to rely upon Exhibit A98. He asserted correctly that in the lower Court the defendant had not taken up the attitude, which he took before us. Although Exhibit A98 was put in evidence, its genuineness was denied. It was not mentioned in the judgment, and it was not relied on in argument. Its original was, however, proved by D. W. No. 3, Muhammad Mustafa Khan (O. P. No. 147), and D. W. No. 11, Bande Ali (O. P. No. 160), and the plaintiff-appellant admitted the genuineness of Raja Hanwant Singh's signature and seal on the document (O. P. No. 160). The plaintiff-appellant's Counsel admits that Hanwant Singh affixed his signature to the document but he reverted to the circumstance that no reliance was placed on the document in the lower Court, and that neither attestation nor registration was proved. It is an unfortunate circumstance that the defendant-respondent did not prove Exhibit A98 fully and properly before the lower Court, and his learned Counsel preferred instead to rely upon grounds which in our opinion are not good grounds, to the effect that the original compromise had been made a rule of Court, and that it was in effect a family settlement, which required neither registration nor attestation. We were put in some difficulty on this point owing to the circumstance that the learned Counsel who appeared for the defendant-respondent in the lower Court had died before the appeal came on for hearing. We were thus not able to ascertain the reasons that induced him to take up the position which he did. It appeared to us, however, that inasmuch as the document was on the record, as it was admitted on behalf of the plaintiff-appellant that Raja Hanwant Singh had actually signed it, and that in previous litigation it was accepted as a duly executed document [see note in Rampal Singh v. Ram Prasad Singh (1)], it would have been most improper to reject the document at a late stage of the proceedings without giving the defendant-respondent an opportunity of establishing the facts of registration and attestation, while at the same time permitting the plaintiff-appellant to call rebutting evidence or to call in his aid presumptions contained in the Indian Evidence Act. We, therefore, framed on 16th August 1918 the following issues:—

"1. Whether the agreement executed by Raja Hanwant Singh on the 30th October 1871, (Exhibit A98) was properly attested in the manner required by law?

"2. Whether any of the attesting witnesses are alive and if not, were the attestations borne by the document made by the persons, whose names they bear?

and referred them to the lower Court for the decision.*

The successor of the learned Subordinate Judge took evidence and returned the remand finding on the 31st October 1918. The matter then came before us again, but we found that the officer in question had omitted to record the rebutting evidence of the plaintiff appellant for what we considered insufficient reasons. We, therefore, returned him the case and ordered that he might record the plaintiff-appellant's evidence.* He recoreded this evidence on the 17th February 1919, and the case came back to us once more.

We have to examine the document Exhibit A98. This document purports to have been written on the 30th October 1871 by the hand of a certain Nawal Kishore. It is signed by Raja Hanwant Singh. The witnesses to its execution were Najaf Ali Khan, Zemindar ofNohar Patti, Babu Ram, Zamindar of Narainpur, Khayali Ram, general agent of Raja Hanwant Singh, and Gulam Haidar Khan, Rais of Manikpur. All of these persons signed the document as witnesses. On the 3rd November 1871, the fourth day after the execution of the document, the document was produced before Kazi Abdul Hamid, Sub-Registrar of Behar at Behar, and was registered by him at noon. Execution was admitted by Raja Hanwant Singh, who was known personally to the Sub Registrar. At the same time (although he was known personally to the Sub Registrar), he was formally identified by Najaf Ali Khan, Khayali Ram, and Ghulam Haidar Khan. The registration endorsement was signed by Kazi Abdul Hamid, the Sub-Registar, by Raja Hanwant Singh, and by Najaf Ali Khan, Khayali Ram, and Ghulam Haidar Khan, three of the persons who had been witnesses to the deed. We now have it proved in evidence that every one of the above mentioned persons is dead. Raja Hanwant Singh, as has been stated above, is dead, the scribe is dead, the Sub Registrar is dead, and all the witnesses are dead. It is clear that Raja Hanwant Singh executed the document and this fact is admitted. It is clear that these witnesses purported to be witnesses to the execution of the document. The signatures of all the witnesses are proved to have been in their handwriting. The respondent has been unable to prove directly that the Raja affixed his signature in the presence of the witnesses. The meaning of the words "duly attested" was considered by their Lordships of the Privy Council in the case of Shamu Patter v. Abdul Kadir Ravuthan (2). A document is only duly attested if witnesses see its actual execution and then sign their names after seeing such execution, but in the circumstances prevailing in Oudh in 1871 it cannot be expected that any document, though duly attested, would bear upon it a recital that the witnesses had seen the execution of the document and had affixed their signatures after seeing such execution. We have never, though we have seen a very large number of attested documents of that period, seen such a recital on any of them. The most that such documents show upon the face of them are the signatures of witnesses and the word "witness" after each name, as is the case here. There may have been an attestation or there may not have been an attestation; but whether there has or has not been an attestation the recital will be the same. From the necessity of the case, when a document as this document is nearly fifty years old, it would ordinarily be impossible to produce direct evidence that there had been due attestation and for this reason the law allows in section 90 of the Indian Evidence Act that in the case of such an ancient document when all the attesting witnesses are dead (as they are here), the Court can presume that the document is duly attested. The learned Subordinate Judge who has made the remand finding has misunderstood the position of the Bench with regard to this matter. He has arrived at the conclusion that, because we did not presume the attestation at the time we sent back the case for remand evidence and finding, we indicated an intention to refuse to presume such attestation in any circumstances. That was not our position. We desired to obtain as much information on the point as the parties could supply, and we left the question of decision on the presumption, until such information had been supplied.† As has already been explained, the case was complicated by the fact that the Counsel who appeared for the Court of Wards before the original trial Judge had laid no stress on the document. The question whether it had or had not been duly attested had never been decided. We considered that in those circumstances it would be improper at that time to presume the genuineness of the attestation. It was obviously due to the plaintiff-appellant to give him an opportunity of rebutting the presumption and if he was to be given an opportunity of rebutting the presumption, the defendant-respondent in common fairness should be given an opportunity of proving fully the deaths of all the witnesses or producing attesting witnesses (in which latter case there would be no necessity to apply the presumption), and for these reasons we sent the case back for evidence, but we did not and could not have desired to exclude the possibility of presuming that the document was duly attested. The evidence produced by the defendant respondent has already been discussed. It goes no further than proving the deaths of all the witnesses. We note that one witness, the son of the deceased Babu Ram, deposed that he recollected an occasion when his father had been asked by Raja Hanwant Singh to sign a document as a witness which the Raja had already executed, but there is nothing to show from this man's evidence that the document in question was a document which required by law to be attested, and we can draw no inference from this evidence to the effect that the Raja made a habit of having the signatures of witnesses who purported to be attesting witnesses taken after the document had been executed, although they had not themselves witnessed the execution of the document.

We now proceed to discuss the rebutting evidence called by the plaintiff-appellant. The first witness is the nephew of Ghulam Haidar Khan, a man called Muhammad Ismail. This man has come forward to depose that he recollects distinctly the incident of the execution of Exhibit A98. He says that it was brought to the village of Manikpur where Ghulam Haidar Khan resided, this village being two or three miles from Kalakankar, and that the Raja had already executed the deed before it was brought to Ghulam Haidar Khan. He professed himself able to remember the contents of the deed absolutely, although his only opportunity of knowing the contents was, according to him, the opportunity he had while he was carrying the deed inside the house. He said that at the same time Exhibit A164 was brought to Ghulam Haidar Khan for signature and he professed to be able to know the contents of that document also. This man is an insolvent drawing Rs. 5 a month pay as a collecting peon. We do not believe his evidence. He has every appearance of being a witness who has been brought to depose to the facts to which he deposes. The second witness, Abdul Kadir, has been produced from the Allahabad District. He says that in 1871 he was in the service of Najaf Ali Khan and that, while he was sitting at the door of Najaf Ali Khan's house in Behar which is 14 or 16 miles from Kalakankar, a Sawar brought two papers for Najaf Ali Khan to sign. He says that he read the documents and deposes that Exhibit A98 was one of them. Now it is to be noted that the document was registered at Behar on the 3rd November 1871 and thus there would have been very little reason to send a Sawar between the 30th October and 3rd November to obtain the signature of Najaf Ali Khan thereon, when Najaf Ali Khan was admittedly present at the time of registration on the 3rd of November. This witness, Abdul Kadir, appears to us to be an absolutely untrustworthy witness. The next witness was Saadat Ali Khan of Manikpur. According to him when Raja Hanwant Singh wished Khayali Ram his own servant to sign Exhibit A93, he handed Exhibit A93 to a Sipahi and sent Saadat Ali Khan (who was an acquaintance) with the Sipahi to the village of Alapur, which lies between Kalakankar and Manikpur, Kalakankar being two or three miles from Manikpur, to take the signature of Khayali Ram. This witness has given no reason why it was necessary to employ him in addition to the Sipahi to take the document to Khayali Ram and no explanation has been offered why, if Khayali Ram was so ill that he could not go the short distance from Alapur to Kalakankar to witness the deed on some day between the 30th October and the 3rd November, he was well enough to go 14 or 16 miles to Behar on the 3rd November. This witness also appears to us unreliable. The fourth witness was a certain Kunwar Bahadur, who deposed to the drafting of the deed by Nawal Kishore. He said that after Nawal Kishore drafted the deed the Raja signed it at once and then sent it round to various witnesses to get it signed. This man appears to us to be an untrustworthy witness.

We are of opinion that all rebutting witnesses whom the plaintiff-appellant has produced have not given true evidence and that they have been collected to depose falsely to the allegation that the deed was not duly attested. It appears, in our opinion, that after this lapse of time it has been impossible to obtain truthful and reliable evidence one way or another to show whether the deed was or was not duly attested. The defendant respondent has frankly confessed his failure to obtain such evidence, and has satisfied himself with producing evidence to show the death of all the attesting witnesses.

We are thus left with the question as to whether we should apply the presumption that the deed was duly attested. That presumption, in our opinion, has not been rebutted by reliable evidence. The section says: "Where any document, purporting or proved to be thirty years old, is produced from any custody which the Court in the particular case considers proper, the Court may presume that the signature and every other part of such document, which purports to be in the handwriting of any particular person, is in that person's handwriting and, in the case of a document executed or attested, that it was duly attested and executed by the persons by whom it purports to be executed and attested." A point was raised that, inasmuch as the plaintiff appellant had admitted that Raja Hanwant Singh had signed this document, the Court could apply no further presumptions because it could only apply presumptions in case the signature had been denied. There is no weight in this argument.

The next point that was raised was that there is nothing to show that the witnesses purported to attest the document. We are of opinion that in the case of such a document executed in Oudh fifty years ago, the mere fact that the witnesses signed as witnesses to the document implies that they are witnesses to its execution: in other words, the fact that their names appear upon the document implies that they were present at the time of execution and saw the document executed, that is to say, that they purport to be attesting witnesses. It is to be noted that with the exception of Babu Ram the witnesses Najaf Ali Khan, Khayali Ram and Ghulam Haidar Khan took the trouble not only to sign the document as witnesses but to be present at the time of registration, when they admitted having signed the deed. Why should it be assumed that, if Ghulam Haidar Khan, who resided at Manikpur which is close to Kalakankar (Kalakankar being 14 or 16 miles from Behar), and Khayali Ram, who was the Raja's general agent and who lived close to Kalakankar, chose to take the trouble to go to Behar to be present at the time of registration, they would not have taken the trouble to go to Kalakankar to be present at the time of execution? The case might have been different with reference to Najaf Ali Khan who lived in Behar, but it would seem to us to be a presumption not consonant with reason or common sense to suppose that Ghulam Haidar Khan and Khayali Ram would not have been present at the time of execution. What would have been the object of not calling them in to witness the Raja's signature? The plaintiff-appellant's learned Counsel can give no answer to that question. Khayali Ram in particular as the Raja's general agent would be likely to have been present at the time even if we leave Najaf Ali Khan and Babu Ram out of the case. We presume that Khayali Ram and Ghulam Haidar Khan attested the document. This seems to us to be a fair presumption. A similar presumption was made in the Probate Division in the case of Frances Peverett, In the goods of (3) by Jenne President. We have also to refer to Wright v. Sanderson; Sanderson, In re (4), which was quoted in Uttam Singh v. Hukam Singh (5).

We, therefore, disagree with the finding of the learned Subordinate Judge's successor and find that the agreement executed by Raja Hanwant Singh on the 30th October 1871 was properly attested in the manner required by law. None of the attesting witnesses are now alive and the attestations borne by the document were made by the persons whose names they bear. As Exhibit A98 has thus been proved, the fact that the compromise was not registersd has no effect. The plaintiff-appellant's argumsnt must fail on Exhibit A98 alone.

The next point taken is that the arrangement embodied in the compromise of 1871 and in Exhibit A98 is bad in law as attempting to lay down a rule of succession. The argument here is that there was an attempt to lay down a succession for Lachhman Singh's heirs other than the succession allowed by law and that thus the grant to him of an absolute interest is vitiated, and at the best he could only obtain a life interest under the grant, which became a nullity because he died before Rampal Singh. His interest according to this argument was no greater than the interest of Dirgaj Kunwar and he had no heritable interests. Objection is taken here to the following words of paragraph 7 :—

"Babu Lachman Singh, the second son of Raja Hanwant Singh, and his heirs or representatives shall succeed to his entire Rampur Kaithaula estate as provided by section 22 of Act I of 1869."

The plea is that in no circumstances would the succession to Lachhman Singh have been governed by section 22 of Act I of 1869, inasmuch as the transfer to him being a transfer under section 15 of Act I of 1869, the property transferred would be regulated by the rules which would govern the transfer of such property if the transferee had bought the same from a person not being a Talukdar. It is established that the succession to Lachhman Singh would be under the Mitakshara Law or custom and that it would not be governed by the provisions of section 22. It does not, however, follow that the addition of the words "and his heirs or representatives shall succeed as provided by section 22 of Act I of 1869," vitiates the transfer of complete title to Lachhman Singh. The learned Counsel laid great stress on quotations from the well-known decision of their Lordships of the Privy Council in Jotendromohun Tagore v. Ganendromohun Tagore (6) better known as the Tagore case. We have been referred to various quotations from the judgment. The general principle laid down therein is that all the estates of inheritance created by gift or Will, so far as they are inconsistent with the Hindu Law of inheritance, are void as such, and no person can succeed thereunder as an heir to estates described in terms which English Law would designate estates tail. The objection taken in the Tagore case (6) to the proposed estate of inheritance created by a Will was that it created a series of life estates of a nature unknown to the Hindu Law. The principles laid down in the Tagore case (6) have been applied in many subsequent decisions. In Tarakeswar Roy v. Shoshi Shekareswar (7) their Lordships of the Privy Council held that an attempt to restrict the order of succession to Hindu males excluding females where certain life-estates were created without a right to alienate could not succeed. In a case from Oudh recently decided, Rajindra Bahadur Singh v. Rani Raghubans Kunwar (8), the Lordships accepted the following statement of the law as correct :—

"I take it that it is settled law that a subject cannot make his property descendible in a manner not recognized by the ordinary law, and that he cannot subject it to a rule of descent such as is contained in the primogeniture Sanad granted to Girwar Singh. If this is so, it appears to me to follow that Balbhaddar Singh could not by express declaration, still less by mere volition, whether actual or presumed, subject property acquired by him to the rule of succession entered in the primogeniture Sanad granted to Girwar Singh."

This statement of the law is sufficient to show that the attempt to confine succession to the succession laid down in section 22, Act I of 1869, in the case of the descendants of Lachhman Singh must fail, but it does not dispose of the point argued before us. In Purna Sashi Bhattacharya v. Kalidhan Rai Chowdhuri (9) their Lordships had to deal with the following case. Two brothers Krishna Kishore and Naba Kishore executed a document in which they purported to provide for the permanent devolution of their respective properties in the direct male line, including adopted sons, with the condition that in case of failure of lineal male heirs in one branch the properties belonging to that branch should go to the other, subject to the same rule, and only in absence of male descendants in the direct line in either branch were the properties to go to female heirs or their descendants. Krishna Kishore died in June 1868, leaving surviving, besides a son named Ananda Kishore and a daughter Durga Sundri, his brother Naba Kishore and their mother Kalitara Debya. Ananda Kishore died in 1872 without issue and Kalitara Debya in March 1901 The plaintiffs were the sons of Durga Sundri. They instituted a suit against Naba Kishore claiming as next reversioners to Ananda Kishore. The properties, which originally belonged to Krishna Kishore and after him to Ananda Kishore, had since come into the possession of Naba Kishore. Naba Kishore died after the institution of the suit and his sons were brought on the record. Here undoubtedly their Lordships decided that the instrument was invalid. But it is to be observed that they did not have before them the point as to whether a bequest to Ananda Kishore would have been invalid or not. Such a point could not have been before them. Ananda Kishore succeeded his father under the provisions of the Dayabhaga Law apart from the provisions of the instrument. But the point with which we are concerned in this matter is a somewhat different point to those contained in these decisions of their Lordships. There can be no doubt in our minds as to the fact that Lachhman Singh acquired, under the provisions of the arrangement to which we have made reference, a contingent interest which was in itself of no value in event of Rampal Singh and his mother predeceasing Hanwant Singh. But when Hanwant Singh predeceased Rampal Singh and his mother, that contingent interest became a vested interest. The effect was that Lachhman Singh under the terms of the arrangement succeeded to full proprietary interest in the Rampur Kaithaula estate on the death of Hanwant Singh, but his enjoyment was postponed to the life estate of Rampal Singh. The life estate of Dirgaj Kunwar never came into existence owing to the fact that she predeceased her son. Lachhman Singh obtained no actual benefit from his succession to full proprietary title inasmuch as he predeceased Rampal Singh. Can we hold, however, that the attempt to fetter the succession to the estate after the death of Lachhman Singh deprived Lachhman Singh of his full proprietary interest and gave him something less than what he obtained under the transfer, namely, a life-estate in the place of a full proprietary estate? To decide this point in favour of the plaintiff-appellant would appear to us to be wrong. In absence of authority, upon general principles the right law would appear to be that, when a man having a right to make a transfer transfers full proprietary title the enjoyment of which is subject to the life estate of a certain person, and endeavours to fetter the succession to the estate, effect must be given to the transfer of full proprietary title and the attempt to fetter the succession should be ignored. There is, however, authority in support of this view. In Bhoobun Mohini Debia v. Hurrish Chunder Chowdhry (10) their Lordships held that a Sanad executed by Shambhu Chandra in favour of his sister, by which he granted her certain full proprietary interests subject to certain conditions, conferred upon the sister an absolute estate defeasible on the happening of an event which did not occur and that she took an estate which she could dispose of by Will. We, therefore, take the view that on the proper construction of this arrangement a complete title passed to Lachhman Singh on the death of Hanwant Singh in the estate, but that its enjoyment was postponed to the life-estates created.

The next point taken that the compromise created a succession of what purported to be of something of the nature of Hindu widows' estates and that the succession opened on the death of the last holder of such estates, has already been dealt with incidentally in a previous portion of our decision. Here we are concerned with the interpretation of the document. The argument of the learned Counsel for the appellant on this point was that Raja Hanwant Singh might, had he so intended, have made a disposition of the nature suggested by the defendant-respondent—in other words, that he might have divested himself of everything except a life estate in a portion of his own property reserving resumption of full title in event of his surviving Raja Rampal Singh and Rani Dirgaj Kunwar, and that he might have created a contingent remainder in favour of Lachhman Singh which was to become a vested remainder in event of Hanwant Singh predeceasing Rampal Singh and Dirgaj Kunwar but that the deed cannot be interpreted in this sense because it would have been repugnant to Hanwant Singh as a Hindu to have made a disposition so foreign to the mind of a Hindu, and because it cannot be assumed that he understood the actual terms of the document. Before we go any further, it will be as well to examine the terms of this arrangement, to see what each of the executing parties stood to gain or to lose by the transaction and what the position was of other parties benefiting under its terms.

At the time of the execution of the document Raja Hanwant Singh was a Talukdar. He had received the Sanad. His name had been entered in the lists prepared under the provisions of section 8, Act I of 1869. But his title was under a cloud. He had made a deed of gift in favour of Rampal Singh. He was asserting—and there appears to have been considerable force in his assertion in view of the result—that this deed of gift was null and void. But he had to remove the cloud created by the deed of gift from his title. It is now recognized that his position was a good position. Rampal Singh withdrew his claim based upon the deed of gift. But it was certainly to the advantage of Hanwant Singh to have the cloud removed from his title, and in consideration of this advantage, he divested himself of the life-interest in a portion of the estate in favour of Rampal Singh. He went further. It was agreed that, if Rampal Singh predeceased his mother and his mother did not predecease Hanwant Singh, the life estate granted to Rampal Singh should be passed to the lady. Hanwant Singh reserved to himself the right to obtain full proprietary title over the whole Taluka, if Rampal Singh and Dirgaj Kunwar predeceased him, but if they did not predecease him, the full proprietary title in the Taluka had to pass to some one. He clearly did not intend that it should pass to Rampal Singh or his mother. The circumstances of the case show that he did not consider Rampal Singh, fit to be trusted with full proprietary title, and he would naturally be adverse to transferring full proprietary title to a woman. He, therefore, decided to give a vested remainder to his younger son Lachhman Singh on the death of the last of the three persons—himself, Rampal Singh, and Dirgaj Kunwar—in event of his predeceasing the two latter. He thus stood to gain on the one side and to lose on the other side by making this arrangement. The conditions of partial gain and partial loss are the usual conditions in a compromise. Raja Rampal Singh stood to gain by obtaining certain recognition. It must be taken that he considered he could not rely upon the provisions of the deed of gift, as he was ready to give up his title under that, and thus benefit Hanwant Singh. But if he felt he could not rely on the deed of gift, his position was absolutely insecure unless Hanwant Singh made some provision for him, for as Hanwant Singh had complete power to alienate his property and could transfer it to Lachhman Singh or any person other than Rampal Singh, Rampal Singh, once he abandoned his rights under the deed of gift, had no certainty of anything. So he gained by obtaining a life estate in a portion of the property, and also by the creation of a life-estate in favour of his mother if the latter survived him. Rani Dirgaj Kunwar, who was not a party to the arrangement, stood to gain absolutely. Lachhman Singh also stood to gain absolutely. Was the arrangement an unreasonable one? It was not an unreasonable arrangement. It was a reasonably satisfactory compromise. It was prepared under the advice of Mr. Thomas Claydon, a legal gentleman of some position. Raja Hanwant Singh was clearly a man of considerable ability and possessed of knowledge of affairs. It is true that the compromise was executed in English. But Exhibit A98 was executed in Urdu—the language of Raja Hanwant Singh. We can see nothing repugnant to the views of an orthodox Hindu in the arrangement. Apart from that fact, Raja Hanwant Singh was giving only a contingent remainder to his son Lachhman Singh, which was to become a vested remainder if Hanwant Singh predeceased Raja Rampal Singh and his mother. If Hanwant Singh survived the two latter, Lachhman Singh was to get nothing. Hanwant Singh had overlooked the claims of Lachhman Singh in previous proceedings. As we shall subsequently show, Lachhman Singh was Hanwant Singh's rightful heir under the Mitakshara Law. There was no custom to the contrary. By the previous arrangements that Hanwant Singh made as well as by these arrangements he was disinheriting his rightful heir under the Mitakshara Law. In these circumstances there can be no force in the argument that arrangements not in conformity with the ordinary law of Mitakshara succession would be repugnant to Raja Hanwant Singh. But little is gained from a discussion as to what Hanwant Singh would or would not have been likely to do. We have to look to what he did, and to gather his intentions from the interpretation of Exhibit A98. The words of this document present no difficulty in interpretation. Clause 7 can only be interpreted, in our opinion, as conferring full proprietary title on Lachhman Singh in event of Hanwant Singh predeceasing Rampal Singh and his mother with enjoyment postponed to the life-estates. We do not consider that the situation is in any way altered by the addition of the words "and his heirs or representatives." We do not take this to be a case such as is considered in Kristoromoni Dasi v. Narendra Krishna Bahadur (11), where an absolute gift was given to certain persons and their heirs male, in a manner which implied that the estate was not given absolutely to those persons, but to those persons in conjunction with their heirs male. The title was to pass to Lachhman Singh absolutely. He could deal with it as he thought fit. If he died intestate, the property would descend to his heirs under the law to which he was subject, and not to his heirs as limited by the conditions of the disposition. If he were dead when succession opened, the property would pass to his heirs under the law, but if he were alive at the death of Hanwant Singh the property would pass to him alone, and we can find nothing to support the view that succession opened on the death of the last holder of the life-estate. The succession to the proprietary title opened on the death of Hanwant Singh. Enjoyment did not then commence. It was postponed to the life estates. But the succession to Lachhman Singh must certainly be regulated by the law applicable to Lachhman Singh and what that law is will be considered in the later portion of this judgment.

The next point taken in appeal is as to the finding on the alleged custom of male lineal primogeniture, which is asserted by the defendant-respondent to prevail amongst persons of the religion and tribe of Lachhman Singh. In addition to general evidence supporting the existence of such a custom, the defendant-respondent called evidence to show that in thirteen instances—eight in the Partabgarh district and five outside—the existence of such a custom as that asserted was established. We take the evidence with regard to these instances in order.

The family to which Hanwant Singh belonged is a family of Bisen Thakurs. The history of the Taluka is to the effect that at some remote period in antiquity the property which now forms part of the Rampur Kaithaula Taluka was a portion of the estate of Raja Manak Chand Gaharwar in the Partabgarh district. A daughter of the Raja married the Bisen Raja of Ma-

(11) 16 C. 383: 16 I. A. 29; 5 Sar P. C. J. 295 (P.C.).

auli. Her youngest son Rai Hom Bisen was adopted by Raja Manak Chand. The following pedigree shows how the various families originated:—

The first instance is that of Rampur Kaithaula itself; and the main evidence as to the existence of the custom in this instance is contained in the record of certain proceedings which took place in 1858. In that year Raja Hanwant Singh endeavoured to get the name of Rampal Singh entered as that of his successor in respect of the Taluka in supersession of the claims of Lachhman Singh, and he presented an application (Exhibit 100) to the Deputy Commissioner that the name of Rampal Singh should be entered on the records and a kabuliyat executed in his favour. The order passed on this was that the application should be verified by the applicant through the Tahsildar. This was followed by another application (Exhibit 99), on which orders were passed in Exhibit 99X, dated the 17th February 1859. Hanwant Singh's further application is Exhibit A6. This is dated the 13th March 1859. In this he made the following statement:—

"Under the custom prevailing in the Raj, the old practice and the usage well-known in the family of the petitioner, the eldest son has always continued to be the owner of the Raj and the Gaddi and the younger sons get the Babu's share for his livelihood to the extent of two or three villages of which the income might amount to Rs. 2,000 or 3,000"

He went on to say that so long as the eldest son or his children were alive the younger son was not entitled to the estate and the Raj. Hanwant Singh continued that according to this custom he made a settlement for the support of Lachhman Singh and that the estate should go to Rampal Singh. A pedigree was attached, Exhibit A7. It was ordered by Exhibit A8, dated the 30th March 1859, that the Tahsildar should inquire from the relations of Hanwant Singh the custom obtaining in the family regarding (amongst other matters) succession to the Gaddi and maintenance allowance awarded to other relations, and that he should also inquire from Lachhman Singh, whether he had got any objection to the arrangement proposed. On the 2nd April 1859 Hanwant Singh made the deed of gift in favour of Rampal Singh to which reference has already been made. This is Exhibit 113. Lachhman Singh made a statement, Exhibit 102, on the 17th April 1859 simply to the effect that he was entitled to maintenance. He stated nothing definite as to the custom. He followed this up by an application of the 18th April 1859, in which he asserted that his father was angry with him for no reason, and was making every effort to deprive him of his rights. This is Exhibit 101 On the 21st May 1859 the Tahsildar examined fifteen of the collateral members of the family, most of whom were what are called colloquially in Oudh chhutbhaiyas or cadets. Their statements are in Exhibit A9. They were asked: "What is the custom in your family regarding the Raj, i. e., what powers the Raja has, as to whom he can instal on the Gaddi, and what should he fix for the livelihood of the brothers? State the custom which might be obtaining." To this they answered: "The custom is that he should make that person his successor who might be entitled to the Raj and he should provide food for such brothers as might obey him." They were subsequently asked whether Lachhman Singh could object reasonably to the succession being made in favour of Rampal Singh. To this they replied: "His objection is improper. The same custom should be followed as has been existing from before. All of us are collaterals and if there be any share, then all of us should get" - They were then asked, "Who is entitled to the Raj?" They replied, "Raja Rampal Singh." In view of their previous replies they apparently meant by this that Raja Hanwant Singh chose to select him as his successor. They were asked if there was any other custom regarding the property and they said nothing more. When asked if there was any rule under which the Raja could appoint some other person as Raja in his lifetime, they replied that the Raja had every power to give the Raj to whomever he desired. Later on other persons, one of whom was a Kayesth and presumably a servant but the remainder of whom were members of the clan, verified the above statement but added nothing to it. The Tahsildar put in his report, Exhibit A10. In this he said: "In compliance with your order I made an inquiry regarding the custom of succession to the Gaddi and the maintenance of the persons entitled to it from the members of the family of Raja Hanwant Singh. All stated unanimously that the person entitled to the Raj becomes the absolute proprietor and that the other members of the family receive maintenance for their support. This has been the custom." The report contained nothing further of any importance.

So far it is clear that beyond one sentence in Raja Hanwat Singh's original application in Exhibit A6, to the effect that so long as the eldest son or his children were alive, the younger son, according to the custom obtaining in the Raj, was not entitled to the estate and the Raj—a statement which was not supported in any way by any of the witnesses called—there was nothing from which it could have been deduced that the custom of succession by male lineal primogeniture existed in Hanwant Singh's family. But the superior officer (name illegible) who eventually decided the matter in Exhibit A11 on the 25th May 1859 gave it as his opinion that the estate should go to the eldest son and in case of his death it should devolve on his son and not on his younger brother. There is further an application of 22nd July 1859 by Lachhman Singh, in which he admits that the eldest son is entitled to the Raj if he survives his father, but denies that the son of an elder son who predeceases his father has any right to supersede a younger son. The estate, as has already been mentioned, is entered in list No. II. It is an estate in which the Court must presume under the binding presumptions of Act I of 1869 that it ordinarily devolved upon a single heir on or before the 13th February 1856. But there is no presumption under the law that succession to the estate was by male lineal primogeniture. Government officers of the period were not invariably well acquainted with the rules of succession of Hindu Law or with the meaning of certain terms of English Law. It is a well-known fact that by many of them the term gaddi-nashini—succession to a single heir—was considered as equivalent to succession by the rule of male lineal primogeniture, and that they were not always acquainted with the fact that under the Mitakshara Law the younger son excludes from succession the son of a deceased elder son. Thus the circumstance that the superior officer in question noted that in his opinion the succession was a succession equivalent to one by male lineal primogeniture—a circumstance which in no case would carry this Court much further on the point—is deprived of practically all value by the fact that this Court is not in a position to know that his opinion was based upon an accurate knowledge of the conditions of succession, and we are left with the bare opinion of Raja Hanwant Singh. It is to be noted that at the period that Raja Hanwant Singh expressed his opinion he had quarrelled with Lachhman Singh, that he was endevouring to deprive Lachhman Singh of succession to the estate, that he was determined to make Rampal Singh his heir, and that he wished to put him in possession. When the authorities pointed out to him the claims of Lachhman Singh, he then made this assertion that succession was by male lineal primogeniture, but in the succeeding inquiry no one supported his contention. It must be granted that the estate is impartible under the law and descends to a single heir. But there is nothing in this evidence, even if the evidence be admissible, upon which a finding to the effect that succession was by male lineal primogeniture could be supported. We are of opinion that Hanwat Singh's statement is not admissible. It could only be admitted under the provisions of section 32, clause 4, Act I of 1872, and cannot be admitted under that clause for the statement was made after a controversy as to the custom had arisen. It is to be noted that no primogeniture Sanad was issued with regard to the Rampur Kaithaula estate. The only Sanad issued was the Sanad Exhibit A12, which was a non-primogeniture Sanad. Rampal Singh applied to have added to this Sanad the condition that the estate should be held by his family in its entirety without division for ever generation after generation according to the custom of Raj-gaddi. This addition was irregular. But, even if not irregular, it does not support succession by male lineal primogeniture. There was some further correspondence on this subject. When the Circular Exhibit A34 was issued—this is the circular referred to in the Introduction to Sykes' Compendium at page 81 and quoted in full as Appendix F, page 289—the Tahsildar reported in Exhibit A65 that in this Taluqa succession was succession to a single heir, but he does not state that it was by male lineal primogeniture. This was forwarded on 25th February 1870 in Exhibit A351. In Exhibit A347 the Deputy Commissioner forwarded to the Commissioner his report and stated therein that it included the names of all the Talukdars in whose estates the law of primogeniture could be enforced. But he was clearly confusing here the succession to a single heir with succession by male lineal primogeniture. The list attached is Exhibit A348. Later on another circular was sent out by the Chief Commissioner to which reference is made in the Introduction to Sykes' Compendium, at page 97. It was Circular No. 57 2395 of 19th July 1861. Hanwant Singh replied to this on the 16th January 1860 in Exhibit A17 to the effect that he wished Rampal Singh to succeed. The Rubkar, Exhibit A13 (Appendix G of Sykes' Compendium), was received by Hanwant Singh—see Exhibits A13 and A14. Hanwant Singh applied on the 10th February 1860 in Exhibit A18 that his estate should remain entire and undivided in his family in the hands of the proprietor of the Gaddi according to the custom of the Raj, but nothing was said as to succession by male lineal primogeniture. We have a reference to the issue of a Sanad to Hanwant Singh in Exhibit A16 and Exhibit A19 dated the 12th March 1860, but no primogeniture Sanad was ever issued. For a reason that has not been explained a communication was made to Hanwant Singh on 22nd June 1861, Exhibit A34, with a request that he should record a history of his family. He complied with this in Exhibit A35, which was forwarded with Exhibit A44 by Rampal Singh and Hanwant Singh in August 1861, with a pedigree Exhibit A45. There is nothing in this history to show succession by male lineal primogeniture. Exhibit A49 is the wajib ul-arz and Exhibit A63 is a deposition made by Rampal Singh in the case of Jagdish Bahadur v. Sheo Partab Singh (12). There is nothing in the wajib ul-arz or in the deposition to support a custom of succession by male lineal primogeniture. There are certain mutation orders which have no bearing in this case. This concludes the documentary evidence upon the point.

There is further a mass of oral evidence. D. W. No. 49, Bhawani Bukhsh Singh, has stated, as most of the witnesses have stated, that if an elder son predeceased his father in the Rampur Kaithaula Taluka, the elder son of the deceased elder son would inherit the Taluka in preference to the younger sons of the Talukdar. But he knew no instance that supported his statement. He quoted the case of Jai Singh who succeeded in preference to his younger brother. Sarda Bakhsh Singh, D. W No. 55, gave similar evidence but could quote no instance as did Amir Singh, D. W. No. 59, Ram Bahadur Singh, D. W. No. 60, Kali Bakhsh, D. W. No. 62, Bisheshar Singh, D. W. No. 64, Deo Narain Singh, D. W. No. 65, Sheo Dayal Singh, D. W. No. 67, Balbhaddar Singh, D. W. No. 74 and Bishwa Nath Singh, D. W. No. 75. While thus there are a number of witnesses who depose to the existence of the custom, it is difficult to see on what their opinions can be based, for there has been no instance within their knowledge supporting the existence of such a custom. There is nothing thus to establish, in our opinion, that a custom of succession by male lineal primogeniture is proved to prevail in this particular family, and, as no custom of male lineal primogeniture is proved to prevail in this family, no amount of evidence which can prove that it prevails in other families in the tribe would be of any avail.* Nevertheless we propose to deal shortly with the evidence relating to other families in the tribe, which in our opinion goes to negative rather than support the conclusion of the learned Subordinate Judge.

The next instance is that of the Taluka of Dhingwas or Pawasi. This is entered in list II No. 119, and it is hard to understand how it is possible to utilize it in support of a custom of male lineal primogeniture, for we find that at the time of the re-settlement of Oudh Kablas Kunwar, the widow of Mahpal Singh, succeeded to the Taluka. She received the primogeniture Sanad. This estate has been the subject of litigation in the well known cases reported as Brij Indar Bahadur Singh v. Rani Jankee Koer (13) and Jagdish Bahadur v. Sheo Pertab Singh (12). When it is seen that a woman succeeded more than once to this Taluka, it is clear that the instance, so far from supporting, is against the existence of a custom of succession by male lineal primogeniture.

The next instance is that of Dhangarh. At the time of the preparation of the lists Dhangarh was entered in list IV, No. 24. It was the divided property of two brothers, Sitla Bakhsh who owne nine annas thereof and Shankar Bakhsh who owned seven annas. In Exhibit A68—a statement showing the custom of succession of families of the Talukdars of the Partabgarh District—the custom noted against Dhangarh is to the effect that the elder brother became the owner of the Taluka and that the younger brother got a few villages as Nankar for maintenance. The original settlement was made with Shankar Bakhsh, but subsequently by mutual agreement, Shankar Bakhsh took seven annas and his brother Sitla Bakhsh took nine annas. A similar record is found in Exhibit A67. In Exhibit A32 the two brothers stated that the succession was by the custom of Raj-gaddi and in Exhibit A33 Sitla Bakhsh in spite of the fact that he had already partitioned his estate, prayed that after his death the estate should remain intact according to the custom of Raj-gaddi, that is to say, single heir succession. The history of the Taluka in Exhibit A37 adds nothing to our information, nor does the history given in Exhibit A47. The branches of Sitla Bakhsh and Shankar Bakhsh engaged in litigation with respect to the Pawasi estate. The judgment of their Lordships of the Privy Council is Exhibit A77. The case is reported as Jagdish Bahadur v. Sheo Pertab Singh (12). There is nothing in that litigation to show that there was any custom of succession by male lineal primogeniture in the family. The wajib-ul arz of Dhangarh is Exhibit A54. That does not support the existence of a custom of succession by male lineal primogeniture There is further the evidence of one witness Lal Indrapal Singh, D. W. No. 61. At p. 275 he says, "Lal Sitla Bakhsh of Dhangarh died leaving four younger grandsons and the sons of a predeceased grandson. The great grandson succeeded to the Taluka to the exclusion of the grandsons." He added: 'The son of the eldest grandson got the estate both according to the custom and Will." This instance has no value, as the succession under the provisions of Act I of 1869 would have been to the son of the eldest grandson and there is nothing to show that there was any point of custom involved.

The next instance is that of Dera. It is difficult to see why this instance is quoted on behalf of the defendant-respondent, for in the history Exhibit A38 it appears that earlier in the history of the estate the holder Kalyan Sah divided all his property among his five sons and it is further seen from Exhibit A46 that there was a succession of a woman who made an adoption.

The next instance is that of Bhadri. This estate is an estate in which succession was to a single heir. It was entered in list II, No. 118. In Exhibit A68 the custom in this family is stated to be that the eldest son becomes the owner of the Taluka and the younger brother gets maintenance. In the applications of Rai Jagat Bahadur Singh, Talukdar of Bhadri, Exhibits A29 and A30, the same statements are made. The history in Exhibit A39 adds nothing to our knowledge of the custom of succession, nor does the wajib-ul-arz Exhibit A57. In this documentary evidence there is no support for the existence of a custom by male lineal primogeniture. Bajrang Bali Singh, D. W. No 50, of the Bhadri family has deposed to a custom that the eldest son and his descendants would get the Taluka in preference to a younger son. The instance he quoted was that of Raja Jagat Bahadur Singh. The instance of Raja Jagat Bahadur Singh proves nothing. He was adopted. The witness is palpably in error on several points in his deposition. Sant Bakhsh Singh, D. W. No. 58, made a similar statement with regard to Jagat Bahadur Singh. Lal Indrapal Singh, D. W. No 61, who has deposed as to the succession of Raja Jagat Bahadur Singh, has given evidence which is of no value on this point. Pitambar Singh, D. W. No. 72, deposes to a custom and clearly knows no instance to support it. There is nothing to show that there is any custom of succession by male lineal primogeniture in the estate of Bhadri.

The next estate is Shamspur. This estate is under list IV, No. 22, as the property of Thakurain Baijnath Kunwar, Chattarpal Singh, Surajpal Singh and Chandarpal Singh. There were four co-sharers, one of whom was a woman. The estate was subdivided up and one of the inheritors was a woman. It is unnecessary to discuss the instance any further. It is clear that there is no evidence of succession by male lineal primogeniture in this estate. We have, however, to note the evidence of Badri Narain Singh, D. W. No. 63, and observe that he was a plaintiff in Babu Badri Narain Singh v Thakurain Harnam Kuar and others (14) the appeal of which was decided by the Judicial Commissioner's Court—4 O. L. J., page 233. He would be naturally a highly interested witness, as he was endeavouring to prove a similar custom of succession in his own favour.

The next instance is that of Dahiawan This estate is entered in list II, No. 120 We have here again the same custom of succession to a single heir, but nothing to establish succession by male lineal primogeniture. Here again we can find nothing to support the existence of a custom of succession by male lineal primogeniture.

The same may be said with regard to the estate of Sheikhpur Chauras which is entered in list II, No. 123.

The above eight estates are in the Partabgarh District.

We next come to the estates of Bhinga in the Bahraich District and Birwa Menon in the Gonda District. It is difficult to see why these two instances have been quoted on behalf of the defendant-respondent. There was litigation with respect to the succession of the Birwa Menon Taluka, which ended in the decision of their Lordships of the Privy Council in Achal Ram v. Udai Partab Addiya Dat Singh (15). This decision was arrived at in 1883. The suit was brought by Udai Partab against Achal Ram. Udai Partab claimed on the assertion that the estate descended by the rule of male lineal primogeniture. After re-annexation the Sanad had been given to Pirthipal, who died before Act I of 1869 was passed. Achal Ram was the husband of the daughter of Pirthipal. He was not able to establish any title Nevertheless Udai Partab lost his suit on the ground that there was no succession in the estate by male lineal primogeniture, no primogeniture Sanad having been given to Pirthipal and no custom of succession by male lineal primogeniture having been proved. Their Lordships found that Udai Partab was unable to establish any title This decision, so far from supporting the existence of succession by male lineal primogeniture, is absolutely against (14) 40 Ind. Cas. 555; 4 O. L. J. 233.

(15) 10 C. 511; 11 I. A. 51 (P. C.).

it. The succession to the estate arose again in a litigation which culminated in 1893 in the decision of their Lordships of the Privy Council in Bhai Narindar Bahadur Singh v. Achal Ram (16). Here Bhai Narindar Bahadur Singh, the son of Harbhagat, claimed the estate as the nearest collateral to Pirthipal. Their Lordships decided that succession opened on the death of Brijraj Kunwar, daughter of Pirthipal, in 1879 and that at that time Jubraj and Narindar Bahadur Singh were the two nearer collaterals, those two being both sixth in descent from the common ancestor of themselves and Pirthipal, and that Jubraj, coming from the senior branch, had preference over Bhai Narindar Bahadur Singh. The property clearly went to a single heir according to Mitakshara Law. Lord Hobhouse commences the judgment at page 652—

"The question in this case has come to a very simple point indeed after all this litigation. The estate is in Oudh, and was granted by the Crown to one Pirthipal after the confiscation, and it is placed in class 2 of Act I of 1869, and not in class 3. The effect of that is that the estate is labelled as one which according to the custom of the family descends to a single heir, but not necessarily by the rule of lineal primogeniture. It may be, and it has so happened in this case, that the heir according to lineal primogeniture is more remote in degree from the ancestor than other collaterals, or other persons in the line of heirship. If so, the degree prevails over the line according to the classification under the Act, though if two collaterals, or persons in the line of heirship, are equal in degree, then as the property can only go to one, recourse must be had to the seniority of line to find out which that one is."

The principle contained in these decisions applies practically to both Bhinga and Birwa Menon.

The next instance is that of Mankapur in the Gonda District. But there is nothing in this estate to support the existence of a custom by male lineal primogeniture. Nor is there anything in the instance of Gonda Raj.

The last instance was that of the estate of Majhauli. The argument based on this instance seems to be peculiarly far fetched. The holders of the Majhauli estate in the Gonda District were Bisens. The daughter of Raja Manak Chand Gaharwar married the Majhauli Raja, who appointed his grandson Rai Hom to inherit his estates. This appointment took place 2,000 years ago. It is clear that Rai Hom remained a Bisen and he thus could not have been adopted. The argument that the Partabgarh Bisens look for their custom to the Majhauli estate is one that appears to us without any weight. But in any circumstances we do not find that there is evidence in Majhauli Raj to support a custom of succession by male lineal primogeniture.

There is, in our opinion, no evidence to establish the existence of a custom of succession by strict male lineal primogeniture in the Taluka of Rampur Kaithaula, but on the view that we take of the succession to the rights of Lachhman Singh, it would not carry the defendant-respondent any further if he had established that such a custom existed, for, considering as we do that the transfer to Lachhman Singh was by way of gift by Hanwant Singh falling under the provisions of sections 13 and 15 of Act I of 1869, Lachhman Singh's rights in the Taluka would be governed by the personal law modified by custom, if any, to which Lachhman Singh, a cadet of the family, was subject and not by any custom of succession prevailing in the Taluka of Rampur Kaithaula in which the succession was to a single heir. The property became Lachhman Singh's self-acquired property and if he died intestate, it would descend under the rules of the Mitakshara Law to the two branches in shares. It may be conceded that the evidence before us might establish that the custom of Jethansi prevails in the family, whereby the elder branch receives a share of 9/16ths and the younger branch a share of 7/16ths. But there is no custom of male lineal primogeniture established as amongst the cadets. The learned Counsel for the plaintiff-appellant has quoted a large number of authorities in support of his view, but it is not necessary to go into these as we are of opinion that he has established his proposition on the merits. The custom of Jethansi is established to this extent that on the death of the wife of Lachhman Singh one of the villages, Debigarh, which had been transferred to him, was divided by Jethansi between Ramesh Singh son of Ram Prasad and the plaintiff-appellant.

But the defendant-respondent, while failing on the question of male lineal primogeniture, has supported his position in another manner. There was never any necessity in this case to raise a custom of succession by male lineal primogeniture. Lachhman Singh had executed a registered Will, dated the 18th June 1888, Exhibit A154. Under the terms of this Will he left the whole of the Taluka to Ram Prasad Singh and his heirs. Now it is to be noted that the plaintiff-appellant propounded a Will of a later date dated the 20th June 1888, Exhibit 104. The learned Subordinate Judge found that the execution of this Will was not proved and the plaintiff-appellant has not appealed with regard to this portion of the judgment. Had he done so, his appeal would have been of no avail as the learned Subordinate Judge's reasons for finding that the alleged Will of 20th June 1888 was not executed satisfy us as being absolutely convincing. We have already referred to the curious omission on the part of the defendant-respondent's learned Counsel, now deceased, who appeared for him in the lower Court to rely on the provisions of Exhibit A98, and it is a remarkable thing that, although he put in the Will Exhibit A154 and proved it by the evidence of Debipal Singh, D. W. No. 26, and Kuber Singh, D. W. No. 33, and although the plaintiff-appellant himself admitted that he knew of the execution of this Will, he did not rely upon this Will in argument and preferred instead to set up a plea of succession by male lineal primogeniture, which we find to be unfounded. The learned Counsel for the plaintiff-appellant has, as he had every right to do, strongly protested against the use of the Will at this stage to establish a point which the defendant-respondent has endeavoured to establish in another way and has failed to do so. But, although we admit that it is most unfortunate that the strong point in favour of the defendant-respondent was not taken in the lower Court while undue stress was laid on the weak point, we consider that we have no right to refuse to admit the plea based upon the Will, Exhibit A154, in the appeal before us. As we have already stated, the learned Counsel who represented the defendant-respondent died before the hearing of the appeal, and we are not able to discover the reasons for his action in the matter. This appeal involves the succession to a very important estate, and, when the defendant-respondent has a valuable piece of evidence to support his title which he produced and proved before the lower Court, the fact that he omitted to lay due stress on it in original proceedings does not prevent the learned Counsel who now represents him and who did not represent him before from advancing the plea.

We find that Lachhman Singh executed the Will of 18th June 1888 which was duly registered. It was never revoked. Under the terms of that Will the Talukdari estate passed to Ram Prasad Singh and his heirs.

The learned Counsel for the plaintiff-appellant mainly contends that this Will is invalid under the provisions of section 13 of Act I of 1869, because it was executed less than three months before the death of Lachhman Singh. Lachhman Singh was neither a Talukdar nor a grantee, nor was he an heir to Hanwant Singh. The learned Counsel, however, contends that under Exhibit A93 Lachhman Singh was a legatee of the grantee and, therefore, the provisions of section 13, Act I of 1869, operate in the case of this Will. We are not of opinion, however, that Lachhman Singh took benefits as a legatee under the provisions of Exhibit A98. It is true that the contingent interest which he derived under the provisions of that document did not become a vested interest until the death of Raja Hanwant Singh. But Exhibit A98 is not a Will. This will be clearly seen from the fact that it is not revocable. Having made Exhibit A98 Raja Hanwant Singh could not have resiled from its provisions at his own volition. He could not revoke Exhibit A98. He might have, had he so desired, instituted a suit to set it aside on a plea of undue influence or for some such reason, but he could not in our opinion revoke it. He had obtained under the provisions of Exhibit A98 the substantial advantage of having a cloud removed from his title which had been created by the execution of the previous deed of gift, and the document as it stands, which was duly registered and attested, operated as a deed of family settlement. Lachhman Singh could have sued to enforce its provisions as a deed of family settlement under the provisions of section 23 (c), Act I of 1887, and the absence of the power to revoke, to our minds, shows clearly that the disposition to Lachhman Singh was not by devise but by gift. In these circumstances the provisions of section 13 of Act I of 1879 have no application. Lachhman Singh's rights derived under Exhibit A98 were in the self acquired property and as a Hindu, he had a right to dispose of his self-acquired property by Will. Such a Will did not require to be registered or attested, and would not be invalidated by the fact that it was executed within the three months preceding the testator's death.

The learned Counsel for the plaintiff-appellant has further contended that the provisions of this Will are unenforceable because the property was left to Ram Prasad Singh and his heirs. He argues that the Will has attempted to lay down a rule of succession unknown to the Hindu Law, and has advanced the same pleas which he had already advanced with regard to the provisions of Exhibit A98. It is unnecessary to say more upon this point than that we find that there is no attempt to lay down a succession unknown to Hindu Law. The property was left to Ram Prasad Singh and his heirs and there is nothing objectionable in the contents of the Will.

The next point taken by the learned Counsel for the plaintiff-appellant is that in any circumstances the non-Talukdari property inherited from Rampal Singh should pass to his client, as Exhibits A98 and A154 do not purport to transfer anything more than the Talukdari property. He bases his title to succeed to the non-Talukdari property on his being the nearest reversioner under the Hindu Law to Rampal Singh. The plea is a sound plea, but the plaintiff-appellant can derive no advantage from it unless and until he can establish that property has passed to the defendant-respondent from Rampal Singh which is not a portion of the Talukdari property. This he endeavoured to do in the first place with regard to certain deeds of endowment executed by Hanwant Singh and Rampal Singh. His case is that these deeds of endowment relate to self-acquired property of Hanwant Singh and Rampal Singh which is not included in the Taluka, that these deeds of endowment were fictitious, that no endowments as a matter of fact were ever created, that at first Hanwant Singh and then Rampal Singh had under the colour of making deeds of endowment retained the property in their own possession, that after the death of Rampal Singh the whole of the property passed first to the defendant-respondent's father and thence to the defendant-respondent, and that they have continued to enjoy this property as their own self acquired property. We need not go at length into the history of the endowment of Hanwant Singh, which is contained in Exhibit A164. The story is long and complicated. There were many transfers and cross-transfers, creation of rights, and destruction of rights. It will serve no useful purpose to follow the complicated and tortuous course of those transactions, in view of the fact that all the property endowed by Hanwant Singh has admittedly passed into the endowment made by Rampal Singh. Rampal Singh's endowment was created by Exhibit A219 of the 21st August 1906. He set aside certain self acquired property for the maintenance of two hospitals, two poor houses, one boys' school, and two newspapers which had come into being before the deed was executed. The deed further provided for the construction of a hostel, the making of metalled roads and the opening of two girls' schools. There can be no question as to the fact that the objects of this endowment are public and legal objects and the trust created for these objects is a good and valid trust. The learned Counsel for the plaintiff-appellant does not contest this position. His argument is that the deed discloses from the appointment of the trustees that the trust was intended to be fictitious and that subsequent evidence shows that it was fictitious. The trustees appointed were a woman who is called in the deed Radha Debi, the wife of Raja Rampal Singh. This woman was not the wife of Raja Bampal Singh. She was his mistress. Here name was not Radha Debi. She was a Muhammadan. She was to succeed Rampal Singh as president of the committee after his death. Some of the trustees were independent gentlemen, others were persons who were the subordinates and servants of Rampal Singh. It cannot, however, be found that a trust is bad in law because the trustees are of varying character and because certain of them are under the direct influence of the creator of the trust and in one instance of indifferent character. Nor can it be argued that, because the creator of the trust has subsequently, as has been abundantly proved, endeavoured to convert the trust property back to his own uses, the trust is a bad trust. It is clear that Rampal Singh, who is shown in the evidence to have been a man of great eccentricity and extraordinary character, first created the trust and on several occasions afterwards treated the trust property as though it was his own and devoted trust funds to his own purposes. This circumstance, however, in no way invalidates the trust. There is nothing substantial put forward to show that Raja Rampal Singh executed this deed collusively or fictitiously. The learned Counsel for the plaintiff-appellant has not been able to suggest a reason or weight as to why he should have done so. He did suggest that his object was to benefit his mistress. But that argument is without force. If his object was to benefit his mistress, why did he not do so by making her a gift of certain property or providing for her maintenante in some other manner? The subject matter of the trust was his own property. It was not property in which he had no power of transfer. He could deal with it as he wished and could have provided for his mistress from it in any manner which he desired.

Another argument taken by the learned Counsel for the plaintiff appellant is that the Court of Wards as guardian of the defendant-respondent in previous proceedings denied the validity of the trust. This is a fact. But the learned Counsel for the defendant-respondent has explained the attitude of the Court of Wards satisfactorily. It appears that, when the Court of Wards took over the management of the Taluka on behalf of the minor defendant-respondent, the papers of the estate were in absolute confusion. It was difficult to discover what Rampal Singh had done or what he had not done. There were a large number of transfers which he had made that he had no right to make, and in these circumstances the Court of Wards made the error of denying the validity of the deed of trust. The Court of Wards now admits the validity of the deed of trust. The position of the defendant-respondent in this matter is as follows:—He accepts the genuineness of the endowment and does not propose to utilize the income of the endowment for his own private purposes or to devote it to any purpose other than the purposes laid down in the deed. The property subject to the endowment is under the management of the Court of Wards, as there is no one else to manage it, the trustees having fallen out one by one by resignation or death, and there being no person competent to carry out the purposes of the trust. But the trust still exists. We understand that the Court of Wards proposes to move the Civil Courts for a scheme of management, the creation of new trustees, and effective orders in order to enable the objects of the endowment to be attained. In these circumstances the position is clear. The endowment is good endowment. The endowed property is not included in the subject-matter of the suit.

The learned Counsel for the plaintiff appellant has raised an argument that owing to the failure of trustees his client as the nearest collateral should be made trustees of this property. It is not likely that such a plea would find favour with any Court, but in any circumstances it cannot be raised here. The management of endowed property by the plaintiff appellant cannot possibly be included as one of the reliefs that can be granted in the present suit. We dispose of this point accordingly.

The last point that remains is with regard to certain sums that were left in the Bank on the death of Raja Rampal Singh. The learned Counsel for the defendant respondent has argued that these sums must be included in the previous Wakf and that in any circumstances the plaintiff-appellant could claim only the balance of these sums, as the greater part of it was expended by the predecessor-in-title of the defendant-respondent on the obsequies of Raja Rampal Singh. Subsequent acquisitions by Raja Rampal Singh were to form a portion of the endowment. This is clear from paragraph 20 of the deed. The money in the Bank falls within the scope of that paragraph. It is property which Raja Rampal Singh acquired during his lifetime and did not transfer in any other way. There is nothing objectionable in the paragraph and under its terms the money in the Bank forms a portion of the Wakf property.

This concludes the pleas raised before us.

We find that the claim was not barred by the principle of res judicata, that the appellant has the right to examine the legal effect of the compromise of 1871, that that compromise does not bind him, but that he is bound by the terms of Exhibit A98 which reproduced the terms of the compromise, that under Exhibit A98 Lachhman Singh obtained a contingent interest which matured into a vested interest on the death of Raja Hanwant Singh in 1831 and that vested interest descended under the terms of the Will of Lachhman Singh of 18th June 1888 (Exhibit A154) to Ram Prasad Singh and his heirs, although there was no custom of succession by lineal primogeniture in Lachhman Singh's family. Thus the estate has devolved on the defendant-respondent. The plaintiff-appellant's claim to the Wakf property fails as the deed of endowment is a good deed. His claim to the money in the Bank fails as that money is a portion of the endowment. The appeal thus fails on every point and is dismissed.

The circumstances of this appeal have been peculiar. On the judgment of the learned trial Judge the appellant had good grounds for appealing and has in effect succeeded on the points made against him in that judgment. But on certain other points on which the learned trial Judge had not adverted, the appeal has failed and the decision of the Court below has been affirmed. In these circumstances it would not, in our opinion, be fair to saddle the appellant with the costs of this appeal. We, therefore, direct that the parties bear their own costs.

Evidence, weight to be attached to—Appellate Court, powers of—Record of Rights, draft of, whether admissible.

The question of the weight to be attached to evidence is a question for the Court dealing with the evidence, and not for the Appellate Court.

The draft of a Record of Rights is not admissible in evidence and a decision based on such draft cannot be upheld in appeal.

Appeal from a decision of the Subordinate Judge, Muzaffarpur.

Mr. Tribhuban Nath Sahay, for the Appellant.

Mr. Syed Mohammad Tahir, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This case must go back to the lower Appellate Court. It appears that the lower Appellate Court, in coming to the conclusion to which it did, attached some importance to the draft Record of Rights, Exhibit 3, produced in the case. The draft Record of Rights is clearly inadmissible in evidence and should not have been admitted at all.

The learned Vakil on behalf of the respondents, however, says that the Court would have come to the same conclusion if it had not admitted the draft Record of Rights in evidence. That may be so, and it may be that this document did not influence it to a very great extent, but my difficulty is that I do not know to what conclusion the lower Appellate Court would have come had it not taken this document into its consideration. The question of weight to be attached to evidence is a question not for me but for the Court dealing with the evidence. In this view I must allow this appeal and remand the case to the lower Appellate Court for its decision after excluding the draft Record of Rights from its consideration. The appellant is entitled to the costs of this appeal.

The costs incurred in the Courts below will abide the result, and will be disposed of by the lower Appellate Court.

Stamp Act (II of 1899), s. 35—Document, unstamped, admissibility of, in evidence—Appellate Court, power of, to admit document on payment of penalty—Lease—Agreement to pay rent in vague terms, whether enforceable.

Where a document is inadmissible in evidence owing to its not being sufficiently stamped, it is open to an Appellate Court to receive the document on payment of the stamp duty and penalty. [p. 927, col. 2.]

An agreement contained in a lease to pay a particular rate of rent which is so vague as not to make it clear what the intention of the parties was, cannot be enforced.

Second appeal from the order of the Commissioner, Benares Division, dated the 23rd of September 1919, in the case of ejectment.

JUDGMENT.

HARRISON, J. M.—(January 21, 1920).—This appeal and Nos. 28, 29 and 30 are filed against appellate orders of the Commissioner, who has held that the respondents in these appeals are not liable to ejectment, the Assistant Collector having given a decree to the plaintiffs in the suit, who are the appellants here.

The case presents several peculiar features. The defendants-respondents were lessees of the plaintiffs' proprietary rights under a registered lease for 11 years from 1315 to 1325 F. They had given up this theka, and this suit was brought in the beginning of 1326 F. to eject them from certain lands which they professed to hold under a special contract embodied in the 4th paragraph of the deed of lease. This contract provided that after the expiry of their lease the lessees should be entitled to hold as ordinary tenants any land from which they might eject tenants during the currency of their theka and at the rent entered in the Jamabandi. These holdings, moreover, were to be held permanently (hamesha).

The first point taken by the appellants is that the lease was not properly stamped. It appears to have been stamped merely as an ordinary lease of proprietary right, but no additional duty was paid at the time of execution on account of this special clause which gave them rights outside the ordinary rights of a thekadar. It appears from the record that this point was never taken before the Assistant Collector until the stage of argument had been reached in the trial of the suits, though when the case went before the Commissioner in appeal, an affidavit was filed by the plaintiff, to the effect that he had offered to pay any deficient duty and penalty that the Court might consider proper. No notice was taken of this offer by the Assistant Collector and in his judgment he held merely that the lease was invalid on account of the deficiency in stamp. The Commissioner on appeal allowed the plaintiff to deposit the requisite duty and penalty, though it appears that they were not actually paid before he delivered judgment. However, the duty and penalty have been paid since and the question is whether I can now take notice of this clause in the lease. On the whole I think that in the circumstances and in view of the affidavit of the plaintiff before the Commissioner, it would have been quite regular for the Commissioner to have remanded the case and directed the Assistant Collector to receive the document in evidence after realising the duty and penalty and to decide the case afresh after considering its terms. The Commissioner, however, elected to dispose of the case himself, and in the circumstances I think the document may now be accepted, as there is no point in remanding the case now and the materials for disposing of these appeals are all on the records.

SOMAN SINGH v. UTTAM CHAND.

The next point taken by the appellants is that the terms of the clause in question are vague and unenforceable. The appellants' Counsel has referred me to Ramasami v. Rajagopala (1), where it was held that an agreement to pay any rent imposed for any land which a tenant might take was bad and unenforceable. I have been also referred to Surrendra Nath Sen v Dinabandhu Naik (2), in which it was held that a covenant in a lease for renewal after its term, when no special terms of renewal were specified and no number of years and no rent were indicated, was also not capable of enforcement. This is a ruling of the Calcutta High Court. The respondents' Vakil has referred me to section 29 of the Contract Act, which says that agreements, the meaning of which is not certain or capable of being made certain, are void. He argues that here the terms are not vague; the land to which the clause referred would be certainly ascertained by the time the original theka expired and the rent to be paid would be found in the official records. I agree that the land to which the agreement applied is sufficiently identified but the rent, I think, is not. It is not clear whether the intention was that the rent formerly paid by ejected tenants should continue to be paid by these thekadars or whether the rent that they chose to get entered should be the rent payable by them. I, therefore, hold the agreement cannot be enforced.

The last point taken is that the theka was given to two persons Tirmal Singh and Baldeo Singh, and the sons of Baldeo Singh are now his representatives. There was no condition in the lease that the rights in the disputed plots should be heritable, and it is argued that in any case the agreement was good only for the joint lives of the original thekadars. If that view is not accepted, it is urged that Baldeo Singh having died, the agreement should not hold good in favour at least of his heirs. As a matter of fact I find that effect was given to the original theka by recording Baldeo Singh as in possession as lessee of two villages, Amarpat and Jagdishpur (Appeals Nos. 27 and 30), while Tirmal Singh was recorded separately as thekadar of two separate villages, Raghunathpur and Dohre (Appeals Nos. 28 and 29). In the absence of conditions making the new tenancy heritable, it is clear that any rights that arose under this disputed clause would not descend to the successors of the original thekadar. On this ground also I would hold that the contract, even if it had been valid originally, would be no longer binding in Amarpat and Jagdishpur where Baldeo Singh had been recorded as sole thekadar. In view, however, of the opinion I have expressed as to the validity of the disputed clause this matter is really immaterial.

I would, therefore, allow the appeals and set aside the decree of the Commissioner and restore that of the Assistant Collector, though on different grounds. The appellants should get their costs in both Appellate Courts.

FERARD, S. M.—(February 5, 1920).—I agree.

Munsif, 1st Class, Sargodha, dated the 8th January 1918, dismissing plaintiffs' claim.

Mr. Ram Chand Manchanda, for the Appellants.

Mr. Mukand Lal Puri, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The facts are that on the 24th January 1908 Musammat Asa Devi, widow of Gurmukh Ram, mortgaged a house to one Uttam Chand. On the 12th August 1916 the plaintiffs-appellants, who are Gurmukh Ram's collaterals, sued for a declaration that the mortgage should not affect their reversionary rights. The first Court held inter alia that the parties were governed by Hindu Law, and that the suit was time-barred under Article 120 of the Limitation Act. The only point on appeal was the question of limitation. The lower Appellate Court held that Article 120 and not Article 125, as contended for the appellants, applied and that the suit was time barred. The plaintiffs appeal.

Apparently the point appears to be simple enough, inasmuch as Article 125 of the Limimitation Act applies only to cases in which the plaintiff would be entitled to immediate possession on the death of the woman making the alienation, and it is clear and admitted that the plaintiffs would not be so entitled, as a daughter of Musammat Asa Devi is alive, who would, on her death, be entitled to such possession, though with a limited interest. But for the appellants an elaborate argument has been based on the judgment in Abinash Chandra Mazumdar v. Harinath Shaha (1) and whilst it is finally admitted that the case falls under Article 120 of the Limitation Act and not under Article 125, it is argued that under Article 120 the starting point for limitation is the date when the right to sue accrues, and that, according to the decision referred to, such right accrues when the intermediate person entitled to succeed colludes or fails to take action in the matter. It has been held in the present case that there is no proof that the daughter has given up her rights or is colluding, and Counsel is unable to refer to any evidence on the record to the contrary. He, therefore, argues that the rights of the plaintiffs would accrue at the expiration of 12 years from the alienation if the daughter took no action and the suit is not time-barred. But this argument is self-destructive, because, if the right to sue for the declaration has not yet accrued, the suit is premature and the plaintiffs have no locus standi.

The decision relied on, however, does not bear out the contention. The portion relied on purports to be based on the judgment in Govinda Pillai v. Thayammal (2), and in this judgment it was held that there is no privity of estate between one reversioner and another as such and, therefore, an act, or omission, by one reversioner cannot bind another reversioner who does not claim through him. The plaintiff was born more than 12 years after the alienation and was a minor and a very remote reversioner. It was held he could maintain the suit as the nearer reversioners were barred by limitation under Article 120, inasmuch as they had not sued within time, and that a cause of action had accrued to him, as the person immediately entitled to possession on the death of the alienor was also barred under Article 125. How could a right accrue to a minor before he was born? This judgment in no way helps the appellant. On the contrary, it is against him. In Abinash Chandra Mazumdar v. Harinath Shaha (1), relied on, it was held that, though ordinarily only an immediate reversioner could bring the suit, that rule had no application when the immediate reversioner is herself only the holder of a life estate, and it was further held that, although the right of the nearest reversioner for the time being to contest an alienation may have been barred by limitation against him, this will not bar the similar rights of subsequent reversioners, but it is clear, I think, that the decision is that this fact of itself will not create a bar, not that the subsequent reversioners can sue even though barred by limitation, and it is in connection with this part of the judgment that Govinda Pillai v. Thayammal (2) is referred to. This is made clear from the following extract: "It follows necessarily that a reversioner who is an infant at the date of the alienation or who is born subsequently is entitled to the benefit of section 7 of the Limitation Act, for it is only reasonable to hold that the right of any reversioner to sue for a declaration cannot accrue before he is born."

(1) 9 C. W. N. 25; 32 C. 62.

(2) 14 M. L. J. 209; 28 M. 57.

On the other hand, there is a mass of decisions given in Rustomji's Limitation Act, 2nd Edition, page 394, which shows that the existence of the daughter is no bar to an immediate suit for a declaration by the nearest collateral and that the starting point for limitation is the date of the alienation, and to this list may be added the recent Full Bench judgment in Challagundla Varamma v. Madala Gopalasayya (3) which is explicit on the point. I have no hesitation, therefore, in holding that the suit is barred by time.

I may mention that it was brought to my notice, though not pressed for good reasons, that in Deve Raj v. Shiv Ram (4) it was held that a house was not "land" within the meaning of Article 125, but no reasons are given in that judgment for this decision, and it is not apparent from the report whether the house was sold apart from its site. Apparently this was the case, because the decision does not refer to or purport to differ from previous judgments of the Chief Court of the Punjab. In Ralya Ram v. Sher Singh (5) it was held that land in Article 125 included a house and its site and in Sant Ram v. Ganga Ram (6) and Musammat Ralli v. Sundar Singh (7) this view was referred to and apparently approved.

For the above reasons I dismiss the appeal with costs.

Second appeal from the order of the Collector, Ghazipur (as Commissioner), dated the 14th of August 1919, in the case of ejectment.

JUDGMENT.

HARRISON, J. M.—(January 19, 1920).—This is a second appeal by a Zemindar in an ejectment suit. The facts of the case are somewhat peculiar. The appellant was one of several joint plaintiffs in an Assistant Collector's Court. The rest of the plaintiffs withdrew their suit before the Assistant Collector, apparently without her consent. She appealed to the Commissioner, who transferred the appeal to the Collector for disposal. The latter officer originally remanded the case for decision on the merits and directed the first Court to decide whether one of the original defendants Kripal Rai had died before the institution of the suit. It was found that he had died some time before and that his heirs had not been brought on the record. The appellant explained the failure to bring the heirs on to the record by want of knowledge of Kripal Rai's death and the fact that his name was still recorded in the Patwari's papers. Application was actually made before the Collector in appeal for the substitution of Kripal Rai's heirs for Kripal Rai himself. The Assistant Collector, before whom no fresh application for substitution of names was made, finally dismissed the suit for non joinder of necessary defendants. The case went to the Collector in appeal again and he decided that in the absence of a rule to the effect that it is not open to a Zemindar to eject one of several co-tenants, the other co-tenant Bharat Rai might alone be ejected. The appellant appeals to this Court from that order.

Clearly the order of the Collector cannot stand, for it can have no effect whatever and the word tenant in the Act must be held to include all the tenants of the holding when there are more than one. The question remains whether there is any remedy at this stage. In the first place it is argued that the withdrawal of the suit by all the plaintiffs other than the appellant necessarily caused the suit to abate. For information as to the views held by this Court on that point I have been referred to judgments of my present colleague and of my predecessor, Mr. Hopkins, reported at page 306, Volume III, U. D., but the Members of the Board as then constituted disagreed as to the effect of the withdrawal of some only of a number of co-plaintiffs. My present colleague held that under rule 1 (4) of Order XXIII of the Code of Civil Procedure one plaintiff could not withdraw a suit without the consent of all the plaintiffs. Mr. Hopkins took a different view, holding that rule I (1) gave a single plaintiff power to withdraw the whole suit, though from the concluding sentence of his judgment he evidenly had some doubts on the subject. On the general principles of construction and with reference to the General Clauses Act, I am inclined to hold that the word plaintiff in rule 1 (1) includes all the plaintiffs and I read rule 1 (4) as designed to make clear simply that one plaintiff cannot withdraw if there were several plaintiffs, without the consent of all. I, therefore, agree with my colleague's view of the whole rule.

The next point is whether the application for substitution of Kripal Rai's heirs before the Collector in appeal was sufficient to enable the Assistant Collector to bring them on record. As a matter of fact I find that these heirs were made parties to the appeal, and I do not think it was open to the Assistant Collector to ignore that fact when the case came to him on remand. In fact he should have treated the case as then proceeding against those heris and the other co-tenant, Bharat Rai. At the same time it must be noted that as the Assistant Collector did not treat the heirs as defendants, the renewed appeal by the appellant did not implead them, nor in fact are they impleaded in this Court. It is not probable that they have any particular defence to the suit, but they should have an opportunity to plead I think the proper order in this case, therefore, will be to set aside all the decrees of the Courts below and direct that the Assistent Collector should retry the case after making Kripal Rai's heirs parties to the suit.

The present appeal suggests that there was some difficulty about limitation. In view of the fact that ejectment suits under section 63 of the Tenancy Act must be filed before the first of October, there apparently is some idea that all necessary parties must also be brought on record before that date. I do not, however, regard section 63 as fixing a period of limitation. The particular months within which a suit may be filed are laid down clearly for administrative convenience only. It is true that if a suit for ejectment is not brought under this section before the 1st October in the 12th year of tenancy, the tenant cannot be ejected later on, for by the next period for suing he will have acquired occupancy rights, but this section cannot be regarded as laying down any period of limitation in the ordinary sense of the term. I may also refer to rule 9 of Order I of the Code of Civil Procedure, which lays down that no suit shall be defeated by reason of the misjcinder or non-joinder of parties and in a case like this where through an obvious mistake of fact a dead person is impleaded as defendant, it seems to me that the Court is bound, when the mistake is discovered, to bring the proper parties on the record, subject of course to any real question of limitation. In this case it appears that the suit was instituted in 1917 at the beginning of the twelfth year of tenancy so that if the present appellant is not allowed to prosecute the case further, the tenants in question will have acquired occupancy rights.

As I propose as above to set aside the orders of the lower Courts, the case will be laid before my colleague. I would allow the appellant costs of this appeal and of the last appeal before the Collector.

GHANSHAM DAS—APPELLANT

versus

HINDUSTAN BANK, LTD. (IN LIQUIDATION), THROUGH LIQUIDATOR—RESPONDENT.

Companies Act (VI of 1882), s. 169, applicability of—Order fixing remuneration of employee of liquidator—Appeal, whether lies.

Section 169 of the Companies Act, 1882, applies only to orders made in the matter of winding up of a company, and has no application to an order fixing the remuneration of an employee of a liquidator; such an order, therefore, is not appealable.

Miscellaneous first appeal from the order of the District Judge, Lahore, dated the 2nd May 1919.

Mr. Hargopal, for the Appellant.

Mr. Niranjan Parshad, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—This is an appeal under section 169 of Act VI of 1882 from an order of Mr. Prenter, Liquidation Judge, disallowing a sum of Rs. 500 alleged by the appellant to be due to him under a previous order of Mr. Ellis, the then Liquidation Judge. Preliminary objections are raised that the appellant, being neither a creditor nor a contributory, has no locus standi to appeal, that Mr. Ellis had no power or jurisdiction to pass the order relied on inasmuch as the appellant was merely an employee of the respondent and other liquidators of companies in liquidation under an arrangement made by them and sanctioned by the Liquidation Judge for the time being, and that, in any event, Mr. Prenter's order is a ministerial and not a judicial one, that this Court cannot interfere in a matter purely within his discretion, and that if it is alleged that there has been any breach of a contract on the part of the respondent, the appellant has his remedy by suit.

For the appellant it is contended that section 169 of the Act gives an unrestricted right of appeal from all orders of the Liquidation Judge not only in respect of the nature or subject matter of the order, but in respect of the person aggrieved by such order, that Mr. Ellis' order was based on a previous order of Rai Bahadur Damodar Das, Liquidation Judge, to the effect that the appellant was to receive half of the respondent's remuneration as Official Liquidator, that Mr. Ellis' order was final inasmuch as, though a review from his order was competent, such review was governed by the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure and the limitation of 21 days provided in section 169 of the Indian Companies Act of 1882, that, therefore, Mr. Prenter was not competent to review Mr. Ellis' order which, in any case, was time-barred, no notice having been served on the appellant within 21 days, that the appellant was by virtue of section 166 of the Act executing the order of Mr. Ellis, that Mr. Prenter, as executing Judge, had no power to question, or go behind, that order and that the appellant had been appointed superintendent of the liquidation office direct by the Court and not by any private arrangement of the respondent and other Official Liquidators.

It appears that the appellant was expressly appointed by Rai Bahadur Damodar Das, then Liquidation Judge, who made an arrangement whereby the work of the Official Liquidators of several companies in liquidation was carried on in a central office and the pay of the appellant and other staff was made from a fund to which all the Liquidators contributed. The Judge himself fixed the salaries. The "main file" shows that on the 6th July 1917 the Judge made a long note on the affairs of the Hindustan Bank, and paragraph 12 of this note is to the effect that the appellant had worked well, and that he also holds a power-of-attorney from the Official Liquidators of the Hindustan Bank and that he intended giving the appellant a substantial reward at the close of the liquidation. In October 1917 the appellant made an application to Mr. Ellis, who had succeeded as Liquidation Judge, in which he laid claim to certain pay, alleged to be due to him as Superintendent of the Central Office, and also brought to notice that originally he had, in addition to other work, been acting under a power-of-attorney given him by the two Official Liquidators of the Hindustan Bank, and that when Rai Sahib Pandit Wazir Chand, one of them, resigned he had been nominated by the creditors of the Bank as a joint liquidator, but that, as an understanding had been arrived at, with the approval of the Court, between him and the respondent, the remaining liquidator, whereby he was to continue to act under the power of attorney and recieve half of the respondent's remuneration, he was not specifically appointed liquidator. He claimed, therefore, that the respondent should be made to carry out the arrangement made. He later attached a memo. obtained by him from Rai Bahadur Damodar Das, which supported his allegations. On the 5th November 1917 Mr. Ellis, holding that Rai Bahadur Damodar Das had intended giving the appellant a bonus of Rs. 1,000, and that there was an understanding that the appellant should share the respondent's remuneration, wrote as follows:—"I have considered his claims and think every one will be fairly dealt with by awarding him an immediate bonus of Rs. 500 to be deducted from the Official Liquidator's ultimate remuneration"

This order was communicated to the respondent on the 10th November 1917. On the 5th December 1918 the appellant applied to the respondent for the payment of the Rs 500, when respondent wrote a note objecting to the money coming out of his remuneration. The matter was laid before Mr. Harrison, Liquidation Judge, who, on the 7th December, ordered that the money was not to be paid at present, and again on the 21st December the same Judge wrote that Mr. Ellis' order "so far as the question of the funds from which it will be paid is concerned will probably have to be revised and the question will also have to be considered whether a wholetime employee like Ghansham Das can be paid a bonus at all." The matter was finally disposed of by Mr. Prenter by his order, dated the 24th January 1918.

Enough facts have, I think, been stated to make the position clear. Section 169 of the Indian Companies Act, 1882, does not relate to all orders that a Liquidation Judge may pass. The words "all orders" are restricted by the words "in the matter of the winding up of a company" in the same section. It has, therefore, to be seen in the first place whether Mr. Ellis' order is one "in the matter of the winding up." I do not think it is. There are apparently no authorities on the point, but it appears to me that the appellant must be regarded as an official of the Court. The Court's sanction had to be obtained to the establishment entertained, its personnel and the salaries to be paid. In the present case the Court itself appointed the appellant and fixed his salary. It was so alleged by the appellant. The Court had the power of reducing or increasing salaries or of dismissing one of the staff. Such exercise of power cannot be regarded as judicial acts or orders given in the matter of the winding up of the company. Does a servant, who is dismissed, or has his pay reduced from Rs 10 to Rs. 9, have the right to appeal to the High Court by virtue of section 169 of the Act simply because he is an aggrieved person? Nevertheless, it is argued that the appellant, as an aggrieved person, has the right. I hold, therefore, that the order of Mr Ellis was not one within the meaning of section 169, and that it was always open to revision and reconsideration, whether by himself or by a successor. In his original application to Mr. Ellis the appellant had asked that the respondent should be compelled to carry out the arrangement come to with him by the respondent. On this finding it becomes unnecessary to deal with the contention that the review of Mr. Ellis' order was time-barred. For the same reason it is unnecessary to discuss the contention that by virtue of section 166 of the Act the later applications of the appellant for payment must be regarded as in execution of Mr. Ellis' order, and that as an executing Court Mr. Prenter had no power to go behind that order.

The appellant finally seeks to fall back on the merits of Mr. Prenter's order. But that order is based on discretionary powers with the exercise of which this Court will not interfere, even in the case of judicial orders, unless a great injustice has been done. After a consideration of the facts, though one of the reasons given may not be sound, Mr. Prenter decided that the appellant should not be given the bonus of Rs. 500, and with that order I refuse to interfere. It may be that the appellant has a remedy against the respondent based on the agreement alleged, but that is a separate matter. I dismiss the appeal with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Pandit SHEO PRASAD—PLAINTIFF—RESPONDENT.

Agra Tenancy Act (II of 1901), s. 177 (e)—Ejectment, suit for—Proprietary title, plea of, decision of—Appeal, forum of.

Where in an ejectment suit the pleading, however flimsy, sets up a claim of proprietary title by adverse possession and an issue is drawn in respect of it, a question of proprietary title is in issue, and a decision of that question is appealable to the District Judge. [p. 931, col. 1]

Second appeal from the order of the Commissioner, Agra Division, dated the 17th of July 1919, in the case of ejectment.

JUDGMENT.—This is a second appeal by a person who was sued for ejectment by the plaintiff-respondent, who alleged that he had ejected the recorded occupancy tenants, Tika, etc., and that the defendant-appellant had held under them as a sub-tenant and did not relinquish the land, although any right he had was extinguished on the ejectment of the occupancy tenants.

The defendant-appellant contended that he was not a tenant of the plaintiff but he was himself a Zemindar and share-holder in the Mahal and that he was holding in that capacity. He asserted that he was holding the land as a proprietor and in adverse possession to the plaintiff for over 12 years and the land was his khudkasht.

The respondent plaintiff appeared before me in person and he explains the situation as follows:—The defendant-appellant was and is actually a mortgagee in possession of 16 bighas from Sundar, a co sharer, though this mortgage apparently does not concern the land in suit. In respect of the land which was held by Tika, etc., his claim rests on a mortgage executed by Tika, etc., on the very eve of the date when the plaintiff himself bought up Tika's share at an auction sale. This mortgage was ultimately set aside and declared void by decree of the High Court, dated 13th August 1902. Nevertheless, the defendant-appellant continued to be recorded as sub-tenant (mortgagee) of Tika, etc, until their ejectment shortly before the institution of this suit.

The first question is whether the appeal from the Assistant Collector lay to the Commissioner or to the District Judge. The Assistant Collector has held in his judgment that the appellant had acquired illegal possession of the land and that as he himself was a co-sharer (presumably in virtue of the mortgage of Sundar's share and not of the share of Tika, etc.), he must be regarded as holding as a co sharer in the Mahal and not as a tenant. The Commissioner dismissed this contention in the opening part of his judgment in appeal. He says that the plaintiff does not dispute the defendant's proprietary rights in the Mahal but merely contests the nature of his occupation, whether he is occupying as a former sub-tenant of Tika, etc, or as a proprietor; and his opinion is that there was not really any question of proprietary title involved. I cannot agree with him. The pleadings distinctly set up a claim of proprietary rights by adverse possession and the Assistant Collector framed an issue No. 3 upon that point. However flimsy the plea may be, I think it must be held that a question of proprietary title was in issue and was decided and that, therefore, the appeal should have been presented to the District Judge. I would, therefore, set aside the Commissioner's decree and direct him to return the memorandum of appeal to the appellant in his Court (respondent here) for presentation to the Court. In the circumstances the parties may bear their own costs in both Appellate Courts.

Appeal allowed.

Negotiable Instruments Act (XXVI of 1881*)*, ss. 1, 7 —Mercantile usage of Delhi—Hundi—Acceptance, oral —Drawee, liability of.

The mercantile community at Delhi recognise the custom of accepting hundis by word of mouth and a mercantile usage exists whereby the drawee, who signifies his assent by word of mouth, is made liable on the hundi accepted by him. [p. 932, col. 1.]

Second appeal from the decree of the District Judge, Delhi, dated the 26th February 1915, affirming that of the Sub-Judge, Delhi, dated the 8th October 1914, decreeing plaintiff's claim.

The Hon'ble Pandit Sheo Narain, Messrs. Mohan Lal and Govind Das, for the Appellants.

Mr. Shamair Chand, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The relevant facts of this case are set out in the order of remand, dated 31st May 1918 [Pannalal-Lachhmandas v. Hargopal-Khubi Ram (1)], which must be read as a part of this judgment. The issue remanded for further enquiry was "whether there is a mercantile usage at Delhi which renders a drawee, who has accepted a hundi orally, liable on the instrument." The Subordinate Judge has recorded the evidence of a large number of witnesses produced by both the parties, and has also examined the khokhas or discharged hundis produced by some of the witnesses in order to show that payments were made by the drawees after the hundis had been accepted orally. The learned Judge has found that the usage relied upon by the plaintiffs has been established, and his view has been endorsed by the learned District Judge.

We have examined the oral as well as the documentary evidence in the light of the comments made by Mr. Sheo Narain for the appellants and Mr. Shamair Chand for the respondents, and reached the conclusion that the view taken by the lower Courts is correct and should be upheld. There is a consensus of opinion that the mercantile community at Delhi recognize the custom of accepting hundis by word of mouth. On this point the witnesses on both sides are unanimous, but while the plaintiffs' witnesses proceed further and state that oral acceptance makes the drawee liable on the instrument, those produced by the defendants demur to this statement and assert that oral acceptance does not import legal liability to pay. Now, we find that while the plaintiffs' witnesses fortify their position by citing a very large number of instances in which oral acceptance has been followed by payment, the witnesses for the defendants are unable to cite a single instance in which no payment was made on the basis of a hundi which had been accepted orally. Indeed, some of these witnesses, who had themselves been signifying their assent to hundis by oral acceptance, had to admit that they themselves never refused payment.

A perusal of the entire material before us shows that though the acceptance of hundis may be made in writing, the majority of them are undoubtedly accepted by a mere word of mouth; that oral acceptance is rather the rule than the exception; that such acceptance has been invariably followed by payment; and that there is not a single instance in which a drawee, after accepting a hundi orally, has declined to pay. When we find that the persons accepting hundis orally have always made payments, we cannot but conclude that the reason for such payments was that the acceptors knew that the mercantile usage not only recognized the validity of such acceptance but also rendered them liable to the same extent as a person who had renduced his acceptance to writing. If the oral acceptance does not result in any legal liability, it is not easy to understand why the holder should be satisfied with an acceptance of that character and should not insist upon the drawee either accepting the hundi in writing or dishonouring it. A holder would naturally like to know definitely how he stood with respect to the drawee, and would not ordinarily rest contented with an oral acceptance, if it carried with it only a moral, and not a legal obligation to pay.

As pointed out by their Lordships of the Privy Council in Juggomohun v. Manickchand (2) to establish a mercantile usage it is enough, if the usage appears to be so well known and acquiesced in, that it may be reasonably presumed to have been an ingredient tacitly imported by the parties into their contract. This test has been fully satisfied in the case before us; and we must, therefore, hold that the plaintiffs have succeeded in establishing the existence of a mercantile usage at Delhi making the drawee, who has signified his assent by word of mouth, liable on the hundi accepted by him in that manner.

We accordingly dismiss this appeal with costs.

Miscellaneous reference by the Sub-Judge, Jhansi, through the District Judge, under Order XLVI, rule 1, Code of Civil Procedure.

Mr. S. P. Ghosh, for the Petitioner.

JUDGMENT.—The learned Judge of the Court of Small Causes at Jhansi has referred to us the question whether a finding recorded in a certain previous litigation does or does not operate as res judicata between the parties to a suit now pending before him. In the former litigation the parties were arrayed on the same side as defendants, but there was a question in issue between them and the adjudication of the same was necessary to give appropriate relief to the then plaintiff. The point was duly decided, and was decided in a sense favourable to the plaintiff in this subsequent suit in connection with which the reference is now made. On the principles laid down by this Court in Ahmad Ali v. Nujabat Khan (1) and in Chajju v Umrao Singh (2) the decision arrived at in the former suit does operate as res judicata in the present one. This is our answer to this reference. We are of opinion that the plaintiff in the case, who alone has been represented before this Court, is entitled in any event to his costs of this hearing, as the reference by the Court below was made at the express instance of the defendant.

Letters Patent (Lahore), cl. 10—"Judgment," meaning of—Order on application to stay execution, whether judgment—Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. XLI, r. 5—Stay of execution, when will be granted—Pre-emption suit, decree in—Practice.

The term "judgment" in clause 10 of the Letters Patent, Lahore High Court, includes any interlocutory judgment which decides, so far as the Court pronouncing the judgment is concerned, whether finally or temporarily, any question materially in issue between the parties and directly affecting the subject-matter of the suit. [p. 934, col. 1]

An order on an application to stay execution pending appeal is a judgment, and as such is appealable [p 934 cols. 1 & 2]

The practice in the Lahore High Court is to stay execution of a decree in a pre-emption suit, so far as immoveable property is concerned, except in regard to costs, provided the decree-holder is permitted to recover from the Court the money deposited by him in compliance with the terms of the decree without prejudice to his right to redeposit it in the event of the failure of the appeal. [p. 934, col. 1.]

Appeal under section 10 of the Letters Patent, for setting aside the order of Mr. Justice Wilberforce, dated the 14th of October 1919, rejecting the application for stay of execution of the decree of the Senior Subordinate Judge, Delhi, dated the 25th August 1919, pending decision of Civil Appeal No. 1893 of 1919 by the High Court.

Lala Moti Sagar, R. S., for the Appellant.

Mr. H. S. K. Malik, for Lala Mul Chand, R. S., for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This purports to be an appeal under section 10 of the Letters Patent and the first question calling for decision is whether an appeal lies, in other words, whether the order of the single Bench refusing to stay execution of the decree pending decision of the appeal is a judgment within the meaning of the section aforesaid

The original suit out of which this matter arises was a pre-emption suit which was decreed by the trial Court. From that decree an appeal was preferred to this Court with an ancillary prayer that pending decision of the appeal, execution of the decree should be stayed.

The appeal was duly admitted but stay of execution was refused, and the refusal to stay execution is the subject of this appeal.

It should be premised that the appellant does not pray for stay of execution as to costs, but only for stay in regard to execution of the main decree.

Section 10 of the Letters Patent reads as follows:—

(i) An appeal shall lie to the High Court of Judicature at Lahore from the judgment (not being an order made in the exercise of revisional jurisdiction) of one Judge of the High Court.

'Judgment' is defined in section 2 of the Civil Procedure Code as the Judge's statement of the grounds for his decree or order and 'the Laws of England' describes it as any decision given by a Court on questions at issue between the parties to a proceeding properly before the Court.

In Srinantu Raja Yarlagadda Durga Prasad Nayudu v. Srimantu Yarlagadda Mallikarjuna Prasad Nayudu (1) the question before the Judges, whether a refusal to stay execution for costs amounted to a judgment within the meaning of the Letters Patent, was decided in the negative on the ground that the order did not affect the merits of any question between the parties by determining any right or liability in dispute in the suit or appeal and Mohabir Prosad Singh v. Adhikari Kunwar (2) was referred to with approval, but in Tuljaram Row v. Alagappa Chattiar (3) this view was regarded as unsound.

In the Tuljaram Row v. Alagappa Chattiar (3) the learned Chief Justice held that to be a 'judgment' which put an end to the suit or proceeding so far as the Court before which the suit or proceeding was pending was concerned. He then pro-

(1) 24 M. 358.
(2) 21 C. 473.
(3) 8 Ind. Cas. 340; 21 M. L. J. 1; 8 M. L. T. 453; (1910) M. W. N. 697; 35 M. 1.

seeded to hold that an order on an application for an interim injunction is a judgment within the meaning of the clause, and his learned colleague justified its inclusion within the term 'judgment' on the ground that it temporarily at any rate affected the rights of the parties in the subject-matter of the suit or other proceedings.

In Justices of the Peace, Calcutta v. Oriental Gas Co. (4) judgment was defined as a decision which by determining some right or liability affects the merits of the question between the parties, and this definition has been generally accepted in all subsequent decisions.

In Mathura Sundari Dassi v. Haran Chandra Shaha (5) the Judges were of the opinion that 'judgment' as used in the Letters Patent should be given a wide rather than a restricted meaning, but the problem of where the line should be drawn remains a difficult one to resolve. In De Souza v. Coles (6) it was held impossible to prescribe any limits to the right of appeal founded upon the nature of the order or decree appealed from, but this view has not received acceptance in later judgments.

A consideration of those decisions and several others to which references are made in them leads to the conclusion that the term 'judgment' as used in the Letters Patent is a very wide one, having a not much narrower connotation than the definition given in the Code of Civil Procedure, and this view receives confirmation from the language employed in sections 29 and 30 of the Letters Patent, which give a right of appeal to His Majesty's Privy Council, subject to certain conditions, from even a preliminary or interlocutory judgment, decree or order. Our conclusion then is that judgment in section 10 of the Letters Patent includes any interlocutory judgment which decides, so far as the Court pronouncing such judgment is concerned, whether finally or temporarily, any question materially in issue between the parties and directly affecting the subject-matter of the suit.

An order on an application to stay execution pending appeal comes within this definition of 'judgment' and so is appealable.

To turn to the merits, Counsel for the respondents, decree-holders, admits that the practice in this Court is to stay execution, when immoveable property is concerned, except in regard to costs, and provided that he be permitted to recover from the Court the monies deposited by him in compliance with the terms of the decree without prejudice to his right to re-deposit it in the event of the failure of the appeal, he has no objection to the observance of the usual practice.

We accordingly accept the appeal and stay execution of the decree except for costs. We also permit the decree-holder to withdraw his deposit without prejudice to his decree, pending the appeal. Parties shall bear their own costs before us.

Appeal accepted.

JUDGMENT.

HARRISON, J. M.—(January 20, 1920).—This is a second appeal from the decree of the Commissioner on appeal in an ejectment suit.

The plaintiff came into Court on the basis of a perpetual lease which is filed with the Commissioner's record, showing that he had been granted this lease in respect of the proprietor's sir land and he claimed to eject the defendants who had up to that time been tenants, commonly called sub-tenants, in that sir. The defendants pleaded that they had been, for many years, in possession of the land as tenants and had acquired occupancy rights.

The whole case turns upon the effect of the lease. The Commissioner held that it was in the nature of a sub-infeudation which is discountenanced by the tenancy law of these provinces. He was of opinion that a sir-holder could not introduce a third person between himself and the tenant or sub-tenant and give that third person power to eject sub-tenants. He also said that if the proprietor desired to grant such a lease, he should first eject that tenant in possession himself. So far as I am aware, the point is a new one. The appellant lease-holder argues in appeal that the lease gave him what he calls an under-proprietray right in the holding, that the original proprietor having granted the lease could not now legally eject the tenants in possession and that the interest he has acquired entitled him to eject.

The terms of the lease show that it is hereditary and the right granted is described as similar to that of a fixed-rate tenant. The terms of the document in no way resemble those of an ordinary theka or proprietary right.

In one view of the case the appellant lease holder is in no better position than the defendant tenants themselves, for the lease cannot be held to grant more than a tenancy in the sir such as the defendants themselves have already. On the other hand, there is no doubt that the lease in its very mildest interpretation assigns the right of the proprietor to receive the rents of existing tenants in sir to the appellant lessee and in that way the appellant becomes the landholder of the tenants in the sir. In that view I think he must be held entitled to eject. The lease is quite recent and the respondents could not acquire occupancy rights in the holdings while the land was actually sir in the possession of the proprietor, and they have not had time to acquire them since even if the sir should be held to be extinct. I would, therefore, allow the appeal and set aside the decree of the Commissioner and restore that of the Assistant Collector. The appellant should get his costs in both Appellate Courts.

FERARD, S. M.—I agree.

Custom—Adoption—Adopted son adopting his own brother—Hindu Jats, Ludhiana District—Onus.

Among the Hindu Jats of the Ludhiana District a sonless proprietor, who happens himself to have been an adopted son, is not debarred from exercising the general power possessed by a proprietor in the central and eastern parts of the Punjab of appointing one of his kinsmen to succeed him as his heir, and the adoption by such a proprietor of his own brother is not invalid [p. 936, col. 2; p. 938, col. 1.]

The onus of proving that there is any restriction operating to control the appointer in his selection, lies on the party asserting such restriction [p. 937, col. 1.]

JIWA SINGH v. CHANDI.

JUDGMENT.—The circumstances of the present case would appear very clearly from the genealogy given by the learned District Judge which for convenience is repeated in this judgment :—

It will be seen that Sohna, a Hindu Jat of the Ludhiana District, adopted his collateral Prem Singh. In 1907 Prem Singh executed an adoption deed in favour of his own younger brother Gujar. Prem Singh having died, the collaterals of Sohna have sued to recover Prem Singh's property. Gujar has also died pendente lite and is represented by his widow. Now the Courts below have concurred in finding that Prem Singh did in fact appoint Gujar as his heir, and that such appointment was valid even though a brother was appointed.

In appeal it has been contended—

First, that Prem Singh, being himself an adopted son, was not competent to appoint a person as an heir to succeed to the property which he had received from his adoptive father.

Secondly, that the onus should have been thrown on Gujar to prove that his adoption by his brother was valid by custom ; and Thirdly, that such an adoption is absolutely invalid.

As for the first proposition some reliance has been placed on the ruling in Mehra v. Mangal Singh (1), which as a matter of fact only decided that the son of a person who had been adopted is not competent to challenge, on the ground that the property is ancestral qua him, an alienation by his father of property to which his father had succeeded by adoption [Mehra v. Mangal Singh (1)]. It is not very clear what direct application that particular decision, which was arrived at in very special circumstances, has to the present case The learned Counsel for the appellants has also pointed out that an adoption operates as a transfer, only differing from a gift in that it takes effect after the death of the donor instead of in his liefetime [Ralla v. Budha (2)]. This may be conceded, but it does not appear to establish the contention that a sonless proprietor, who happens himself to have been an adopted son, is debarred from exercising the general power possessed by a proprietor in the central and eastern parts of the Punjab of appointing one of his kinsmen to succeed him as his heir (See Rattigan's Digest, section 35). Although there does not appear to be any published judgment of this Court exactly in point, there is a judgment of the District Court, Ludhiana, of the 9th October 1914 (Civil Appeal No. 124 of 1914, Hira v. Dewa Singh) in which it was held that a man who had himself been adopted was not prevented from exercising the power of appointing an heir in his own turn from amongst his own kinsmen. The appeal to the Chief Court was dismissed. In the absence, thereofre, of further material we do not think that the Counsel for the appellants can be said to have established his first contention.

(1) 27 Ind. Cas. 393; 99 P. R. 1914; 71 P. L. R. 1915; 8 P. W. R. 1915.

Next, as regards the onus of proof it is contended that the adoption of a brother is so unusual that the onus should have been laid on those who set it up to prove its validity. There does not appear to be any authority on which the Counsel for the appellants can rely to support his contention. The general rule is given in paragraph 36 of Rattigan's Digest, which lays down that there was no restriction as regards the age or the degree of relationship of a person to be appointed as an heir The adoption of a brother does not infringe the basic principle underlying the customary appointment of an heir, as it involves no alienation of ancestral land to a person standing outside the agnatic group. There is some authority against the appellants in Sant Singh v. Mula (3) and the case of Waryam Singh v. Jiwan Singh (4), where it has been laid down that if a custom of adoption be proved to exist under which a collateral may be appointed as customary heir, the onus lies on the party asserting that there is any restriction operating to control the appointer in his selection. We are not, therefore, satisfied that the onus was wrongly laid.

Now as to the actual validity of the appointment now in question, it is evident that there has been no alienation of ancestral land outside the limits of the agnatic group. It also appears that the appointment by Prem Singh of his brother Gujar as his heir was attested by the Lambardars and did not apparently excite any immediate protest ; nor does it appear to have been regarded as by any means an impossible operation. We would also refer to the remarks made in the introduction to Chapter III of Rattigan's Digest. It is therein stated that "According to the notion prevailing amongst agriculturists, adoption is in no sense connected with religion, and partakes more of the character which the act assumed in the later Roman Law as a simple nominis heredis institutio; that is to say, it is a more or less public institution by a sonless owner of land of a person to succeed him as his heir". Now the fact that a Hindu Jat of Ludhiana is at liberty to select one of his collaterals as his heir is beyond dispute, and in the Ludhiana Customary Law of 1911, page 98, numerous instances are given. No doubt the adoption of a brother would not be looked upon with favour amongst Hindus of the twice born castes, where a different form of adoption is practised, but the parties to this liligation do not belong to the twice-born castes. The appointment of an heir has no religious significance, and there does not appear to be any authority for supposing that there is any arbitrary restriction beyond the practical one that the land must not go outside the agnatic group. The presumption no doubt would be against the validity of the appointment of a daughter's or a sister's son, but this is a very different matter inasmuch as such an appointment takes the land away from the agnatic groups and cases involving the appointment of a daughter's son as his heir are not in point in the present case. Even looking to Hindu Law, there is some authority to the effect that the adoption of a brother is permissible in the kritrima form of adoption. It is mentioned in the Punjab Civil Code by Tremlett, page 211. It is also mentioned as a possible adoption amongst Hindu tribes in the Deccan in Steele's Law and Custom of Hindu Castes at page 44. It is sometimes suggested that no adoption can be valid in which the mother of the person adopted is debarred from marrying the adoptive father. This rule, however, is not known to apply amongst agriculturists of Ludhiana (see Gordon Walker's Customary Law, page 93); and indeed this rule can barely be regarded as of general application. It is not possible in the present case to lay down any general rule because the circumstances of this are very narrow; the person whom Prem Singh appointed as his heir is a near collateral of the persons contesting the validity of the appointment and in any case the land will remain in the family, but in the circumstances we think that the appointment is prima facie valid and the appellants have failed to show that there is any religious or customary impediment to such an appointment.

It is said in fact only a small portion of the property is ancestral qua the plaintiffs, but this question has not been decided by the lower Courts. The appellants' Counsel has also contended that the widow of Gujar has no rights in the property, but we consider that her right to a life-interest in it until death or re-marriage is beyond dispute (see paragraph 54 of Rattigan's Digest).

The result is that the appeal fails and is dismissed with costs.

Res judicata—Issue not vital to decision, effect of.

An issue which is not vital to the decision of a suit and the finding on which is not very clear, does not operate as res judicata in a subsequent suit. [p. 939, col. 1.]

Second appeal from the order of the Commissioner, Meerut Division, dated the 19th August 1919, in the case of ejectment.

JUDGMENT.

HOPKINS, S. M. (February 12, 1920).—This is a tenant's second appeal in an ejectment suit in which the Commissioner, holding that a certain previous decision operated as a res judicata, has held that the appellant has not acquired occupancy rights. The Commissioner relied upon a decision in a previous suit for ejectment brought in the previous years. The issues in that suit were two:—

(1) Whether the defendant had acquired occupancy rights, and

(2) whether he was holding under an expired lease.

The suit was actually decided upon the second issue, it being found that he was holding under a lease for 4 years, which had not expired. This finding actually made a finding on the first issue unnecessary, but the latter was technically decided against the tenant in the following words:—"Defendant has filed a copy of the Khatauni abstract of Mauza Bisauli relating to his holding, but he has not at all proved that it was included in plaintiff's Khata Khewat. For my satisfaction I looked up into the Khatauni of 1314 F. of this Mauza and observed that there were so many as 14 Khatas in the Khewat of the said Mauza. The tenancy is admitted since 1315 F. by the plaintiff. The defendant has completed up 11 years in 1325 F. and has not consequently acquired occupancy rights. I decide the issue against the defendant." The Commissioner remarks upon this decision that the defendant should have appealed against the finding that he had completed only 11 years. To this the appellant replies that the decree in the former suit having been in his favour on the finding on the second issue, he had no right to appeal. Undoubtedly if there had been no finding regarding the lease, he might himself have appealed, but as the Zemindar did not appeal against the finding on the second issue, there was no cause for the tenant himself to appeal. He could only have filed a cross-objection regarding the finding on the first issue, if the Zemindar had appealed against the finding on the second.

Now it seems to me that there was no real finding at all on the first issue. Possibly the Assistant Collector meant to imply that the plaintiff had not made out that he had held for 12 years under the same landholder, but in effect merely recited the fact that 11 years were admitted by the plaintiff. It seems that there was some question whether the disputed holding had been held under the same landholder prior to 1315 F. from which time the tenancy was admitted, and it appears from the Patwari's evidence in the present suit that formerly the village was divided into Thoks, but that separate Khewats were prepared with effect from 1315 F. This proceeding, if it occurred, would account in some measure for the records starting an apparently new period from 1315 F, and from the way in which the Assistant Collector wrote his judgment in the former suit I infer that he examined the Khatauni which was before him after he had heard arguments, so that he had not the assistance of Counsel in examining it. In these circumstances seeing that the issue was not vital to the decision of the former suit and that the finding on the issue itself is by no means clear, I would hold that the plea of res judicata connot be taken. I would, therefore, remand the suit to the Commissioner for decision of the appeal on the merits and give appellant his costs of this appeal.

HOPKINS, S. M.—I agree that there was no real finding in the previous suit on the matter now in issue and concur in the order proposed.

Bombay Court of Wards Act (I Bom of 1905*), ss.* 13, 14—Notices, publication of, manner of.

Although the publication of notices under sections 13 and 14 of the Bombay Court of Wards Act in the Government Gazette and local newspapers in English and in vernacular is a sufficient compliance with the law, yet in the interests of illiterate persons some special method of publishing notices calling for claims should be prescribed [p. 940, col. 1.]

Second appeal from the decision of the District Judge, Ahmedabad, in Appeal No. 363 of 1916, reversing the decree passed by the Subordinate Judge at Nadiad, in Civil Suit No. 125 of 1915.

Mr. G. N. Thakor, for the Appellant.

Mr. N. K. Mehta, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.

MACLEOD, C. J.—The plaintiff brought this suit by his next friend, the Talukdari Settlement Officer, against the defendant to recover possession of the plaint land with mesne profits for the year 1915, alleging that his estate was in charge of the Court of Wards; that a notice calling for submission of claims was published in the Government Gazette of the 6th June 1907; that the defendant did not submit his claim as a mortgagee within six months as required by the said notice; that, therefore, notice was issued to the defendant to give up possession of the land on the 25th October 1913 under the Bombay Land Revenue Code; that possession was taken of the land on the 3rd June 1914 in the presence of the Panch; that defendant took back such possession wrongfully on or about the 6th June 1914, when the cause of action for this suit accrued. The defendant denied the claim and alleged that the notice did not bind him; that section 14 of the Court of Wards Act did not bind him, nor did it entitle the plaintiff to maintain the present suit against him, a mortgagee in possession. The trial Court dismissed the suit. The plaintiff appealed and his claim was decreed with costs throughout. It is admitted that a notification under section 14 (1) was properly published and also the notice under section 13 (1) to file claims was properly published. The only defence the defendant has is that he is an illiterate cultivator and could not read the Government Gazette. The learned District Judge admitted that it was a hard case. He says:

"It is absurd to suppose that an illiterate cultivator will read the Government Gazette. It is, however, just as absurd to suppose that he will read the 'Praja Bandhu' or 'Gujarati'. No doubt where there are numerous creditors the fact that an application is necessary soon gets about, but it is not always the case that there are numerous creditors. It would be much more satisfactory, if there were public notification by beat of drum in the principal village of the estate and at the Taluka town. To give notice to each creditor as suggested by the lower Court is impracticable, as the object of the Statute is to enable the Court of Wards to ascertain who the creditors are."

I agree with the remarks made by the learned District Judge. It is certainly desirable that there should be some further publication of the notice calling for claims than the mere publication in the Government Gazette Under section 14 (1) the notice would be published in the Government Gazette and in such other manner as the Governor in Council may, by general or special order, direct, and I think our best course is to send a copy of the proceedings in this case and our judgment to Government, suggesting that some special order should be made under section 14 (1) of the Court of Wards Act with regard to the further publication of notices calling for claims under that section. At present this appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Malabar Compensation for Tenants' Improvements Act (I Mad of 1900), s 19—Contract made after passing of Act—Terms more favourable than Act—Right of tenant to claim under contract—Improvements, value of, method of computing.

Section 19 of the Malabar Compensation for Tenants' Improvements Act is no bar to a tenant claiming under a contract if the terms of the contract are more favourable to him than the provisions of the Act, even though the contract was made after the passing of the Act [p. 940, col. 2.]

In assessing the value of improvements mentioned in a contract the calculation should be made at the rate prevailing at the time of eviction. [p. 941, col. 1.]

Second appeal against the decree of the Court of the Temporary Subordinate Judge, Tellicherry, in Appeal Suit No. 63 of 1919 preferred aginst the decree of the Court of the District Munsif, Madapuram, in Original Suit No. 474 of 1915.

Mr. K. P. M. Menon, for the Appellants.

Messrs. K. P. Padmanabha Pillai and B. V. Parameswara Aiyar, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The questions for consideration are:—

1. Whether 2nd defendant is entitled to contract himself out of the Malabar Tenants' Improvements Act where the terms of the contract are more favourable to him than the provisions of the Act relating to improvements.

2. Whether the calculation of the value of improvements according to Desamerydda (usage of the land) mentioned in the contract should be made at the rate prevailing on date of Exhibit A or at the time of ejectment.

3. What is the amount claimable for improvements according to the contract? Is it (a) two times the value of Kuzhikanom improvement plus twice that amount again for Vettukanom or (b) twice the Kuzhikanom amount plus twice the Vettukanom amount or (c) two times the value of Kuzhikanom puls the value of the Kuzhikanom for Vettukanom (that is thrice on the whole)?

We think that section 19 of the Act does not prevent the tenant from claiming under a contract made even after the passing of the Act, if it is more favourable to him than the Act. The general words in the short judgment in Randupurayil Kunhisore v. Neroth Kunhi Kannan (1) that "section 19 precludes parties from contracting themselves out of the Act by any contract made after 1st January 1886" do not, when taken with the facts of that case and having regard to the language of section 19, prevent the tenant from claiming according to the contract if it is more favourable. The section says only that "nothing in any contract made after the 1st day of January 1886 shall take away or limit the right of a tenant to make improvements and to claim compensation" according to the Act, and not that nothing in any contract made after the 1st day of January 1886 shall oblige the landlord to pay more compensation than is claimable under the Act, nor does it say conversely that nothing in such a contract shall entitle the tenant to claim more compensation than is claimable under the Act.

(1) 1 Ind. Cas. 207; 32 M. 1; 5 M. L. T. 277; 18 M. L. J. 98; 3 M. L. T. 291.

On the 2nd question, we are bound to follow the decision of the Full Bench in Kerala Varmah Valia Raja v. Ramuni (2) and hold that the value at the time of eviction has to be considered.

On the 3rd question, we think that twice the ordinary value for Kuzhikanom and the same amount as the ordinary value of the Kuzhikanom for Vettukanom, total thrice the amount of Kuzhikanom is claimable for both Kuzhikanom and Vettukanom taken together. In the result, the compensation payable to 2nd defendant for Kuzhikanom and Vettukanom, is not Rs. 1,663-15-7 but thrice Rs. 1,271-5-6 plus thrice Rs. 294-8-0. (This will not affect the amount given separately for Ohamayans)

The lower Court's decree will be modified accordingly. Time for redemption extended till six months from this date. The appellant will get half his costs from plaintiffs here and in the lower Appellate Court. The appeal, so far as it is directed against the respondents Nos. 6 to 9, is dismissed with costs.

Provincial Insolvency Act (III of 1907), s. 16 (2), (6)—Receiver, vesting of property in—Order of adjudication, effect of.

The vesting of an insolvent's property in the Receiver takes place only when an order of adjudication is made and such order relates back to the presentation of the petition for insolvency. [p. 942, col 1.]

First appeal from the order of the District Judge, Moradabad, dated the 30th May 1919.

The Hon'ble Dr. S. M. Sulaiman, the Hon'ble Mr. Raza Ali and Mr. P. L. Banerji, for the Appellant.

The Hon'ble Dr. T. B. Sapru and Mr. G. L. Agarwala, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—This is an appeal from an order of the District Judge of Moradabad sitting in insolvency, dismissing an application, filed by the Receiver, for an order that a certain transfer made by the insolvent was void under the Insolvency Law and that the property be handed over to the Receiver. So far as the question decided by the learned Judge and now before us in appeal in concerned, the facts are not in dispute. The respondent suggests that there may be grounds for attacking the order of adjudication and the locus standi of the original petitioning creditor, but these are not matters which can be decided upon this application and he must be left to take such course as may seem proper to him by way of an independent application to the Court below.

The facts are that the petition or application in insolvency was presented on the 3rd of March, summons was issued on the 11th of March, on which day the debtor contracted for the sale of his immoveable property, and on the following day, namely, the 12th of March, the sale-deed in question was executed, providing that certain portions of the consideration money should be left with the purchaser for payment to certain creditors of the debtor of the debts due to them. The debtor was adjudicated insolvent on the 2 st of March 19.9 and on the 25th of March the present applicant, the Receiver, applied to set aside the transfer both under sections 36 and 37 and, by a supplementary application or amendment of his original application made on the 24th April, under section 16.

It is alleged that four witnesses were summoned on behalf of the applicant, the Receiver, and a large number on behalf of the debtor, but that no evidence was actually recorded on either side and that.

the Receiver declined to call any parole evidence or to put the witnesses summoned into the box simply because they had nothing relevant to say. The facts really speak for themselves and raise a question of Bankruptcy Law, which so far as the English law is concerned, has been settled for many years and which, we think, is not doubful under the Provincial Insolvency Act. Section 16, sub section 2, provides that, on the making of an order of adjudication, in this case the 21st of March, the whole of the property of the insolvent shall vest in the Receiver and shall become divisible among the creditors. If that provision stood by itself, there would be no question but that any dealing with his property by the insolvent before the date of the adjudication would be good. Sub-section 6 contains a provision, which is familiar in the English Bankruptcy Law and which dates as far back at least as the year 1869, that an order of adjudication shall relate back and take effect from the date of the presentation of the petition on which it is made. In our view the joint effect of these two provisions is this:—No vesting takes place until an order of adjudication is made. It is the making of the order of adjudication which vests the property and only upon such an order being made can any vesting take place at all; but once the order is made, the effect created by it is by a legal fiction taken to relate back to the presentation of the petition or, in other words, the commencement of insolvency. It is impossible to give any real meaning to the word "relate" or to the words "take effect from" contained in sub-section 6 unless this be the real meaning. This question has, so far as we have been able to ascertain with the assistance of the experienced gentlemen appearing in this appeal, not been seriously raised hitherto and there is no reported case in the official reports, but there is a record of a case in which the question arose indirectly by reason of the meaning sought to be put upon section 36, which was heard in the High Court at Madras in February 1918 by two Judges, both of whom took the view which we now take. That case is Sankaranarayana v. Alagiri Aiyar (1). We are not satisfied that there is really all the difference between the provisions of the English law and the Provincial Insolvency Act, which appears to have troubled the Madras High Court; but it does not matter, as the view which we take is the view which was always taken from the earliest days in the administration of the Bankruptcy Law for reasons inherent in the policy of the Bankruptcy Law, some of which are contained in the judgment of the Madras High Court. The commercial community cannot be too often reminded of the risks which everybody runs in dealing with a man who is in low water and who may have committed an act of insolvency. Section 38 of the Provincial Insolvency Act, which is another section taken from the English Legislature, protects anybody who before the date of the order of adjudication deals with the insolvent for valuable consideration, but that protection has always been held to be unavailable to a transferee where the circumstances show that the transfer which he has taken is in itself an offence against the Bankruptcy Law, that is to say, a man cannot claim the protection of a bona fide transfer for value, where he is himself engaged in an act which is an act of insolvency. There are reasons for thinking that this transfer might have been assailed on at least two other grounds. If it be the fact, as was suggested, but this has not been proved, that it was a transfer under which the puachaser was to pay certain creditors of the debtor to the exclusion of others, and the debtor was unable to pay his creditors in full, it would have been an undue preference and in itself an act of insolvency under section 4 (c). If, on the other hand, it was a transfer of the whole of his property which then remained to him with the intention of defeating or delaying his creditors except those for whose payment he made provision, that also would have been an act of insolvency under section 4, and no transferee under such a deed could take any title against the Receiver if an interim order of adjudication were made. These matters have not been gone into because the adjudication appears to have proceeded upon an altogether different act of insolvency anterior in date, and the circumstances explain, and in our opinion justify, the court taken by the Receiver in refraining from calling any evidence. Technically, no doubt, it may be said that the Receiver ought to make a formal affidavit setting out the facts which are ascertainable from the record, as we have mentioned them above, and file such affidavit, or formal evidence in support of his application, and if objection had been taken by the respondent to the absence of such an affidavit, it could easily have been remedied by an adjournment and by the Receiver filing the necessary affidavit, but there are no rules which make such a course obligatory upon the Receiver. It is left to the Court to use its discretion and common sense in each case, and of course the Court being the Court in which the order of adjudication has been made and in which all preliminary proceedings have already been taken, it can take judicial notice of the debts and proceedings. Therefore no possible prejudice could arise to the respondent from the absence of any formal evidence of the nature we have suggested. The real mistake of the learned Judge is that he has not adjudicated at all upon the matter, which, we think, is clearly established by the admitted facts. He treated it as an application which was really not supported by any evidence at all. If that were correct, he would have been right in dismissing the application, or at any rate in adjourning it to compel the Receiver to file some affidavit or other evidence, but in this particular case the deed and the date on which it was made and the date of the petition and the date of the order of adjudication spoke for themselves and constituted really the sole evidence to which it was necessary for the Receiver to refer in order to establish the invalidity of this deed. The appeal must be allowed with costs including fees on the higher scale and the deed declared void under section 16. We may say that we entirely agree with the learned Judge that no case was made out under section 37.

(1) 49 Ind. Cas. 283; (1918) M. W. N. 487; 24 M. L. T. 149; 35 M. L. J. 296; 8 L. W. 281.

Privy Council Procedure—Appeal, withdrawal of, on terms—Parties not sui juris*—Minor—Consent of Court, when should be given—Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. XXXII, r. 7.*

An application to allow an appeal to be withdrawn on terms, where there are parties concerned who are not sui juris, should not be granted without grave consideration. [p. 944, col. 1.]

The Courts in India should ordinarily accept as sufficient the assurance of the minor's Counsel that the compromise which is proposed is for his benefit. [p 944, col. 1.]

In the present case the Board allowed such a compromise in an appeal pending before it on the assurance of the minor's Counsel, supported by a certificate of the Counsel who had appeared for him in the lower Courts. [p. 944, col. 1.]

Application to withdraw an appeal to His Majesty in Council from a decree of the Bombay High Court, FACTS.—This suit arose out of the Will of a widow, Khansubai, who left considerable property. The defendants were the executors and beneficiaries under the Will One of them, a beneficiary, was a minor, and was represented by his guardian, Shirinibai, one of the executors. The learned Judge decreed the suit, but on appeal his decision was reversed. Plaintiff Sakinabai, therefore, presented the present appeal. Pending the hearing the parties entered into a written agreement for the withdrawal of the appeal on certain terms.

The present application was by the minor respondent, and prayed for a certificate that the agreement of compromise was for the benefit of the minor, or that the case might be remanded to the High Court to enquire and certify whether the agreement was for the benefit of the minor, and upon such certificate that leave be given to withdraw the appeal. The application was supported by an affidavit by Shirinibai, stating that she was advised that the compromise was for the benefit of the minor, annexed to which was the opinion of Counsel who had appeared for Shirinibai at the trial and for Shirinibai and the minor on the appeal in the High Court, advising the compromise as being in the interest of the minor.

Mr. E. B. Raikes, for the Appellant.

Mr, Kenworthy Brown, for the minor Respondents.

JUDGMENT.

LORD SHAW.—Applications to allow an appeal to be withdrawn on terms, when there are parties concerned who are not sui juris, are not granted without grave consideration. In the present case Mr. Kenworthy Brown, as Counsel for the minor concerned, having considered the whole proceedings, both in their legal bearings and with a full regard to the interests of the minor and his estate, has assured their Lordships that he is of opinion that the compromise is for the benefit of the minor. The case is further strengthened in that direction by a certificate of Mr. J. B. Kanga and Mr. V. F. Taraporewala, the Counsel for the minor in the Courts below, that the compromise which is proposed is for his benefit.

If there were an appeal pending before the High Court, this certificate would have been presented to the Court below, if advantage had been taken of rule 7 of Order XXXII of the Code which prescribes that:—

"No next friend or guardian for the suit shall, without the leave of the Court, expressly recorded in the proceedings, enter into any agreement or compromise on behalf of a minor with reference to the suit in which he acts as next friend or guardian."

In these circumstances the Board finds itself in possession of what, according to ordinary practice, would have been satisfactory to the Court below, whose leave to enter into a compromise would have been asked. It has the further assurance of learned Counsel at its own Bar and upon the whole their Lordships are of opinion that this compromise is for the benefit of the minor and one that they should sanction. In terms of the compromise, accordingly, their Lordships will advise His Majesty that leave should be granted to withdraw the appeal.

Leave granted.

Registration Act (XVI of 1908), s. 17 (1) (c)—Receipt for consideration money, whether compulsorily registrable—Payment, whether can be proved aliunde—Practice—Ruling of single Judge, whether binding.

A receipt for the balance of the purchase-money on account of immoveable property reciting an oral sale is compulsorily registrable under clause c of section 17 (1) of the Registration Act, although it is not in itself a sale-deed, and, unless it is registered, it cannot be received in evidence, but payment of consideration may be proved aliunde. [p. 944, col. 2; p. 945, col. 1.]

The ruling of a single Judge of the Lahore Chief Court, which has not been dissented from or overruled, is binding on the subordinate Courts in the Punjab and must be followed [p. 944, col. 2.]

Second appeal from the decree of the District Judge, Mianwali, dated 8th August 1918.

Mr. B. N. Kapur, for the Appellant.

Mr. Behari Lal, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—In Ram Chand v. Chattar Singh (1) a receipt very similar in terms to Exhibit D 1 was held by Shah Din, J., to be an instrument compulsorily registrable under clause (c) of section 17 (1) of the Registration Act. It was held by the same learned Judge that the document before him was not in itself a sale deed within the meaning and for the purposes of clause (b) of that section. I have myself no hesitation in following this ruling, and the District Judge was not justified in refusing to follow it simply because it was the decision of a single Judge of this Court.

In this connection I would point out that a ruling by a single Judge of this Court, which has not been dissented from or overruled, is as much binding upon the subordinate Courts of the Province as the decisions of Division Benches.

But while I hold that Exhibit D 1 was not admissible in evidence, inasmuch as it has not been registered, I see no reason why defendant should not prove payment of consideration aliunde. The District Judge has found that Mawaz Khan, the second vendee, did not pay the full sum of Rs. 1,125 to Muzaffar Khan, the first vendee, but that he did actually pay a sum of Rs. 400. I agree with the learned Judge that the mere fact that the second vendee has failed to prove that he paid the full amount of the consideration does not vitiate the sale to him. Muzaffar Khan, the vendor, admits that he has sold the land to Mawaz Khan and that he has received full consideration for the bargain. It is also shown by copies of entries on the record that mutation was effected in favour of the second vendee in March 1918.

The result is that before plaintiff obtained his decree for pre-emption, the land was actually sold to Mawaz Khan who has a superior right of pre-emption, and plaintiff's suit has accordingly been rightly dismissed. I dismiss his appeal with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Order III, rule 1, Civil Procedure Code, is wide enough to enable the Court to direct any party to the suit to appear in person, whether he be a minor or a major or of sound or unsound mind, and the order may be made at any stage of the suit. [p. 947, col. 2.]

When such an order is given to the guardian of a lunatic or minor defendant, it is in effect an order to the defendant to appear in person and failure to comply with it will enable the Court to act under Order IX, rule 12, of the Civil Procedure Code. [p. 947, col. 2.]

Petitions, under section 115 of Act V of 1908 and section 107 of the Government of India Act, praying the High Court to revise the orders of the Court of the Temporary Subordinate Judge, Ramnad at Madura, dated the 26th December 1918 and 21st January 1919, in I. A. Nos. 204 and 206 of 1918, in Original Suit No. 86 of 1916 and the order dated 4th January 1919 in Original Suit No. 86 of 1916 respectively.

FACTS appear from the judgment.

The Hon'ble Mr. S. Srinivasa Aiyangar, (Advocate General), for the Petitioner:—The lower Court had no power to set aside the ex parte order, that it had passed, on the application of the defendant's new guardian under Order IX, rule 7, Civil Procedure Code. Under Order IX, rule 12, the new guardian is to be subject to the rules that precede, i. e., he is affected by the disabilities in those rules but cannot avail himself of the remedies provided by them.

Nextly, the ex parte order was made owing to the defendant's failure to appear in compliance with the order of Court. Hence the defendant should personally apply under rule 7 and not by Pleader.

Good cause has not been shown for the guardian not producing his ward and there were not sufficient grounds for setting aside the ex parte order.

In any event before setting aside the ex parte order the Court should have insisted on the production of the defendant afresh. The present Subordinate Judge had no power to go back on his predecessor's order.

AYYA NANDAN v. THANAMMAL.

Messrs. L. A. Govindaraghava Aiyar and K N. Kumarsami Aiyar, for Respondents:—The first order for trial of the suit ex parte was itself incompetent as Order IX, rule 12, does not contemplate cases of guardians not producing their wards. Rajagopal Pandarithar v. Muthukumara Chettiar (1). In any event the Court had jurisdiction to set aside the ex parte order on the application of a new intending guardian. Rule 12 should not be too narrowly construed. The new guardian is entitled to avail himself of all provisions in the preceding rules. There is nothing in rule 7 to restrict it to applications by the parties themselves. There is nothing to prevent their representation by Vakils.

It was not obligatory on the Court, while setting aside the ex parte order, to insist on the guardian producing the defendant in Court. It rested in the Court's discretion to do so, and the High Court should not interfere, in revision, with such discretion.

JUDGMENT.—The suit from which these revision petitions arise was brought by the plaintiff as the heir to the estate of one Chinna Nadar, alleging inter alia that the defendant, his widow, was a lunatic at the time the succession opened on his death and she was, therefore, disqualified under the Hindu Law from getting a widow's estate and that she was still a lunatic at the date of the suit. He, therefore, proposed that a guardian ad litem should be appointed for her for the suit. She denied the allegation of unsoundness of mind made against her, but the Court, after holding a preliminary enquiry, came to the conclusion that she was of unsound mind and that a guardian was necessary to protect her interests in suit. The matter was brought up to this Court and a Bench of this Court confirmed the order and appointed her brother as her guardian ad litem and the correctness of that order is, therefore, no longer open to question in these proceedings. It is, however, rightly conceded by the learned Advocate-General for the plaintiff that that finding in no way affects the trial of the issue in the suit whether she was a lunatic when the succession opened.

To prove the defendant's lunacy the plaintiff applied to the Court to pass an order for her personal appearance in Court and the then Subordinate Judge, purporting to act under the proviso to Order III, rule 1, of the Civil Procedure Code, gave directions to the defendant's guardian to have her produced in Court on the day of hearing. Though several adjournments were given for the purpose and though on one occasion the Vakil appearing for her guardian undertook to produce her, she was not produced in Court, nor did she appear herself. The guardian himself also failed to appear. Thereupon the Subordinate Judge acting under Order IX, rule 12 read with rule 6 (1), decided to proceed with the suit ex parte against the defendant and adjourned the hearing of the suit ex parte to 27th August 1918 In doing so, he passed a long order wherein he considered the question whether the guardian was acting against the interests of the lunatic in not producing her and he thought, though there was no evidence for it, that the guardian was acting in what he considered to be or was advised to be in the interests of the defendant; and that, therefore, there was no ground for removing him and appointing a new guardian.

Before the case came on for hearing ex parte on the adjourned date, the defendant's mother put in an affidavit alleging negligence on the part of the defendant's guardian and prayed that he may be removed and that she may be appointed guardian of her daughter and that the order directing the suit to be heard ex parte may be set aside under Order IX, rule 7, and that she may be allowed to defend the suit. This application came on for hearing before a new Subordinate Judge and he has allowed the petitioner's prayer. It is against his orders that the present revision petitions are filed under section 115 of the Code of Civil Procedure and section 107 of the Government of India Act.

Civil Revision Petitions Nos. 149 and 151 are against the orders removing defendant's brother from guardianship and appointing her mother in his place under Order XXXII, rule 11, of the Civil Procedure Code. These orders have not been seriously attacked before me by the learned Advocate-General,

(1) 17 Ind. Cas. 762; 23 M. L. J. 676; 13 M. L. T. 19.

AYYA NADAN v. THANAMMAL.

The present Subordinate Judge has found that the guardian was guilty of neglect of duty in not complying with the order of the Court and thus jeopardising the right of the defendant to defend the suit. Though the previous Subordinate Judge thought that there was no reason to remove him, it was open to the present Subordinate Judge to remove him as, in his opinion, he was guilty of neglect of duty. The power under rule 11 may be exercised at any time during the pendency of the suit. It was argued in the lower Court that because an order to try the suit ex parte had been passed, there was no necessity or power to change the guardian. No authority was cited to support that contention and I think it was rightly disallowed by the Subordinate Judge. Even in an ex parte case the guardian has still to consider whether he should not apply to set aside the order ex parte and to appeal if necessary. If the guardian on record dies, it is conceded that the case cannot proceed without a fresh guardian being appointed in whatever stage it may be. That shows the necessity to have a guardian on record throughout the trial to make it a valid trial. There is nothing in rule 11 to make it applicable to an ex parte case. The lower Court's orders in the above matter were, therefore, right and Civil Revision Petitions Nos. 149 and 151 fail.

Civil Revision Petition No. 150 of 1919 is against the order setting aside the order declaring that the trial of the case should proceed against the defendant ex parte and giving leave to the new guardian to defend the case. As stated above, the former order was passed because the then guardian had failed to produce the defendant though ordered to do so and she herself had failed to appear; it was passed under Order IX, rule 12, read with rule 6 (1) of the Civil Procedure Code. The learned Vakil for the respondent contends that that order was not a competent one because rule 12 does not contemplate cases of guardians failing to produce their wards, and he relies on the ruling of Sadasiva Aiyar, J., in Rajagopala Pandarithar v. Muthu Kumara Chettiar (1). The question is one of some difficulty; but I am inclined to think that too narrow a construction should not be put upon rule 12 so as to exclude its application to a case where parties are represented by guardians. Order III, rule 1, proviso, is wide enough to enable the Court to direct any party to the suit to appear in person, whether he be a minor or a major or of sound or unsound mind, and it may be done at any stage of the suit; see Vaiguntathammal v. Valliammai Ammal (2). There can be doubt that defendant is a party to the suit, even though he be represented by a guardian on account of minority or of unsoundness of mind. The only way the Court can give an order for his appearance is by directing his guardian to produce him. When such an order is given, it seems to me that it is in effect an order to the defendant to appear in person; and failure to comply with it will, in my opinion, enable the Court to act under rule 12. The case in Rajagopal Pandarithar v. Muthukumara Chettiar (1) above cited was somewhat different, as there the order was given to the minor's next friend for himself to appear in person, and the case is thus distinguishable and I need express no opinion whether the view taken in it should be followed. I am inclined to think that the first order was, therefore, a competent order. But whether it be a competant order or not, the result of this civil revision petition will be the same.

Assuming it to be a competent order, I consider that it was open to the Court to set it aside under Order IX, rule 7, on the application of defendant's new guardian. The learned Advocate-General argues that rule 7 does not apply because the clause in rule 12, which says 'he shall be subject to all the provisions of the foregoing rules,' suggests that he is liable to the disabilities imposed but he is not entitled to the remedies provided for, the word used being 'subject.' I am unable to accept the argument, as it is founded on too narrow a construction of the word 'subject.' The application of rule 6 carries with it in my view the application of rule 7, and I consider the words "all the provisions" in rule 12 show clearly that rule 7 applies. It was next argued that in a case like the present where the order ex parte was made because the defendant failed to appear when ordered to do so, the defendant himself should appear in person when applying under rule 7 and that the application could not be made by a Pleader for him. I did not understand the learned Advocate General to contend that in cases of minors and of lunatics who are unable to act by themselves they should appear in person and not by their guardians. Such an argument would be on the face of it untenable for the very reason that minors and lunatics cannot act for themselves. I cannot agree that parties are not entitled to appear by Vakil under rule 7. There is nothing in the wording of the rule excluding appearance by a Vakil as allowed by Order III, rule 1. There was no order of Court that the defendant should appear in the person in the matter of the application; though it was open to the Court to have passed such an order, it was not done here. There was, therefore, nothing to prevent the defendant's guardian filing the application through her Vakil and the lower Court committed no error of procedure in allowing the Vakil to file the petition and to appear for her.

I agree, however, with the learned Advocate-General that the previous non appearance for which good cause has to be assigned under the rule, is non-appearance which has led to the order under rule 6, clause 1, and that in the present case it is the non-production of the defendant. The learned Subordinate Judge has, however, considered this question and has held that there was sufficient explanation not only for the old guardian's non-appearance but also for his non-production of the defendant. That a guardian's laches may be sufficient cause for setting aside an ex parte decree or order in the case of minors was laid down in the rulings in Adayapadi Ramanna Udpa v. Krishna Udpa (3) and in Kesho Pershad v. Hirday Narain (4); in any case there is no ground for interference in revision with the finding of the Subordinate Judge.

It was finally argued that the Subordinate Judge should have at any rate imposed as a condition for setting aside the order ex parte that the defendant should be produced in Court on a date to be fixed by him. This was the contention most pressed by the learned Advocate-General. It was also argued by him that the present Subordinate Judge had no jurisdiction to go back upon the order for production passed by his predecessor under Order III, rule 1, proviso, as it could only have been done by way of review under Order XLVII, but that remedy was not available under rule 2 of that Order as the Judge who made the order was not the present Subordinate Judge.

It is true that in setting aside the ex parte order under Order IX, rule 7, the Subordinate Judge did not impose any condition as to defendant's appearance in person as he might have done. The matter however, was in his discretion and I am not prepared to say that his discretion was exercised so improperly as to amount to a material irregularity of procedure justifying interference of this Court in revision. It is still open to the plaintiff to apply to the Subordinate Judge in the trial of the suit to direct the personal appearance of the defendant in Court; all that the Subordinate Judge has refused to do is to impose it as a condition precedent to setting aside the order under rule 7.

I do not consider that any questions of review or of want of jurisdiction arise here. The direction to a party to appear in person decides no rights between the parties. The order is made for the further progress of the suit and to help the Court in its proper disposal It is an order that can be, and is often, made by the Court suo motu and it is, therefore, open to the Court to change it whenever it thinks it necessary or expedient to do so in the interests of justice without any application, by the parties, for review for the purpose. The nature of the order does not get changed because it happens to be passed, as in this case, at the request of one of the parties. Furthermore, the previous order in this case was for appearance on a particular date, and it became spent on the expiry of that date. The Court had then to consider afresh whether the same order should be made for another date, and when it held that no fresh order need issue, it cannot be said to have been acting by way of review in doing so, it was really a fresh disposal of the question. If one party desires the presence of the opposite party in Court for the purpose of examining him as a witness, as the plaintiff in the present case seems to do, the procedure which he has a right to adopt

(3) 25 Ind. Cas 450; 27 M. L. J. 167.

is the one under Order XVI of the Code of Civil Procedure, but a direction under Order III, rule 1, proviso, is not one which he had a right to claim.

I am, therefore, of opinion that the Subordinate Judge had jurisdiction in making the orders in question here and that he did not act "illegally or with any material irregularity" in doing so: and there is thus no ground for interference under section 115 of the Code of Civil Procedure or section 107 of the Government of India Act.

All the three revision petitions are, therefore, dismissed with costs, with Vakil's fee in Civil Revision Petition No. 150 of 1919 only.

Easement—Custom—Privacy, invasion of, whether actionable—Gujarat Province.

In the Province of Gujarat there is a customary usage which makes an invasion of privacy an actionable wrong; and a man may not, therefore, open new doors or windows in his house, or make any new apertures, or enlarge old ones, in a way which will enable him to overlook those portions of his neighbour's premises which are ordinarily secluded from observation. [p. 949, col. 2]

Second appeal from the decision of the District Judge, Ahmedabad, in Appeal No. 518 of 1915, modifying the decree passed by the Additional First Class Subordinate Judge at Ahmedabad, in Civil Suit No. 567 of 1914.

Mr. G. N. Thakor, for the Appellant.

Mr. H. V. Divatia, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.

MACLEOD, C. J. In this case the plaintiff sued for several injunctions against the defendant, his neighbour. He succeeded in getting an injunction from the District Judge, restraining the defendant from invading the privacy of his bedroom by opening a window in the additional storeys erected by him. The Judge has found as a matter of fact that the privacy of the plaintiff was not invaded directly before the house of the defendant was raised, and he has given effect to the decisions of this Court which have held that in the Province of Gujarat there is a customary usage which makes invasion of privacy an actionable wrong, and that a man may not open new doors or windows in his house, or make any new apertures, or enlarge old ones, in a way which will enable him to overlook those portions of his neighbour's premises which are ordinarily secluded from observation. That is laid down in Manishankar Hargovan v. Trikam Narsi (1). The Court said: "A series of decisions extending over a long number of years, and commencing with 1 Borr. 272, has settled this question." Those decisions must no doubt have been founded on evidence, at any rate we must presume that, and as the case cited has never been overruled, in second appeal it is impossible for us to say that the decision on a question of fact was wrong. Therefore, in the Province of Gujarat this customary right of privacy must be taken to have been proved. The only ground upon which it may be argued that the decision of the learned District Judge was wrong was that the plaintiff before the defendant altered his building had no privacy for this particular room. For, if already there was a window in the defendant's house which looked directly into the plaintiff's bedroom, it would make no difference if more windows were added which also overlooked the plaintiff's room. But the learned Judge has found as a fact that the plaintiff had a right of privacy for this particular room, and that right of privacy was not affected by the fact that a man with a flexible neck standing on the defendant's Agashi (which did not actually belong to the house in dispute) might be able to crane over and thus see a portion of the plaintiff's bedroom. That, as the learned Judge remarked, would be a positive act of spying. I do not think that it could be said that the plaintiff has not acquired a right of privacy for his bedroom, merely because a person by doing something, which he ought not to do, might be able to look into a portion of it. In my opinion, therefore, the decision of the learned District Judge was right. The appeal should be dismissed with costs.

(1) 5 B. H. C. R. (A. C. J.) 42.

HEATON, J.—I agree. It was argued that the somewhat peculiar exception to the general law which has been applied to the Province of Gujarat really ought not to be applied. We have an instance of it in the case of Manishankar Hargovan v. Trikam Narsi (1) and it is now too well-recognised to be successfully disputed. It is not contended in this case that the person aggrieved belongs to a class who do not by custom obtain the benefit of this law as to privacy. It may be there are people on whom this peculiar custom confers benefit, and others who do not take that benefit. But no point of that kind is raised here. Therefore, we have to accept first of all that the rule as to privacy applies in this neighbourhood; and secondly, that it applies to the plaintiff. That being so, the questions whether his privacy was real before the present additions to the defendant's house, and whether that privacy is now invaded by reason of those additions, are both purely questions of fact. They are not, and cannot, as far as I can see, be questions of law. The Judge below has found on these questions of fact. He is right in his application of the law, and I think his decision must be affirmed and the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Provincial Small Cause Courts Act (IX of 1887) Sch II, Art. 13—Small Cause Court, jurisdiction of—Suit for price of trees, whether cognisable by Small Cause Court.

A suit by a zemindar to recover half the price of trees sold by his tenant, based on the terms of the village wajib-ul-arz, is cognisable by a Small Cause Court.

Civil revision against the order of the Judge, Small Cause Court, Kasganj, District Etah, dated the 22nd August 1919.

Mr. Panna Lal, for the Petitioner.

Mr. Gulzari Lal, for the Opposite Party.

JUDGMENT.—This is an application in revision from the decree of the Small Cause Court Judge on the ground that the learned Judge had no jurisdiction to entertain the suit. The plaintiffs, the opposite parties, sued in the Court of the Judge of Small Causes at Kasganj for the recovery of half the price of the trees sold by the applicant, on the allegation that under the custom prevailing in the village the plaintiffs, who were the Zamindars, were entitled to half the sale proceeds. The claim was resisted on various grounds, but it was decreed. In revision to this Court it is stated that under Article 13, Schedule II, of the Small Cause Court Act the present suit is not cognizable by Small Cause Court. I do not think that the contention for the applicant is well founded. Mr. Rustomji in is commentary on the Small Cause Courts Act says:—

"If the claim is simply on the basis of a contract or custom, for example, as recorded in the wajib ul-arz., Article 13 has no application and the suit is prima facie small cause."

Under this note he gives rulings of several High Courts, vide page 63 of his book. The haq that the plaintiffs are claiming was not in respect of any immoveable property but in respect of the price of the trees sold, and their claim is based on the terms of the wajib-ul arz of the village. The objection fails and I dismiss the application with costs.

JUDGMENT.—This appeal is preferred by the defendants, and judgment has been delayed because after arguments had been addressed to us, the learned Vakils thought that they might be able to arrange a compromise.

The defendants have a shop in Belanganj Barar with a kachha floor and a roof of corrugated tin, and they have began to erect a pucca building instead. The plaintiffs are some of their landlords with an interest of 4½ annas, and they want an injunction restraining the defendants from erecting a masonry structure.

The principal issues on the pleadings were :—

4. Whether the defendants have acquired a premanent right of tenancy in the disputed land?

5. Are the defendants entitled to construct ary pucca structure on the disputed land by usage or otherwise?

The defendants assert that they have what they call a Chandiana right, and that this right is permanent, heritable and transferable. The Courts below have both found that this right has not been proved.

On behalf of the defendants three arguments were advanced. The first is that as the plaintiffs are only owners of a portion of superior interest, they are not entitled to ask for an injunction in the absence of their co-owners. No authority has been advanced for this proposition, and it is difficult to see on what principle one of several co owners should be denied relief, if he can make out a case for an injunction.

The second argument is that the erection of pucca buildings is not waste, and that, therefore, no injunction should be granted. The plaintiffs have never suggested that such a building would cause waste; what they say is that it is an assertion of a permanent right in the defendants, and on that account they must interfere. If the plaintiffs allowed the defendants to build without protest, and after the building was complete tried to eject the defendants as mere tenants-at-will, it is certain that they would be met by pleas of waiver and acquiescence. If, therefore, the defendants are allowed to go on with the building, the plaintiffs' right as landlords will be jeopardised, and on that account they have a right to seek an injunction.

The third argument is that the case is one in which pecuniary compensation can be given for the invasion of the plaintiffs' rights. That is obvious and it was in the hope that the parties would agree upon a sum to be paid to the plaintiffs that we deferred our decision. The parties, however, did not ask the lower Court to deal with this aspect of the matter, with the result that there is no evidence on the record upon which an estimate may be founded. It is too late now for the defendants to ask for a remand. They chose to fight the suit on the ground that they had a permanent right and that they were at liberty to build such structures as they pleased, and now that they have failed they cannot ask for the scope of the suit to be enlarged, and a fresh enquiry started.

The appeal is dismissed with costs.

Muhammadan Law—Gift—Possession, delivery of, what constitutes—Donor and donee present on gifted premises—Intention.

Under the Muhammadan Law a gift is invalid unless there is a delivery of possession. Where the donee is with the donor on the premises at the time of the gift, an appropriate intention may put the one out as well as the other into possession without any actual physical departure or formal entry But it does not follow in every case necessarily that where the two are present, possession must be deemed to have been transferred. [p. 952, col. 2.]

The question as to whether the donor intended to transfer the possession at the time of the gift must be answered with reference to the facts of each particular case. [p. 952, col. 2]

Second appeal from the decision of the District Judge, Poona, in Appeal No. 37 of 1917, varying the decree passed by the Joint Subordinate Judge at Poona, in Civil Suit No. 288 of 1914.

Mr. A. G. Desai, for the Appellant.

Mr. D R. Manerikar, for Respondent No. 1.

JUDGMENT.—This appeal arises out of a suit brought by a Muhamadan widow to recover her dower and her share in the property of her deceased husband.

The first point urged in support of the appeal is that her claim to dower is time-barred. Both the Courts have decided in favour of the plaintiff. The decision on this point really depends upon the question of fact as to whether there was any demand and refusal during her husband's lifetime. The finding is in favour of the plaintiff, which must be accepted in second appeal. The point, therefore, fails.

The second point relates to the gift of a house. Defendant No. 1 pleaded that the house in question was given to him by way of gift by his grandfather on 8th July 1912 and relied upon a registered deed of gift. Both the Courts have found that there was no delivery of possession and that the gift is invalid. It is urged that there was a transfer of possession so as to make the gift valid. It is clear that the registered deed of gift by itself is not sufficient. According to the Muhammadan Law there must be a delivery of possession. In the present case it is found by the trial Court, and this finding has been acquiesced in by the lower Appellate Court, that the donor did not give up his control over the property, and continued in possession of the house until his death in November 1912. The application put in by defendant No. 1, who is the son of the donor's daughter, in January 1913 before the Municipal authorities shows that the possession had remained all along with the donor during his lifetime. It is urged, however, that the donee was with the donor on the premises at the time of this gift and that under the circumstances the possession must be deemed to have been transferred to him. In support of this view reliance is placed upon certain observations in Shaik Ibhram v. Shaik Suleman (1). It may be, as pointed out in that case, that an appropriate intention where two are present on the same premises may put the one out as well as the other into possession without any actual physical departure or formal entry. But it does not follow in every case necessarily that where the two are present, the possession must be deemed to have been transferred. The question as to whether the donor intended to transfer the possession at the time of the gift must be answered with reference to the facts of each particular case. In the present case on the evidence the trial Court has definitely found that there was no transfer of possession. The Appellate Court has given no reasons for accepting this finding, and that has necessitated our examining this question at greater length than we might otherwise have to do. In spite of the omission on the part of the District Judge to give reasons in support of the finding that there was no transfer of possession, we think that the finding must be accepted now. The gift was, therefore, invalid.

Lastly, it is urged that the plaintiff had certain ornaments which she was bound to account for before she could be allowed to claim her share out of her husband's estate. It is clear from the admitted facts in the case that soon after the marriage between the plaintiff and her husband in 1899 there were differences between them. These ornaments were never effectively claimed by the husband during his lifetime, although in Suit No. 215 of 1899 a reference was made to them by the husband. It follows that either these ornaments never formed part of the husband's estate or if they formed part of his estate once, they had ceased to form part thereof in November 1912, when he died. This point also must be disallowed.

The result is that the decree of the lower Appellate Court is confirmed and the appeal is dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

PIARI LAL—PLAINTIFF—RESPONDENT.

Specific Relief Act (I of 1877), s 42—Property in possession of Court and tenants—Declaratory suit, maintainability of—Custom—Adoption—Mahesris—Widow, power of, to adopt—Consent of husband or collaterals, whether necessary.

Where the property in dispute is partly in the possession of the Court and partly in the possession of tenants who have not attorned to either party, a suit for a declaration of title is maintainable in respect thereof. [p. 54, col 2.]

Mahesris, whose home or place of origin is in the Bikanir State, do not, in the matter of adoption, follow strict Mitakshara Law, and among them the previous authority of her deceased husband, who had separate property and was not a member of a joint family, is not legally necessary to enable a widow to make a valid adoption, nor is the consent of his collaterals necessary. [p. 54, col 2; p. 96, col 2]

First appeal from the decree of the District Judge, Delhi, dated the 2nd August 1915.

Mr. Moti Sagar, R. S., for the Appellants.

Bakhshi Tek Chand and Mr. Mehr Chand, Mahajan, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—One Jugal Kishore, a Maheśri residing at Delhi, died childless leaving a widow, Musammat Dakho, who, during her lifetime, adopted her minor brother Murli Dhar. After the death of Musammat Dakho, Piari Lal, plaintiff-respondent, a cousin of Jugal Kishore, instituted a suit in the Court of the District Judge at Delhi against Kalu Ram, the father of Musammat Dakho, and Murli Dhar, minor, under the guardianship of Kalu Ram, defendants-appellants, praying for a declaration that he was the owner of a certain house and its contents and for an injunction restraining the defendants from interfering with the said property. The suit was opposed on behalf of Murli Dhar who claimed to be the adopted son of Jugal Kishore, having been adopted to him by his widow Musammat Dakho.

The following two issues, amongst others not material, were framed:—

(1) Is the plaintiff not entitled to bring a suit for a declaration as regards the house and property therein?

(4) Has Musammat Dakho made a valid adoption of Murli Dhar to her husband?

With regard to the first issue, the contention of the defendants was that the plaintiff not being in possession, a suit for a mere declaration without consequential relief would not lie. The looks of the Court of the District Judge were on three of the rooms whilst others were occupied by tenants and, therefore, on the authorities of Ohinnammal v. Varadarajulu (1) and Lachhmi Bai v. Hondi Bai (2) the lower Court held that the declaratory suit was maintainable. On the fourth issue the lower Court, whilst holding that the factum of adoption had been proved, found that the defendants had failed to prove that Murli Dhar had been validly adopted and, therefore, granted a decree as prayed for except with regard to jewellery. The defendants appeal to this Court.

For the appellants it is again contended that under the circumstances of the case a declaratory suit is not maintainable. Lengthy arguments on both sides on this point have been addressed to us and for the plaintiff respondent it is prayed that if we are of opinion that the appellants' contention is correct, he should be allowed to amend the plaint so as to include a prayer for possession on payment of the proper Court-fee. We do not propose to discuss the large number of judicial decisions which have been cited before us In the lower Court it was admitted on behalf of the defendants as follows:—"Three rooms inside the house are in the possession of the Court, that is, the Court's lock is on them." It may be that originally the locks were placed on the premises to safeguard the contents and to enable lists to be prepared, but the locks continued to remain on the three rooms and it must be held that the Court was in possession of those rooms. The parties were not. The remaining portions were occupied by tenants who had apparently not attorned to either party. In their application of the 7th August 1914 the defendants admitted that they were no longer in possession of the premises under locks and asked for possession. There is no evidence that the tenants have attorned to the defendants and in this respect the case can be distinguished from some of the rulings cited and relied upon. Under the particular circumstances of this case we agree with the lower Court and hold that the suit as instituted is maintainable.

The main contention in this case relates to the validity of the adoption. The lower Court has held that the defendants have failed to prove that the adoption was authorised by Jugal Kishore prior to his death, and with this finding we entirely agree. The parties are Maheswris by caste. The home or place of origin of Maheswris is in the Bikaneer State. Both parties were agreed in the lower Court that, in the matter of adoption, Maheswris do not follow the strict Mitakshara Law. They were both agreed that the previous authority of her deceased husband is not legally necessary to enable a widow to make a valid adoption. But whilst the defendants contended that Maheswri widows have an unrestricted power to adopt to their deceased husbands, the plaintiff contended that such an adoption could be made validly only with the consent of the deceased husband's collaterals. In this Court an attempt was made on behalf of the plaintiff respondent to take up the position that even the consent of the collaterals was not sufficient, but this attempt is futile in the face of the plaintiff's own evidence. In the present case the consent of the plaintiff was not obtained and the matter for decision is narrowed down to the question whether, or not, amongst Maheswris, the consent of the husband's collaterals is necessary to a valid adoption by the widow.

We agree that the burden of proof is on the defendants appellants, but that burden is not so heavy as it would have been, had the plaintiff been relying on the strict Hindu Law and the defendants been left to establish a custom contrary to that law. Here, the evidence of both parties is that Maheswris, with regard to adoption, are governed by custom and not the law, but they differ as to what that custom is. In this respect the present case is very different from cases in which it is sought to establish a custom contrary to the ordinary personal law of the parties.

In discharging this burden of proof the defendants are greatly handicapped by the fact that they are called upon to prove two negatives, (a) no authority to adopt from the deceased husband and (b) no consent of the collaterals. It is admitted by the parties that if the deceased husband gave authority to adopt, no question of the necessity of the consent of the collaterals would arise. That is to say, the question of custom arises only in cases where the husband did not give authority. Consequently, in all instances of adoption by widows, tendered as evidence to prove the custom relied on by the defendants, they have to prove that neither the authority nor the consent was given. It is most difficult to do so. The only persons who could prove both these facts satisfactorily are the adopting widows. Other persons could state only that so far as they knew, the husband gave no authority, or did not do so in their presence. Again the implied consent of the collaterals from the fact of their presence at the adoption is consistent with the position taken up by either party. If, as a matter of fact, the widow has an unrestricted right, recognised by the collaterals, there is nothing surprising in their being present at the adoption, and this fact does not necessarily prove that their consent was necessary to the validity of the adoption.

The defendants have given 16 instances of adoption by widows on which they rely. It is not necessary for us to discuss the details of each. Of these we intimated at the time that two were of no use to the defendants. The objections of the plaintiff-respondent to these instances have been summarised as follows: -

One was admittedly made with the authority of the husband.

In 2, no collaterals were alive.

In another there is no proof that collaterals were alive.

In 2, there was no property.

One is consistent with the consent of collaterals who were childless and were present at the adoption.

In another the collaterals consented.

In the two remaining instances the witnesses did not have sufficient information to be able to state whether or not authority or consent had been given.

Apparently, the contention that in two instances there was no property is not correct There was no immoveable property.

The witnesses of the defendants have also been attacked as partisans, but it is not shown that the instances they quote did not occur, and, in one instance, the witness speaks to his own adoption and some others are obviously within the knowledge of the witnesses.

The defendants also rely on the evidence of a number of witnesses, two of whom gave evidence in a case of 1888, one of these latter being a Chaudhri of Maheswaris, to the effect that, amongst Maheswaris, widows had an unrestricted power of adoption and could adopt in spite of there being no authority, or consent. The defendants, on closing their oral evidence, desired to have a commission issued for the examination of certain Maheswaris of position with regard to the alleged custom. In view of the fact that a commission had still to issue on behalf of the plaintiff, that the case had not long been pending, and of the importance of the case, the request might well have been granted.

In giving the lists of witnesses of either side who depose to custom apart from instances, the lower Court has omitted the two witnesses of 1888 and has come to the conclusion that the weight of evidence appeared to favour the plaintiff. But it is to be noted that the majority of the defendants' witnesses are from Delhi whilst those of the plaintiff, with the exception of three, are from various other places. Of the three Delhi witnesses two are relations of the plaintiff. Had the District Judge's attention been called to Mathura Dass Karnani v. Sri Kissen Karnani (3), it is possible he might have taken a different view of the value to be placed on the evidence and, though the remark of the lower Court as to the partisan character of some of the defendants' witnesses is true, the Court has described Lala Mina Mal of Delhi, defendants' witness, as a well-known and highly respectable member of the Maheswari community. This witness fully supports the defendants' case and gives the largest number of instances of adoption. He is also Vice President of the Maheswari Mahasabha of Aligarh and produced a copy of the resolutions arrived at by that body at Mathra the preceding year, one of which is as follows :—

"Hamare yahan riwaj hai ke chahe mard khare gol le ya Musammat istri god khare lewe uo manzur hai nikal nahin sakta."

The lower Court was of opinion that this assertion ignores the controversial point whether the consent of collaterals is necessary to validate an adoption by a widow, and it leaves the matter there. This, however, is not our opinion. The assertion of the right of the widow is made without qualification and means that she has an unrestricted right. We place considerable value on this resolution as a statement of the right to adopt amongst Maheśrs by, apparently, a representative body of that community, possibly because the matter wanted clearing up. The resolution is in accord with decisions to which we will presently refer.

(3) 44 Ind. Cas. 5 27 C. L. J. 517.

The plaintiff's witnesses also gave instances of adoption in which it is alleged that consent of collaterals was given. There is no evidence of the nature or formality of the consent. The deed of adoption and Musammat Dakho's Will have also been referred to, on behalf of the plaintiff, and an inference is sought to be drawn from a false recital in the deed that the consent of the collaterals had been obtained, that it was known such consent was necessary and that no Will was necessary if the adoption was valid. We do not, however, attach any importance to these documents in the face of weightier considerations.

In Mathura Dass Karnani v. Srikissen Karnani (1) the Calcutta High Court held that, amongst Maheśrs, the widow had an unrestricted right to adopt to her deceased husband in cases, as in the present one, where her husband had separate property and was not a member of a joint family and that neither the authority of the husband nor the consent of the collaterals was necessary to validate the adoption. In this same judgment reference is made to a judment of the Chief Court of the Bikaneer State to the same effect. We regret that we have not a copy of the latter judgment. It is obvious that a judgment of the highest Court in Bikaneer State, the home of the Maheśrs, is of the greatest value. The custom itself is not of an extraordinary nature and is followed in western India as part of the personal law applicable to Hindus, whilst here in the Punjab it has been judicially held that Jains and Kashmiri Pandits follow the same custom. It is by no means a great innovation, as the lower Court appeared to think.

The defendants have been able to produce a considerable number of instances of adoption by widows considering the small number of the community in Delhi and, although some of the instances are not strong, it is worthy of comment that the plaintiff has not been able to produce a single instance in which an adoption by a widow has been attacked.

In Case No. 1524 of 1912, [Gopi Kishen v. Gopi Kishen (4)] decided by the Chief Court of the Punjab, the plea of custom had not been taken, or put in issue.

We are of opinion that the defendants-appellants have discharged the burden placed on them of proving that, amongst Maheśrs, a widow has the power to adopt to her deceased husband without his authority, or the consent of his collaterals. No objection was taken in the present case to the power of a widow to adopt her own brother to her husband and it is, therefore, not necessary for us to go into this point. For the above reasons we accept the appeal and dismiss the suit. In view of the novelty of the point of custom on which there was no precedent of this Court, we direct the parties to bear their own costs in both the Courts.

Appeal accepted.

JUDGMENT.—These appeals and applications relate to the rules which have been framed under clause 12 of this scheme and sanctioned in 1914 by Mr. Kennedy, the District Judge of Ahmedabad. The appeals have been filed as appeals from orders in execution passed under clause 12 (7) of the scheme by the District Judge of Ahmedabad. We think we ought to deal with them as such as no objection has been taken. No orders need, therefore, be passed on the applications filed ex majore cautela as applications under clause 20 of the scheme reserving general power of interference to the High Court. We have heard Sir Chimanlal Setalvad on behalf of the Tapodhan Shevaks in Appeal No. 80 of 1915, Mr. Mehta on behalf of the Khedaval Shevaks in Appeal No 79 of 1915 and Mr. Inverarity on behalf of the Shrigor Shevaks in Appeal No. 78 of 1915. We have heard Diwan Bahadur Rao on behalf of the Tarwadi Mewada Gors, represented in the second suit, in Appeal No. 122 of 1915, Mr. B. G. Rao for other Tarwadi Mewada Gors, so represented but by mistake struck out of these proceedings by the District Judge, in Appeal No. 206 of 1915, Mr. Divatia on behalf of other Tarwadi Mewada Gors, not so represented, in Appeal No. 75 of 1915, and Mr. Thakor on behalf apparently of an altogether different group of Gors in Appeal No. 76 of 1915. We have heard Diwan Bahadur Rao again on behalf of the representative of the family of Tambekar in Appeal No. 121 of 1915. We have, on behalf of the Temple Committee, heard Mr. Jayakar, and finally, on behalf of the general public, the Advocate General.

The contest has been mainly over the rules restricting by payment for passes entry into the inner sanctuary of the temple known as the Nij Mandir. But this was the very dispute between the Shevaks and the Tarwadi Mewada Gors decided in the other suit by Mr. Dayaram Gidumal, District Judge of Ahmedabad. He observed in his judgment: "We have almost unanimous evidence to the effect that before the Shevaks made their rules in 18 3, their permission for entering the Nij Mandir was only taken at the time of the Sakribhog Darshan and at no other, and even at Sakribhog time no fixed fee was ever demanded or paid"; and again, "But although every one could go into the Nij Mandir, every one could not go up on the Sinhasan. The idol wears ornaments worth about a lakh...It stands to reason, therefore, that permission should be taken for mounting the platform. It is needed by those who want to do Panchamrit or Kesar Snan or Charanasparsh. The regulation of these must in the nature of things be done by the Shevaks in attendance.....The condition regarding cleanliness does not appear to have been rigorously enforced, but there is no doubt that Shevaks are entitled to refuse permission to any one not following the usual rules regarding personal cleanliness...The Shevaks are to see to decency in worship, but this power does not mean that they can make a sweeping rule demandnig tickets and fees for entrance. I, therefore, hold that according to the established practice of the institution the Gors were not prevented from entering the Nij Mandir whenever it was open or doing any Dharma Kriya in the said Mandir, but that whenever such Kriya had to be performed on the Sinhasan permission, express or implied, used to be taken from the Shevaks in attendance, which permission was never refused to decent worshippers." He then proceeded to show that the Gors were before the rules free also to enter for Darshan or Dharma Kriya with their Yajmans and that before 1883 the Shevaks had no right to demand money from them as entrance fee for the Nij Mandir. He next discussed the question whether the Gors could take whatever was given to them by their Yajmans in the Nij Mandir and came to the conclusion that they could, whether given inside or outside the Nij Mandir, and he remarked that "it would appear from some of the witnesses that they consider it a matter of conscience to pay the Gor in the Nij Mandir." He also stated generally: "There is, therefore, not the least doubt that before 1883 every Hindu (excepting certain low caste people like Mochis, etc) could go freely into the Nij Mandir." He then considered whether the Shevaks had any right to change the old practice of the institution and frame the rules of 1883 for fixed fees and wrote: "All I can say is that nothing can be more scandalous, nothing more unjustifiable...They have promulgated these novel rules which would make the hair of any Hindu loving his country's institutions to stand on end. Such open sale of Darshan tickets has never been practised anywhere, and not a single witness except the 3 or 4 infatuated ones, who said the Shevaks were owners...could say a word in favour of the Shevaks' power to frame such rules." These conclusions were confirmed and even extended by the exclusion of the exception in favour of the Sakribhog Darshan by the High Court. Birdwood, J., observed: "The Shevaks are not the owners of the temple...they are liable, as trustees, to render an account of their management. This was the position assigned to them by the judgment...in Manohar Ganesh Tambekar v. Lakhmiram Govindram (1). And we do not think that by virtue of their office, as defined in that case, they have the authority to levy fees in respect of any public religious services held in the temple." [Kalidas Jivram v. Gor Parjaram Hirji (2).] And Parsons, J., remarked: "Such of the rules which forbid admission to the Mandirs, except on the production of a pass to be obtained on payment of a fee, are undoubtedly illegal and ultra vires. Rules can be made and enforced by the Shevaks to ensure good order and decency of worship and to prevent overcrowding in the temple, but subject to these rules the right of entrance into a public temple, such as the present, for the purposes of worship, of the members of a caste entitled there to worship is a free right and cannot be prohibited or sold." [Kalidas Jivram v. Gor Parjaram Hirji (2)] No appeal was made from this decree of the High Court to the Privy Council. It has, however, been argued on behalf of the Shevaks with the support of the Temple Committee that the rules have been validated by having been in force since 1863 and by having been revived in 1883 by the Receiver in the present suit Manohar Ganesh Tambekar v. Lakhmiram Govindram (1), with the approval of Mr. McCorkell, the District Judge of Ahmedabad, and in 1892 of the High Court and by having been continued in force pending the framing of fresh rules under clause 12 (4) by the provisions of clause 13 of the scheme of management prepared in 1903 by the High Court and finally sanctioned in 1912 by the Privy Council. It seems to us, however, that these arguments have no solid foundation, as urged on behalf of the Gors and the general public. The radical objections to the rules have been repeated by Mr. Kennedy, the District Judge of Ahmedabad, thus: "The first question then as regards these rules is the pass system. There is no objection to the pass system itself, by which only pass holders are admitted with certain exceptions into the Nij Mandir and where special passes are issued for particular acts of devotion. But a great deal of objection is raised to the levy of fees for the passes. It does seem to me somewhat of a scandal that the opportunity of acquiring religious merit should be sold in this way formally and nakedly. I do not suppose any other temple in India does anything of the sort. There are fees no doubt levied at other temples ad valorem of the religious benefit, but these are secular taxes imposed by the Government." He did not consider the levy of fees necessary to prevent overcrowding, but did not press his objections in view of the fact that the levy had been practised for at least thirty years and was strongly favoured by the Temple Committee. He failed, however, to notice that this practice had been in question from the very outset and had been declared illegal and ultra vires in the other suit by his predecessor Mr. Dayaram Gidumal in 1888 and in 1890 by the High Court. Its revival or rather survival under the Receiver from 1888 in the present suit was a temporary arrangement pending the settlement of the scheme of management and was so sanctioned by Mr. Dayaram Gidumal's successor Mr McCorkell in 1891 and in 1892 by the High Court. It was similarly permitted as a temporary arrangement only pending the framing of regular rules under clauses 12 (4) and 13 and schedule 5 of the scheme in 1906 by the High Court and in 1912 by the Privy Council. It seems to us, therefore, that the rules prescribing the pass system have been shown to be illegal and ultra vires, in so far as they have imposed fixed fees in payment for the passes, whether upon the Gors or the general public entitled to worship in the temple at Dakore. It has to be remembered that the rules when sanctioned become a part of the scheme of management under clause 12 (7), subject under clause 20 to the control of the High Court, and that it was provided that the scheme should be in accordance with the established practice of the institution by the preliminary judgments both of the High Court and of the Privy Council.

APPEAL FROM THE CALCUTTA HIGH COURT.

December 2, 1919.

Present:—Lord Shaw, Sir John Edge, Mr. Ameer Ali and Sir Lawrence Jenkins.

RADHA KISHUN—PLAINTIFF—APPELLANT

versus

KHURSHED HOSSEIN AND OTHERS—DEFENDANTS—RESPONDENTS.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), s. 11 Expl. IV —Transfer of Property Act (IV of 1882), ss. 85, 96— Res judicata - Mortgage—Suit for sale under mortgage —Prior mortgagee made party but his mortgage not attacked—Suit, subsequent, by prior mortgagee, whether barred.

Section 96 of the Transfer of Property Act expressly provides that when property, the sale of which is directed, is subject to a prior mortgage, it may be sold free of such mortgage with the consent of the prior mortgagee, and implies that without such consent it cannot be so sold. [p. 962, col. 1.]

A prior mortgagee has a paramount claim, and although made a party to a suit by a puisne mortgagee, need not intervene unless his mortgage is impugned. [p. 962, col. 1.]

Where, therefore, a prior mortgagee was made a party to such a suit but did not appear, and subsequently brought a suit on his mortgage:

Held, that he was not barred from asserting his claims by section 11 of the Code of Civil Procedure, inasmuch as there was no need for him to make his prior mortgage, the validity of which had not been attacked, a ground of defence in the former suit. [p. 962, col. 1.]

Appeal from a decree of the Calcutta High Court, dated May 24th, 1915, affirming a decree of the Additional Subordinate Judge, Mozufferpur.

FACTS.—The appellant sued for a sale decree under a mortgage. The only question for determination on this appeal was whether as to four villages forming part of his security his claim was barred by the plea of res judicata. The High Court (Fletcher and Richardson, JJ.), affirming the trial Judge, held that it was. In the present appeal the principal contest was as to two of the villages, Pandharia and Gambaria. As to these the judgment of Fletcher, J., in which Richardson, J., concurred, was as follows:—

"I will now deal with the appeal of the plaintiff. The learned Judge has held that the plaintiff is not entitled to redeem certain Mouzas or to have them brought to sale.

The first two Mouzas are called Pandarhia and Gamarhia. These two Mouzas were mortgaged on the 28th of April 1894 to the defendants Nos. 37 to 42. A suit was brought on this mortgage, and to that suit the defendant No. 43 was made a party but he failed to enter an appearance in the suit. A preliminary decree was passed in that suit on the 28th July 1905. Whether or not the decree absolute has been made, does not appear. The plaintiff argues that so long as the decree absolute has not been made, the equity of redemption has not finally gone. That may be so. But it is a very different question as to whether the plaintiff can redeem in this suit. In my opinion the learned Judge was right when he held that he could not. So long as the decree of the 28th of July 1905 remains on foot, the plaintiff claiming through the defendant No. 43 is bound by it. The defendant No. 43 failed to appear in that suit and set up his prior mortgage. The plaintiff cannot set up that mortgage up now as against the defendants Nos. 37 to 42. The case of Gopal Lal v. Benarasi Pershad Chowdhry (1) appears to me to be a clear authority for that proposition."

Messrs. Dunne, K. C., and E. B. Raikes, for the Appellant:—The appellant is not estopped by the decree in Suit No. 100 of 1906 from enforcing his mortgage. Section 85 of the Transfer of Property Act merely provides that all persons having an interest in the property comprised in a mortgage shall be joined as parties: the property which was the subject of Suit No. 100 was merely the equity of redemption. True, our assignor was made a party and did not appear: but there was no need for him to do so. The latest authorities both in Allahabad and Calcutta held that the prior mortgagee is not bound: and there is no case before the Board of a person being joined who was not a puisne mortgagee. Under section 96 of the Transfer of Property Act the property cannot be sold free of the prior mortgage without the prior mortgagee's consent. In Gopal Lal v. Benarasi Pershad Chowdhry (1) on which the High Court has relied, the puisne mortgagee not merely made the prior mortgagee a party, but prayed for a sale free from incumbrances: the prior mortgagee did not oppose that prayer, hence the decision. That is not the case here. In Sri Gopal v. Pirthi Singh (2) the prior mortgagee was also a puisne mortgagee: all the Board held in that case was that he should have set up all his claims, if he wished to rely on any of them.

The Allahabad High Court has expressly held that a first mortgagee, in circumstances similar to those here, can bring a suit for sale upon his mortgage. Ajodhya Pande v. Inayat Ullah (3). All that was decided in Mahomed Ibrahim Hossein Khan v. Ambika Pershad Singh (4) was that a puisne mortgagee who is joined as a party, and who has an equitable right prior to the mortgage which the suit is brought to enforce, will be estopped if he fails to assert such equitable right: that decision does not affect the present case. Inferentially, the judgment shows that even under the Act of 1882 a prior mortgagee was not a necessary party to a suit for sale by a puisne mortgagee, a matter which is now expressly laid down in the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908.

[MR. AMEER ALI referred to Ghose on Mortgage, page 681, and observed that Dr. Rash Behari Ghose was a recognised authority.

Sir W. Garth, K. C., and Mr. Dube, for the Respondents.—Appellant's predecessor-in-title, the prior mortgagee, was made a party to Suit No. 100 of 1905 and the decree in that suit is res judicata against him under Explanations IV and VI to section 11 of the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908, the prior mortgage was a ground of defence which he could and should have taken. Mahamed Ibrahim Hossein Khan v. Ambika Pershad Singh (4), Gajadhar Teli v. Bhagwanta (5).

It was incumbent upon the appellant's predecessor in the former suit to prove his prior mortgage, and he did not do so. The plaint cannot have admitted the prior mortgage; if it had, the decree would have been in a different form. If it is not clear that the prior mortgage was not

JUDGMENT.

SIR LAWRENCE JENKINS.—The suit out of which this appeal arises is one brought by the appellant, Radha Kishun, for the realisation of his mortgage security by sale, and the only question now remaining for decision is whether the appellant's claim to four villages which form a part of his security is barred by the plea of res judicata.

The Additional Subordinate Judge of Muzaffarpur, and on appeal the High Court of Judicature, have decided adversely to him. He has accordingly preferred this appeal.

There are two groups of contesting respondents who may be conveniently described as the Sheikhs and the Sahus. The Sheikhs claim the two villages called Baraibar and Lachhnowta, the Sahus those named Pandharia and Gambaria.

The validity of the Sheikhs' claim to the two villages of Baraibar and Lachhnowta is beyond dispute and the High Court's conclusion with regard to them must be upheld.

To the contest as to the other two villages, however, different considerations apply.

By an instrument, dated the 13th May 1892, these villages were mortgaged to Kishun Lal to secure Rs. 40,000.

On the 7th September 1906 the mortgage and the security were transferred to the appellant by Bakhtaur Mall Abbor, on whom they had devolved on Kishun Lal's death. This is the appellant's title, and it is not now disputed except so far as the plea of res judicata may be a bar to its successful assertion.

But on the 25th February 1891 the villages had been transferred by way of usufructuary mortgage to the Sahus, and on the 28th April 1894 a simple mortgage of them was executed to the same mortgagees.

On the 15th March 1907 the present suit was instituted by the appellant against the Sahus and others for enforcement of his mortgage.

It was tried in 1909 and as against the Sahus it was dismissed as barred by the plea of res judicata on the 12th October 1909, and this was affirmed on appeal by the High Court on the 24th May 1915.

The former suit on which this plea is based is Suit No. 100 of 1905. It was brought by the Sahus, and the defendants to it included the mortgagor and Bakhtaur Mall, the present appellant's predecessor in-title.

The claim was for recovery of the mortgage-money due on the mortgage deed of the 28th April 1894. Reference was made to the zerpeshgi deed of the 25th February 1891 with a view to safeguarding it.

A decree was passed on the 6th August 1906, in the absence of the defendants, and it was ordered "that this suit is decreed and that if the principal with interest as mortgage-bond with costs in Court is paid within six months the mortgaged property be released from mortgage, and in the event of the decretal money not being paid the mortgaged property will be sold subject to former zerpeshgi mortgage-deed." The decree then proceeds to make a personal order for payment against the defendants.

The contention for the Sahus is that as the present appellant did not make his mortgage deed of the 13th May 1892 a ground of defence in the former suit, he is now barred from suing on it.

The rule of res judicata is contained in section 11 of the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908, which provides that no Court shall try any suit in which the matter directly and substantially in issue has been directly and substantially in issue in a former suit between the same parties litigating under the same title in a Court competent to try such subsequent suit, and has been heard and finally decided. Had this been an exhaustive statement of the rule, it obviously would not have supported the plea in the facts of this case, and so reliance has been placed on Explanation IV which provides that any matter which might and ought to have been made a ground of defence in such former suit shall be deemed to have been directly and substantially in issue in such suit.

(6) 24 Ind. Cas. 42; 18 C. W. N. 1013.
(7) 23 Ind. Cas. 673; 19 C. W. N. 942.

The mortgage-deed of the 13th May 1892, it is urged, might and ought to have been made a ground of defence in the former Suit No. 100 of 1906, and by the omission the present suit is barred.

The rule is clear; the controversy is narrowed down to the question whether the facts invite its application.

It becomes necessary, therefore, to see what was the position of Bakhtaur Mull in the former Suit No. 100 of 1906. It was a suit brought by the Sahus to enforce against the mortgagor their mortgage deed of the 24th April 1894. Bakhtaur Mull was joined as a defendant, but whether any or what relief was sought against him does not appear.

Bakhtaur Mull's mortgage was prior to that on which the Sahus sued, and its validity is now admitted.

The case, therefore, came within the terms of section 96 of the Transfer of Property Act, which expressly provides that where property the sale of which is directed is subject to a prior mortgage the Court may, with the consent of the prior mortgagee, order that the property be sold free from the same, giving to such prior mor gagee the same interest in the proceeds of the sale as he had in the property sold. The implication of the section is that without such consent the property could not be so sold.

Bakhtaur Mull's position, therefore, was that he was a prior mortgagee with a paramount claim outside the controversy of the suit unles his mortgage was impugned. Consequently to sustain the plea of res judicata it is incumbent on the Sahus in the circumstances of this case to show that they sought in the former suit to displace Bakhtaur Mull's prior title and postpone it to their own. For this it would have been necessary for the Sahus as plaintiffs in the former suit to allege a distinct case in their plaint in derogation of Bakhtaur Mull's priority,

But from the records of this suit it does not appear that anything of the kind was done, and, as has been observed, of things that do not appear and things that do not exist the reckoning in a Court of law is the same.

The Sahus, therefore, have failed to establish the conditions essential to their plea, and they alone are responsible for this defect. The plaint in Suit No. 100 of 1906 has not been produced and this omission is not supplied by the summary of the plaint set out in the extracts from the decree (Exhibit J. 37C.). That summary still leaves the contents of the plaint a matter of mere conjecture and certainly does not show that Bakhtaur Mull's mortgage was attacked. The decree, too, is open to the same comment. In arriving at this conclusion their Lordships have not overlooked the authorities cited at the Bar, but so far as they are binding on this Board they are clearly distinguishable.

Their Lordships at one time hesitated as to whether it would not be the better course to afford the Sahus an opportunity of producing the record of the former suit but, on reflection, they felt that they were not entitled to this indulgence. The Sahus have been singularly remiss: the absence of this evidence was not sprung upon them in the argument before this Board; it was made a ground of complaint in the application for leave to appeal, and yet no attempt has been made to meet it.

Nor is this the only defect in their proofs, for they have not even shown by any evidence on the record that being decree holders they obtained an order absolute for sale, or the necessary permission of the Court to purchase the property. Moreover, it is not without importance that it is the decree holders who claim to have bought in execution and that they are endeavouring to defeat by their plea a mortgage of which they had notice, and which on their own admission now made was valid and so of necessity paramount to their claim.

Their Lordships, therefore, hold that the plaintiff's claim to the villages of Pandharia and Gambaria cannot be defeated by the plea of res judicata, and that it was erroneous to dismiss the suit as against the defendants Nos. 37 to 42. They will, therefore, humbly advise His Majesty that the decrees of the High Court and the Additional Subordinate Judge ought to be varied accordingly, and the case remitted to the High Court with directions to modify its decree in accordance with this decision in regard to the two villages of Pandharia and Gambaria, the adjustment of costs consequent thereon, and otherwise as the circumstances of the case may require. There will be no order as to the costs of this appeal.

Civil revision against the order of the Additional Judge, Aligarh, dated the 31st of August 1918.

Mr. Iqbal Ahmad, for the Appellant.

Dr. S. M. Sulaiman, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This is a revision against an order of the Second Additional Judge of Aligarh passed on the 31st of August 1918. The predecessor-in office of the Judge in question heard and decided an appeal on the 26th of April 1915. The plaintiff in that suit sought for partition of a house, claiming a half share therein and a half share in plot No. 54/2. The plaintiff also claimed exclusive possession of plot No. 54/1. On appeal the Additional District Judge found in favour of the plaintiff and in his finding wrote the following words: "Thus the proper order to make is to award to the plaintiff the entire site 54/1 and a half share in the remaining site inclusive of the platform and a half share in the entire materials. I find accordingly." This was very clear and distinct. At the end of his judgment he wrote as follows: "I allow this appeal in part and modifying the decree of the lower Court order that plot No. '54/2' be awarded to the plaintiff unconditionally, that the remaining portion of plot No. 54 and plot No. 160 be divided in equal shares and one half of it be given to the plaintiff," etc. It is, therefore, quite clear that he found in favour of the plaintiff, but in writing the mandatory portion of his judgment he accidentally wrote 54/2 instead of 54/1. This error crept into the decree. When the error was discovered, the plaintiff at once went to the Court below and asked for action to be taken under section 152 of the Code and to have the error corrected. Thereupon the then Additional Judge, another officer, wrote the following order: "I am unable to correct the finding of a former Judge. The decree appears to be in accordance with the finding." It is in respect of this order that the present application is made, and it is urged that the Judge of the Court below has refused to exercise the jurisdiction lying within him. On behalf of the opposite party it is urged that the Judge has not refused to exercise his jurisdiction but has exercised it and has held that there is nothing to be corrected. Reading the Judge's order it seems to me that its plain meaning is that the Judge was of opinion that he had no power at all to correct the error in his predecessor's judgment. This he clearly has. It is admitted before me that the error exists. It is quite clear that justice demands that it be amended. I, therefore, direct the amendment to be made both in the judgment and in the decree. Where the figure 54/2 occurs in the last paragraph but one of the judgment, that will be altered to 54/1 and the corresponding amendment should be made in the decree. In view of the circumstances of the case the parties will bear their own costs of this application.

Revision accepted.

JUDGMENT.

HEATON, J.—In this case we have the Talukdari Settlement Officer on behalf of a person described as a Talukdar suing to redeem a mortgage. The mortgaged property, it is admitted, was part of the jivai estate which up to the year 1847 was vested in one Raisang, who in that year died. He left a nephew, the son of his brother, and a widow, and it was the widow and the nephew who joined in making the mortgage to redeem which this suit has been brought. The defendants opposed the claim on the ground that Narsang, the Talukdar, whose estate is under the management of the Talukdari Settlement Officer, has no right to redeem the mortgage. Narsang himself is dead and was succeeded by a son Fulsangji. But the question is whether Narsang was or was not validly adopted by Surajrani, the widow of Raisang. If he was validly adopted, then the plaintiff's suit must succeed. If he was not validly adopted, the plaintiff's suit must fail, because it is brought by one who has no right to redeem the mortgage. The adoption was made by Surajrani, the widow of Raisang, after the death of Manbhai, the nephew of her husband. Manbhai or his father, it would seem, had held the jivai subsequent to Raisang's death in 1847. Manbhai died in 1882 and in 1884, i.e., nearly forty years after her husband's death, Surajrani made the adoption. By the law as it is understood in this Presidency, an adoption of this kind in a family which constituted a joint Hindu family, although the property was impartible, could not be validly made. We were, however, referred to a very recent case decided by the Privy Council last year, Partapsing Shivsing v. Agarsinghji Raisinghji (1). In that case, however, the facts were that the adoption had been made within the pericd of gestation succeeding the death of the widow's husband. Those facts were the subject of argument in the case. They were expressly mentioned in the judgment, and it appears the only thing that was decided was that in circumstances of that kind an adoption would be valid. But where the circumstances are as they are here, it seems to me quite plain that we must follow what is well understood as the ordinary law in this Presidency and apply it to the facts. The widow of a deceased co parcener of a joint Hindu family cannot, in the absence of any specific authority, make an adoption subsequent to the death of a co parcener who survived her husband; and more particularly when, as here, that later surviving co-parcener left widows. It seems to me, therefore, quite plain that the decision of the Court below is correct and that this appeal must be dismissed with cost. One set of costs to respondent No. 1 only.

Mr. S. B. Johri, for the Opposite Party.

JUDGMENT.—This application in revision is against a decree of the Small Cause Court Judge of Cawnpur, dated 16th September 1919. It appears that the opposite party, the plaintiff, sued to recover Rs. 65 on the allegation that he had deposited Rs. 100 with the applicant with the object of doing some business; that the business was not carried out and the applicant returned Rs. 35 and Rs. 65 is still due from him. It turned out on the evidence of both parties in the Court below that the business in respect of which the money was paid to the applicant was in respect of satta transactions, that is wagering contracts. The defendant applicant went into the witness-box and stated that he had made wagering contracts on behalf of the plaintiff, the opposite party, with certain other firms in which losses had been sustained and the deposit made by the plaintiff had been swallowed up by the losses The learned Judge of the Small Cause Court did not believe the defendant with regard to the losses. However, it is common case of both the parties that the money was given on account of satta transactions by way of security. Section 65 of the Contract Act, under which the decree of the lower Court seems to have been passed, does not apply, vide Dayabhai Tribhovandas v. Lakhmi Chand Pana Chand (1). Stamp Act (II of 1899), Sch I, Art 45—Agreement evidencing partition—Stamp duty chargeable.

A document termed a yadast or agreement evidencing the division of property and stipulating for the execution of a separate partition, till when the document is to remain in force, is chargeable with stamp duty under Article 45 of the Stamp Act as a contract of partition [p. 968, col. 1.]

Case stated under section 61, Act II of 1899, by the Collector, Tinnevelly, in Original Suit No. 1 of 1919, on the file of the District Court, Tinnevelly.

FACTS are clear from the following letter of reference by the Collector of Tinnevelly:—

"At the instance of the Revenue Divisional Officer, Tinnevelly, I have the honour to refer the following case for the orders of the High Court under section 61 (.) of the Indian Stamp Act (II of 1899).

2. The District Judge, Tinnevelly, in the course of the trial of Original Suit No. 1 of 1919 on his file admitted in evidence, under section 35 of the Stamp Act, an unstamped document (copy enclosed with a translation) after levying a stamp of 8 annas and a penalty of Rs. 5, under Article 5 (c) of Schedule I (a). The document, which is termed a Yadast or agreement, was executed at Trivandram in Andu 1090, corresponding to the year 1915, by one Krishna Aiyar and his brother, Subramanya Aiyar. It bears a Travancore adhesive stamp of one anna. By means of this document the brothers divided their properties situated both in British and Travancore territories. The partition was to take effect from the date of execution of the document and the properties were to be enjoyed separately with effect from the 1st Thai of Andu 1090 corresponding to the 14th January 1915. It is also stipulated that separate partition deeds should be executed for the properties in Travancore and British India and that, till then, this document should remain in force.

3. The Revenue Divisional Officer is of opinion that the document is not a Yadast or agreement but an instrument of partition under Article 45 of Schedule I (a) as defined by section 2 (15) of the Stamp Act. I agree with him.

4. If the document is declared to be a deed of partition, the stamp duty will depend on the value of the separated share, specified in Schedule II of the document, which consists of immoveable property valued at Rs. 7.,500 situated in British India and also in Travancore. As the bulk of the property situated in British India and also in Travancore consists of lands paying assessment and as their value for the purpose of stamp duty has to be calculated at not more than five times the annual assessment, I am asking the Revenue Divisional Officer to ascertain and report the annual assessment of these lands. I shall submit a further report on assessment of these lands, on receipt of the information.

5. Pending the disposal of this reference the Revenue Divisional Officer has requested the District Judge not to deliver the original document to the parties."

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. IX, r. 8—Plaintiff, absence of—Procedure—Duty of Court.

Where on the date fixed for the hearing of a case the plaintiff is absent and the defendant appears, the Court is bound, under Order IX, rule 8, Civil Procedure Code, to dismiss the suit for default: it has no jurisdiction to record the defendant's statement and to decree the claim in part.

Civil revision against the decision of the Subordinate Judge, Jaunpur, dated the 15th April 1919.

Dr. J. N. Misra, for the Petitioner.

Mr. S. N. Gupta, for the Opposite Party.

JUDGMENT.—This is a revision under section 115 from the decree of the Subordinate Judge dismissing the appeal of the applicant from a decree of the Munsif. It appears that the opposite party Brij Mohan instituted a suit against the applicant in the Court of the Munsif of Jaunpur for the recovery of money on the basis of a bond, dated the 27th of March 1914. The defendant denied his obligation under the bond and stated that the bond was given by way of satisfaction to the plaintiff for the debt due to him from one Musammat Rajrani. In other words, he pleaded that he simply stood surety for Musammat Rajrani. On the day of hearing the plaintiff was absent. The learned Munsif, however, proceeded with the case and recorded the statement of the defendant and decreed the claim in part. In appeal the defendant contended, and the same point is urged here, that under Order IX, rule 8, Civil Procedure Code, the learned Munsif ought to have dismissed the claim for default and should not have tried the case. In support of this view the cases of Kesri Chand v. National Jute Mills Company (1) and Ihul Koer v. Hashmatullah Khan (2) are quoted. I think that the objection for the applicant is well founded. The Court of first instance had no option but to dismiss the case in default when it found that the plaintiff on the day of hearing was absent. The learned Munsif was quite wrong in appreciating the force of the plea for the defence. He was under the impression that the execution of the bond was admitted and the bond was challenged on the ground of consideration. The plea advanced by the defence really meant that the bond was given by way of security. The creditor could not sue the surety only without impleading the principal. I, therefore, allow the revision, set aside the decree of the Court below and dismiss the claim of the plaintiff for default under Order IX, rule 8, Civil Procedure Code. Taking all the facts into consideration I do not think the opposite party should be saddled with costs. I direct that each party bear his own costs in all Courts.

(1) 17 Ind. Cas. 87; 40 C. 119; 16 C. W. N. 968.
(2) 29 Ind. Cas. 558; 18 A. L. J. 679; 37 A. 490.

Revision allowed.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), s. 47—Execution of decree—Application for refund of excess money realised in execution—Court, proper—Delay in making application—Extension of time Sufficient cause—Bona fide mistake—Limitation Act (IX of 1908), s. 14

An application for refund of a sum of money wrongfully recovered in execution proceedings can be entertained by the Court executing the decree, as such application raises a question relating to the execution of the decree within the meaning of section 47 of the Civil Procedure Code and in respect of which no separate suit can lie. [p. 968, cols 1 & 2]

Where instead of applying to the Court executing a decree for refund of excess money levied in execution, a suit is under a bona fide mistake brought by the applicant, he is entitled, under section 4 of the Limitation Act. to deduct the time taken up in prosecuting the suit in calculating the period for making an application for refund. First appeal from the decision of the First Class Subordinate Judge, Ahmednagar, in Miscellaneous Application No. 70 of 1915.

Mr. Y. N. Nadkarni for Mr. K. H. Kelkar, for the Appellants.

Messrs. D R. Patwardhan and S. R. Gokhale, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.

SHAH, J.—This is an appeal from the order of the First Class Subordinate Judge of Ahmednagar on the application of the present appellant for a refund of Rs. 1,088 5-6 said to have been wrongfully recovered by the present respondent in execution proceedings in Darkhast No. 1224 of 1906. The decree under execution was passed by the Subordinate Judge of Jhansi and transferred for execution to the Court of the First Class Subordinate Judge at Ahmednagar. The sum is said to have been improperly recovered by the respondent on or about the 29th of November 1910. A suit was filed in the Court of the Second Class Subordinate Judge of Shevgaon on the 14th of November 1913 to recover this amount. But that suit was dismissed on the 31st of March 1915, on the ground that no suit could lie and that the proper remedy was by way of an application under section 47 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The present application was made to the Court at Ahmednagar on the 19th of May 1915. That Court has dismissed it on the ground that such an application in execution cannot lie and that it is time barred.

The correctness of this view is questioned before us on behalf of the appellant, and on behalf of the respondent it has been further argued, in support of the order made by the lower Court, that that Court had no jurisdiction to entertain the application after the execution of the decree was over and that if at all, the application should have been made to the Court at Jhansi, which passed the decree.

The first question is whether this application for a refund of the sum can be entertained by the executing Court. According to the terms of section 47 of the Code of Civil Procedure, all questions arising between the parties to the suit and relating to the execution, discharge or satisfaction of the decree must be determined by the Court executing the decree and not by a separate suit. This application raises, in my opinion, a question relating to the execution of the decree, and is clearly one which could be and ought to be entertained by the Court executing the decree and in respect of which no separate suit can lie. This view is supported by the decision in Partab Singh v. Beni Ram (1), which was a decision under section 244 of the Code of 1877 corresponding to section 47 of the present Code. The application, therefore, was properly made to the executing Court. Further, it is difficult to understand how the present respondent can be heard to urge this plea, after having successfully contended in the suit filed in the Court at Shevgaon that the proper remedy was to file an application under section 47 of the Code for the refund and not to file a suit.

The second point is one of limitation. It has been held by the lower Court that on the 19th of May 1915 the application was time barred, as it was not made within three years from the date on which this payment in excess is said to have been made, i. e., from the 29th of November 1910. It is urged, however, on behalf of the appellant that under section 14 of the Indian Limitation Act the time taken up in the prosecution of the suit at Shevgaon should be deducted and if that time were deducted, the application would be within time, as the Court was closed for the Easter holidays from the 1st of April to the 6th of April 1915 and for the summer vacation from the 7th of April to the 18th of May. The question, therefore, is, whether the present appellant prosecuted the suit with due diligence and in good faith. I see no reason to doubt the good faith of the present appellant in filing the suit in the Court at Shevgaon and in attempting to recover the sum in those proceedings. It is not suggested that he did not prosecute the suit with due diligence. I am, therefore, of opinion that the time taken up in prosecuting the suit at Shevgaon ought to be deducted under section 14 of the Indian Limitation Act. The present application, therefore, is not time barred.

It is urged on behalf of the respondent that the execution being over long ago, the lower Court must have certified to the Court at Jhansi, which passed the decree, the fact of such execution under section 41 of the Code of Civil Procedure, that thereafter it would have no juri-diction to entertain such an application and that the application could be properly made to the Court at Jhansi. In order to ascertain whether the Court of the First Class Subordinate Judge at Ahmednagar had certified to the Court at Jhansi the fact of execution as required by section 41 of the Code of Civil Procedure, we called for the proceedings in the Darkhast and the learned Pleader for the respondent has practically given up that point as he has not been able to trace on the record any such certificate. It is not necessary, therefore, to consider the question whether in virtue of the provisions of section 42 the Court of the First Class Subordinate Jude at Ahmednagar would have jurisdiction to entertain this application after it had certified to the Court at Jhansi the fact of execution. At any rate before the fact of execution is certified to the Court which passed the decree, the Court to which the decree is transferred for execution has jurisdiction to deal with an application like the present for a refund of the excess.

The learned Subordinate Judge has not decided the application on the merits in favour of the respondent, though it is claimed for him that it is a decision on the merits. In view of the observations made by the learned Judge in the last but one paragraph of his judgment, it is clear that he has not decided the application on its merits.

As both the preliminary grounds upon which the lower Court disposed of this application fail, I think that the application must be remanded for disposal according to law.

I would, therefore, set aside the order of the lower Court and send back the application for disposal according to law.

Costs to be costs in the application.

HAYWARD, J.—I agree. The ascertainment of the facts is essential to a correct determination of the question whether an excess was or was not levied in execution and the matter must for that purpose be remanded for a further trial to the First Class Subordinate Judge at Ahmednagar.

The application was in time, because the excess, if any, was levied on the 29th of November 1910 and a suit was by bona fide mistake brought on the 14th of November 1913 and was pending until the 31st of MATRU MAL v. DURGA KUNWAR.

March 1915 in the Subordinate Judge's Court at Shevgaon. It was not possible to take further steps until the 19th of May 1915 owing to the intervention of the Easter holidays and the summer vacation in the First Class Subordinate Judge's Court at Ahmednagar. It has been ascertained that no certificate has so far been sent to the decretal Court by the First Class Subordinate Judge at Ahmednagar under section 41, and that, therefore, the jurisdiction to try the matter has still been retained by the First Class Subordinate Judge at Ahmednagar under section 42 of the Civil Procedure Code. The question whether the excess has or has not been levied in execution would, in my opinion, undoubtedly be a question relating to the execution of the decree within the meaning of section 47 of the Civil Procedure Code.

An order made under section 89 of the Transfer of Property Act, for the sale of mortgaged property, has the effect of substituting the right of sale thereby conferred upon the mortgagee for his rights under the mortgage, and the latter rights are extinguished. [p. 971, col. 2.]

Where, therefore, a first mortgagee sued for and obtained a decree for sale without impleading a puisne mortgagee, and subsequently bought in the property, but did not obtain possession for several years:

Held, that the puisne mortgagee could redeem him on payment of the amount due under the decree, and was not liable to pay him the much larger amount (principal and interest) to which he would have been entitled under his mortgage if he had not brought the property to sale. [p. 971, col. 2.]

Appeal from a decree of the Allahabad High Court (Sir H. Richards, Chief Justice, and Mr. Justice Rafique), dated the 27th January 1916, modifying a decree of the Additional Subordinate Judge, Aligarh, dated the 6th July 1914.

FACTS.—The property in suit was mortgaged first in 1872 to the appellants' predecessor, later in 1879 to respondent's predecessor.

In 1884 appellants sued on their mortgage without, however, making respondent's predecessor a party. They obtained a decree for sale in 1884, but the property was not sold till 1890 when it was bought in by appellants for Rs. 13,702, which was the amount then due under the decree. Owing to obstruction by the mortgagors appellants did not actually obtain possession till 1895.

In 1909 the present respondent sued to redeem the property. The only question in dispute was as to how much she had to pay. Appellants contended that she had no right to redeem unless she paid the entire amount due under the mortgage up to the time when they got possession.

The trial Judge upheld this contention and gave respondent a decree for redemption on payment of Rs. 49,124. On appeal the High Court (Sir H. Richards, C. J., and M. Rafique, J.) reversed this decision and substituted for the amount allowed by the trial Judge the sum of Rs. 23,311, which respondent declared herself willing to pay. The material portion of their judgment was as follows:—

"It becomes necessary to consider what is the true position of the contesting defendants. The decree which was obtained on foot of the mortgage of the 19th of February 1872 is dated the 28th of February 1884. It found that there was due on foot of the mortgage the sum of Rs. 9,432 12.0 for principal and interest up to the date of the suit. It further awarded Rs. 25.13.7 interest pendente lite, and future interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum on the decretal amount together with costs. The property was ordered to be sold to realise these amounts. The property was sold on the 20th of March 1890 for Rs. 13,762 6 3, which was the exact amount due on the decree at that date. The answering defendants allege that they did not get possession until 1895. Their contention is that they are now entitled to set up the mortgage of the 19th of February 1872 just as if it was still in force and effect up to the time that they got actual possession and that accordingly the interest should be calculated at the contractual rate, which was 15 per cent. per annum compound interest with yearly rests. In our opinion this contention is not sound. As soon as the decree of the 28th of February 1884 was passed, the mortgage-debt merged in the decree. It is a mere accident that the answering defendants are the mortgagees of the mortgage of February 1872 or their representatives. They have no greater rights than any stranger would have had who had purchased the property under the mortgage decree and paid cash for it. In our judgment all that the answering defendants are entitled to is to set up the amount of the decree of the 28th of February 1884. We may assume for the purposes of the present case that the answering defendants only got possession as alleged by them in 1895. We may also assume for the purposes of this case that they are entitled to simple interest on the amount of the decree including costs up to the date that they got possession, because even if they are allowed all this right up to obtaining possession, the amount will be less than the sum which the appellants, according to their memorandum of appeal, are willing to pay. We allow the appeal, modify the decree of the Court below by substituting the sum of Rs. 23,311 for Rs. 49, 124-9 0."

Hence this appeal.

Mr. E. B. Raikes, for the Appellants, submitted that the High Court had erred in modifying the Subordinate Judge's decree. The appellants were entitled to the benefit of their mortgage, as they no longer had the benefit of their decree: Umes Ohunder Sircar v. Zahur Fatima (1).

The later case of Het Ram v. Shadi Ram (2) is distinguishable. There is no evidence here that a final order was made under the Transfer of Property Act, 1882: moreover, the mortgages in this case were anterior to the Transfer of Property Act. [Reference was also made to Sri Gopal v. Firthi Singh (3)].

Mr. Parikh, for the Respondent.—Upon a sale decree being obtained under section 89 of the Transfer of Property Act, 1882, the mortgage in suit and all rights under it are extinguished. Het Ram v. Shadi Ram (2).

In Umes Ohunder's case (1) not only the mortgages, but the decree itself, were anterior to the Transfer of Property Act. The present case is governed by that Act: in 1884, when appellants sued, that Act provided the only procedure by which a sale decree could be obtained under a mortgage. It must be presumed that a final decree was duly made here; Omnia præsumuntur rite esse acta.

Mr. Raikes replied.

JUDGMENT.

SIR JOHN EDGE.—This is an appeal from a decree, dated the 27th January 1916, of the High Court at Allahabad, which modified a decree, dated the 8th July 1914, of the Additional Subordinate Judge of Aligarh.

In the suit in which this appeal has arisen, the appellants here or those whom they represent were defendants, and the plaintiff was Musammat Durga Kunwar, who was the respondent to this appeal but is now dead; her personal representative is now the respondent. The suit was brought on the 8th July 1909 by Musammat Durga Kunwar to obtain a decree for the sale of certain immoveable property within the jurisdiction of the Court of the Subordinate Judge, and was based upon a mortgage of the property dated the 12th June 1879, of which she became the assignee on the 21st May 1909 by an assignment from the representatives of one Murli Dhar, to whom the mortgage of the 12th June 1879 had been granted; his mortgage was the second mortgage on the property. The property had been mortgaged on the 19th February 1872 to the predecessors in title of the present appellants for Rs. 3,750, with compound interest at 15 per centum per annum with yearly rests.

On the 6th February 1884 the first mortgagees brought a suit for sale under the Transfer of Property Act, 1882, on their mortgage, but did not make Murli Dhar, the second mortgagee, a party to their suit. On the 28th February 1884 the first mortgagees obtained a decree in their suit for Rs 9,342, annas 12, for principal and interest due on this mortgage at the date of their suit, for Rs. 29, annas 13, pies 7, in respect of interest from the date of their suit to the date of their decree, and for further interest at the rate of 6 per centum per annum on the decretal amount until payment, and for costs. By the decree the mortgaged property should in default of payment be sold to realise the amount decreed. An order for sale was made and the property was sold on the 20th March 1890 by public auction and was purchased by the first mortgagees for Rs. 13,702, annas 6, pies 3, the amount due under the said decree of the 28th February 1884. Formal possession was given to the purchasers on the 15th August 1890, but they did not obtain actual possession until the end of 1895.

In the present suit the defendants claimed that the plaintiff had no right to a decree unless she paid the entire amount of the first mortgage, with compound interest at 15 per centum per annum to the date when the purchasers at the sale of the 20th March 1890 got actual possession together with some revenue and irrigation charges, amounting in all to Rs. 55,155, annas 13, pies 2. The Subordinate Judge, no doubt acting on the decision of the Board in Umes Chunder Sircar v. Zahur Fatima (1), gave Musammat Durga Kunwar a decree for sale conditional on her paying to the defendants Rs. 49,124, annas 9. From that decree Musammat Durga Kunwar appealed to the High Court,

The High Court in the appeal rightly held that the first mortgagee purchasers "had no greater rights than any stranger would have had who had purchased the property under the mortgage decree and paid cash for it." The learned Judges said: "In our judgment all that the answering defendants (the mortgagee purchasers) are entitled to is to set up the amount of the decree of the 28th February 1884." But as Musammat Durga Kunwar had by her petition of appeal only asked that the sum of Rs. 49,124, annas 9, should be reduced to Rs. 23,311, which she professed herself willing to pay, the High Court modified the decree to that extent. From that decree of the High Court this appeal has been brought.

At the time when the High Court delivered judgment, the case of Het Ram v. Shadi Ram (2) had not been before the Board. That case decided that an order made under section 89 of the Transfer of Property Act, 1882 (Act IV of 1882), for the sale of mortgaged property, has the effect of substituting the right of sale thereby conferred upon the mortgagee for his rights under the mortgage, and the latter rights are extinguished. When the decree or order for sale in the case of Umes Chunder Sircar v. Zahur Fatima (1) was made, the Transfer of Property Act, 1882, had not been passed and the procedure prescribed by that Act for suits for sales under that Act did not exist; that case was decided on the law as it then stood.

Their Lordships will humbly advise His Majesty that this appeal should be dismissed with costs, and that the decree of the High Court under the circumstances be confirmed.

Decree confirmed.

In order to satisfy the requirements of section 110 of the Civil Procedure Code the value of the claim, that must be taken into account in determining whether an appeal lies to His Majesty in Council is the value on the date of the decree from which the applicant seeks to appeal [p 973, cols. 1 & 2.]

Where the subject-matter of a suit is a share in family property, in determining the value of such subject-matter for the purpose of an appeal to His Majesty in Council, the value of the share only ought to be regarded, and not the value of the whole property [p 973, cols. 1 & 2.]

JUDGMENT.

SHAH, J.—This is an application for leave to appeal to His Majesty in Council from the decree of this Court in First Appeal No. 130 of 1916, on the ground that the requirements of section 110 of the Civil Procedure Code are satisfied.

In the suit as originally brought the plaintiff claimed one-half share in the family property and valued it at Rs. 12,000. The defendant No. 1, his uncle, and defendant No. 2, his grandmother, pleaded that he was entitled only to one-third share. A decree was passed in his favour to the extent of one-third share in the property. After the preliminary decree was passed, the defendant No. 2 died and the plaintiff then made an application to have the decree amended by claiming a moiety in the one third share of his grandmother. The trial Court held that on her death that share became equally divisible between the plaintiff and defendant No. 1. The defendant No. 1 preferred an appeal to this Court, which related to the one sixth share which the plaintiff claimed after the death of defendant No. 2 over and above the one-third share already awarded to him. This Court confirmed the decree of the trial Court, holding that the plaintiff was entitled to divide equally with the defendant No. 1 the share which defendant No. 2 could have claimed in her lifetime.

As the decree of the lower Court is confirmed by this Court, under section 110 it is essential that the appeal must involve some substantial question of law. This condition, in my opinion, is satisfied in the present case. The appeal raises the question as to whether on the death of Yesbodabai the plaintiff became entitled to a moiety of her share in the property or whether the defendant No. 1 was exclusively entitled to that share.

As to the value of the subject matter of the suit, in the Court of first instance it is clearly over Rs. 10,000. But the subject matter in dispute on appeal to His Majesty in Council would be the one-sixth share of the whole estate If the value of this one sixth share is Rs. 10,000 or upwards, the applicant would be entitled to the certificate. But if the value of that share is less than Rs. 10,000, he cannot succeed.

It is urged on behalf of the applicant that even if the value of the one sixth share be less than Rs. 10,000, under the second paragraph of section 110 the decree sought to be appealed from in this case involves, directly or indirectly, a claim to or question respecting property of the value exceeding Rs. 10,000. It is contended that under this paragraph of the section the property referred to must be taken to be the whole property of the family sought to be partitioned and not only the one-sixth share. I am of opinion that this contention is not sound. In this case the decree from which the applicant seeks to appeal to His Majesty in Council involves, directly or indirectly, a claim to or question respecting one sixth share of the property only. It is not suggested that by that decree any property outside the one-sixth share to which the appeal to this Court related would be affected A similar contention as to the true meaning of the second paragraph of section 110, Civil Procedure

Code, in relation to a partition suit was considered and negatived by Jenkins, C. J., and Russell, J., in De Silva v. De Silva (1).

The applicant, therefore, can succeed only if he is able to satisfy this Court that the one sixth share of the family property including the mesne profits is worth Rs. 10,000 or upwards. The value of the share, according to the value of the family property estimated by the plaintiff in the plaint, would be only Rs. 4,000 exclusive of the mesne profits. But the applicant asserts through his son, who has made an affidavit, that the whole property during the year 1918-1919 has considerably increased in value and is worth nearly Rs. 66,000, and that on that calculation the value of the one sixth would exceed Rs. 10,000. The opponent has filed a counter-affidavit made by her father Bapuji Atmaram Tendulkar, in which the correctness of the allegation made on behalf of the applicant is questioned. Thus there is a dispute between the parties as to the value of this property. Where such wide fluctuations in the value of the property are asserted, it is essential to fix the date, with reference to which the value of the property should be estimated for the purpose of this application. Having regard to the terms of section 110 it seems to me that the value of the one sixth share on the date of the decree from which the applicant seeks to appeal to His Majesty in Council must be determined and must be taken into account in determining whether the requirements of section 110 are satisfied. This view is supported by the decision in Surendra Nath Roy v. Dwarka Nath Chakrabutty (2).

It is necessary, therefore, to know the market value of the one sixth share of the property in suit at the date of the decree of this Court, i.e., on or about the 30th of January 1918. As the parties are not agreed as to the value of the property, under rule 5 of Order XLV we refer the dispute as to the value of the one sixth share in the whole property, which is the subject-matter in dispute on appeal to His Majesty in Council, for report to the trial Court.

(2) 35 Ind. Cas. 605; 44 C. 119; 24 C. L. J. 350; 21 C. W. N. 580.

The lower Court will also report as to the value of the one sixth share of the mesne profits from the date of the suit to the date of the High Court decree. Apparently the mesne profits have not been ascertained yet. For the purpose of this application it is necessary that they should be estimated, as the one sixth share in the mesne profits forms part of the subject-matter of the appeal to His Majesty in Council.

The report to be made to this Court in one month.

HAYWARD, J.—I agree. The plaintiff's one-half share was the subject-matter of the suit and was valued at Rs. 12,000 in the Court of first instance. The defendant No. 1's claim in appeal is for one half of the one-third share of defendant No. 2, which would be at the previous rates only Rs. 2,000. But it has been contended that the value of the property has risen and that the value of the claim in appeal would now be Rs. 11,000, being one sixth of the total value now estimated to be Rs. 66,000, and affidavits have been put in by the parties on either side affirming and contesting this position. There must, therefore, in my opinion be an inquiry as to the real value under rule 5 of Order XLV of the Schedule to the Civil Procedure Code.

It has been urged that in any case the value of the share only ought not to be regarded, but the value of the whole property. But it seems to me that we ought in this matter to follow the decision of De Silva v. De Silva (1) and not the contrary decision of Lala Bhagwat Sahai v. Rai Pashupati Nath (3) of the Calcutta High Court. On the other hand the value of the subject matter of the appeal ought, in my opinion, to be the value at the date of the decree of the High Court, as held in the case of Surendra Nath Roy v. Dwarka Nath Chakrabutty (2).

There is, in my opinion, a substantial question of law involved, viz., the exact effect of the proceedings in the litigation as regards the share of the deceased defendant No. 2 and the legal effect of that position under the rules of Hindu Law.

Issues remitted.

Hindu Law—Joint family—Mortgage by father of family property—Antecedent debt—Family necessity —Liability of sons—Debts for which joint family responsible.

A mortgage by a Hindu father of joint family property in lieu of antecedent debts and debts incurred for the benefit of the family is binding on his sons and on the joint family property.

The payment of a prior mortgage or the consideration for the acquisition of property for the joint family are debts for which the joint family is liable.

First appeal against the decision of the Additional Subordinate Judge, Meerut, dated the 28th March 1917.

The Hon'ble Dr. Tej Bahadur Sapru and Mr. Radha Kant Malaviya, for the Appellants.

Dr. S. N. Sen, Messrs. N. C. Vaish and Sital Pershad Ghosh, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This is an appeal by the sons of the mortgagor in a suit brought by the mortgagee to enforce a mortgage executed in his favour on the 21st of April 1913. The mortgagor is one Bholar alias Pahalwan. The claim was disputed by the sons on the ground that there was no family necessity for the mortgage. They also urged that the mortgage-debt was incurred for immoral purposes. As regards the first point, what we have to consider is whether the mortgage debt now in dispute was incurred in lieu of an antecedent debt. Assuming that the observations contained in the judgment of their Lordships of the Privy Council in the case of Sahu Ram Chandra v. Bhup Singh (1) apply to this case, it has, in our opinion, been established that the mortgage in suit was given for an antecedent debt. This mortgage was executed in lieu of the amount of a prior mortgage of the 10th of March 1911. That mortgage was for a sum of Rs. 7,000. Out of the consideration for the aforesaid mortgage, Rs. 2,220 was the amount of a prior mortgage; Rs. 2,000 was the consideration for a sale obtained by the mortgagor of certain mortgagee rights which the present mortgagee had purchased from him and resold to him. This sum was clearly consideration for the acquisition of property for the joint family and was, therefore, a debt for which the joint family was liable. The other items secured under the mortgage of 1911 were all monies which were borrowed otherwise than on the security of the family property. The amount of the earlier mortgage for Rs. 3,000, part of which was Rs. 2,200 mentioned above, also consisted of debts which had been incurred by the father of the appellants apart from the security of the family property. It follows, therefore, that the mortgage, which is now sought to be enforced, was a mortgage executed in lieu of antecedent debts incurred for the benefit of the family. This case very much resembles the case of Brij Narain Rai v. Mangla Prasad (2). We are, therefore, of opinion that the mortgage now sought to be enforced was a mortgage which would be binding on the sons of the mortgagor and on the joint family property, unless it could be shown that the debt was incurred by the father for immoral purposes. As to this last point there is no evidence to show that this particular debt for which the mortgage in suit was executed were incurred for purposes of immorality. Some evidence was given as to the general immorality of the mortgagor, but that is not sufficient to taint the present mortgage in any way. The appeal is thus, in our opinion, without force and we dismiss it with costs, including fees in this Court on the higher scale.

Appeal dismissed.

Second appeal from the decree of the District Judge, Delhi, dated the 7th December 1915.

Dr. Muhammad Iqbal, for the Appellants.

The Hon'ble Pandit Sheo Narain, R. B., and Mr. Kanwar Narain, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This is a second appeal from the order of the District Judge, Delhi, upholding the order of the Subordinate Judge, dismissing the plaintiffs' claim for recovery of Rs. 1,077-13-0 as short proceeds of certain goods indented for by the defendants, but of which they refused to take delivery on the ground that they were not in accordance with the description as entered in the indents. It is not denied before us that the goods which arrived at Delhi were different in great part from those indented for, but it is contended that even assuming that this was so the plaintiffs were entitled to a decree. It is contended that as defendant accepted the shipping documents and the drafts for the amounts due, he was liable to pay the latter at maturity, and that he could not refuse to pay merely on the ground that there was some difference in the goods, and that if he had any claim on this score he should have made it subsequently in accordance with the conditions entered in the indent form. In support of his argument Dr. Muhammad Iqbal has referred to the case of Marshall and Co. v. Nagin Chand-Phul Chand (1). In his judgment Beaman, J, referred to certain remarks of Scrutton, L. J, in the case of Arnhold Karberg and Company v. Blythe, Green, Jourdain and Company, Theodor Schneider & Co. v Burgett and Newsam (2), in which the learned Lord Justice lays it down that "the key to many of the difficulties arising in C. I. F. contracts is, in his opinion, to hold firmly before the mind this point, that in law what is contracted to be sold and paid for is not the goods but the shipping documents."

The letters C. I F. occur in the indents in the present case, and the contracts appear to be what are called C. I. F. contracts. A reference to the indents also leads to the conclusion that the indentors were bound to pay the drafts at maturity, while if they had any claim in regard to the nature of the goods they could bring it subsequently in the manner laid down in the indent. Thus clause 2 says that "should I fail to accept drafts on presentation or pay at maturity I hereby authorize you or your agent to sell the goods by public auction or private sale when and where you like, after having given me 10 days' notice of your intention to do so." Clause 7 says: "No claim can be recognized if not made in writing within 30 days after arrival of the goods in India, and if the survey report is not sent to you within two months after arrival of the goods with cuttings attached sealed by the surveyors of both the order samples and goods shipped, your draft upon us is to be accepted and paid at maturity independent of any claim, which is to be settled afterwards according to surveyors' decision."

No authority to the contrary has been cited, and we are clear that the defendants were bound in consideration of receiving the shipping documents to meet the drafts upon maturity, and that if they had any claim in respect of the goods they had to make it separately. The learned District Judge in the course of his judgment says: "Even had the plaintiffs sued on a bare acceptance, it would be open to the defendants to plead failure of consideration as against the plaintiffs and the plaintiffs have sued on the assertion and assumption that the goods ordered were delivered to the defendant." In our opinion the defendants cannot in answer to the claim upon the draft plead failure of consideration, because what they contracted for were the shipping documents and not the actual goods. The plaintiffs no doubt sued on the assertion that the goods ordered were delivered or rather tendered to the defendants, but in their replication in answer to the defendants' pleas they clearly stated in paragraph 3 that as the defendants had honoured the drafts they were bound to pay the money. If they had any objection about the goods they could bring a separate suit. We hold then that in the first instance the defendants are liable upon the drafts accepted by them. What amount they are entitled to deduct from the plaintiffs' bill has not been argued before us, and the case must be remanded for decision of the fourth and other issues. The first Court, in discussing issue No. 7, expressed the opinion that the claim must fail on other grounds also. This part of the case has not been argued before us and we express no opinion thereon.

We accept the appeal and setting aside the order of the lower Appellate Court remand the case thereto for re decision of the appeal. The lower Appellate Court may, if it finds it necessary, order a remand to the trial Court. Stamp in this Court will be refunded and other costs will be costs in the case.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), s. 110—Appeal to Privy Council—Valuation of subject-matter of suit—Interest, whether can be added to decretal amount.

In calculating the value of the subject-matter of a suit for the purpose of an appeal to His Majesty in Council, the appellant is not entitled to add the interest added to the decretal amount in order to bring the value up to Rs 10,000. [p. 976, col. 2; p. 977, col. 1.]

Application for leave to appeal to His Majesty in Council.

Mr. Panna Lal, for the Petitionre.

The Hon'ble Dr. Tej Bahadur Sapru and the Hon'ble Mr. Raza Ali, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This is an application under section 110 of the Code of Civil Procedure for permission to appeal to His Majesty in Council. The parties to the application are a contractor and a person who employed the contractor to build a house for him. The valuation of the dispute between the parties was over Rs. 10,000 in the Court of first instance. It came up in appeal before a Bench of this Court, and the contractor succeeded. The building owner now files this application for leave to appeal to the Privy Council. For the contractor the objection is taken that the value of the subject-matter in dispute before the Privy Council would be less than Rs. 10,000, and no substantial point of law is involved in the case and, therefore, no leave should be given. The learned Counsel for the applicant replies that the value of the subject matter in dispute before the Privy Council would be over Rs. 10,000, if to the original amount decreed by this Court is added interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, in which case the amount will be Rs. 10,055. Moreover, it is urged that this dispute is of a nature that is not to be found in any reported case and has never been up in appeal to the Privy Council, and, therefore, it is a matter of general interest that permission should be allowed. We may dispose of this latter contention at once by saying that we find no question of substantial law or of general public interest involved in the appeal. The dispute between the parties is of the ordinary nature, arising between a contractor and a building owner. The point in issue between the parties in the case depends upon the evidence. As to the valuation of the subject-matter in dispute we may observe in the first instance that out of the decretal amount of Rs. 8,000 Rs. 1,821 have to be deducted which the applicant took out of Court. The balance of Rs. 6,000 plus the interest at 6 per cent. per annum would not bring up the total amount to Rs. 10,000. But apart from the sum of Rs. 1,821 the applicant has not, in our opinion, the right to add interest to the decretal amount in order to show that the valuation of the proposed appeal to the Privy Council would be Rs. 10,000 or more. The applicant relies on the case of the Bank of New South Wales v. Owston (1). In that case interest was allowed to be added to the decretal amount for the purpose of following the subject-matter in dispute before the Privy Council. But there is one point of difference between that case and the present, namely, that by the law of New South Wales, by Statute, interest was added to the decretal amount. In this country there is no Statute giving the right to the decree-holder to add interest to the decretal amount. The grant of interest is discretionary to the Court. We, therefore, think that the case relied upon by the applicant does not help his contention.

We disallow the application with costs, including fees on the higher scale.

Application rejected.

Petition, under section 25 of Act IX of 1887 and section 107 of the Government of India Act, praying the High Court to revise the order, dated the 17th January 1919, of the Court of the Subordinate Judge, Nilgirie, Ootacamund, in Civil Miscellaneous Petition No. 477 of 1918, in Small Cause Suit No. 949 of 1918.

This petition came on for hearing on the 28th of October 1919 before Sadasiva Aiyar and Spencer, JJ.

Mr. M. Patanjali Sastri, for Mr. T. M. Krishnaswamy Aiyar, for the Petitioner:—The rule in section 17 of the Provincial Small Cause Courts Act is only directory. The Court has to decide whether it is deposit or security that is required and then issue directions to the applicant. Ramasami v. Kurisu (1), followed in Akula Achiah v. Challapalli Lakshminarasimham (2). See also Suryanarayana v. Ramanna (3). In Errikulappa Chetty v. The Official Assignee of Madras (4) the Court admitted the application and then granted time to pay up the deposit.

[SADASIVA AIYAR, J.—The words are "shall at the time of the application." The word "shall" clearly ousts the Court's discretion.]

The decisions of the Calcutta and other Courts take a contrary view. But this is the acknowledged practice of this Presidency as found in Akula Achiah v. Challapalli Lakshminarasimham (2).

Mr. O. Madhavan Nair, for the Respondent:—In Akula Achiah v. Challapalli Lakshminarasimham (2) the learned Judges take a different view of the law and yet reluctantly follow Ramasami v. Kurisu (1). In Calcutta and elsewhere, an entirely different construction prevails.

ORDER OF REFERENCE TO A FULL BENCH.

The question that arises for our determination in this civil revision petition

(1) 13 M. 178 (F. B.); 4 Ind. Dec. (N. S.) 837.
(2) 53 Ind. Cas. 926; 37 M. L. J. 433; (1919) M. W. N. 687; 10 L. W. 474.

(4) 32 Ind. Cas. 190; 39 M. 903.

is one upon which there has been considerable difference of opinion so far as this Court is concerned. It is whether the wording of section 17 of the Provincial Small Cause Courts Act makes it imperative that a party seeking to set aside an ex parte decree of a Small Cause Court should deposit the decree amount in Court or give security at the time of presenting his application.

In Ramasami v. Kurisu (1), a case which went before a Full Bench on another point, the Divisional Bench that heard the civil revision petition held that the provisions of this section were merely directory and not mandatory. In Suryanaryana v. Ramanna (3) Miller, J., considered this ruling but decided the case before him on another point, namely, that a deposit made after the hearing of the petition was in any case too late and rendered the application liable to be dismissed as barred by limitation.

In Akula Achiah v. Challapalli Lakshminarasimham (2) the authority of Ramasami v. Kurisu (1) was followed with some hesitation, as the learned Judges were unwilling to make a departure from what had been held to be the law in this Presidency by the practice prevailing for over 30 years.

On the other hand the Allahabad High Court has held in Jagan Nath v. Chet Ram (5) and Chhotey Lal v. Lakhmi Chand (6) that the words of this section are mandatory.

We agree with this view. In our opinion the meaning of the section is clear. When it says that the applicant shall either deposit the amount due or give security * * * as the Court may direct, it does not mean that this shall be done only "if the Court so directs," which is the interpretation that the petitioner's Vakil wishes us to place on these words. The deposit or the tender of security must also be made "at the time of presenting the application." Those words cannot be treated as intended to be devoid of their natural meaning so as to leave it open to the applicant to make the deposit or tender the security at that time or at any other time.

We, therefore, refer to a Full Bench the question whether the direction in section 17 of the Provincial Small Cause Courts Act as to the deposit of the decree amount or the giving of security at the time of presenting an application to set aside an ex parte decree are mandatory or not.

This petition coming on for hearing on the 19th and 20th January 1920, in pursuance of the Order of Reference to a Full Bench, upon perusing the petition and the order of the lower Court and the record in the case and the said Order of Reference to a Full Bench and upon hearing the arguments of Mr. T. M. Krishnaswamy Aiyar for the Petitioner and of Mr. O. Madhavan Nair for the Respondent, and the case having stood over for consideration till this day, the Court expressed the following

OPINION.

WALLIS, C. J.—The corresponding provision in the earlier Act XI of 865 was enacted as a proviso to section 21, which, after enacting that all decrees and orders of the Court should be final and making provision for setting aside ex parte decrees and also for granting new trials in other cases, expressly provided that no such new trial should be granted to a defendant "unless he shall with his notice of application deposit in Court the amount", etc. Under this section there was clearly no jurisdiction to grant a new trial unless the proviso had been complied with in terms. Under that Act the procedure in these Courts was governed by rules made by the High Court under section 46, but by section 5 of the Code of Civil Procedure of 1877 the sections of the Code set out in the Second Schedule were applied to Small Cause Courts, so far as applicable. The sections so applied included the sections dealing with applications to set aside ex parte decrees and applications for review, and it was, therefore, only natural that the proviso now in question should appear in the present Act as a proviso to section 17, which again expressly provided that Small Cause Courts should follow the procedure prescribed in the chapters and sections of the Code of Civil Procedure specified in the Second Schedule. The re-arrangement necessitated some alteration in the language of the proviso, but that alteration in my opinion affords no ground for attributing to the Legislature an intention to modify the clearly mandatory nature of the earlier enactment, more especially as the new provise is expressed in terms which are prima facie mandatory and have been so construed by the other High Courts. There are no doubt some English decisions in which the Courts have found indications in the particular enactments that provisions in form mandatory were only intended to be directory, but having regard to the history of the section there is in my opinion no room for any such conclusion here. In Ramasami v. Kurisu (1) Parker, J, no doubt stated that he was disposed to hold that section 17 was merely directory and not mandatory, and went on to observe:—"The Court did require the costs to be deposited before the review was heard, and this, I think, is the intention of the section."

With all respect this appears to me to be importing into the section a new mandatory provision not to be found there. It does not appear from the report in that case whether the time prescribed in the Limitation Act for making an application under section 17 had expired when the costs were deposited. In Jeun Muchi v. Budhiram Muchi (7), where the application was made without making a deposit or giving security, it was held by Brett and Mookerjee, JJ., that, if the requirements of the section were complied with within the period prescribed for such applications in the Limitation Act, it might be treated as sufficient, as no objection could have been taken if a fresh application had been presented when security was deposited. I think that this interpretation of the requirements of the section may well be followed, having regard to the practice which has prevailed in this Presidency, and would answer accordingly that the provision in question is mandatory, but is sufficiently complied with by satisfying the requirements of the section before the time prescribed for such applications in the Limitation Act has elapsed.

OLDFIELD, J.— I entirely agree and add only that the interpretation we are adopting is consistent with the object of the Provincial Small Cause Courts Act, the provision of a simple fixed procedure for the cheap and expeditious disposal of petty claims.

SESHAGIRI AIYAR, J.—After the very full discussion which this case has received, I am confirmed in the view I took in Akula Achiah v. Challapalli Lakshminarasimham (2) that there is no necessity for bringing our decision into line with the decisions of the other High Courts except with Jeun Muchi v. Budhiram Muchi (7).

On the question whether the language of section 17 of the Provincial Small Cause Courts Act is only directory, there can be difference of opinion. The position is this. Before the enactment of Act IX of 1887, the procedure for the trial of Small Cause suits and the procedure for the trial of regular suits were regulated by distinct legislative enactments. By the Madras Civil Courts Act, III of 1873, section 28, power was conferred upon the Local Government to invest District Munsifs and Subordinate Judges with Small Cause Court jurisdiction in regard to suits of a particular description. My impression is that until the enactment of this provision, there were separate Small Cause Courts in defined centres, and the regular tribunals of the Presidency were not invested with small cause powers. Then came the Civil Procedure Code of 1877. It was intended to regulate the procedure not only in the regular Courts but also in the Small Cause Courts. The Civil Procedure Code of 1882 recognised this principle, and also provided for the repeal of some of the provisions of the Small Cause Courts Act of 1865. When the present Small Cause Courts Act was re enacted, provisions were introduced into it which, while confirming the right of a small cause suitor to have his case tried according to the procedure prescribed in the Civil Procedure Code, imposed limitations upon the exercise of some of the powers. Section 17 is an instance of this kind. In granting applications for setting aside ex parte decrees, the Small Cause Courts Act, section 17, imposes a limitation upon the right of the suitor. Whereas, under the ordinary law, what the Courts have to be satisfied is that the party has not been duly served and that he had no opportunity of defending the suit, under the Small Courts Act, in addition to satisfying these requirements, the defendant is required to deposit the amount of the decree. Therefore, section 17 should be read not as conferring a new jurisdiction subject to certain conditions, but as limiting the exercise of jurisdiction by imposing conditions. This aspect of the history of legislation is essential for finding out whether section 17 is directory or mandatory. Mr. Krishnaswamy Ayyar referred to section 46 of the Small Cause Courts Act of 1865 and drew our attention to the fact that the language in the present Small Cause Courts Act is materially different. I think there is force in this contention. The language of section 17 suggests ex facie that the deposit of the decree amount should precede the application for setting aside the ex parte decree; but there are no words in the section that, if the deposit is not made, the application should not be received. That seems to be one of the criteria for construing a statutory provision to be mandatory; I do not say that that is the sole criterion. This view gathers strength from the decision of the Judicial Committee to which Mr. Krishnaswami Ayyar drew our attention, namely, Burjore an' Bhawani Pershad v. Bhagana (8). Their Lordships accepted the view taken in Soorj Mukhi Kuar, In the matter of (9) that the absence of a provision for the dismissal of a suit or application for failure to comply with a condition is a circumstance tending to show that the provision is permissive and not mandatory.

Even more significant is the decision of the Judicial Committee under the Pensions Act in Mahammad Azmat Ali Khan v. Lalli Begam (10).

In that Act, sections 4 and 6 read together make the institution of a suit in the Civil Courts dependant upon the production of a certificate from the Collector; and yet the Judicial Committee held that the production of a certificate during the course of the trial would be sufficient, thereby indicating that the sections are only directory. This view has been followed in Madras and the other High Courts. See Bepin Behari Saha v. Abdul Barik (11) and Ganpat Rao v. Anant Rao (12).

A third class of cases was referred to by me in my judgment in Akula Achiah v. Challapalli Lakshminarasimham (2). In Ramayyangar v. Krishnayyangar (13) and in Srinivasa Chariar v. Raghava Chariar (14) it was held that section 92 of the Civil Procedure Code, which, on a plain reading of it, indicates that the sanction of the Collector or the Advocate-General is a condition precedent to the institution of a suit, was satisfied by the production of the sanction during the course of the suit. I cannot say that the language of section 17 of the Small Cause Courts Act is more imperative than sections 4 and 6 of the Pensions Act, or section 92 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Therefore, the principle which underlies the decisions in these latter acts is equally applicable to the construction of section 17 of the Small Cause Courts Act.

In Maxwell on the interpretation of Statutes, it is stated in one place that the conditions relating to the giving of recognizances or to the trials in suits should ordinarily be regarded as mandatory. But a reference to the decision in Rendall v. Blair (15) will show that this statement is subject to many exceptions. In that case, the question was whether if the consent of the Charity Commissioners was not obtained prior to the institution of an action, the action failed. Justice Kay in the first Court held that it was a fatal objection. The learned Judge says: "Another objection is this: if I allow the action to stand over in order that leave may be obtained, the writ, which was issued more than a year ago, must be treated as a writ issued nunc pro tunc, and amendment must be allowed to the effect that the action was commenced after that leave obtained. I think that would be wrong. It would, I think, be entirely against the object and purpose of this section to allow the action to stand over for leave to be obtained". In appeal, all the Lord Justices agreed that time should be given for obtaining the consent. Lord Justice Bowen said, "whether, supposing the consent of the Commissioners was necessary, it would be right to dismiss the action altogether..... ..... It does not seem to me that the proper course, if an action appears to the learned Judge at the hearing to be an action which falls within section 17, would be to dismiss it altogether; on the contrary, I think you ought to allow it to stand over to see if the consent of the Commissioners can be obtained." Then the learned Judge examines the language of the Statute, which is in these terms:—"Before any suit, petition, or other proceeding for obtaining any relief, etc., relating to any charity, shall be commenced, presented or taken, there shall be transmitted notice in writing to the Board... ... and the said Board, if upon a consideration of the circumstances they think fit, may by an order or certificate direct any suit, petition or proceeding be next presented etc., ... and save as herein otherwise provided no suit, petition or other proceeding shall be entertained or proceeded with by the Court except upon and in conformity with the order or certificate of the said Board." On this language Bowen Lord Justice says: "This section is not framed in the way in which sections are framed when it is intended that some preliminary steps should be taken before the action is maintainable at all. On the contrary, both from the way in which it is framed, from the omission of the usual words, and also from the presence of words which seem to me to indicate that the absence of the consent of the Commissioners is only a bar to the Courts dealing with the action, and not a bar to the original institution of the suit". This decision, in my opinion, which was concurred in on this point by Lord Justices Fry and Cotton, furnishes a clue for the construction of the section we are dealing with. I am not, therefore, prepared to say that the section is mandatory.

However that may be, in Jeun Muchi v. Budhiram Muchi (7) it is laid down that even though the original application may not be accompanied by a deposit, once the application is on record, a deposit subsequently received within the time limited by law would validate the application. This seems to be a very salutary rule. The later deposit would attract to itself the earlier application, and the application itself may be regarded as having been made on the date of the deposit. While this view would still make it permissible to the suitor to come into Court with an application unaccompanied by a deposit, it would also compel him to pay the money within the time limited by law. As against this view, there is the answer suggested by Mr. Krishnaswami Ayyar that, whenever a deposit is made before the conclusion of the trial, it should date back to the date of the original application. In support of this veiw, there is the analogy of the practice in this and the other Courts by which deficient Court-fees, paid subsequent to the date of filing of the appeal and the filing of necessary papers which did not accompany the memorandum of appeal, have been regarded as enabling the party to claim that the additional payment and the later production of documents should date back to the presentation of the appeal. In such cases the office fixes a time within which the deficiency or the omission should be set right. If this is done, the delay is excused in the Admission Court.

My answer to the question is that the provision of section 17 of the Small Cause Courts Act will be complied with, if the deposit required by that section is made within the period of limitation, although it did not accompany the application for setting aside the ex parte decree.

The expression "former Court" in proviso 3) to section 3 of the Transfer of Property (Validation) Act means the Court which grants the review, and in the case of an appeal, the Appellate Court, and not the trial Court.

JUDGMENT.—The learned District Judge was, in our opinion, mistaken when, at the conclusion of his judgment, he held that he was bound by the finding arrived at in the trial Court, that is to say, by the Court of first instance, on the question of the consideration for the mortgage-deed in suit. The question turns on the wording of section 3, proviso 3 of Act XXVI of 1917. When the learned District Judge, by his order of April the 27th, 1918, granted the plaintiff's application for review, the plaintiff's appeal against the decree of the trial Court dismissing his claim for a decree for sale on the mortgage, and granting him only a simple money-decree, became once more a pending appeal on the file of the District Judge of Meerut. We are not at all certain from the form of the order before us that this fact was fully realised in the Court below. The order itself is headed as being an order in a miscellaneous case and the learned District Judge begins his judgment by describing the matter before him as an application for review of judgment under Act XXVI of 1917. He is certainly wrong there, as the application for review of judgment had been granted by his predecessor on the 27th April 1918. What he had before him was the appeal itself for decision on merits and on any plea that might be raised before him by either of the parties. The position then was that the trial Court had found in favour of the plaintiffs on every point except as regards the formal execution of the deed of mortgage. That point the Court was now bound to decide in favour of the plaintiffs under Act XXVI 1917, but the mere filing of the appeal had opened a door to the defendants to support the decision of the trial Court on any point which had been decided against them. The order under appeal shows that they actually tried to do this, for they asked the District Judge to reconsider the finding on the question of payment of consideration and to record a new finding in their favour. The learned District Judge seems to have taken this point into consideration and to have discussed it; but we cannot treat his remarks on the point as equivalent to the recording of a finding, in view of the fact that he goes on to say that he holds himself bound by the original finding of the Subordinate Judge. That he was not so bound is, in our opinion, clear, for two reasons. When the review was granted by the District Judge it was a review of his order dismissing the appeal. The decision of the "former Court" referred to in proviso 3 to section 3 of Act XXVI of 1917 was the decision of the District Judge, the Court of first appeal, and not that of the Subordinate Judge, the original trial Court. Moreover, the question of the payment of consideration for this mortgage had not been finally determined when an appeal was brought against the decree of the trial Court by the plaintiffs It was an issue which required to be determined in the Appellate Court after the question of execution had been decided in favour of the plaintiffs. We have come to the conclusion that the proper way for us to deal with this matter is to remit an issue on the question of consideration to the lower Appellate Court so as to secure a clear finding. The issue then is as follows:—

Was the consideration for the mortgage deed in suit actually paid, and if so, was it such as to bind the interest of Jagannath in the property mortgaged?

Ten days will be allowed for objections after return of finding.

Issue remitted.

Letters Patent (Lahore), cl. 10—Appellant, right of, to ask for reversal of Single Bench judgment—Fresh contention, whether can be urged.

An appellant is not entitled to ask a Division Bench hearing an appeal under the Letters Patent to set aside the judgment of the Single Bench when it is found that the judgment is correct on all points upon which the Single Judge was called upon to adjudicate nor is it open to the parties in such an appeal to raise a contention which was not urged before the Court from the judgment of which the appeal is preferred. [p. 984, cols. 1 & 2.]

Letters patent appeal against the judgment of Mr. Justice Martineau, dated the 22nd July 1919, in Civil Appeal No. 705 of 1919.

The Hon'ble Mr. Fazl-i Husain and Lala Balwant Rai, for the Appellants.

Sheikh Umar Bakhsh and Mr. Niaz Muhammad, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT—This is an appeal under clause 10 of the Letters Patent from the judgment of a Single Bench, and the main ground upon which the appellants seek to impeach the conclusion of the learned Judge is one which was never raised before him and upon which he was not called upon to pronounce his opinion. Put briefly, the facts of the case are that on the 16th July 1918 one Abdul Samad, mortgagor, obtained a preliminary decree against Faujdar Khan and others for the redemption of a plot of land on payment of a certain sum of money within six months. The decree passed in favour of Abdul Samad also awarded him the costs of the suit. On the 13th January 1919 Abdul Samad sold the land to the appellants, who thereafter deposited in Court the amount payable under the decree. Now, it is quite clear that the real bone of contention between the parties is whether the mortgagees, who have preferred a first appeal to this Court against the preliminary decree, should remain in possession of the property, or whether they should be displaced by the appellants. It appears that the mortgagees applied to the High Court for stay of further proceedings in pursuance of the preliminary decree, but their application was ultimately rejected on the ground that the appellants had obtained possession of the property. We have perused the proceedings taken by the Subordinate Judge in connection with the alleged delivery of possession, and we must say that the procedure adopted by the learned Judge was wholly erroneous and has given rise to a legitimate complaint by the mortgagees. It is, however, unnecessary to dilate upon this matter, because the judgment of the Single Bench has, to a large extent, remedied the injustice done to them.

So far as the appellants' locus standi to intervene is concerned, the matter does not admit of any real doubt. They contended before the Single Bench that they were the assignees of the decree and invoked the provisions of Order XXI, rule 16, Civil Procedure Code. The learned Judge rightly points out that what they purchased from Abdul Samad was not the decree but the land. The sale deed in their favour deals with the transfer of the land and contains no recital to the effect that the decree is sold to them. Mr. Fazl i-Hussain for the appellants does not argue that the sale amounted to a transfer of the decree but places his reliance upon an application alleged to have been made by Abdul Samad on the 13th January 1919, informing the Court that he had sold the land to the appellants who would deposit the money in Court and would realize the costs, if any, awarded to him. Upon the record before us there is no application of this character, nor was any reference to such an application made when the appeal came up for hearing before the Single Bench. It may be that the application forms part of some other record, but it was obviously the duty of the appellants to furnish particulars of that record and to see that it is brought up before the Court.

In view of the facts referred to above, the Single Bench holds that the appellants cannot be treated as the transferees of the decree under Order XXI, rule 16, because it was the land and not the decree that was assigned to them; and the learned Judge further finds that, at any rate, that part of the decree, which deals with costs, was never transferred to the appellants, and that the law does not contemplate a transfer of a part of a decree. In this connection the judgment in Ram Chander Naik Kalia v. Abdul Hakim (1) is on all fours with the present case. We consider that the appellants' claim to be treated as assignees of the decree has been rightly disallowed by the learned Judge, and there can be no manner of doubt that that was the only ground urged before him by the appellants to establish their locus standi.

Mr. Fazl-i-Hussain for the appellants further raises a question which was not even mentioned before the Single Bench. He contends that his clients appeared before the Subordinate Judge at a stage prior to the passing of the final decree, that the proceedings at that time were proceedings in the suit, and that under Order XXII, rule 10, they could by leave of the Court continue the suit as the representatives of Abdul Samad. Now as stated above, it is perfectly clear that this matter was not urged before the Single Judge, who had no opportunity to adjudicate upon the question and to decide whether the leave of the Court, as required by the aforesaid rule, was or was not given. We consider that the appellants are not entitled to ask the Division Bench hearing an appeal under the Letters Patent to set aside the judgment of the Single Bench when it is found that that judgment is correct on all the points upon which the Single Judge was called upon to adjudicate. It appears that though the aforesaid rule is referred to in one of the applications made to the Court of first instance, the matter was not present to the minds of the appellants; and that their whole energy was concentrated upon showing that they were the transferees of the decree. Further it is not clear whether the Subordinate Judge applied his mind to the consideration of the question whether the leave as required by Order XXII, rule 10, should or should not be granted, and it is exceedingly doubtful whether his attention was invited to the provisions of that rule. In these circumstances, and having regard to the fact that the appellants have already taken an unfair advantage of the erroneous procedure adopted by the Subordinate Judge by defeating the application of the respondents for stay of further proceedings, we are not prepared to exercise our jurisdiction under clause 10 of the Letters Patent. As pointed out in Shahazadi Hajra Begum v. Khaja Hossein Ali (2), it is not open to the parties to raise in appeal under the Letters Patent a contention which was not urged before the Court from the judgment of which the appeal is preferred. This is a sound rule and we have no hesitation in following it.

We accordingly dismiss the appeal with costs.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), s. 11, Expl. VI—Res judicata—Suit by person claiming through another who was party to previous suit—Previous suit, parties in, litigating bona fide—Decision in previous suit whether bars subsequent suit.

A person claiming through another, who was a party to a previous suit in which the parties were litigating a private right bona fide on behalf of a class, is bound by the decision in that suit, even though he was no party thereto either in a representative or personal capacity and the decision in the previous suit against his predecessor was ex parte; consequently, a subsequent suit brought by him on the same facts would be barred under Explanation VI to section 11 of the Civil Procedure Code as res judicata. [p 988, col. 2; p 989, col. 1; p. 990, col. 1.]

Second appeal against the decree of the Court of the Temporary Subordinate Judge, Ellore, in Appeal Suit No. 402 of 1915, preferred against the decree of the Court of the District Munsif, Tanuku, in Original Suit No. 483 of 1914.

FACTS appear from the judgment.

The Hon'ble Mr. T. R. Ramachandra Aiyar, for the Appellants.—There is no real res judicata inasmuch as the learned Judge committed a mistake of fact.

Mr. P. Venketramana Rao, for the Respondents.—Even assuming that there was a mistake of fact, there is res judicata. Explanation VI to section 11, Civil Procedure Code, applies inasmuch as the right litigated in the prior suit is common to all the Agrabaramdars.

[WALLIS, C. J.—That would apply only when persons expressly litigate in that manner.]

Yes, but the question is whether the right litigated is common. The explanation is not limited to cases coming under Order I, rule 8. See Gedimella Rangamma v. Panchangam Narasimhacharyulu (1), following Srinivasa Chariar v. Raghava Chariar (2). A different view is no doubt held in Baiju Lal Parbatia v. Bulak Lal Pathuk (3). From Varanakot Narayanan Namburi v. Varanakot Narayana Namburi (4) onwards, this Court has taken the same view. See also Subhandri Apparau v. Gopalkristnamma (5), Somasundara Mudali v. Kulandaivelu Pillai (6).

The Hon'ble Mr. T. R. Ramachandra Aiyar, in reply.—There is no 'litigating for the other' when the other is a party. Such party stands in his own rights. Even in Srinivasa Chariar v. Raghava Chariar (2) it is not denied that proceedings should be taken under section 30 (now Order I, rule 8) before the Explantion can apply. Further it is a case of a trust, which is a single institution. It cannot apply to the present case of Agraharamdars whose liability is joint and several. Varanakot Narayanan Namburi v. Varanakot Narayana Namburi (4 is a case of a Karnavan. It is now well settled that he alone can sue on behalf of the Tarwad.

[WALLIS, C. J.—You concede that a person, not a party, would be bound. The more the reason why a person who is a party should be bound.]

The Explanation is an exception to the general rule that only parties or representatives can be bound. Hence the latter does not follow.

Next, it is not competent to any person to litigate on behalf of another except as prescribed under Order I, rule 8. Srinivasa Chariar v. Raghava Chariar (2), Baiju Lal Parbatia v. Bulak Lal Pathuk (3)

See also Rogava v. Ramaratnam (7). The view in England also is the same. May v. Newton (8).

(Mr. P. Venketramana Rao was asked to reply).

[WALLIS, C. J.—The words 'public right' are new in the present Code. Does that not clearly indicate a move on the part of the Legislature towards the view in Baiju Lal Parbatia v. Bulak Lal Pathuk (3)?]

The present question is different. Here is a common right in which all the Agraharamdars are interested jointly and severally.

JUDGMENT.

WALLIS, C. J.—The subject of this suit is the amount of the Kattubadi payable to the plaintiff Zamindar by the defendants who are Agraharamdars, and the question argued before us is whether this is res judicata against the 10th defendant by reason of the decree in Second Appeal No. 838 of 1911 confirming the decree in Appeal Suit No. 451 of 1905, which decided the question against the Agraharamdars reversing the decree of the Subordinate Judge in their favour.

In Original Suit No. 56 of 1901 in the Court of the Additional Subordinate Judge of Rajahmundry two of the Agrahara-ramdars sued the Receiver of the Nidadavole estate and the Zamindar for a declaration that the Kattubadi was only Rs. 550, joining the other Agaraharamdars as defendants.

The Additional Subordinate Judge of Godaveri gave the plaintiffs a decree in Original Suit No. 5 of 1901, which was reversed on 1st December 1910 by the District Judge of Kistna in Appeal Suit No. 451 of 1905. Prativadi Bhayankaram Rukmaniamma, one of the Agraharamdars through whom the present appellant (the 10th defendant) claims, was impleaded as 6th defendant in the former suit and as the 4th respondent in the appeal to the District Court. She died in March 1908 nearly three years before the disposal of the appeal, and the appellant, who was the Receiver of the Widadavole estate, failed to bring in her legal representatives, nor were they made parties in the second appeal to this Court preferred by the plaintiffs in Second Appeal No. 838 of 1911. The District Judge has found the amount of the Kattubadi in the present case to be res judicata against the 10th defendant Sreeman Madabushi Gopalacharyalu on the ground that he was impleaded in the second appeal as the representative of the deceased Rukmaniamma, but this appears to be an error as Prativadi Bhayankaram Gopalacharyalu, who was impleaded as the 4th respondent in the second appeal, was the 9th defendant in the original suit and a different person from the present 10th defendant.

We must take it then that no legal representative of Rukmaniamma, through whom the 10th defendant claims, was brought on after her death either by the contesting defendant in his appeal to the District Court or by the plaintiffs in their second appeal to this Court. It has nonetheless been argued before us that the suit is res judicata as against the 10th defendant by virtue of Explanation VI of section 11 of the Code of Civil Procedure (Act V of 1908), which says that "Where persons litigate bona fide in respect of a...private right claimed in common for themselves and others, all persons interested in such right shall, for the purposes of this section, be deemed to claim under the persons so litigating." It is clear from the judgment of the District Judge in the previous suit, which was confirmed in second appeal, that the plaintiffs in the previous suit were litigating on behalf of themselves and the other Agraharamdars, whom they joined as defendants because they were unwilling to sue as plaintiffs, as regards the amount of Kattubadi and that they obtained a decree in the Munsif's Court, which was reversed by the District Judge on the ground that the full amount of Kattubadi claimed by the contesting defendant, the Receiver of the estate, was payable; and the position, therefore, is that Rukmaniamma, the 6th defendant, and her heirs were not represented in the appeal when the District Judge set aside the decree which that plaintiffs had obtained on her behalf as well as their own, or in the second appeal preferred by the plaintiffs in which that decision was affirmed. If there had been no appeal to the District Court from the decree of the Subordinate Judge, the issue as to the Kattubadi would apparently have been res judicata in her favour by virtue of the explanation, although she had been impleaded only as defendant and had remained ex parte, because the relief had been claimed on her behalf, Somasundara Mudali v. Kulandaivelu Pillai (6), and equally of course it would have been res judicata against her if her representatives had been properly impleaded in the appeals The question whether the Explanation is applicable, although Rukamaniama was not represented either in the appeal or in the second appeal, is of considerable difficulty. The Explanation was first enacted as Explanation II of section 13 of the Code of 1887, in which section 30 (now Order I, rule 8) was first enacted. Section 30 was again taken with an important modification from Order XVI, rule 9, of the new rules of the Supreme Court, which embodied the practice of the Court of Chancery in representative suits as explained by Lord Eldon in Cockburn v. Thompson (9). Order XVI, rule 9, of the R. S. C. under the Judicature Act provides that "where there are numerous persons having the same interest in one cause or matter, one or more of such persons may sue or be sued or may be authorised by the Court of a Judge to defend in such cause or matter on behalf of or for the benefit of all persons so intrested," and, where a plaintiff properly so sues, the persons whom he represents are bound Markt v. Knight Steamships Co. 10'. This rule was reproduced in section 30 of the Code of 1877, with this important modification that the permission of the Court is required to enable the plaintiff to sue in such a case, whereas under Order XIII, rule 9, no such permission is required in the case of plaintiffs. It, therefore, follows that, in India, the Legislature considered that a plaintiff ought not to be allowed to represent the other parties interested in the case mentioned in the section without the leave of the Court. The section 11 and the Explanation were enacted at the same time and must be read together, and it has sometimes been stated that the Explanation is applicable only to cases where the consent of the Court to the institution of the suit had been given under section 30 Thanakoti v. Muniappa (11), Bai u Lal abatia v. Kulak Lal Pathuk (3), Srinivasa Ch riar v. Raghava Chariar (2). The Explanation, no doubt, applies to such cases, but it is not in terms confined to them. It may be that if a suit to which section 30 is applicable were brought without the consent of the Court, the plaintiff could not be considered to be litigating bona fide on behalf of the other persons interested, that is, not only honestly but with due care and attention, or in other cases in which he failed to implead parties who ought to have been joined, but it is in terms wide enough to include accidental slips where no real prejudice has been caused, and we should, in my opinion, be justified in refusing to apply it to such cases. This is the view taken in Godimella Rangamma v. Panchangam Narasimhacharyulu (1), but before coming to that decision it is desirable to refer to the other decisions of this Court which have been cited. In Varanakot Narayanan Namburi v. Varanakot Narayanan Namburi (4) it was merely held that a decree against the Karnavan of a Malabar Tarwad was binding on the other members of the Tarwad, even though no order under section 30 had been obtained. This proceeded on the ground that the Karnavan sufficiently represented the other members of the Tarwad without any order under section 30 and even where the section was in terms inapplicable, as where the members of the Tarwad are not numerous. Similarly a widow sufficiently represents her husband's estate, and the nearest reversioner, it is now settled, sufficiently represents other reversioners in contesting an adoption which would exclude them all. This case does not seem to me to help us, as the other members of the Tarwad were properly represented throughout the litigation by the Karnavan. In Thanakoti v. Muniappa (11) a ryot had sued for damages to his crops caused by the defendants' diversion of a certain channel which the plaintiff claimed to be entitled to along with the other ryots of the village. The suit was dismissed on the ground that they had not the right claimed, but the Explanation was held not to debar other ryots not parties to the former suit from bringing similar suits. This decision proceeded on the ground that the Explanation was inapplicable as the plaintiff in the first suit had not sought any relief for the other ryots, which is in accordance with the subsequent ruling of the Full Bench in Somasundara Mudali v. Kulandaivelu Pillai (6), but the judgment also contains the following observations as to the effect of the Explanation: "Now, unless the other plaintiffs were aware of the suit of plaintiff No. 3 and authorised him to make the claim for them (of which there is neither allegation nor evidence), plaintiff No. 3 would have had no authority to claim on their behalf so as to bind them from afterwards bringing their own suit. One party having a right in common with others is not at liberty or authorised to sue in his own name to establish the right of others except by their authority. Explanation V must be read with the provisions of section 30 and the principles to be found in that section. If that section had been followed, which it was not, then the other plaintiffs would be bound". These observations may be read as meaning that in such a case the other ryots could not have been bound unless they were impleaded in the former suit on an order obtained under section 30. That, in my opinion, might properly be so, because a plaintiff who sued on their behalf without impleading them could not be considered to be litigating on their behalf bona fide, i. e., with due care and attention, and the Explanation should not be read as setting at nought the ordinary rules as to the joinder of parties. Be that as it may, it is a very different case from the present one. In Madhavan v. Keshavan (12) it was held that, where four out of five trustees sued to recover trust property, the trust which was the real plaintiff was sufficiently represented and bound by the decision and the fifth trustee was not entitled to sue again on its behalf. The decision was so understood by the Full Bench in Somasundara Mudali v Kulandaivelu Pillai (6) and does not, I think, really help either side. In Chandu v. Kunhamed (13) certain members of a Muhammadan family sued to recover their share in certain land joining the other members of the family as defendants, and it was held that a subsequent suit by a plaintiff claiming under one of these defendants for the recovery of that defendant's share was barred under the Explanation, but this decision was afterwards overruled by the Full Bench in Surender Nath Pal Chowdhry v. Brojo Nath Pal Chowdhury (14) on the ground that the plaintiff had not been suing in the first suit on behalf of the other members of the family impleaded as defendants but merely claiming his own share. Latchanna v. Saravayya (15) was to the same effect and was also overruled by the Full Bench in Somasundara Mudali v. Kulandaivelu Pillai (6). It was held by the Full Bench in that case, overruling the decisions just cited, that, where a co-sharer sues for his own share impleading the other co sharers as supplemental defendants but not claiming any relief for them, the decision is not res judicata against them although they were parties to the suit.

In these cases the Court had not to consider a case where a plaintiff in the second suit had not been impleaded in the first suit or properly represented in it by virtue of an order under Order I, rule 8, or otherwise.

The only decision of this Court governing the present question appears to be Godimella Rangamma v. Panchangam Narasimhacharyulu (1), where it was held upon the language of the Explanation that the decision in a suit brought by one Agraharamdar to recover the suit property for himself and the other Agraharandars, fourteen of whom were impleaded as defendants Nos. 3 to 16 and remained ex parte, was res judicata in a subsequent suit for the same reliefs brought by the 4th defendant so impleaded and another Agraharamdar who for some reasons had not been made a defendant in the previous suit. The learned Judges held that the plaintiff in the former suit had been litigating bona fide in respect of a private right claimed in common for himself and others and that the 2nd plaintiff, though not a party to the suit, was bound by virtue of the Explanation.

The language of the Explanation may seem dangerously general and Edge, C. J., has observed in Ram Narain v. Bisheshar Prasad (16) that we should be careful in applying it, and that it should not be applied to any case which does not come within its very wording. I entirely agree, and should certainly hesitate to hold that any litigation had been bona fide within the meaning of the Explanation in which there had been a substantial departure from the accepted rules as to the joinder of parties, as, for instance, by suing without the leave of the Court in a case properly falling under Order I, rule 8, or in suits as regards public rights without the authority prescribed in sections 91 and 92. At the same time, I cannot say on the strictest construction that the plaintiff's litigation in the earlier suit in this case was otherwise than bona fide within the meaning of the section. He impleaded all the other Agaraharamdars as defendants, including Rukmaniamma through whom the present 10th defendant claims, and they remained ex parte. When she died after being impleaded as a respondent in the 1st defendant's appeal to the District Court and before the hearing of the appeal, the failure to bring on her legal representatives was due to the default of the other side. When the plaintiff appealed to this Court from the decree of the District Court, the fact that he did not implead the representatives of the deceased 6th defendant who had been ex parte in the first Court and whose legal representatives had not been brought on by the other side in the District Court cannot, in my opinion, be said to constitute such a want of bona fides as to render the Explanation inapplicable. On this ground, therefore, I would support the Subordinate Judge's finding that the 10th defendant in this suit, who claims through the 6th defendant in the previous suit, is bound by res judicata and would dismiss the second appeal with costs.

SPENCER, J.—The question to be decided is whether the decision of the District Judge of Kistna in Appeal Suit No. 451 of 1905 dated 1st December 1910 (Exhibit A in these proceedings), confirmed in second appeal by the High Court in Second Appeal No. 838 of 1911 on 7th August 1913 (Exhibit XVII), is res judicata against the 10th defendant, who is the appellant before us, on the point of Rs 7 4 14 0 being the correct amount of Kattubadi payable by the Agraharamdars on the Gopavaram Agraharam. It appears that the 6th defendant in that suit, whose name was Prativadi Bhayankaram Rukmaniamma, was dead at the time when the High Court passed its remand order on 17th September 1909 and when the District Judge delivered his judgments on 1st December 1911, although her name was still kept on the record. The Subordinate Judge is of opinion that the defect is cured by the fact that the 10th defendant was on the record as Rukmaniamma's legal representatives when the High Court judgment finally disposing of the second appeal was passed on 7th August 1913.

The District Judge's judgment in Appeal Suit No 451 of 1905 shows the name of Partivadi Bhayankaram Gopalacharlu as 6th respondent and the same individual's name appears as 4th respondent in the High Court's judgment.

The 10th defendant's name is Sreeman Madhabushi Gopalacharlu.

The Subordinate Judge, therefore, appears to be in error in his statement that this 10th defendant was added as the legal representative of Rukmaniamma in the second appeal to the High Court.

A suit instituted for settling the amount of Kattubadi due to the Receiver of the estate upon this Agraharam was one in which all the Agraharamdars were necessarily interested in Second Appeals Nos 35 and 178 of 1918. It was recently held by Krishnan, J., and myself that Agraharamdars are jointly and severally liable for all Jodi payable on their Agraharm We followed prior decisions of the High Court in Ellaiya v. Collector of Salem (17), Ramayya v. Subbarayudu (18) and Sobhandri Apparau v. Gopalakristnamma (5).

Under Explanation VI to section 11, Civil Procedure Code, when there is a final decision by a competent Court in respect of a private right claimed in common by parties to the suit and others and the litigation is conducted bona fide, all persons interested in that right are bound by the result of the litigation. In Godimella Rangamma v. Panchangam Narasimhacharyulu (1) it has been held by Sadasiva Iyer and Moore, JJ, that this Explanation is not confined to suits brought under Order I, rule 8, by a few persons representing a numerous class after obtaining the Court's permission and after giving notice to others who may be interested. This decision followed the dictum in Varankot Narayanan Namburi v. Varankot Narayanan Namburi (4) under the Code of 1859. That was a case where a declaratory decree had been obtained against the Karnavan of a Tarwad. A decree to which a Karnavan is a party binds the other members of the Tarwad because he is their recognised representative in suits, as was well settled by a Bench of four Judges in Vasudevan v. Sunkaran (19). But Godimella Rangamma v. Panchangam Narasimhacharyulu (1) and the case before us are instances of private rights claimed by some individuals in common with others rather than as representatives of a body of persons. Somasundara Mudali v. Kolandaivelu Pillai (6) was a Full Bench case under the Code of 1882. The words "claimed in common" occuring in Explanation V to section 13 of that Code and repeated in Explanation VI of the present Code are explained therein as referring to rights to relief which would benefit such parties by being granted and give them such an interest as would enable them to join as co-plaintiffs under section 25 (Now Order I, rule 1).

KHAIRA v. NATHU.

There can be no doubt that Agraharamdars have such a common interest for, as each Agraharamdar can be made to pay the whole of the Jodi if others do not pay, all are equally interested in the demand being decreased to the lowest possible figure or at least not being increased.

Judged by this standard, I feel clear that the decision in Appeal Suit No. 451 of 1905 is binding on the parties to this suit including the 10th defendant, as that litigation was, so far as it appears, conducted bona fide.

But Mr. T. R. Ramachandra Aiyer has sought to draw a distinction in a case where a party is represented at one stage of the suit and afterwards ceases to be represented owing to a failure to bring his legal representatives on record. If such cases are to be made exceptions to the general rule, it would be necessary to import words into Explanation VI to section 11 which are not there. "All persons interested in such right" must then be understood as meaning "all persons who are not already parties to the suit and are interested in such right."

I see no reason to put such a limited construction on the plain words of the Explanation.

I agree with my Lord the Chief Justice that the lower Court's decision is right and that this appeal should be dismissed with costs.

Lala Fakir Chand, for the Appellant.

Mr. Kanwar Narain, for the Plaintiff-Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The first contention raised is that the appeal to the lower Appellate Court should have been dismissed as it was presented by a Pleader whose power of-attorney was not thumb marked or signed by the plaintiff or his agent until after limitation had expired. Here Mohammad Ali Khan v. Jasram (1) is relied on. The judgment here passed on appeal is very short, and it was a case in which the defect was, not that the power-of-attorney was not signed, but that the name of the Vakil had been omitted from the body of the vakalatnama.

In Raghunatha Thatha Chariar v. Venkatesa Tawker (2) an application for execution was held to be time-barred, because the petition, though presented in time, was not duly verified till after time had expired. But a contrary view has been taken by a Division Bench of the Calcutta High Court in Chhoyunneesa Bibi v. Kazi Bisarat Rahman (3).

In Bisheshar Nath v. Emperor (4) it is held that if a suit is duly authorized, a mistake or omission in the proper signing of the plaint can be amended at any time, and the dictum of Bowen, L. J., in Cropper v. Smith (5) is cited with approval. That dictum is as follows: "The object of Courts is to decide the rights of parties and not to punish them for mistakes which they make in the conduct of their cases, by deciding otherwise than in accordance with their rights....Courts do not exist for the sake of discipline, but for the sake of deciding matters in controversy." An earlier ruling of the Allahabad High Court, Basdeo v. John Smidt (6), is to the same effect. There is sufficient authority for adopting the more liberal view in such cases. The omission to sign the power-of-attorney was obviously an oversight and I hold that the subsequent signing cured the defect.

Then it is contended that the agent who engaged the Pleader was only appointed an agent for the first Court and not for the purpose of appealing. This objection was not taken in the lower Appellate Court; had it been taken it could have been enquired into.

As to the merits I see no good ground for second appeal. There is evidence that Kura and his father lived in the house. It is true that the lower Appellate Court has not referred to defendant's evidence, nor to the fact that some of plaintiff's witnesses are his relations, but it does not necessarily follow that these things have been overlooked. As to the Khana Shumari papers these at least show that Jani once occupied a house in the village; it is not for me in second appeal to weigh the evidence. It is urged that even from plaintiff's evidence it is clear that defendant lived in the house even before Musammat Nanki died, but I do not see that it necessarily follows that Nanki also was not living there.

The appeal is dismissed with costs.

Transfer of Property Act (IV of 1882), s. 84—Mortgage—Redemption—Offer by notice—Money not produced—Tender, whether legal.

An offer by notice of the amount due under a mortgage, without production of the money, is not a good tender within the meaning of section 84 of the Transfer of Property Act. [p. 994, col. 1.]

First appeal against the decision of the Additional Subordinate Judge, Moradabad dated the 17th April 1917.

Messrs. B. E. O'Conor and M. Ishaq Khan, for the Appellants.

The Hon'ble Mr. Moti Lal Nehru, for the Repondents.

JUDGMENT.—This appeal arises out of a suit brought by the plaintiffs appellants in the Court below for redemption of a mortgage, dated the 31st of March 1880. The mortgage was executed by one Musammat. Intizam-un-nisa Begam in lieu of Rs. 17,000. The mortgage was usufructuary and was given to one Santu Prasad, Both the mortgagor and the mortgagee are dead. The plaintiffs-appellants represent the mortgagor and the defendants-respondents represent the mortgagee. On the 24th of June 1916 the plaintiffs sent a notice to the defendants offering to pay Rs. 17,000 to them and asking for redemption. The defendants sent no reply. On the 30th of June 1916 the suit out of which this appeal has arisen was instituted by the plaintiffs for the redemption of the mortgage of 1880. Several objections were taken to the suit, one of which was that the suit was premature, inasmuch as no legal tender had been made. The learned Subordinate Judge yielded to this plea and dismissed the suit. He also held that the offer by notice, even if it were considered a good offer, was made a the wrong time and was against the terms of the mortgage deed. In appeal to this Court both pleas decided by the Court below are contested. It is argued on behalf of the plaintiffs appellants that the offer to redeem the mortgage by notice amounted to a legal tender of the mortgage money. We are unable to agree with this contention. A similar point was raised in the case of Chetan Das v. Gobind Saran (1), and a Bench of this Court held that "an offer by letter of the amount due under a mortgage is not a good tender within the meaning of section 84 of the Transfer of Property Act. It is necessary that the money should be actually produced, unless it could be shown that the person entitled to receive the money has waived this condition." In the present case it is not stated that the money was actually produced or tendered to the defendants and redemption asked. Nor is it shown that the defendants waived their right of receiving the money and agreed to accept the notice in lieu thereof. We think the learned Subordinate Judge was right in holding that no proper tender had been made by the plaintiffs as required by law.

We think that the second contention for the plaintiffs, that a tender made in June would be a valid tender, is right if made within time—the end of June.

The appeal, therefore, fails and is dismissed with costs, including fees in this Court on the higher scale. In calculating the costs of this Court the office will exclude the cost of printing the evidence on behalf of the respondents, as that evidence was not necessary for the disposal of the points raised in this appeal.

Held, that the suit was maintainable.

Application, under section 44 of Act VI of 1918, for revision of the decree of the Senior Subordinate Judge, Rohtak, dated the 15th October 1919, confirming that of the Munsif, 1st Class, Sonepat, District Rohtak, dated the 9th July 1919.

Mr. Nihal Chand Mehra, for the Petitioner.

Mr. Devi Dayal, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The defendant bought wheat from the plaintiff, but did not take delivery, and the plaintiff has sued for the amount of the loss incurred on re-sale and has been given a decree. The only point calling for consideration in this application for revision is whether the plaintiff is debarred under section 230 of the Contract Act from maintaining the suit.

It is true that part of the wheat belonged to one Khem Lal and was sold by the plaintiff as Khem Lal's agent, but the other part was the plaintiff's own wheat, so that he had an interest in the contract, and the law is that when an agent enters into a contract, he may sue thereon in his own name if he has an interest in the contract. Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), s. 244 (2)—Summons case—Process to compel witness to attend—Discretion of Court.

Under section 244 (2), Criminal Procedure Code, a Magistrate is under no obligation to issue process in a summons case to compel the attendance of a witness on the application of either side.

Criminal revision against the order of the Joint Magistrate, Benares, dated the 25th November 1919.

Mr. Kumuda Prasad, for the Applicant.

The Assistant Government Advocate, for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.—The applicant Jhabboo was one of the accused persons in a case under section 160 of the Indian Penal Code. This was a summons case and was properly tried under Chapter XX of the Code of Criminal Procedure. It so happened that Jhabboo was also one of the accused in another case of a more serious nature, which was being tried as a warrant case in the Court of the same Magistrate at about the same time. Jhabboo undertook to prove an alibi in his defence, in both cases, and asked the Court to issue process for the attendance of a certain witness. The Magistrate allowed his application and repeatedly postponed the trial of the summons case in order that the witness in question might be examined for the defence on one and the same date in both cases. Finally he refused to adjourn either of the cases any further and proceeded to deliver judgment in both of them without having examined this particular witness for the defence. In a connected application I have held that the procedure of the Magistrate in the warrant case was not justified by the provisions of section 257 (1) of the Code of Criminal Procedure and I have found it possible to pass orders which should meet the ends of justice. The difference between the two applications now before me is this:—Under section 244, clause 2, of the Code of Criminal Procedure the Magistrate was under no obligation to issue process to compel the attendance of any witness, either on the application of the complainant or on that of the accused. He would have been within his jurisdiction, and probably within his discretion so far as this particular case is concerned, if he had said that in a small matter of this sort he did not feel himself justified in issuing process to compel the attendance of a public servant from a distant district. There are also practical difficulties about interference in this case, as any attempt to procure the evidence of this particular witness would involve the re-trial of the summons case before another Magistrate. In my opinion the present application ought to be rejected on the ground that Jhabboo had no right in law to require the issue of process for the attendance of this witness in this particular case and that the Magistrate might in his discretion have refused to issue such process in the first instance. If the result of the order passed by me on the connected revision should be that, in the opinion of a competent Court, Jhabboo is able to establish a conclusive alibi from Benares on the date in question, and he feels disposed to carry this matter further for the purpose of clearing his own character, it would be open to him to present a fresh application against the same order after the connected case has been disposed of by the Appellate Court.

Application rejected.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), s. 118—Punjab Restriction of Habitual Offenders Act (V of 1918)—Order for security for good behaviour—Order of restriction, whether legal.

Where a person is required, under section 118 of the Criminal Procedure Code, to furnish security for good behaviour, it is illegal to make an order at the same time under section 7 of the Punjab Restriction of Habitual Offenders Act restricting his movements.

Case reported by the District Magistrate, Sialkot, with his No. 603, dated the 10th March 1919.

Mr. B. N. Kapur, for the Petitioner.

JUDGMENT.—By order dated the 17th December 1918 the Magistrate of the 1st class directed Kabir Bakhsh to furnish security in the sum of Rs. 1,000 for his good behaviour and in the same order further directed that the said Kabir Bakhsh should be restricted to his own village for two years. The District Magistrate has referred the case to this Court, on the ground that under section 7 of Act V of 1918 both orders cannot stand, and requests that the order under section 118, Criminal Procedure Code, be cancelled and the restriction order under section 7 of Act V of 1918 be allowed to stand. I agree that one of the two orders must be set aside, and I think that it is quite clear from the proviso to section 7 that the order which must be set aside is the order for restriction. The proviso is to the effect that "the Magistrate shall not make an order of restriction against any person against whom he makes an order under section 118 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898, requiring such person to execute a bond for his good behaviour." In the present case it was only after the accused had been directed to furnish security under section 118 of the Code that he was further directed to restrict his movements to the limits of his village.

I accordingly set aside the latter part of the Magistrate's order, but my order will in no way affect the direction by the Magistrate that the accused is to furnish security for his good behaviour.

Revision accepted.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), ss. 110, 118, 234—Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860), s. 401—Conviction under s. 110, nature of—Order, whether bar to trial under s 401, Penal Code—Charge under s. 401, Penal Code—S. 234, Criminal Procedure Code, whether applicable—Gist of offence—Habit, proof of—Previous conviction, evidence of, whether admissible in trial under s. 401, Penal Code.

A conviction under section 110, Criminal Procedure Code, has nothing to do with the punishment for an offence. An order under that section is merely preventive and only binds a person down to be of good behaviour and is not punishment for any offence committed by him. Consequently, there is no bar to the subsequent punishment of a person so bound down for an offence under section 401 of the Penal Code. [p. 995, col. 2.]

Section 234 of the Criminal Procedure Code has no application to a charge under section 401 of the Penal Code, as the gist of an offence under the latter section is association for the purpose of habitually committing theft or robbery and habit is to be proved by the aggregate of acts, though the charge may be of a single offence. [p. 996, col. 2.]

Evidence of previous conviction for an offence under the Penal Code, or evidence to show that accused has been previously bound down under section 118 of the Criminal Procedure Code, is inadmissible in a trial under section 401 of the Penal Code for the purpose of proving the conviction or proving bad character, but such evidence may be used for proving association. JUDGMENT.

SHAMS-UL HUDA, J.—Thirty four persons were placed on their trial on a charge under section 401 of the Indian Penal Code. The trial was held by a Magistrate specially authorized under section 30 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. The trial lasted a long time, in the course of which 314 witnesses were examined. The Magistrate acquitted two of the accused and convicted the rest. Three of them were sentenced to more than four years' rigorous imprisonment, and they have appealed to this Court under section 408 (b) of the Code.

The facts of the case are briefly as follows:—Proceedings under section 110 of the Criminal Procedure Code were taken in the year 1917 against Mason Haji and others including two of the appellants, Munshi and Jaban. Mason Haji made a confession which led to an enquiry, and the Local Government appointed M. Mufizar Rahman to verify the confession made by Mason. M. Mufizar Rahman then recorded the confession of Mason at a greater length than it was taken down before, and went on to verify the statements made to him. The accused were then sent up for trial. On the 14th June 1918 the charge against Mason was withdrawn by the Public Prosecutor under section 494 of the Criminal Procedure Code and he was discharged. Mason's confession formed the basis of the present charge. The learned Magistrate has, in an exhaustive judgment, dealt with the whole evidence in the case, and he has considered separately the case of each individual accused. The evidence against each accused has been separately detailed in the judgment, and it is unnecessary to repeat it.

Several points have been argued by the learned Counsel who appeared on behalf of the appellants. The first argument is that the Magistrate in discharging Mason did not give judicial consideration to the case, and, therefore, the order of discharge is illegal and has no legal effect. As to this argument I need only say that, upon the reported decisions, it is enough that the accused person had been discharged before he gave his evidence and was not on his trial when such evidence was given. This, in my opinion, is quite sufficient to make his evidence admissible.

The next point argued was that the charge was bad having regard to the provisions of section 234 of the Criminal Procedure Code. It seems to me that there is no substance in this contention. Section 234 lays down that, when a person is accused of more offences than one of the same kind committed within the space of 12 months, he may be charged with and tried at one trial for any number of them not exceeding three. In this case the accused were not charged for more offences than one. They are charged with one offence only. An offence under section 401 is a special one. The gist of the offence is association for the purpose of habitually committing theft or robbery and, as pointed out by the Madras High Court in Re Shriram Venkatasami (1), habit is to be proved by the aggregate of acts, and though the charge is a charge of a single offence, the period over which the association extends is often very long; and the longer the period, the better it is to establish habit. The question of confining the charges to three in the course of a year, therefore, does not arise in the case, and section 234 has no application.

The next point urged is that the accused having been bound down under section 110 of the Criminal Procedure Code, they cannot again be punished for being members of a gang associated for the purpose of habitually committing crimes under section 401 of the Indian Penal Code. This, it is urged, is punishing a man twice over for the same offence. It is clear that a conviction under section 110 of the Criminal Procedure Code has nothing to do with the punishment of an offence. The order under section 110 of the Criminal Procedure Code is merely preventive, and only bound down the accused to be of good behaviour. It was not punishment for any offence committed by them.

It is also urged that the confession of Mason recorded by Maulvi Mufizar Rahman, and consequently the evidence of verification by that officer, are not admissible. This may be so, but after making the confession the approver has repeated his story in Court in his evidence on oath, and, therefore, the question of the admissibility of the confession is of no practical importance, and though I am of opinion that the confession was of no value as a piece of evidence, that does not affect the merits of the case.

It has next been urged that the evidence of previous conviction for an offence under the Indian Penal Code, or evidence to show that the accused had been previously bound down under section 118 of the Criminal Procedure Code, was inadmissible.

(1) 6 M. H. C. R. 120; 1 Weir 452.

Reliance has been placed on decisions of this Court in Mankura Pasi v. Queen-Empress (2) and Kader Sundar v. Emperor (3). I think this contention is sound, and the evidence of previous conviction was wrongly admitted, although there may be some doubt whether, if it can be shown that in a previous case a number of the accused persons were placed on their trial together and convicted, such conviction can be used not for the purpose of proving the conviction or proving bad character but for proving association.

In my opinion, leaving aside the evidence which I have held to be indmissible, the rest of the evidence is ample to establish the guilt of the appellants. The evidence which has been detailed by the learned Magistrate in his judgment shows that the accused often met together at different places before or after the commission of offences, and have been seen on various occasions carrying away stolen articles or seen together under circumstances that suggested their complicity in thefts and robberies and their association for the purpose of habitually committing such offences. This evidence is very strong: especially against the three appellants. Mason Haji speaks of 74 thefts or burglaries, out of which the accused Kasem Ali is said to have taken part in 11, Jaban in 31 and Munshi in 11. No reason has been shown why the numerous witnesses, who have deposed on behalf of the prosecution and who have been believed by the learned Magistrate, should be disbelieved by us. I may also state that in the appeal that was preferred by the other accused persons, who were sentenced to less than four years' rigorous imprisonment, the learned Sessions Judge has upheld the conviction and believed the evidence upon which the conviction of the present appellants is largely based.

It has been complained before us that the Magistrate was wrong in placing on the record certain statements prepared by the Public Prosecutor and in making them a part of his judgment. No doubt it is generally not desirable to make documents prepared by parties to a case part of the judgment, but in this case, as I have said, the record was voluminous and the statements do not furnish any new materials, but are simply the result of the examination of the evidence by the Public Prosecutor. If the learned Magistrate had taken those statements on trust there might have been some ground for complaint. But in this case the Magistrate has recorded, and he has done so on every page of these statements, that he has checked them himself. Under these circumstances, I do not think that the accused have been in any way prejudiced by the action of the Magistrate. The convictions and sentences are, therefore, upheld and the appeals are dismissed.

DUVAL, J.—I agree with the judgment of my learned brother. As to the tabular statements, I would like further to point out that, though the learned Counsel objected to them as being wrongly incorporated in the judgment, it is clear that they were checked by the Magistrate, and the learned Counsel has not been able to show to us that in any single particular these statements, which are really an epitome of the evidence put in a tabular form, are incorrect. The learned Counsel, though he did not enter into details about individual witnesses, made some comments on the oral evidence in general. As to the approver, his position was that, as he had been discharged under section 494 of the Criminal Procedure Code, his evidence should be expunged from the record. My learned brother has dealt with that matter, and I agree in holding that after his discharge he was a person competent to be a witness. Then as to his evidence in Court and his confessions recorded by Mr. P. C. Chatterjee and M. Mufizur Rahman, no doubt the earlier confessions could have been used by the defence for the purpose of contradicting what the approver Mason said in the course of the trial, and indeed it appears that there are certain discrepancies between his evidence during the course of the trial and his confession before Mr. Chatterjee. It is urged that as approver he is an unreliable witness, and of course no one can be convicted on the uncorroborated evidence of an approver. But here we have before us a large mass of corroborative evidence. There is first the evidence of association. This evidence shows that these accused and others were frequently seen together, specially at hats, and there is evidence that shortly after they were seen together, thefts and robberies used to take place; and as to the three men whose cases are before us, we have a mass of direct evidence against Kasem of robberies in houses, bazars and boats, against Jaban of robberies in houses and boats and against Munshi of robberies and thefts in shops and boats as well as thefts of cattle. We also have the evidence about Kasem and Jaban being engaged in the same thefts. The evidence shows that several of the accused were originally pilots on river steamers: and after their dismissal from the Steamer Company's service, thefts on river steamers and boats plying on the river and at the riverside bazars became frequent, and in addition to these thefts in boats and bazar the gang also engaged in thefts and robberies in houses and in regular systematic theft of cattle. On the evidence adduced I hold that the existence of a gang for committing thefts and burglaries has been amply proved: further, that the three men before us were members and (I should add) leaders of that gang.

Appeals dismissed.

EMPEROR—RESPONDENT.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), s. 556—District Magistrate, prosecution ordered by, as Inspector of Factories—District Magistrate, whether competent to try case.

Where a District Magistrate, in his capacity as Inspector of Factories, sanctions a prosecution, he is disqualified, under section 556, Criminal Procedure Code, from trying the case. [p. 999, col. 1.]

Case reported by the Sessions Judge, Lyallpur, with his No. 491 of 15th May 1918.

FACTS.—On receiving information that certain factories at Lyallpur worked at night, the District Magistrate, Lyallpur, by his order, dated the 3rd January 1918, required an Extra Assistant Commissioner to report. The Extra Assistant Commissioner visited the factories on the ensuing night and found the factory of Lorinda Ram-Sewa Ram at work employing women without permission contrary to sections 24 and 27 of the Act, and children under 14 years of age in defiance of section 23—and he reported accordingly on the 4th January. On receiving this report the District Magistrate asked the Extra Assistant Commissioner to furnish details of the nights on which women were employed. This the Extra Assistant Commissioner did the next day (5th January 1918), and thereon the District Magistrate recorded an order sanctioning the following prosecutions under the Factories Act:—

(a) Working at night against the provisions of section 27, Factories Act,	27 cases.
(b) Working on Sunday (section 22),	6 cases.
(c) Employing Kesar, minor, without a certificate (section 23),	8 cases.
(d) Employing Ishhar, minor, without a certificate	3 cases.
Total ...	44 cases.

After recording this order, he issued summons to the owner and manager of the factory in all the cases for 10th January 1918. On that date Lala Devi Ditta Mal, Pleader, appeared before the District Magistrate on behalf of the manager of the factory and contended, inter alia, (1) that the Factories Act was not applicable, because the number of persons simultaneously employed in the factory never exceeded 49 on any one day in the year [section 3 (e)]; (2) that section 27 did not contemplate that sanction of the Inspector was required to employ women at night.

The District Magistrate, without taking any evidence or examining the accused, overruled these contentions and imposed a fine of Rs. 50 in each case of class (a) and (b) and of Rs. 10 in each of the remaining 11 cases. Thus the total of fines imposed was Rs. 1,760.

GROUNDS:—(1) There was no proper inquiry.

(2) It is doubtful whether the accused's main contention, that the Act was not applicable, could be overruled on a correct interpretation of the term "employed" used in sections 3 (1) (e) and 2 (2).

Section 3 (1) (e) runs as below:—

Nothing in the following chapters shall apply to any factory wherein on no day in the year are more than forty-nine persons simultaneously "employed."

Section 2 (2) defines "employed." It is difficult to say that chowkidars, clerks, store-keepers and others who do not work in a manufacturing process or handicraft or in any other kind of work incidental to or connected with the manufacturing process or handicraft, etc., can fall within the purview of "employed." It is clear that the term "employed" is defined to restrict its general significance and I am of opinion that in its restricted sense it is not applicable to chowkidars, etc.

Section 27 would not apply if the number of women employed was sufficient in the opinion of the Inspector to make the hours of each woman not more than 11 in any one day. There was no evidence on this point.

The District Magistrate was "Inspector" too and sanctioned the prosecutions as such. The illustration to section 556, Criminal Procedure Code, would show that he could not try the cases himself. Provisions of section 191, Criminal Procedure Code, were complied with, but that section did not govern the case.

The cases are of sufficient importance on account of the law points involved, on which an authoritative pronouncement is necessary. In any case there should be a proper trial.

Mr. Bhagat Ram Puri, for the Petitioner.

The Government Advocate, for the Respondent.

ORDER.—This is an application for revision of the order of the District Magistrate, Lyallpur, convicting the petitioner of certain offences under the Indian Factories Act, XII of 1911. The ground taken by the petitioner's Advocate before us is that having regard to section 556 of the Criminal Procedure Code, Mr. Kitchin, who tried the case, had no power to do so, as he was personally interested in it within the meaning of the section. It appears that the District Magistrate on receiving certain information directed an inquiry to be made and as a result of the inquiry he sanctioned certain prosecutions under the Factories Act on the 5th of January 1918. On the same day he directed that summons should issue to the owner and manager of the firm of Lorinda Ram-Sewa Ram, to which the factory belonged. He subsequently took cognizance of the present cases against the petitioner and convicted him on a number of charges.

The illustration to section 556 of the Criminal Procedure Code is as follows:—

A, as Collector, upon consideration of information furnished to him, directs the prosecution of B for a breach of the Excise Laws. A is disqualified from trying this case as a Magistrate.

In Queen-Empress v. Chenchi Reddi (1) a distinction was drawn between a case where a Magistrate directed the prosecution and where he simply authorised the prosecution. It was held that section 556 did not cover the case of a Magistrate who merely authorised the prosecution and that he was not thereby disqualified from trying the case. The facts of that case are, in our opinion, distinguishable. In the present cases the District Magistrate as Inspector of Factories ordered an enquiry to be made and in the same capacity sanctioned the prosecutions. To all intents and purposes he directed the prosecutions. In our opinion the illustration to section 556 clearly applies to the present cases. We are fortified in our view by a case of this Court, Mangal v.

(1) 24 M. 238; 2 Weir 730.

Emperor (2), wherein it was held that a trial of an offence under section 48 of the Indian Excise Act was liable to be set aside under section 556 of the Criminal Procedure Code, where the Magistrate himself in the capacity of Tahsildar had ordered to prosecute and search the house of the accused on the report of an opium contractor who was neither a Collector nor an Excise Officer. We think there can be no doubt that the District Magistrate in the capacity of Inspector of Factories was personally interested in these cases and, therefore, disqualified from trying them.

We accordingly allow the revision and, setting aside the convictions and sentences in all the cases, direct that the petitioner be re-tried by some other Magistrate. The fines, if paid, will be refunded.

Revision allowed;
Retrial ordered.

JUDGMENT.

SANDERSON, C. J.—This is an application under section 435 of the Criminal Procedure Code by Messrs. Kishori Mohan Bagchi and Amar Krishna Bagchi; and in the application the applicants ask for an order, that a certain search warrant and an order directing the applicants to execute a bond for Rs. 15,000 should be set aside.

It was directed by this Court that this application should be heard at the same time as the Criminal Appeal No. 354 of 1919, and in the ordinary course the procedure would have been to have issued a Rule upon the learned Magistrate to show cause why this order should not be made; but inasmuch as the direction was that the application should be heard along with the appeal, and inasmuch as Mr. Orr appearing in the appeal was already instructed on behalf of the Crown and Mr. Mukerjee appeared on behalf of the complainant, it was agreed by all the parties that this matter, in order to save time, should be fully argued to day, and it has been argued by the learned gentlemen whom I have just mentioned and by Mr. Pal Chowdhry who appeared for the applicants.

The facts which gave rise to this application are as follows. On the 18th of February 1919 there was a direction by the High Court that a complaint by the complainant against the applicants under section 7 of the Copyright Act of 1914, should be further enquired into: the complainant was alleging that the applicants were infringing the copyright of the complainant in a book known as "Purohit Darrpan", and the complainant was proceeding against the applicants under section 7 of the Copyright Act. On the 8th of April a warrant for the production of ten of the alleged infringing copies was issued by the Magistrate. On the 10th of April the Sub-Inspector of Police visited the applicants' premises; and according to the allegations before us, he saw a considerable amount of printed matter. The applicants handed to him one copy which was not complete. Thereupon, as I understand, the proceedings continued in the Police Court and some witnesses were heard. An application had been put in by the complainant, dated the 28th of May 1919, asking that the Magistrate should issue a search warrant to search the press and shop of Messrs. Bagchi for the production of 5,000 infringing copies of the books, plates, etc., under section 10 of Act III of 1914 for the purpose of their being destroyed or made over to the petitioner, or that they might remain in the custody of the Court in order that these might be dealt with as the Court might think fit and proper. I think the object of this application undoubtedly was that the Court might obtain control over the alleged infringing copies, which were supposed to be in the possession of Messrs. Bagchi, in order that an order might be made under section 10 of the Copyright Act upon the application of the complainant. That application apparently was not dealt with at the time it was filed, but on the 16th of June 1919 an order for the issue of a search warrant was made by the Magistrate, and we are informed by the learned Vakil for the applicants that it was made ex parte. The order ran as follows:—"Issue search warrant, as prayed for, to discover all copies of books, and papers named Purohit Darpan, or blocks, plates, printed and set up matters, letters, correspondence and orders with reference to the same book." The warrant was issued under section 96 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, and it proceeded as follows:—

"Whereas complaint has been made before me of the commission of the offence of section 10 of Act III of 1914"—(I think that is a mistake, because there is no offence provided by section 10 of that Act, and I suppose it was a slip for section 7; for it is that section which provides for the offence under consideration)—"and it has been made to appear to me that the production of all copies of books and proofs named Purohit Darpan on blocks, plates, printed and set up matters, letters, correspondence and orders with reference to the same book, in the case of Hari Das Basak v. Kishori Mohan Bagchi and others, is essential to the inquiry into the said offence. This is to authorize and require you to search immediately for all the said copies of books and proofs named Purohit Darpan, etc., in the premises No. 38,38-1, Masjid Bari Street, and 19 and 19-1, Galu Ostagar's Lane, Calcutta, and if found, to produce the same forthwith before this Court, returning this warrant, with endorsement certifying what you have done under it, immediately upon its execution, on the 18th June 1919." This warrant was taken by the Police Officer to the premises of the applicants; and, one of the applicants, Mr. Amar Krishna Bagchi, apparently thinking that the execution of this warrant would seriously interfere with their business, made an application to the Magistrate on the same day, i. e., 16th of June 1919. The terms of his petition were as follows:—"That your petitioner admits that he has published 5,000 copies of the Arjyachar Padhati or Purohit Darpan, and out of that one hundred copies are ready for sale; and your petitioner has only sold about 25 or 30 copies and the remaining books are in the possession of your petitioner. That your petitioner undertakes not to sell or part with any of the copies of the said book and to produce the same whenever called upon by the Court. Therefore, your petitioner prays that execution of the search warrant may be stayed for the present." Thereupon, the Magistrate made the following order:—"Stay execution of the warrant for the present. Accused to produce 5 copies on the 18th in Court, and further to execute a bond for Rs. 15,000 for producing 4,900 copies in Court whenever called upon."

The learned Vakil for the applicants has urged, first, that the order for the issue of the warrant on the 16th of June 1919 was beyond the jurisdiction of the Magistrate. He has also urged, on the facts of the case, that even if there was jurisdiction, the learned Magistrate ought not to have ordered the issue of the warrant, and, finally, he has urged that in any event the Magistrate had no power to impose the condition of the bond for Rs. 15,000. I propose to deal with the last point first because, to my mind, the decision of the case really depends upon whether the Magistrate had jurisdiction to issue the warrant on the 16th of June 1919.

Assuming, for the sake of argument, that the order for the issue of the warrant was within the jurisdiction of the Magistrate, and it was properly made on the facts of the case, in my judgment, the fact that the Magistrate took a bond from the applicants does not make these proceedings void or beyond the jurisdiction of the Magistrate. I think the effect of what took place was this. The warrant had been issued, and Mr. A. K. Bagchi applied to the Magistrate for stay of execution of the warrant, and offered to give his undertaking not to sell the books, and to produce them before the Court whenever the Court required. The Magistrate was not satisfied with such an undertaking, and he said that he would be willing to stay the execution of the warrant provided that Mr. Bagchi executed a bond for Rs. 15,000 for producing 4,900 copies in Court whenever called upon. The learnad Vakil has argued that the Magistrate had no jurisdiction to make that order, and he has relied upon a decision of this Court in the case of Purna Chandra Bandopadhya v. Sasi Bhusan Mullik (1). In my judgment, that case does not cover the present, because in that case the order was made upon the production of a letter and was a substantive order. There was no issue of a search warrant in that case, and the order for the bond was not made as a condition for the stay of execution of a search warrant as in this case. The learned Vakil has produced no authority to show that the order of the Magistrate staying execution of the warrant upon the abovementioned condition was made without jurisdiction, and in the absence of any such authority, I am not prepared to hold that the Magistrate had no jurisdiction to stay execution of the warrant, upon the application of Mr. Bagchi himself, upon the condition that he must enter into a bond for the production of the copies in Court.

Then arises the other question, which, in my judgment, is the real question in this case, namely, whether the order for the issue of the warrant on the 16th of June was beyond the jurisdiction of the Magistrate. That depends upon section 96 of the Criminal Procedure Code and sections 7 and 10 of the Copyright Act of 1914. The third paragraph of section 96 (1) provides as follows: "Where the Court considers that the purposes of any enquiry, trial or other proceeding under this Code will be served by a general search or inspection, it may issue a search warrant. It is agreed by both parties that the proceedings for an alleged offense under section 7 of the Copyright Act are "proceedings under this Code" within the meaning of that section. Therefore, it remains to consider the words "that the purposes of any enquiry, trial or other proceeding will be served by a general search or inspection." Those words are very wide, and the question is whether the order which may be made under section 10 of the Copyright Act can properly be said to be for the purposes of an enquiry, "trial or other proceeding" under section 7. Now, what were the purposes of these proceedings? It seems to me that the purposes were, first, to obtain the conviction of the applicants under section 7, and, secondly, to prevent the sale or hire of the alleged infringing copies or the distribution of the alleged infringing copies: and one way of preventing further sale or distribution of the alleged infringing copies would be by the Magistrate making an order under section 10 of the Copyright Act, because section 10 provides: "The Court before which any offence under this chapter is tried may, whether the alleged offender is convicted or not, order that all copies of the work or all plates in the possession of the alleged offender, which appear to it to be infringing copies, or plates for the purpose of making infringing copies, be destroyed or delivered up to the owner of the copyright, or otherwise dealt with as the Court may think fit." It may well be that the Magistrate may think that in the proceedings it may become necessary for him to make an order with respect to the alleged infringing copies under section 10, and he may be of opinion that, unless he takes some steps to bring the alleged infringing copies, which are in the possession of the alleged offender, under the control of the Court, he will not be able to make an effective order under section 10, and one of the purposes of the proceedings may be prevented. In my judgment, it is not possible for us to say that an order under section 10 of the Copyright Act might not be one of the purposes of the proceedings under section 7 of the Copyright Act. If then an order under section 10 would be one of the purposes of the proceedings, I think it is clear that such purpose might be served by the issue of a search warrant in order that the Magistrate might ascertain whether the alleged offender had in his possession the alleged infringing copies and how many copies he had for the purpose of making an order that those copies should be brought under the control of the Court. For these reasons, I think, the order for the issue of the warrant under section 96 was not beyond the jurisdiction of the Magistrate.

With regard to the facts, I do not think there is anything special in the facts of this case which would justify us in interfering with the discretion of the Magistrate provided that he had jurisdiction,—a question which I have held should be answered in his favour.

For these reasons, I think that this application should be dismissed.

DUVAL, J.—I agree with my Lord the learned Chief Justice. As to the first point as to whether the Magistrate has jurisdiction to issue a search warrant, I agree with him for the reasons that have been given. As to the point as to whether security should have been demanded after search warrant was issued, it seems to me that in this matter, after the issue of the search warrant, the petitioner himself came forward and prayed that the warrant should not be executed so as to prevent a dislocation of his business. It was, therefore, arranged that he would give security and he gave security. I do not think he can now turn round, after he has given security and after it has been found that the warrant which was issued was a legal warrant for search, and ask us to discharge him from such security. If he is unwilling to continue the security, it seems to me that his surety can surrender his suretyship, and he is at liberty to produce the 4,900 copies in Court, and would not be any longer under any liability under the bond for Rs. 15,000. For these reasons, I think that the application should be dismissed.

Appliaction refused.

EMPEROR—RESPONDENT.

Cantonment Code, 1912, ss. 92, 107, scope of—Occupier, whether can be made liable—Magistrate ordering prosecution, whether can try case himself—Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898*)*, ss. 191, 556.

The word 'whoever' in section 107 of the Cantonment Code, 1912, cannot be confined in its interpretation to the owner or lessee merely, but refers also to the occupier and an offence against section 92 of the Code may also be committed by the occupier or even a trespasser. [p. 1003, col. 1.]

Where on a report being made by a cantonment official the Cantonment Magistrate wrote "A is to blame. Prosecute A," and then proceeded to try the case himself and convicted the accused:

Held, that the Magistrate should have informed the accused that he was entitled to have the case tried by another Magistrate and should not have tried the case himself. [p. 1003, col. 2.]

Petition, under section 439, Criminal Procedure Code, for revision of the order of the Sessions Judge, Jullundur, dated the 25th August 1919, affirming that of the Cantonment Magistrate, 1st Class, Jullundur Cantonment, dated the 18th July 1919.

Lala Jagan Nath, for the Petitioner.

JUDGMENT.—In this case the Cantonment Magistrate, Jullundur, has convicted the applicant of a breach of section 92 of the Cantonment Code, in that without permission he erected, or permitted to be erected on his premises a temporary structure without giving the requisite notice and obtaining the requisite permission. The defence of the applicant was that at the time of the offence he had sold the property and was no longer owner of the site. The Cantonment Magistrate, however, found that he was the lessee and had not legally sold his land, inasmuch as the sanction of the Military Authorities had not been obtained. The Magistrate further held that the question whether he or his transferee Attar Singh erected the structure or not was immaterial and that he was the only person on whom the responsibility rested for any deviation from the rules regulating building. The applicant was fined Rs. 50. Against this decision he has put in an application for revision on various grounds.

The learned Counsel for the applicant first argued that he had sold the site on which the structure was erected some 15 days before the offence and that no sanction to the sale by the local Military Authorities was necessary. The Cantonment Magistrate has held that he is bound by the rule contained in the Army Regulations, Volume II, Appendix IV, sub paragraph 35. The learned Counsel for the applicant urges that these Regulations are ultra vires and in no way bind his client. As, however, the information on this point is inadequate, I am unable to come to any decision on this contention.

Counsel, however, is on firmer ground in urging that section 107 of the Cantonment Code of 1912 makes responsible, for any offence, the person who has committed it and not only the owner or lessee as held by the Cantonment Magistrate. The section opens with the words "whoever fails to give notice, etc.," and Counsel urges that the interpretation of the word 'whoever' cannot be confined merely to the owner or lessee. He points out that in other sections for which section 107 is also the penal clause the occupier also is liable for any breach, and he contends, therefore, justly that the word 'whoever' in section 107 refers also as in other cases to the occupier. I agree that there is no justification for confining the interpretation of the word 'whoever' in section 107 merely to the owner or lessee. It is obvious that an offence against section 92 may also be committed by an occupier or a trespasser. In such cases the owner or lessee may possibly be convicted of abetment but he certainly cannot be convicted as the principal offender.

In ground 7 of the application it is urged that the Cantonment Magistrate should not have tried the case himself, at any rate, without observing the provisions of section 191, Criminal Procedure Code, the offence having been committed within his knowledge. I find on perusing the record that a raport of the offence was made by some Cantonment Official and on this the Cantonment Magistrate wrote "Anandi Parshad is to blame. Prosecute Anandi Parshad." This obivously shows that the Cantonment Magistrate had knowledge that Anandi Parshad was guilty of the offence. He should, therefore, have informed him that he was entitled to have the case heard by another Magistrate. There are many authorities on this point such as Kanhaya Lal v. Emperor (1), but the law itself is so clear that it requires no judgments to support it. Counsel also urges with force that under section 556, Criminal Procedure Code, the Magistrate should not have tried the case himself, as it does not appear to have been instituted by the orders of the Cantonment Committee. He refers to the illustration to the section and also to Lorinda Ram-Sewa Ram v. Emperor (2).

For the above reasons I accept the application for revision and acquit the applicant The fine, if paid, will be refunded.

Income Tax Act (VII of 1918), ss. 24, 39 (d)—Penal assessment, levy of—Prosecution under s. 39, whether barred.

The fact that a penal assessment has been levied against a person under section 24 of the Income Tax Act is no bar to the prosecution of that person under section 39 (d) of the Act for failure to produce his account books in obedience to a notice issued by the Collector. [p. 1004, col 2, p. 1008, col. 1.]

Appeal against the order of the Court of the 4th Presidency Magistrate, Egmore, Madras, in Calendar Case No. 6850 of 1919.

EMPEROR v. HUSSAIN ALLY & CO.

FACTS appear from the judgment.

The Crown Prosecutor, for the Crown.—The lower Court has wrongly held that proviso 2 to section 24 of the Income Tax Act bars a prosecution under section 39. The levy of penal assessment is intended to be a punishment for submitting a false return and that bars a prosecution under section 40. The failure to produce accounts is punishable as an independent offence and is unaffected by the proviso. No doubt the Collector took into account the assessee's failure to produce accounts in arriving at the conclusion that the return was false. But that would not affect the assessee's liability for prosecution under section 39. The assessment was not finally made merely on the ground that accounts were not produced. The Collector says that he made independent enquiries.

Mr. S. Ramgasamy Aiyangar, for the Respondents.—The respondents were already punished by the levy of penal assessment. A second punishment on the same facts by way of prosecution is not contemplated by the Act. Section 24 of the Income Tax Act is very generally worded. The Collector's letter itself, Exhibit V, shows that penal assessment was levied for the withholding of the account books. And as a fact the Collector's conclusion that the assessees submitted a false return rested chiefly on failure to produce their accounts. It is not equitable to inflict a double punishment on the respondents.

JUDGMENT.

AYLING, J.—The accused in this case were prosecuted for an offence under section 39 (d) of the Income Tax Act for failure to produce their accounts in obedience to a notice issued by the Collector of Madras.

They have been acquitted by the Fourth Presidency Magistrate on the sole ground that the prosecution is barred by the 2nd proviso to section 24 of the same Act, which runs thus:—"Provided further that no prosecution for an offence against this Act shall be instituted in respect of the same facts on which a penal assessment is made under this section."

The only question for our decision is whether the Magistrate has rightly interpreted the section as barring the prosecution in this case.

In my opinion he was clearly wrong. Exhibit VIII of 21st March 1919 is the order imposing penal assessment on the accused. It does not state the facts on which it was based, but these must be deduced from the Collector's previous letter Exhibit V of 12th March 1919, which runs as follows:—

"In your D return, dated the 12th August 1918, you showed your income for 1917-1918 as Rs. 18,836-12 0, but you did not produce your accounts before the Special Income Tax Officer when he called upon you to do so. On the best information that I could secure, I have estimated your income at Rs. 60,000 and have assessed you on that figure. I have thus reason to suppose that you have deliberately returned your income at less than its real amount. I hereby require you under section 24 of Act VII of 1918 to appear before me at 12 noon on the 19th March 1919, with a written statement showing cause why you should not be required to pay penal assessment at a rate not exceeding double the rate that would otherwise have been payable on the difference between the income of Rs. 18,836-12-0, shown in your return and Rs. 60,000, on which I have assessed you to income tax for 1918—1919."

Now it is perfectly true that the accused's failure to produce their accounts is set out in the letter, and was, as the Magistrate says, a fact before the Collector at the time he wrote this letter and when he levied the penal assessment. But it is equally clear that this was not the fact on which the assessment was made. The letter begins by reciting that accused had returned their income at Rs. 18,000 and odd. It then adds (1) that they have failed to produce their accounts in support of their return, and (2) that the Collector's independent enquiries disclosed the fact that their real income was Rs. 60,000. The Collector then proceeds: "I have thus reason to suppose that you have deliberately returned your income at less than its real amount" and on this, calls on them to show cause why they should not be required to pay penal assessment. The failure to produce accounts may have been one reason why the Collector preferred the result, of his own enquiries to the assessees' return but it is the falsity of the return not the failure to produce the accounts, which is the fact on which the penal assessment is made.

Indeed section 24 makes it clear that it is only a return of income below its real amount which could be the basis of an order for penal assessment. The Collector has to be satisfied that the assessee has returned his income below its real amount either by concealing particulars of it or deliberately furnishing inaccurate particulars.

The proviso, though couched in general terms, appears to be intended to bar a prosecution under section 40 of the Act, not one under section 39 which deals with omissions of a totally distinct nature to the act with which section 24 is concerned.

I would set aside the Magistrate's order and direct him to restore the case to file and dispose of it according to law.

COUTTS TROTTER, J.—I agree; but as the case is of some public importance, I will state my reasons in my own words. The respondents were prosecuted before the Fourth Presidency Magistrate under the Indian Income Tax Act (VII of 1918). He acquitted the accused on the view that the second proviso to section 24 of the Act barred the prosecution. Government appeals against the acquittal.

The facts can be stated very briefly. The respondents are a firm carrying on business in Madras, and they were called upon in the ordinary way by the Collector to furnish a return of their income for purposes of assessment for income tax. On the 12th August 1918 they furnished a return showing an income of Rs. 18,836-12 0. The Collector was not satisfied of the truth of the return and on the 4th February 1919, notice was given to the respondents to produce their account books under section 18 of the Act. This notice and a subsequent one calling upon the firm to show cause why they should not be prosecuted under section 39 (d) of the Act were disregarded, and the books were not produced. The case of the respondents, as to that on the merits, is that the books required for production were in the hands of partners out of Madras who could not be communicated within time. That defence will, of course, be open to them hereafter.

The Collector had meanwhile given the respondents notice by a letter of 12th March 1919 that he disbelieved the truth of their return and had estimated their income at Rs. 60,000 and that he called upon them to show cause on 19th March why they should not pay a penal assessment on the sum between the figure returned and that found by the Collector to be the true one. On the 21st March he passed against the firm an order levying a penal assessment of two annas in the rupee on the difference between the actual return of Rs. 18,836-12-0 and what he held to be the true figure of Rs. 60,000. This he is empowered to do by section 24 of the Act and no question arises as to it before us.

Meanwhile he had on the 12th March issued proceedings directing the prosecution of the respondents for failure to produce their books, a power vested in him by section 41 of the Act. This is the case that has been dismissed by the Magistrate on the ground of law and that is the sole matter that is before us.

The penal section is quite clear (section 39): "If a person fails, without reasonable cause or excuse, to produce on or before the date mentioned in a notice under section 18" (which was admittedly really given) "such accounts and documents as are referred to in the notice he shall be punishable with a fine."

But it is said that these proceedings are barred by the fact that the respondents have already been punished under section 24 of the Act by the penal assessment made on the 21st March. Section 24 enables the Collector to make such an assessment in cases where he finds that the assessee has "concealed particulars of his income or has deliberately furnished inaccurate particulars of such income and has thereby returned it below its real amount". Then follows this proviso: "Provided that no prosecution for an offence against this Act shall be instituted in respect of the same facts on which a penal assessment is made under this section."

The case for the respondents is that it is sought to punish them doubly, by a penal assessment and a prosecution, on the same facts and the learned Presidency Magistrate gave effect to that contention. He was clearly led to do so on his view that the Collector's letter of the 12th March 1919, Exhibit V, treated the withholding of the books as a reason for the penal assessment which he then threatened. I think this view is wholly fallacious. The Collector directed a penal assessment on the only ground open to him under the Act, viz., that the respondents had made a false return. He had three considerations which led him to that conclusion and has clearly indicated them in his letter, Exhibit V. They had returned a figure of Rs. 18,836-12 0, he had information that their true income was Rs. 60,000 and they had not produced their books which would have established their case if it was a true one. The last fact was merely used as evidence of the falsity of their return, they were not and could not have been penally assessed for non-production of their books. The prosecution is not for a false return of income, they could have been prosecuted for that offence under section 40 of the Act, and then a previous penal assessment would doubtless have been a bar. But they are now prosecuted on a definite allegation of withholding books, which is at most a step to aid a false return to get through; it is not even a necessary step, because a man may make a false return, who has no books either to produce or to withhold. Conversely a man might withhold his books and render himself liable to punishment under section 39, without taking the further step of sending in a false return. I conceive the policy of the Statute to be to provide by section 39 a punishment for any of the steps likely to be adopted by a fraudulent assessee to impede the Collector in a just estimate of his true income; and to provide an alternative remedy of punishment under section 40 or penal assessment under section 24 for an actual false return. If he commits one of the former offences, he may be punished for it, though he does not commit the latter; if he commits the latter, he may be punished for it in one of two ways and one only. But if he commits both, he may be separately punished for each. Perhaps the clearest way to put it is by an illustration. Suppose a man to have committed an offence under section 39 by withholding his books and to have been prosecuted and convicted for it before he made a return of his income as he clearly might be. Suppose that subsequently he returns his income at a figure found to be false; could any one maintain that his conviction under section 39 was a bar either to his being penally assessed under section 24 or convicted under section 40?

CRIMINAL REFERENCE No. 127 OF 1920.
February 20, 1920.
Present:—Mr. Justice Walsh.
EMPEROR—PROSECUTOR
versus
BHIKKI AND OTHERS—ACCUSED.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), ss. 35, 397—Accused sentenced in respect of one offence—Conviction for similar offence in another trial—Concurrent sentence, whether justified—Procedure.

Where a person is convicted of an offence and is sentenced to undergo a term of imprisonment and is found guilty by another Judge of a precisely similar offence in another case, it is illegal to pass a sentence upon him to run concurrently with the previous sentence. In such a case, if the Judge is of opinion that the previous sentence is adequate, he should pass a nominal sentence on the accused. [p. 1007, col. 1.]

Criminal reference made by the Additional Sessions Judge, Agra.

JUDGMENT.—This case has been referred to me because the learned Judge realises that in the cases of Bhikki, Mihi Lal Gaddar, Karna Kala, Ramdhan, Kanha and Nathi Jat, who had already been convicted of another dacoity by another Sessions Judge and sentenced to various terms of imprisonment amounting in all to 8 years' rigorous imprisonment each, he could neither pass a nominal sentence, nor order an adequate sentence to be served concurrently with the sentences already imposed. He did in fact make an order that the sentences should run concurrently and then referred the case to this Court to enable this Court to revise the order which made the two sentences concurrent, if in the opinion of this Court the said order be not proper according to law.

SHIB DAYAL v. HANS RAJ.

The absence of a provision in the Code enabling a Judge to make sentences in different cases run concurrently is a casus omissus by the Legislature. Section 35 limits the power to a case of conviction at one trial of two or more distinct offences and section 397 directs that a subsequent sentence shall commence at the expiration of any sentence to which the prisoner has previously been sentenced.

There are two ways of dealing with this by the trial Court without sending it to the High Court. The Judge can inflict such sentence as he considers adequate and leave it to the Local Government to make such reduction as they may think fit. I remember myself having four cases in appeal in which the aggregate sentences against one man amounted to 36 years, and the Local Government interfered. On the other hand, if the learned Judge thinks that the previous sentence is adequate to prevent a prisoner from committing further mischief, he may pass a nominal sentence of one day, but I can understand that he is unwilling to do that partly on account of being misunderstood and partly because if the previous case in which the adequate sentence had been passed happened to be upset in appeal, there would be a miscarriage of justice.

In this case the learned Sessions Judge has taken the ingenious course of making what, I think, he knew was an illegal order in order to get the assistance of the High Court to put it right. We can do with safety what he could not, namely, pass a nominal sentence.

I, therefore, reduce the sentence in this particular dacoity on the persons above named to that of one day, to be served when the sentence by the Sessions Judge of Bharatpur expires.

I direct that a copy of this judgment be sent to the Local Government with the recommendation which, I think, I have made once before, that if possible the practice which is adopted in England should be followed in India, namely, that Judges should be asked by circulars to take into account, when sentencing a prisoner, any sentence already inflicted upon him, for another distinct offence at a different trial, being already undergone or about to be undergone.

Sentence reduced.

HANS RAJ—RESPONDENT.

Criminal proceedings, stay of—Pendency of civi suit—Cause of action arising subsequently.

Ordinarily the subsequent institution of a civil suit relating to the matter in dispute is not a good cause for stay of criminal proceedings. [p. 1008, col. 2.]

Where, however, the cause of action did not arise till after the filing of the criminal complaint:

Held, that the criminal proceedings should be stayed pending the decision of the civil suit in the first Court. [p. 1008, col. 1.]

Appplication under section 439, Criminal Procedure Code, for revision of the order of the Additional Sessions Judge, Lahore, dated the 2nd February 1920.

Mr. C. Bevan-Petman, for the Petitioner.

Lala Amar Nath Ohona, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—This is an application asking that certain criminal proceedings should be quashed, or that at least they should be stayed till the civil suit instituted by the petitioner has been decided.

It is urged that the facts alleged do not constitute a criminal offence, and that the petitioner was legally entitled to possession of the document which he is charged with having obtained by fraud from the complainant, also that the whole dispute is one of a purely civil nature, I am not prepared to come to any finding as to facts, or to say that no criminal offence has been committed.

RAM SAHAI v. EMPEROR.

As to stay of proceedings the petitioner has since lodged a civil suit. Ordinarily the subsequent institution of a civil suit is not regarded as a good cause for stay of criminal proceedings [See Hari Pada Pal v. Jotish Chandra Chatterjee (1)], but on petitioner's behalf it is urged that his cause of action did not arise till 1st November 1919, whereas the criminal complaint was lodged on 30th October 1919.

For the complainant it is urged that the civil suit may take years finally to dispose of, and that criminal proceedings should not be indefinitely delayed, and here Raj Kumari Debi v. Bama Sundari Debi (2) is quoted. There is some force in this, but it is as well to avoid conflicting decisions as far as possible, and I do not think any harm will be done if proceedings in the criminal case are stayed till the civil suit reaches a decision in the first Court.

I direct that the criminal proceedings be stayed till the civil suit filed by the petitioner on the 18th December 1919 be decided by the first Court, and no longer.

Proceedings stayed.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), ss. 195, 476—Order requiring accused to show cause why he should not be prosecuted, contents of—Requirements of s. 195 not complied with, effect of.

An order under section 476 of the Criminal Procedure Code, requiring the accused to show cause why he should not be prosecuted, should carry out the requirements of section 195 of the Code. An order which omits to specify the Court, or the place and the occasion on which the offence was committed, but merely calls upon the accused to show cause why he should not be prosecuted for perjury, is not a good order and is liable to be set aside.

Criminal reference by the Sessions Judge, Shahjahanpur, dated the 2nd February 1920.

JUDGMENT.—On the 18th of December 1919, a Magistrate of First Class convicted Durra and Musammat Bhoppa under sections 325 and 326 of the Indian Penal Code and sentenced them to different periods of imprisonment. On the same day he recorded an order in which he directed the record to be made over to another Magistrate to enquire into the statements made in the case by Ram Sahai, Jodh Singh, Bhola and Nawab Singh, which were false. He passed an order under section 476 directing them to show cause why they should not be prosecuted for perjury. The order is very inartistically framed and does not carry out the requirements of section 195 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. It does not specify the Court or the place and the occasion on which the offence was committed. It is a careless order carelessly worded, and not one calculated to give the accused proper notice of the offence alleged against them. Magistrates passing an order under section 476 should do so with extreme care and at least carry out the requirements of section 195, paragraph 4, of the Code of Criminal Procedure. I do not lay down that it is absolutely necessary that the provision above-mentioned should be verbally and fully carried out, but the record should satisfy this Court that the order has been passed with due care and consideration. I am not satisfied that this was done in the present case. I set aside the order. Let the record be returned.

Order set aside.

Section 97 of the Assam Land and Revenue Regulation confers upon every recorded proprietor of a permanently-settled estate, subject to the qualifications specified therein, the right to claim a partition of the estate. It makes no reference directly or by implication, to the mode in which the lands of the estate are held. A Revenue Court has, therefore, jurisdiction to effect a partition of an estate even when the lands of that estate, in whole or in part, are joint with the lands of other estates.

Where a Statute confers jurisdiction, it impliedly grants also the power to do such acts, adopt such measures, and employ such means as are essentially necessary to its execution.

A partition of an estate which affects the distribution of the revenue should be effected not by a Civil Court but by the appropriate Revenue Court. C YASIN ALI v RADHA GOBINDA, 30 C L. J. 48; 47 C. 354 180

A benamidar can sue in his own name in certain cases, but he must come into Court with a clean case.

Plaintiff sued defendant for the recovery of principal and interest due on a bond. The defendant pleaded that the bond was benami, the real creditor being one C. The plaintiff at first said the money was his own but later on he said it belonged to his sister, whose trustee he claimed to be. It appeared that in some earlier proceedings with regard to the guardianship of C.'s son the present plaintiff had put in certain lists of debts, etc., due to C. which comprised the bond now in suit. The suit having been decreed by the Courts below, the defendant filed a second appeal in the High Court. Under section 31 of the Bengal Land Revenue Sales Act an assignee of the recorded proprietors of an estate is not their representative, so that the Collector is justified in refusing to pay to such assignee claiming on his own behalf the money held in deposit on account of the recorded proprietors as the surplus sale-proceeds of their estate under the Bengal Land Revenue Sales Act But the Legislature did not contemplate that the title of unrecorded proprietors should be lost by the sale to the extent that they should not be entitled to receive the surplus sale-proceeds, even if they could establish in the Civil Court, as against the recorded proprietors, that they were entitled to the estate at the time of the revenue sale

Where after an application by an assignee of an estate sold under the Bengal Land Revenue Sales Act to withdraw the surplus sale-proceeds had been refused by the Collector under section 31 of the Act, the assignee instituted a suit for a declaration of his title to the surplus sale proceeds:

Held, (1) that in such a suit no question of limitation could arise;

An under-raiyat who has remained in occupation of a certain plot of land and has cultivated it for more than twelve years, must be held to have acquired a right of occupancy under section 6 of Bengal Act VIII of 869.

The distinction made by the Bengal Tenancy Act between a raiyat and an under-raiyat was not recognised by Bengal Act VIII of 1869. Under the latter Act the term "raiyat" included all classes of tenants who were actual cultivators of the soil, and it was immaterial whether such a cultivator held his tenancy under a middleman or under a person who, though an occupancy raiyat originally, had placed another tenant in possession of the lands of his tenancy for purposes of cultivation, unless such sub-lease was "for a term or year by year" ——— s. 52—Enhancement of rent on increase in area—Area at inception of tenancy, proof of, by landlord—"Area for which rent has been previously paid," meaning of.

To enable a Court to grant an enhancement of rent under section 52 of the Bengal Tenancy Act, it must be in a position to find what the area was at the inception of the tenancy; it is necessary, therefore, for the landlord to prove that there has been some increase in the area as compared with the area of the tenancy at its inception.

The expression "the area for which rent has been previously paid" in section 52 of the Bengal Tenancy

Act means the area with reference to which the rent previously paid has been assessed or adjusted. C AZIZ KHAN v. SARAJUBALA DEBI 430

Section 67 of the Bengal Tenancy Act applies only where the tenancy is not a permanent mokarari tenancy situated within a permanently settled area.

Where a kabuliyat showed that a permanent tenancy was created, but there were no clear expressions in the document to show that the rent was fixed except that there was a provision that if at any time the land on measurement be found larger in area than that on the basis of which the rent was fixed, the additional rent payable for such additional area would be in proportion of the rent originally fixed:

Defendant No. 2, an occupancy raiyat, granted a lease of his holding to defendant No. 1 for a term in excess of that authorised by section 85 of the Bengal Tenancy Act. Subsequently the defendant No. 2 purported to create an intermediate tenancy in favour of the plaintiffs, which again was unauthorised by the terms of section 85. In a suit by the plaintiffs against defendant No. 1 for arrears of rent, the defendant No 2's son and authorised agent came forward and made a statement in Court that the rent in respect of the holding was not payable to the defendant No. 2 but to the plaintiffs:

Held, that the defendant No 2 and the plaintiffs having agreed between them that the rent was payable to the plaintiffs, it was not competent to the defendant No. 1 to contest the plaintiffs' claim for rent. C KARTICK MONDAL v. MADHAB MONDAL 615

Per Curiam.—With regard to an offence under section 578 of the Calcutta Municipal Act for carrying on a Pleader's profession without taking the prescribed Municipal license, if the profession is exercised for one day only, the prosecution must be commenced within the following three months. If it is exercised on a number of days, whether the offence is a continuing one or not, the prosecution must be commenced within three months of the last of such days.

Per Richardson, J.—Under clause (2) of section 578 of the Calcutta Municipal Act, when an offender has once been convicted and has paid the fine imposed upon him, the offence is purged and the payment of the fine is to be taken in full satisfaction of the demand on account of such license. ——— s. 11—Res judicata between co-defendants—Reasons for decree, whether part of decree—Appeal, whether permissible against reasons for decree.

A decision in a former suit does not operate by way of res judicata between co-defendants, unless it was a decision necessary to the decision of that suit.

Plaintiffs sued defendants for a declaration that they were owners of a certain plot of land. Prior to this one C. had sued the present plaintiffs for an injunction restraining them from interfering with his building on the plot and they had resisted the claim on the ground of ownership. The father of the present defendants alleged his own title and asked to be impleaded. He was made a co-defendant and an issue was struck as to the rights of the defendants inter se. He produced a sale-deed showing that the site had been purchased by a common ancestor of himself and C. The Court thereupon dismissed the suit leaving the parties to bear their own costs. The decree contained the Munsif's reasons for arriving at his decision. The defendants present plaintiffs appealed as to costs and got them from the District Judge:

Held, (1) that the words in the Munsif's decree (in the earlier suit) which gave the reasons for his decision were no part of the decree proper and did not give the defendants, present plaintiffs, any right of appeal;

(2) that the defendants, present plaintiffs, could not appeal and did not appeal against the decree except as to costs;

(3) that the former decision was consequently no bar to the present suit.

Section 96 of the Transfer of Property Act expressly provides that when property, the sale of which is directed, is subject to a prior mortgage, it may be sold free of such mortgage with the consent of the prior mortgagee, and implies that without such consent it cannot be so sold

A prior mortgagee has a paramount claim, and although made a party to a suit by a puisne mortgagee, need not intervene unless his mortgage is impugned.

Where, therefore, a prior mortgagee was made a party to such a suit but did not appear, and subsequently brought a suit on his mortgage:

A decision, in the course of execution proceedings, of a question which properly arises for consideration is final and binding between the parties. The binding character of the order is not affected by the circumstance that as to some of the parties it was based on agreement and as to the others on an adjudication by the Court.

A mortgagee who purchases the property at a sale in execution of his decree on the mortgage is bound by an estoppel that would have bound his mortgagor.

A decree-holder who is bound to notify before the execution sale all encumbrances on the property about to be sold cannot subsequently set up an encumbrance in his own favour not set up in the execution proceedings.

If a person purchases an estate subject to a mortgage, whether under a voluntary conveyance or under a sale in invitum, or undertakes to discharge it, he cannot be heard to deny the validity of the mortgage subject to which he made his purchase. Where, however, the purchaser merely buys an estate which is under mortgage but does not take it subject to the encumbrance or undertake to discharge it, he is not precluded from impeaching the validity of the mortgage. The distinction between the two classes of cases depends upon the question, whether the property has been sold subject to the mortgage or whether mere notice of the mortgage has been given in the proclamation of sale. The former contingency is provided for by Order XXI, rule 62, the latter is contemplated by Order XXI, rule 66, of the Code of Civil Procedure. C KALI DAS v. PRASANNA KUMAR, 30 C. L. A sale held in execution of a decree for an amount in respect of which there was no decree existing at the time is illegal, and the Court would be justified in refusing to confirm it The fact that subsequently to the sale the decree-holder obtained a decree entitling him to the amount for which the sale was held would not validate the sale

On the application of the judgment-debtor a sale was set aside on the 31st July 1913. On the 3rd April 1917 the High Court on appeal ultimately reversed the order setting aside the sale. On the 29th September 1917 the decree-holder applied for confirmation of the sale, whereupon the judgment-debtor put in an application to have the sale set aside. It was objected that this application was barred by limitation, having been made more than three years after the date of the sale:

Held, that the period for making the application was prescribed by Article 181 of Schedule I to the Limitation Act and that period commenced from the time when the right to apply accrued, that the right to apply arose on the 3rd April 1917, and that, treating the interval between the 31st July 1913, and the 3rd April 1917, as under suspense, the application was not barred by limitation. C ARIATULLAH v. SASHI BHUSAN HAZRAH, 24 C. Civil Procedure Code—1908—contd.

Residence in hostile country, length of, necessary to constitute alien enemy—Firm with alien enemy as partner, whether can maintain suit.

Nationality is not the test for determining whether a person is an "alien enemy" within the meaning of section 83 of the Civil Procedure Code. For this purpose the place of residence or the place where the business is carried on is the determining factor, and even a British subject will be treated as an alien enemy, if he voluntarily resides or carries on business in a hostile country.

Residence need not amount to what is called domicile, namely, permanent residence sine animo revertendi. A much less permanent residence is sufficient to constitute a man an alien enemy, provided it is not of a temporary character.

If a person resides in a hostile country for a substantial period of time, he acquires the disability attaching to an enemy during that period, unless such residence is with the consent of the Crown.

If one of the partners in a firm is an alien enemy, neither he nor his partner, who does not bear an enemy character, can recover money owing to the firm in the English Courts.

In a suit for recovery of money due on account of costs of building, it appeared that the plaintiff firm consisted of six persons, one of whom lived at Delhi and carried on the business of the firm, while the remaining five resided at Mecca where the partners had another firm of a different name. The action, though relating to a transaction entered into and probably carried out before the declaration of war between Britain and Turkey, was brought during the war:

Held, (1) that even if the five partners residing at Mecca were British subjects, they must still be regarded as alien enemies because of their residence in a hostile country;

A claim for compensation for wrongful attachment of property before judgment, made in a counter-affidavit disputing the propriety of the attachment, and, therefore, at a stage at which the Court was not called on to deal with it and could not legally have done so, is no bar to a separate suit for damages. Section 95 of the Civil Procedure Code operates as a bar to such a suit if the claim is made at the stage at which either of the conditions postulated by the section has been fulfilled, but not otherwise.

A suit for damages on account of injury to stock caused by making an attachment before judgment must be brought within the period prescribed by Article 36 of Schedule I to the Limitation Act.

Order III, rule 1, Civil Procedure Code, is wide enough to enable the Court to direct any party to the suit to appear in person, whether he be a minor or a major or of sound or unsound mind, and the order may be made at any stage of the suit.

When such an order is given to the guardian of a lunatic or minor defendant, it is in effect an order to the defendant to appear in person and failure to comply with it will enable the Court to act under Order IX, rule 12, of the Civil Procedure Code.

There is nothing in Order XXXII, rule 11, Civil Procedure Code, to make it inapplicable to a case wherein an order was passed to try the suit ex parte.

The power under rule 11 may be exercised at any time during the pendency of the suit.

Parties are entitled to appear by Vakils under Order IX, rule 7, Civil Procedure Code.

Where on the non-compliance by a guardian with an order directing him to produce the minor or lunatic defendant the Court proceeds ex parte, the order may be set aside on the application of a fresh guardian.

In setting aside the ex parte order it is in the Court's discretion to impose, as a condition precedent, that the guardian do produce his ward on a prescribed date. A Court has no jurisdiction to either dismiss a suit or reject a plaint merely because the plaint is defective in that it does not comply with a provision of the law. The proper procedure is to call on the plaintiff to cure the defect, and on his failure to do so, the Court may proceed to decide the suit forthwith and to dismiss it under Order XVII, rule 3, of the Civil Procedure Code, or it may reject the plaint under its inherent powers.

A High Court has power under its revisional jurisdiction to deal with and to set aside, if necessary, an interlocutory order.

Interference on the revision side, however, is only permissible when an interlocutory order is so unjust and is likely to put things into so inconvenient a position that irreparable harm would be done to the applicant for revision.

A High Court will interfere with an interlocutory order passed by a subordinate Court, if the question involved is not one of the exercise of discretion but of want of jurisdiction and manifest injustice might otherwise be done.

When a Court comes to an erroneous decision that it has jurisdiction to entertain a suit, it would tend to the convenience and advantage of all parties if that decision is set aside and matters put right at the earliest possible stage.

A suit for a declaration that the plaintiffs are not liable to pay rent as entered in the revenue records falls within the purview of section 77 (3) (i) of the Punjab Tenancy Act and is exclusively triable by a Revenue Court.

Plaintiffs sued for a declaration that they were only liable to give to the defendants a one-third share of grain as rent in respect of their occupancy lands, despite an entry in the revenue records showing a liability to pay a larger share. The defendants took the preliminary plea that the Revenue Courts alone had jurisdiction to try the suit. The Court having decided in favour of the plaintiffs, the defendants applied to the High Court for revision under section 44 of the Punjab Courts Act of 1919:

Held, (1) that as the question involved was one of jurisdiction, the High Court had power to interfere with the interlocutory order in revision;

(2) that the suit was triable by a Revenue Court and the plaint should be returned for presentation therein. L SAWAN SINGH v. RAHMAN 739

It is not right for a Court, when considering the accounts submitted by a Receiver, to go into the question of his liability to account for periods other than the period covered by the account itself.

The Code of Civil Procedure is not exhaustive and the Court possesses inherent powers to act ex debito justitiæ in order to do that real and substantial justice for the administration of which alone it exists.

A person asking the Court to exercise its discretionary jurisdiction must make out a strong case and must show that there is no other remedy open to him by which he can protect himself from the consequences of the injury complained of.

O. V, rr 17, 20 Substituted service, when can be effected—Ex parte decree—Application for setting aside decree suspended—Subsequent application, whether in continuance of original application—Limitation Act (IX of 1908), Sch I, Art 164.

Plaintiff sued defendants at Sialkot for an injunction regarding an alleged right of way and the demolition of a wall Difficulties having arisen in obtaining personal service on the defendants who did not live at Sialkot, notices were affixed on their so-called inhabited house there and an ex parte decree was passed on the 29th November 1912. On the 23rd of December the defendants applied for setting aside the ex parte decree, but in the proceedings it was found impossible to effect personal service on the plaintiff and after vain attempts to do so, the Munsif passed an order that the application be consigned to the record room and that action could be taken when the plaintiff applied for execution. On the 27th March 1914 the decree-holder applied for execution by demolishing the wall and for Rs. 27 as costs. Summonses were ordered to be sent to the judgment-debtors and were served by being affixed on the same house where the judgment-debtors were not residing. An order for demolition was made and the house was ordered to be sold in order that costs might be recovered. The decree-holder, having obtained permission to bid, bought the house for Rs. 40. The judgment-debtors, having obtained information of what had occurred, put in an application on the 25th July 1915 for restoration of the proceedings in the original suit. This application having been dismissed by both the Courts below as time-barred, the defendants applied for revision:

Held, (1) that no legal service as contemplated by the Civil Procedure Code ever took place on the defendants, as no order was passed by the Court under Order V, rule 20, for effecting substituted service

(2) that upon a proper construction of the law the original application for setting aside the ex parte decree, made as it was within 30 days of the ex parte decree was bound to succeed·

(3) that the mere fact that the original application was consigned to the record room did not in any way necessitate a fresh application;

(4) that the application of the 20th July 1915 must be considered as merely in continuance of the suspended original application;

(5) that consequently no question of limitation arose and the ex parte decree should be set aside. L BARKAT ULLAH v. FAZAL-I-MAULA 824

The Court of execution has to execute the decree as it stands, and it is not open to the parties to impeach the validity or the correctness of the decree.

The provisions of Order XXI, rule 83, of the Civil Procedure Code do not apply to a sale of property directed to be sold in execution of a decree for sale in enforcement of a mortgage on such property.

A decree was passed in terms of a compromise and directed the judgment-debtor to pay the debt due to the decree-holder by certain specified instalments, providing also that in case of default the property mortgaged to the decree-holder would be sold Default having been made the decree-holder applied for sale of the property. No notice was served upon the judgment-debtor under Order XXI, rule 22 of the Civil Procedure Code, but one was issued to him under rule 66 of the Order:

Held, (1) that the decree, having been passed in accordance with a compromise arrived at between the parties, was not a preliminary decree within the purview of Order XXXIV, rule 4, Civil Procedure Code, but was a final one and capable of execution;

(2) that although the application for execution was made after the expiry of one year from the date of the decree, yet inasmuch as the judgment-debtor had been given an opportunity to show cause why the decree should not be executed against him, the mere fact that no notice was served upon him under Order XXI, rule 22, Civil Procedure Code, did not vitiate the proceedings

(3) that inasmuch as the decree contained a specific provision as to the sale of the property, the executing Court had no discretion in the matter. L KORA LAL v PUNJAB NATIONAL BANK, LIMITED, MULTAN, 2 U. P. L. R. (L.) 91; 18 P. W. R. 920 816

Civil Procedure Code—1908—contd.

Possession of immoveable property in execution of a decree cannot be said to have been given according to law unless it is delivered in either of the methods provided by Order XXI, rule 95 or rule 96.

Symbolical possession given in execution proceedings to which the judgment-debtors are parties is to be deemed equal to actual possession as against them.

Defendant constructed a mud wall dividing the plaintiff's land into 2 plots A and B. Plaintiff sued for possession of the plot A and obtained a decree in 1913 He sued out execution and obtained possession on the 28th February 916 Subsequently he brought a second suit for possession, alleging that the defendant had again dispossessed him and had constructed a brick wall in place of the old dilapidated mud wall, which it was prayed should be demolished:

Held, (1) that a full execution of the decree having taken place and possession having been delivered proceedings thereunder came to an end and the plaintiff's remedy was by way of a suit

(2) that the claim for the demolition of the wall was incidental to the claim for possession of land. L SALAMAT ALI v ALI AKBAR 646

In a suit under Order XXI, rule 63, of the Civil Procedure Code the burden of proof lies on the plaintiff to show that the adjudication in the objection proceedings was wrong.

A defendant may impeach a transaction voidable as against him, such as a fraudulent transfer when it is sought to be enforced, whether by a declaration or otherwise.

The parties to a suit referred their dispute to arbitration. In the course of arbitration proceedings they presented a written compromise amicably settling their dispute. The arbitrators thereupon made a report to the Court to that effect requesting it to pass a decree in accordance with the compromise, which was done. Plaintiff, who was represented by a guardian ad litem in the previous proceedings, then sued for a declaration that the decree thus obtained was ineffectual against him, and for possession of certain properties alleging that the guardian had in disregard of his duties allowed the properties in dispute to be allotted to the defendant:

Held, (1) that the report of the arbitrators embodying the compromise entered into between the parties was not an award;

(2) that it was the duty of the Court to have examined the compromise and to have decided whether it was for the benefit of the minor and whether leave should or should not be given to the guardian of the plaintiff to enter into the proposed compromise;

At the time of executing a usufructuary mortgage, the mortgagor executed a rent-note in favour of the mortgagee and continued in possession of the property. He failed to pay the rent due and the mortgagee obtained a decree for the amount due, which he assigned to a third person, who sought to issue execution by sale of the mortgagor's equity of redemption in the mortgaged property:

Held, that the claim on which the mortgagee got a decree was really a decree for payment of money in satisfaction of the claim arising out of the mortgage, and, therefore, within rule 14 of Order XXXIV, of the Civil Procedure Code and that the assignee, therefore, was not competent to apply for sale of the mortgaged property.

An Appellate Court would not be justified in allowing a plaintiff an opportunity of adducing evidence which he has discovered since the institution of the suit in the Court of first instance. The proper procedure in such a case is for the plaintiff to apply for review of the judgment of the first Court.

The legitimate occasion for the use of the provision contained in Order XLI, rule 27, of the Civil Procedure Code is when on examining the evidence as it stands some inherent lacuna or defect becomes apparent, and not where a discovery is made outside the Court of fresh evidence and the application is made to import it.

Where upon an application to allow additional evidence to be tendered, the opposite party takes objection to the grant of the application but the objection is disallowed, whereupon he, too, requests permission to produce additional evidence, this does not amount to a waiver of his right to object in second appeal to the procedure of the Appellate Court. Pat UCHANT AHIR v. A contract can create no right or liability in a person who is not a party to it, unless he can claim or be charged through a party, as in the case of a cestui que trust claiming through the trustee But a contract may be in form with a named person, and yet be intended to secure a benefit to another as cestui que trust in such a way that the latter may sue in his own right to enforce the contract.

The defendant No. 2 demised to the defendant No. 1 for a term of three years a zemindari on 8th October 1910 on a yearly rental of Rs. 10,000 Out of this sum of Rs 10,000 a sum of Rs 6,000 was to be appropriated by the defendant No in reduction of certain amounts due to him from the defendant No. 2, and he was to pay the balance of Rs 4,000 to the defendant No 2 annually for three years. By an Indenture, dated 16th December 1910, the defendant No. 2 assigned to the plaintiff by way of mortgage the sums payable to him by the defendant No. 1 under the demise of 8th October 1910. Afterwards, by an Indenture, dated the 2 rd January 1911 the defendant No. 2 assigned to the defendant No. 1, all arrears of rent of the zemindari and also granted him a receipt for all rents payable to him by the defendant No. 1 for three years, viz., s. 12,000, and in that Indenture the defendant No. 1 entered into a covenant with the defendant No 2 to pay Rs. 10,000 and interest which the defendant No. 2 was liable to pay to the plaintiff under the assignment by way of mortgage and also agreed to indemnify the defendant No 2 for all claims and demands in respect thereof. The defendant No 1 paid Rs. 5,000 to the plaintiff by way of part payment of plaintiff's dues from the defendant No 2. In a suit by the plaintiff for recovery of the balance from the defendant No. 1:

Held, 1 that there was no privity of contract between the plaintiff and the defendant No. 1 and that, therefore, the suit was not maintainable;

Undue influence is not established by proof of the relations of the parties having been such that the one naturally relied upon the other for advice, and that the other was in a position to dominate the will of the first in giving it.

To render influence 'undue', it must be established that the person in a position of domination has used that position to obtain unfair advantage for himself, and so to cause injury to the person relying upon his authority or aid.

It is only when the bargain is with the influencer and is in itself unconscionable that the burden is thrown upon the influencer to establish affirmatively that the other party was scrupulously kept separately advised in the independence of a free agent. P C POOSATHURAI v. KANNAPPA CHETTIAR, 38 M. Criminal Procedure Code—contd.

The mere fact that a Magistrate is placed in charge of a sub-division of a district is, in the absence of anything to the contrary, no ground for holding that his jurisdiction over the area of the district outside his local jurisdiction as a Magistrate of the first class is curtailed, and it is not illegal for such a Magistrate to take proceedings under section 11 of the Criminal Procedure Code upon a Police report in respect of persons residing outside his local jurisdiction, irrespective of how the Police report came before him.

Where a copy of the order made under section 112 of the Criminal Procedure Code does not accompany the warrant as required by section 115, but the order is read over to the person affected thereby, and there is nothing to show that there was any prejudice, the omission to attach a copy of the order to the warrant is a mere irregularity not fatal to the trial.

In order to establish general repute for the purposes of section 110 of the Criminal Procedure Code the evidence of the investigating Police Officer is inadmissible and irrelevant.

Where in cross-examining a witness for the prosecution questions are disallowed by the Court on the ground of irrelevancy or on other grounds, the evidence should show what the questions are and the reason for disallowing them.

Where a large number of witnesses are examined for the prosecution, the accused is entitled to a reasonable interval for considering what evidence he should produce by way of rebuttal. Held, that there were no materials before the Magistrate on which he could decide that a search warrant should be issued.

When there is no inquiry or trial or other proceeding under the Code of Criminal Procedure, a general search warrant cannot be issued under section 96 of the Criminal Procedure Code.

The provision of the law requiring the sanction of a Magistrate before the issue of a search warrant means that the Magistrate should apply his mind to the facts and ought not to issue a search warrant simply because a Police Officer asks him to do so. C PRATT v. EMPEROR, 24 C. A conviction under section 110, Criminal Procedure Code, has nothing to do with the punishment for an offence. An order under that section is merely preventive and only binds a person down to be of good behaviour and is not punishment for any offence committed by him. Consequently, there is no bar to the subsequent punishment of a person so bound down for an offence under section 401 of the Penal Code.

Section 234 of the Criminal Procedure Code has no application to a charge under section 401 of the Penal Code, as the gist of an offence under the latter section is association for the purpose of habitually committing theft or robbery and habit is to be proved by the aggregate of acts, though the charge may be of a single offence.

Evidence of previous conviction for an offence under the Penal Code, or evidence to show that accused has been previously bound down under section 118 of the Criminal Procedure Code, is inadmissible in a trial under section 401 of the Penal Code for the purpose of proving the conviction or proving bad character, but such evidence may be used for proving association. C KASEM ALI v. EMPEROR, 47 C. 151; 31 C. ——— ss. 110, 112, 114, 117—Preliminary order under s. 112, contents of—Accused not informed of substance of accusation, effect of—Dangerous and desperate character—General repute, evidence of, admissibility of—Evidence of Police witnesses, value of—Opinions, hearsay and rumours, admissibility of.

It is not open to a Magistrate to look into evidence of general repute for finding that a person is a desperate and dangerous character within the meaning of section 110 (f), Criminal Procedure Code. There should be proof of specific acts to show that he is of such a character.

In proceedings under section 110 of the Criminal Procedure Code the evidence of official and Police witnesses should, as far as possible, be eschewed. Though there is no rule of law which prohibits a Magistrate from admitting Police evidence, it should, if not wholly discarded, influence his judgment as little as possible.

Where the evidence of the Police witnesses consists only of opinions, rumours and hearsay which they have recorded in their note books and diaries, it is wholly inadmissible.

The evidence on which a Magistrate ought to base a conviction under section 110, clauses a) to (c), Criminal Procedure Code, must relate to particular instances which have come to the knowledge of the deponent and must be specific. Evidence relating to mere beliefs and opinions, without reference to acts or instances which have induced the witnesses to form an opinion, cannot be regarded as evidence of repute within the meaning of section 117 (3) of the Code. Habitual criminality cannot be regarded as established by the repetition of beliefs and opinions At any rate, Courts ought to discard such evidence as much as possible.

Per Seshagiri Aiyar, J.—Under section 112, Criminal Procedure Code, the substance of the report made to the Magistrate should be clearly disclosed to the accused and if the accused is not informed of the charges or of the nature of the evidence which he is to rebut, the proceedings are illegal.

Per Moore, J.—The preliminary order under section 112 should not merely be a reproduction of the language of clauses (a) and (f) of section 110, Criminal Procedure Code. A notice under the section should be a sufficient indication of the time and place of the acts charged with sufficient details to enable the accused to know what facts he has to meet.

The defect, however, is not a sufficient ground for the High Court quashing the proceedings of the Magistrate, if it is not shown that the accused was prejudiced thereby

The test of the admissibility of the evidence of general opinion is whether it shows the general reputation of the accused and it should at least be the opinion of a considerable number of persons. It must not be the repetition of what certain persons have said to the witnesses. It should be the evidence of respectable persons acquainted with the accused who live in his neighbourhood and are aware of his reputation. M KOTTAMIDDU RANGA REDDI, In re, 38 M. L. An accused person was, on his application therefor, furnished with a copy of the Police diaries and of the statements of the prosecution witnesses recorded by the Police. During the pendency of his appeal it was discovered that the statement of one of the witnesses furnished to the accused was not the complete statement recorded in the Police diary of the statement made by him to the Police. The Judge rejected the application, assuming that the statement made by the witness to the Police was untrue:

The mere fact that an application under section 195 of the Criminal Procedure Code to prosecute a defendant is not made immediately after the decree of the first Court, but after the decision of an appeal against that decree and on expiry of the period for filing a second appeal, is not fatal to the grant of the application, it being undesirable to take criminal proceedings in relation to a matter which is still the subject of civil litigation, and it is inexpedient to try a case when the result is likely to interfere with the due course of justice.

The issue of a notice is not essential to the validity of a sanction given under section 195 of the Code, even though if such notice is issued the opposite party may be able to show that he and the applicant are on bad terms.

Where there is a prima facie strong case for granting sanction, the fact that such sanction is granted by a Judge who did not hear the case is no ground for revoking the sanction or for holding that the sanction is bad. N NATHU RAM v. BAREY, 2 CR. L. J. 285 107

A charge of receiving stolen property may be joined with a charge for cheating, when the facts constituting the offences form part of the same transaction.

The true test of acts forming part of the same transaction is that there should be a continuous operation of acts leading to the same end and a common purpose should run through all the acts.

Waiver by the accused's Counsel of the right to re-cross-examine a prosecution witness cannot prejudice the rights of the accused under sections 256 and 257, Criminal Procedure Code.

The right refrerred to in section 256 of the Criminal Procedure Code is absolute and unqualified and is intended to apply only where the witnesses are still before the Court and before they have been discharged from further attendance.

Under section 257, however, there is a discretion vested in the Court to re-summon the prosecution witnesses already examined, and where a witness has been allowed to depart on the representation of the accused that he is not required, any further application to re-cross-examine him must be deemed to fall under section 257.

Where the right to cross-examine a witness has been exercised, the evidence taken becomes complete for the purpose of being admitted in a later proceeding. The mere fact that the witness could have been subjected to a further cross-examination in the exercise of a further right is no ground for holding the evidence already taken to be inadmissible. M LOCKLEY v EMPEROR, 11 L. The non-examination of a complainant under section 244 of the Criminal Procedure Code in a summons case does not vitiate the whole of the proceedings, as that section merely enjoins that he shall be heard and does not say that he is to be examined, and section 247 of the Code would not apply because it does not deal with the examination of the complainant but with his appearance

Section 247 of the Code of Criminal Procedure gives power to a Magistrate to adjourn a summons case for sufficient reason when the complainant does not appear and the fact that some witnesses are examined in the absence of the complainant would not vitiate the trial, unless it is shown that the accused was in some way prejudiced. The High Court, upon a reference under section 307, Criminal Procedure Code, will not interfere with the unanimous verdict of a Jury, and if that verdict is not unreasonable, and can upon the evidence be supported, the High Court will accept the verdict even though it may not wholly agree therewith.

A confession recorded in circumstances which show that the accused was in charge of a Police constable and that under the continued questioning to which he was subjected by the Investigating Officer, he finally broke down, cannot be regarded as a voluntary confession, and is one within the words of section 24 of the Evidence Act.

Where in spite of the directions of the High Court that confessions should be recorded in open Court, a Magistrate records a confession at 11 o'clock at night, this circumstance shows that the confession was not voluntary and that the Magistrate failed to exercise a proper discretion in the matter.

Where an accused person is produced before a Magistrate at 12-30 A. M. for the purpose of recording his confession, and refuses to make one, but eventually does so on the Magistrate's call for the Police, the confession cannot be said to be voluntary.

Plaintiffs sued for a declaration that four mortgage deeds executed by their father shall not affect their reversionary rights. The first was a possessory mortgage, while the other three were deeds of further charge, the consideration being chiefly rent and interest due under the 1st mortgage. It appeared that the rent was enhanced every time a new deed was executed. The first Court, finding that the land was ancestral and that the mortgages were not proved to have been for necessity, gave the plaintiffs a decree. On appeal the District Judge agreed with the Court of first instance as regards the first deed but held that both consideration and necessity had been proved with regard to the remaining three and modified the decree accordingly. The plaintiffs preferred a second appeal to the High Court:

Held, (1) that the mortgages being in favour of the defendants themselves, they ought to have clearly established by evidence that the rent charged was fair and that there was necessity for enhancing the rate of rent after every three years;

(2) that the mortgagor having been proved to be extravagant and it not being shown that he managed his property well and carefully, it could not be said that the subsequent three mortgages were for necessity and that, therefore, they were not binding on the plaintiffs. L HAKO v. NIGAHIA 307

A scheme of inheritance recorded in a wajib-ul-arz, which is altogether repugnant to the personal law of the persons affected thereby, cannot, in the absence of instances of succession having taken place according to that scheme, be regarded as evidence of the existence of the custom it purports to set out.

A Muhammadan mother is the natural guardian of her daughter and is bound to provide for her out of her husband's estate. By the mere fact that a mother maintains her daughter and herself out of the income of such estate, she does not acquire an absolute title to the property by prescription, and her possession is not adverse to her daughter, and her possession is not adverse to her daughter.

In the absence of evidence that the daughters of a widow, who own a 7-8ths share in the property left by their father, consented either expressly or by implication to their mother's posing as the ostensible owner of the property, they are not estopped from asserting their title as owners to their share in the property. Custom—concld.

According to the custom prevailing among the Mekans of Kot Bhai Khan in the Tahsil and District of Shahpur, the rule of distribution is the pagwand one and there being no provision in the wajib-ul-arz for any specific rule in the case of collateral succession, the presumption would be that the whole blood and half blood would be on an equality and would succeed together.

When subsequent to a distribution according to the pagwand rule the whole blood brothers form into separate groups becoming joint in food and cultivation among themselves and entirely separate from their half brothers, the whole blood excludes the half blood in subsequent collateral successions.

Where the common ancestor of the parties had two wives and divided his property into two equal shares, giving one to the two sons of one wife and the other to the two sons of the other, who took possession in accordance with this arrangement; and it appeared further that ever since the partition the two sets of brothers had been entirely separated from each other, while as among themselves they had continued to be joint in food and cultivation:

Held, that in the distribution by the common ancestor it was intended that thenceforward each group of sons should hold its own portion of the estate independently of the other and that, therefore, in collateral succession the whole blood excluded the half blood, no custom to the contrary having been established. L AHMAD KHAN v. NABI BAKHSH, 28 P. By section 50 of the Divorce Act, it is the High Court, and not the Civil Procedure Code, that is to regulate the manner in which service of the petition is to be effected. Service should, whenever it is reasonably possible, be effected on the party in person, and that whether he or she is within or without British India. Where such service cannot, for any good reason, be effected, the proper course is, in the absence of general orders, for an application to be made in open Court for a special order as to how it should be effected. The Court would then consider the particular facts existing, and pass orders, being guided by the principles on which the Court in England acts. Personal service and substituted service are expressions which have not the same meaning under Indian and English procedure, and it is not for the parties or their Advocates to decide the method of service, and then to argue that such service is as effectual as service on the party. L B LOW v LOW, 12 BUR. In a prosecution for murder a witness stated that the accused offered to point out the place where the dead body was and that on being questioned as to who had buried the body he said that he had done so:

Held, that the accused's statement that he had buried the body was not admissible in evidence.

The mere fact that a person knows where the body of a murdered man is buried is not in itself sufficient evidence to convict him of the murder.

A person who witnesses a murder and gives no assistance to the victim and after the murder keeps quiet and gives no information to the authorities is little better than an accomplice and his evidence should be received with caution.

Sound principles of criminal jurisprudence require that the indication of error in a judgment of acquittal ought to be clearer and more palpable and the evidence more cogent and convincing in order to justify its being set aside than would be necessary in the case of a conviction. L EMPEROR v. TUREZI, 21 CR. Where in a suit a question arises as to the amount of money spent by a deceased person for a particular purpose, a statement, in his Will specifying the amount so spent is not admissible in evidence under section 32 of the Evidence Act, inasmuch as the statement is not made against the pecuniary or proprietary interest of the deceased.

A memo. of expenses made by the deceased is also inadmissible in evidence, if it was not made in the ordinary course of business.

A consent given in vague and indefinite terms to the trial of a person for any offence which he may possibly have committed under the Explosive Substances Act is not all that is necessary in order to comply with the provisions of section 7 of the Act. The proper course for the Local Government or the Governor-General in Council, as the case may be, to adopt is to state briefly the facts which constitute the offence and to give a consent to the trial of the accused person upon those facts as constituting, in the opinion of the consenting authority, an offence under one or other of the sections of the Act. It is for the Court and not for the Government to decide finally whether upon a given set of facts a particular offence has been committed, and the mere fact that the consenting authority is of opinion that the facts constitute an offence under one section of the Act, is in itself no bar to a conviction of the accused person of another offence under another section, provided of course that the facts stated in the order giving consent are the same as those upon which the conviction is based. In such a case it would probably be necessary for the Court to alter the charge, but this does not mean that fresh consent to the trial upon such altered charge would have to be given by the consenting authority. Section 230 of the Code of Criminal Procedure makes full provision for a case of this kind. L AMAR SINGH v. EMPEROR, 31 P. R. 1919 CR.; 21 CR L J 230 102

Fraud—concld.

—Trial Court, estimate by, value of—Co-sharers, obligations of, inter se.

A purchaser at a revenue sale cannot successfully defend his title where the sale was brought about by fraud wherein the purchaser participated.

The rule that a Court of Appeal should be slow to differ from the primary Court on a question of estimate of oral testimony cannot apply to a case where some important witnesses never appeared before the trial Judge and were examined on commission, while some others were for the first time examined by the Appellate Court at the request of both the parties to the appeal.

The determination in a cause should be founded upon a case either to be found in the pleadings or involved in or consistent with the case thereby made and a charge of fraud must be substantially proved as laid, so that when one kind of fraud is charged, another kind of fraud cannot, upon failure of proof, be substituted for it. But every variance between pleading and proof is not fatal. The Court must carefully consider whether the objection is one of form or of substance. The rule that the allegations and the proof must correspond is intended to serve a double purpose, namely, first, to apprise the defendant distinctly and specifically of the case he is called upon to answer so that he may properly make his defence and may not be taken by surprise, and secondly, to preserve an accurate record of the cause of action as a protection against a second proceeding formed upon the same allegations.

The fact that a revenue sale is brought about by deliberate default on the part of the agents of one of the co-sharers who is charged with the duty to deposit regularly the Government dues proportionate to his share, does not render inapplicable the principle that due regard must be had to the relative position of co-sharers in respect of the payment of revenue and to the need of demanding from each such measure of candid dealing and good faith as will ensure that a co-sharer is not tempted to make a deliberate default with a view to ousting his co-sharers and appropriating to himself their common property.

Fraud is an extrinsic collateral act which vitiates the most solemn proceedings of Courts of Justice and avoids all judicial acts.

No party to a fraudulent transaction can be allowed to derive any benefit from it and the Court is always reluctant to condone the fraud and to permit the participants therein to retain the advantage.

Under the Hindu Law, the guardian of a minor widow can exercise all the powers which the minor has and in alienating the minor's properties it is competent to the guardian to convey not only the widow's limited interest but also the absolute interest which, under certain circumstances, she can convey.

Prima facie, any person, whether a limited owner or full owner, suing to recover property on the ground that an alienation thereof is invalid must be deemed to act for the benefit of the estate and not for his personal benefit.

A compromise decree in a suit by a widow against an alienee stands on no higher footing than a conveyance by her and unless it is shown that it has all the elements of a valid alienation by a limited owner, it is not enforceable against the reversioners. M SRINIVASA AIYER v. THIRUVENGADA MAISTRY, 26 M. Inasmuch as the members of a joint Mitakshara family have no specific share, an appeal by some of such members against a decree to enforce an alienation of the family property must be against the entire decree and Court-fees must be paid on the amount decreed, and not on the appellants' share of that amount. Pat RUPAN RAUT v. PITAMBAR LAL 233

——— Succession—*Personal law or law of domicile, whether and when governs migrator—*Dayabhaga or Mitakshara—Burden of proof—Presumption—Observance of mixed customs and ceremonies, effect of.

A Hindu family residing in a particular province of India is presumed to be governed by the law of the place where it resides. But where it is shown to have migrated from one province to another, the presumption is that it carried with it the laws and customs as to succession and family relation prevailing in the province from which it came. This presumption, however, is rebuttable by proof that the family has adopted the laws and usages of the place to which it has migrated.

Where there is no proof of migration, the burden lies upon the party making the assertion to prove that a family is governed in matters of succession by some law other than the law of the place where it resides. This burden may be discharged by proof of instances of succession consistent with the former law and inconsistent with the latter law The evidence to support the case that the family has conformed to religious or social rites and usages consistent with the former and inconsistent with the latter law may also strengthen his case because there is in Hindu Law a close connection between religion and succession to property.

the alienation, the onus is shifted on to the person challenging the alienation to show that there was no legal necessity.

In such a case if the plaintiff alleges that the widow has sold more than was necessary, it lies upon him to show that so much of the land as he alleges was required for legal necessity could have been sold, otherwise the Court is entitled to presume that the widow could not have sold less than what she did in order to realise the sum required for necessary purposes. B MADHAV KRISHNA DESHPANDE v. Under the Hindu Law a widow cannot, except for special purposes, alienate of her own free will the property received by her from her husband. For religious or charitable purposes or for purposes conducive to the spiritual welfare of her husband she has a much larger power of disposition than she possesses for purely worldly purposes, and to support an alienation for the last named purpose she must show necessity

The mere payment of a debt to a previous creditor is no justification for an alienation by a widow under the Hindu Law, nor does the purchase of house by her after the alienation furnish such justification.

It is the duty of an alienee from a Hindu widow to prove to the satisfaction of the Court that the transfer is binding on the collateral relations of the widow's late husband. L GOWARDHAN DAS v VIRU MAL, 1 L. 48; 66 P. L R. 1920; 41 P. W. R. 1920 47

A claim for maintenance by a female member of a joint family is a personal claim against members of the family, and can only be made a charge on the family property by an order of the Court or by a properly executed document.

Generally speaking, the transferee of joint property from the properly authorised member of a joint family takes that property free of any claims to maintenance by female members of the family.

A Court will not allow an heir to recover family property from a widow, entitled to be maintained out of it, before securing proper maintenance for her.

Hindu Law—concld.

When a person entitled to dispose of family property not charged with any maintenance disposes of that property in favour of an innocent purchaser without notice of any personal claims imposed on the transferor, there is no obligation upon the vendee to fulfil the personal obligations of his vendor, and this would be so even if he had such notice 8 PARVATI DEVANNA JAGADAL v. The market value of land is the price that an owner willing, and not obliged, to sell might reasonably expect to obtain from a willing purchaser with whom he was bargaining for the sale and purchase of the land.

In determining the amount to be awarded as the market value of the interests of a tenure-holder and the sub-tenants under him in land acquired under the Land Acquisition Act, in respect of which the rent was enhanced prior to the acquisition and a premium paid to the landlord in lieu of higher rent, the tenure-holder is entitled to the capitalized value of the rent as enhanced in addition to the amount paid as premium.

The fact that a tenancy is of a precarious nature, that is to say, is held by tenants-at-will with no transferable interest in the land, and who may at any time be called upon by the tenure-holder to leave the land, is no justification for the conclusion that the interests of these tenants have no market value, especially where it is found that frequent sales of their interests have taken place and substantial prices realized. In such cases it is the commercial value of the rights, and not abstract legal rights, that must be looked at in determining the market value of such rights. C GIRISH CHANDRA ROY v. SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA, 24 C. I, Arts 48, 49—Damages, measure of.*

Where a lease is granted on the basis of a map and the map exhibits the boundaries of the land demised, the general rule is that the map is decisive on the question of boundaries. If, however, the map contradicts the unambiguous text of the title, the map must give way to the text, although every effort must be made to reconcile any apparent discrepancy. This rule is only applicable where the map is referred to for further elucidation of the text, the text being in no way subordinate to the map, which may elucidate but which may not contradict the text.

A property may be described by various terms some of which may be sufficient to define the property with certainty, whereas the rest may add a description which is untrue. In such a case, the additional terms cannot be treated as words restricting the previous description. They are simply rejected as a false demonstration. But this rule is subject to an important qualification, namely, that every endeavour must be made to give full effect to all the terms of description. It is also subject to another rule, namely, that the additional words are not rejected as importing a false description, if they can be read as words of restriction.

Lease—contd.

A trespasser wrongfully working a vein of coal from an adjoining mine acquires possession only of the coal worked and cannot be said to be in possession of the mine itself.

Covenants that touch and concern the thing demised, as distinguished from those which are collateral thereto, run with the land and bind assignees.

A covenant by the lessee of a mine not to work the mine in a certain direction and to have a barrier between the mine leased to him and another mine, is a covenant which concerns the thing demised and runs with the land and is, therefore, binding on the lessees assignees.

Where the question arises whether a transfer of an interest in a lease is an assignment of the lease or an under-lease, the test to be applied is to see whether the lessee under the head lease has parted with his whole interest or with a greater interest than he himself possessed. If he has, then the instrument of transfer, by whatever name it may be called, is in reality an assignment.

A lease of the entire interest of a lessee, subject to a power of surrender, operates as an assignment of the lease and not as an under-lease, and the assignee is liable for the breach of covenants running with the land.

An under-lessee incurs liability on a covenant of a restrictive character of which notice, whether actual or constructive, can be imputed to him. If a person by the leave of another, who is bound by a covenant as to the use of land, enters into possession with notice of the obligation, he will be restrained from violating that covenant.

Every person who acquires a lease-hold interest is bound to investigate the title of his lessor and is affected with constructive notice of any covenant contained in any document forming part of the chain of title of his lessor.

In an action by the lessor of a mine against his lessee to recover damages for wrongful extraction and carrying away of coal, the lessee cannot plead in defence misrepresentation as to the area demised. If there is misrepresentation as to the area demised, the lessee might renounce the lease or obtain an abatement of the rent but so long as the lease stands, he is bound to respect the boundary.

A suit to recover the value of coal wrongfully cut and appropriated by the defendant from the plaintiff's mine is governed by Article 48 of Schedule I of the Limitation Act and time begins to run when the plaintiff first learns in whose possession the coal removed is.

In assessing damages in such a suit the Court should see whether the defendant has acted fairly and honestly, or inadvertently, or under a mere mistake, or under a bonâ fide belief of title, and if he has, he should be allowed the expense both of getting and severing and of bringing to bank. If, on the other hand, the defendant has acted without any colour of title, or in a manner wholly unauthorised and unlawful, or if his conduct has been negligent or wilful, he is not entitled to an allowance for getting and severing, although he might be allowed the expenses of getting to bank. Pat LODNA COLLIERY CO., LTD. v. BEPIN BEHARY BOSE, 1 P. Where there is no express penalty of forfeiture in respect of a lease or license, a mortgage by the lessee or licensee does not give a cause of action for ejectment; but a sale does, as it involves an entire abandonment of the transferor's rights in favour of another person.

The Court of Wards is not an agent for a disqualified proprietor and its action is not, therefore, binding on him in the matter of collection of rent.

The mere receipt of rent by a taluqdar for a year or two after release of his estate from the management of the Court of Wards, i e, before there was time to acquire knowledge of intricate matters affecting his rights, cannot be held to amount to an admission.

Where a taluqdar ignorantly collects rent from a vendee from a perpetual and heritable but non-transferable lessee, and it is found that before him the Court of Wards in management of his estate did the same with full notice of the sale, this would prove that the vendee was recognised merely as an ordinary tenant but not as a person holding special rights U P B R FATEH BAHADUR SINGH v. NAGENDRA BAHADUR SINGH, 7 O L. The term "judgment" in clause 10 of the Letters Patent, Lahore High Court, includes any interlocutory judgment which decides, so far as the Court pronouncing the judgment is concerned, whether finally or temporarily, any question materially in issue between the parties and directly affecting the subject-matter of the suit.

An order on an application to stay execution pending appeal is a judgment, and as such is appealable.

The practice in the Lahore High Court is to stay execution of a decree in a pre-emption suit, so far as immoveable property is concerned, except in regard to costs, provided the decree-holder is permitted to recover from the Court the money deposited by him in compliance with the terms of the decree without prejudice to his right to redeposit it in the event of the failure of the appeal L GOKAL CHAND v. SANWAL DAS, 12 P. Held, that Article 97 had been rightly applied, and as B's possession under the purchase was an existing consideration so long as such possession lasted, limitation commenced from the time he was dispossessed, and that as the suit was instituted within the period prescribed by that Article, it was not barred by limitation.

In sending back the papers to the Collector, the Court merely enforces what it has already ordered and no fresh application for execution is necessary.

An application to send the papers back to the Collector is governed by Article 181 or 182 of Schedule I to the Limitation Act, according as it may be for the continuance of the previous execution proceeding or for taking a step-in-aid of execution, and not by Article 163. O LAL BASANT SINGH v. There is no custom in force in South Malabar entitling a landlord, in cases of Karamkari and Adimayavana tenures, to resume the holding on alienation thereof by the grantee.

The Sudder Court proceedings of 1856 and judicial decisions generally, however they are entitled to respect, are not conclusive on the legal incidents of a tenure and should not be given undue weight in the face of evidence as to custom.

Malabar Law and usage—concld.

Per Krishnan, J.—The ignorance of a grantee's assignees as to the inalienability and liability to forfeiture of a tenure, for which the landlord is not responsible, cannot raise any estoppel against him nor can the fact that he did not enforce his right of forfeiture at any prior period bar his right or raise any estoppel against him.

The inference of prima facie inalienability from the right of reversion in the landlord is not a necessary or valid inference at all, nor does a permanent right of cultivation imply inalienability.

The only safe method to find out if any particular right is a customary incident of a tenure is to take evidence of custom, in the absence of authoritative rulings or statements about it.

Where inalienability and liability to forfeiture are set up as incidents of a tenure, it is for the landlord to prove them, as prima facie all property should be taken as alienable.

Prima facie, alienation of any portion of a holding would offend against the rule of inalienability, if there is one; and, unless it can be shown that under the very custom which imposes the rule of inalienability the rule does not apply to partial alienations, it must be held that a partial alienation will be sufficient to work a forfeiture.

Actual knowledge, as distinguished from means of knowledge, is necessary to infer waiver or implied contract, as in such cases the intention of the party whose act is said to constitute the waiver or the implied contract has to be looked to.

Under Article 143 of the Limitation Act, the forfeiture itself is the starting point for limitation, not the lessor's knowledge of the forfeiture.

The existence or non-existence of an alleged custom is a mixed question of law and fact and a finding about it is revisable by the High Court in second appeal.

There is a distinction between inalienability and resumability. The one does not follow from the other, the right of resumption and re-entry on alienation must be expressly given, it cannot be inferred from inalienability alone. M ZAMORIN RAJA AVERGAL OF CALICUT v. UNIKAT KARNAVAN SAMU NAIR, 38 M. In determining whether the right of subrogation exists, it is not the hand that pays the money that has to be taken into account, but the intention of the parties whether by paying the money the earlier mortgage was intended to be kept alive must be looked to. Mere payment of money would not by itself give rise to the right where the payment is voluntary, but if there is a contract between the mortgagor and the mortgagee that the latter should pay off the earlier mortgage and if in pursuance of that contract money is paid, then the party paying is entitled to subrogation.

Even if there is a partial discharge of the earlier mortgage, to that extent the principle of subrogation would apply.

A mortgagee who pays off an earlier mortgage is not only entitled to the rights of that mortgagee but also to the rights of the mortgagees who were paid off by the mortgage amount .. ABARTHORAMAN KUTTI v. ITTIKAPARAMBILATHAN, (1920 M W. N 14"; 11 L. W. 215; 27 M. L. T. 92 658

Any alteration in a bill of exchange which changes the identity of the contract contained therein must be regarded as a material alteration.

An alteration in the time when the instrument is due and payable is a material alteration and avoids the instrument.

When a bill is materially altered it is discharged, and the law does not allow the party claiming under it to fall back upon the contract as it existed prior to the alteration.

A mere demand of money does not amount to a presentment for payment. In order to comply with the law the holder must exhibit the bill to the person from whom he demands payment and offer to deliver it upon payment.

Under section 13 of the Oudh Estates Act a transfer of property, whether by gift or Will, to be effective, must be registered and attested: the fact that the document evidencing the transaction became merged in a decree in a suit to which the transferee was not a party, would not make any difference.

Although section 90 of the Evidence Act enables a Court to presume the genuineness of a document thirty years old, it is due to the party against whom the document is produced to be afforded an opportunity of rebutting the presumption, and if this is done, the party producing the document is entitled to an opportunity of proving fully the deaths of the witnesses or of producing the attesting witnesses, in which case there would be no necessity to apply the presumption.

When a person having a right to make a transfer transfers full proprietary title, the enjoyment of which is subject to the life-estate of a certain person and endeavours to fetter the succession to the estate, effect must be given to the transfer of full proprietary title, and the attempt to fetter the succession should be ignored.

Where in support of his title a party has a valuable piece of evidence which he produced and proved before the lower Court, the fact that he omitted to lay due stress upon it in the Court, would not prevent him from advancing a plea based on that evidence in appeal.

Where a transfer by gift falls under the provisions of sections 13 and 15 of the Oudh Estates Act, the rights of the transferee are governed by the personal law, as modified by custom, if any, to which he is subject and not by any custom of succession prevailing in the taluka, and the property becomes his self-acquired property which, in the event of his dying intestate, would descend under the rules of his personal law.

Where it is sought to establish the existence of a special custom of succession in a particular family the fact that there is an abundance of evidence that proves that the custom prevails in other families in the tribe, would not be of any avail. O NARAIN SINGH v DEPUTY COMMISSIONER, PARTABGARH, 7 O. A previous denial of the title of the vendor by a person does not deprive the latter of a right of pre-emption under the Oudh Laws Act.

A sale of a share in a law suit does not give rise to a right of pre-emption.

The question whether a sale is a genuine sale or a mere sale of a share in a law suit is one to be determined on the facts of each case.

The mere fact that legal proceedings are necessary to obtain possession of the property sold is no ground for holding that the sale does not give rise to a right of pre-emption.

Where it was found that the vendor could not but be out of possession of his share of the property sold by him and that he sold the whole share belonging to him, and not merely a part of that share with a view to enlist the assistance of the vendee for contribution towards the expenses of legal proceedings on the consideration that the vendee was to be rewarded by a portion of the subject-matter of the suit in the event of the litigation being successful:

A sub-settlement can be granted under the Oudh Sub-settlement Act only in certain circumstances specified in that Act, and the refusal to grant such a sub-settlement, not accompanied by an adverse finding as to an under-proprietary right, does not necessarily destroy such under-proprietary right as the claimant might otherwise have possessed.

At the first Regular Settlement the claim of the defendant's ancestors for a sub-settlement of a village of which the plaintiff was superior proprietor was dismissed, but they were held to be birt-holders entitled to the dasaundh right and a decree for dasaundh right was passed in their favour on the 30th April 1872. The defendant and his predecessors, however, continued in undisturbed possession after that decree. The plaintiff sought to eject the defendant through the Revenue Courts, but was unsuccessful. He then brought the present suit for a declaration that the defendant was a tenant-at-will and had no proprietary or under-proprietary rights in the lands in dispute:

Held, that the suit must fail, that the defendant was a birtdar or under-proprietor, and that, even if

Press Act (I of 1910), s. 4 (1)—Section, whether ultra vires of Indian Legislature—"Government established by law in British India," meaning of—Articles in newspaper, general tone of, to cause hatred—Forfeiture by Government, whether justified

Section 4 of the Press Act is not ultra vires of the Indian Legislature.

The phrase "Government established by law in British India" means the established authority which governs the country and administers its public affairs, and includes the representatives to whom the task of Government is entrusted.

Where the general tone of articles in a newspaper shows a set purpose to cause "the ruling class in India" to be hated and despised, the Local Government would be justified in exercising the powers conferred upon it by section 4 of the Press Act, and passing an order of forfeiture. A SUNDAR LAL, In the matter of the application of, 18 A. At the time of making an order of adjudication against the partners of a firm the Court need not make any order as to the course of administration in insolvency with reference to the joint estate of the firm and the separate estates of the partners. That is a matter that must be considered and determined during the course of the insolvency proceedings.

A transfer of property with intent to delay or defeat creditors is an available act of insolvency, and although a notice suspending payment of debts by one of the partners of a firm cannot be used for the purpose of getting an order of adjudication against the firm, it can be used for the purpose of showing whether or not transfers which were made shortly before the petition of insolvency were made for the purpose of defeating or delaying the creditors. C DEBENDRA CHANDRA v. PURUSOTTAM DAS 186

Held, that under the circumstances of the case the lower Appellate Court ought not to have gone out of its way to exercise the discretion of extending time in favour of the plaintiffs.

Railways Act—concld.

The "preference" forbidden by sections 42 and 43 of the Railways Act refers to goods traffic and rates charged upon traders and does not apply to passengers and, inasmuch as a special tribunal is appointed for the decision of questions thereunder, the ordinary Civil and Criminal Tribunals have no jurisdiction to deal with questions of preference.

A person who enters a compartment of a Railway carriage reserved by a Railway Administration for the use of passengers of a particular class to which he does not belong, and refuses to leave when required to do so by a Railway servant, renders himself liable to the penalty provided by section 109 of the Railways Act.

Transfer of Property Act (IV of 1882), ss. 6, 43, scope of Transfer by expectant heir of chance of succession—Mortgage of reversionary rights—Mortgagor's subsequent succession to property, effect of—Pardanashin lady, document executed by, when can be enforced.

An expectant heir, who transfers a portion of the property included in the succession which he expects, does transfer his chance of succession so far as that portion of the property is concerned.

Section 6 of the Transfer of Property Act does not prohibit the transfer of a spes successionis All that it provides is that such a transfer cannot be made for the reason that a spes successionis is not property and, therefore, the execution of a document purporting to transfer the spes successionis purports to transfer property which does not exist.

In order to bring a transaction within the scope of section 43 of the Transfer of Property Act it is not necessary that the representation made by the transferor should be false: it is sufficient that his representation should be erroneous.

B. sued C the mother of her deceased husband H, for recovery of a certain amount with interest secured by a mortgage executed by C in favour of H. hypothecating her reversionary rights in her father's property and undertaking to repay the mortgage-debt as soon as she should obtain possession of the property. In addition to other pleas about consideration, etc., it was urged on behalf of the defendant that the mortgage was void inasmuch as at the time of its execution, C was not in possession of the property but had with regard to it merely a spes successionis. It appeared that subsequent to the execution of the deed of mortgage C. succeeded to the property and obtained possession:

Held, (1) that the document executed by C, inasmuch as it was a mortgage of property which did not exist at the time, was inoperative as a conveyance but was operative as an executory agreement which attached to the property the moment it was acquired by the mortgagor:

(2) that as C's title in the property had become complete, she was bound to satisfy the plaintiff's claim.

When a person with a defective title purports and intends to mortgage property, any interest subsequently acquired by him in that property is available in equity to make the mortgage effectual, even though the defect in the title is apparent on the face of the document.

In order to enforce a document executed by a pardanashin lady, all that is necessary is to convince the Court that the transaction was a fair one and that the lady understood the act to which she was subscribing L BHAGWATI v. CHAOLI, 2 U. P. L. R. (L) 73 693

The fact that the attesting witnesses were present when a document was executed is a sufficient compliance with the provisions of section 59 of the Transfer of Property Act.

A lease, dated the 7th December 1907, was executed by three out of four lessees on the 9th December 1907. The fourth lessee executed the lease on the 18th December 1907. Among other things, the lease contained a clause for the furnishing of security by the lessees within fifteen days A security bond was given on the 23rd December 1907. The surety sought to escape from his liability under the bond on the ground that the time limit fixed by the lease for furnishing security had run out before the 23rd December 1907:

Held, (1) that as between the lessor and lessees the lease was made a complete and valid document on the 18th December 1907, and that, consequently, time had not run out on the date of the security bond, and the surety was liable under it.

(2) that, in any case, the clause in the lease fixing the time for giving security was a clause solely for the benefit of the lessor, and was capable of being waived and was in fact waived. A KIFAYAT ULLAH KHAN v. SRI RAGHUNATHJI, 18 A. L. J. 105; 2 U. P. L. R. (A) 53 230

A mortgagor seeking to redeem any one mortgage is, in the absence of a contract to the contrary, entitled to do so without paying any money due under any separate mortgage on property other than that comprised in the mortgage which he seeks to redeem, and the onus of establishing such a contract lies upon the mortgagee.

As consolidation has the effect of interfering with the right of a mortgagor to redeem a mortgage on one property without being required to redeem another mortgage relating to a different property, a Court of Justice will always struggle against an interference with the mortgagor's right, unless the covenant is shown to be express and unequivocal. L JIWAN DAS v. THARAJ, 5 P. aquæ is presumed to vest in the riparian owners. But this presumption is capable of being rebutted.

The Madras Land Encroachment Act does not affect pre-existing rights and does not supersede the rights of riparian proprietors.

If a party fails to prove all that he wishes to prove, he can be given a decree at least in respect of that which he succeeds in establishing.

A person does not lose his title to land by its mere submersion under water, so long as the land is identifiable. Non-resistance to vis major such as flood, which causes the change of a river course, cannot be treated as evidence of acquiescence or of abandonment of rights by a riparian owner.

There is no special custom having the force of law in the Palghat Taluk by which all river accretions and river-beds are vested in the Crown

The question whether the facts proved and found satisfy the requirements of law to establish a custom is a question of law and one which the High Court can and must consider in second appeal. M OLAPPAMANANNA NANAKAL v. SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA, 12 L. W. 371 770

There is a presumption in favour of the due execution and attestation of a Will which is apparently duly executed.

A Will is not revoked by the subsequent insanity of the testator.

Where a testator has given instructions for a Will when he is of sound mind but is not in a normal state of mind at the time of the execution of the deed drawn up in accordance with those instructions, he must be deemed to be of sound mind when it is executed.

A person's mental faculties may be affected by his physical weakness, but he may still be capable of devising and executing a Will of a simple character. L WOOLMER v. DALY, 1 L. 173 798

——— Widow succeeding under Will—Adoption by widow—Bequest by widow in favour of third person—Debt due to estate, adjustment of, with adopted son—Adopted son, whether competent to give discharge—Liability of debtor to successor under Will of widow.

Under the Will of her late husband, C. inherited his entire estate. She adopted a son B., and executed a Will in favour of the plaintiff, who on her death took possession of the estate and applied for Probate of the Will. B. opposed the grant of Probate and instituted a suit against the plaintiff for possession of C.'s estate. A compromise was eventually effected between the parties, whereby B. executed a sale in favour of the plaintiff of whatever rights he may have had as the adopted son of C. The plaintiff then brought the present suit to recover from the defendant upon three bonds executed by him in favour of C. The defendant pleaded that he had adjusted the claim by payment to B. The Appellate Court dismissed the claim, on the ground that the effect of the compromise between B. and the plaintiff was to transfer B.'s rights subject to all his liabilities and subject to all that he had done as regards the property up to the date of the compromise. On second appeal:

Held, that the decision was erroneous; that as the sale in favour of the plaintiff contained no reservation that the giving of a discharge to debtors by B. would be recognised, and as there was no admission by the plaintiff that B. had any right to C.'s estate as adopted son, B. had no right to give a discharge to the defendant, and that consequently the adjustment with him could not be set up against the plaintiff. N RAMLAL v. DATTU 418
